PREFACE

This anthology is designed as something more than a mere collection of masterpieces and memorable passages. The selections have been compiled for the twofold purpose of furnishing in convenient form characteristic examples of the major streams of ancient, mediæval, and modern European literature, and of illustrating the literary, philosophic, and critical background of the English-speaking peoples.

These two aims are more closely bound together than is commonly taken for granted. The editors, in choosing their selections, have been moved primarily by the fact that in the midst of a multiplicity of courses offered in the field of literature there is great need for widening the student's cultural horizon. In past years entirely too many graduates have left college without an adequate knowledge of literature other than English or without even an acquaintance with the names of those outstanding European authors of the past and present whose works are our common literary heritage. This situation has been remedied in more recent years by the establishment, in many colleges and universities, of courses in General Literature which offer a suitable survey of the content and trend of world literature, and it is the editors' trust that the present volume may enlarge, or at least strengthen, this movement not only through a novel choice of material but also by means of an arrangement which presents a more closely-knit view of the development of European literature. Then, again, the editors are firmly of the belief that no intelligent appreciation of English literature is possible without at least a bowing acquaintance with the literary forms in other languages which have done most to fix the traditions of literature in England and America. They share with a constantly increasing number of teachers of English the realization that the literatures of English-speaking peoples are actually a part of the great stream of European tradition and that the attitude of looking at English literature as largely an isolated phenomenon is at variance with the modern method of approach in other fields of cultural history.

For the earlier periods of European literature the task of selection has been greatly facilitated by the fact that certain ancient masterpieces have long been recognized as part of the literary inheritance of all cultivated readers of English. The inclusion of Homer, Vergil, Theocritus, and the Greek drama requires no argument, and even an approximate recognition of our debt to Greece and Rome requires some knowledge of the epic of the Argonauts, the Greek Anthology, Longinus' famous Treatise Concerning Sublimity, Roman comedy, and the tragedies of Seneca, whose work, along with that of Plautus and Terence, ranked high in the estimation of English dramatists during the Renaissance. The sacred writings of the Hebrews and the Arabian Nights, though not European in origin, have influenced European literature and thought so profoundly and over so long a period as to justify fully their inclusion in such a collection as the present.

As we approach the modern period, the problem of making a selection at once representative and yet capable of being included in a single volume becomes, it is true, more and more difficult, but is nevertheless not insoluble. The recognition of the part played in later writings by the literature and thought of the Middle Ages explains the inclusion of examples drawn not only from Italian, Old French, Germanic, and Celtic, but also from mediæval Latin. During the Renaissance such great names as Petrarch, Rabelais, Montaigne, and Cervantes come to mind at once, while even the most superficial survey requires some recognition of the French Pléiade (see Ronsard), the romantic epic (see Ariosto), the great dramatic activity of Calderon and Lope de Vega in Spain (see The Star of Seville), and the Italian novella (see Bandello), a literary form which furnished a host of plots for dramas and romances in England.

During the last three centuries European literature has increased enormously in extent and has become more genuinely cosmopolitan in character. The intelligent reader should be aware not only of the splendid outburst of drama in seventeenth-century France, but also of the work of Lessing in Germany, of Goldoni in Italy, and of the more recent movements represented by Ibsen, Hauptmann, and other dramatists. Again, in the field of the short story, no one interested in prose fiction can afford to be ignorant of the fact that short stories of marked distinction exist not only in French but also in Russian, Italian, and German, while in Spain narrative fiction has within the last few generations enjoyed a veritable Golden Age. Le Sage's Gil Blas deserves to be known to all readers of English literature, both because of its intrinsic merit and because it forms an important link in a long chain of realistic fiction extending from Lucian to modern times.

Unavoidable limitations of space have necessitated the exclusion of a few well-known masterpieces, especially in the ancient period where, for example, it was found impossible to include more than one selection each from Greek and Latin comedy and tragedy. Occasionally a slightly less-known work has been chosen in preference to a more generally accepted masterpiece, the better to illustrate the development of a certain literary trend, but these works are in every case just as typical of the author's thought and style and deserve recognition by the modern reader. Even with the necessary omissions and alternatives, the editors, basing their conclusions on an experience of some fifteen years with general courses in literature, believe that the selections chosen are those which have in the main had the most vital and lasting influence upon the world's culture and that they cover about all that the reader can assimilate within the limits of an ordinary course in European literature.

The general order followed in the arrangement of the selections is chronological, by periods (Ancient, Mediæval, the Renaissance, the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, the Age of Romanticism, and the Modern Period) and by types within each period. This arrangement has not only assured a useful continuity, in that any type, like epic or drama, can be studied by itself in entirety — for which purpose a separate Index by Types appears at the end of the volume — but it has also enabled the editors to prefix to each period, as such, a comprehensive preliminary essay dealing with the general trend of the period as a whole, its chief characteristics and literary monuments, as well as with the historical development of each specific type of literature within that age. The student will find, moreover, in connection with each selection not only its dates but also a brief introduction pointing out the significance and influence of the author's work. In a great many instances details of biography, as well as the larger matters of literary history and criticism, have been provided, so that the anthology may well be used without any manual of literary history.

Additional editorial aid has been provided in notes which, for greater convenience, are placed at the foot of the page. The footnotes contain everything that is essential for the clearer reading of the text. Not only do they make clear words and expressions having obsolete or unusual meanings and passages difficult of interpretation, but they explain classical mythological allusions, literary events, and other matters as well. At the same time care has been taken to make them brief, pertinent, and really explanatory, so that they will not clog the process of reading the text.

The volume contains two useful indexes. That at the beginning follows the chronological order of the selections, by periods, types of literature, selections and authors; that at the end of the volume is arranged by types of literature and within each section the order of authors is alphabetical.

The editors wish to express their appreciation to the various publishing companies who have allowed them to use copyrighted material; due acknowledgment and specific reference are to be found in each introductory essay throughout the book.

ANCIENT PERIOD

ANCIENT PERIOD

The two main streams of literature that flow down to us from the ancient world come from Oriental and from Græco-Roman civilization.

The literature of the Orient is in itself as varied as that of Europe. For our present purposes, however, we need consider only that portion which is significant for English literary tradition. The most influential of all is the Hebrew literature in the Old Testament. This literature represents a long period of development, reaching from the stern, bare chronicles of war and conquest in Kings and Judges to the gentle cynicism of Ecclesiastes (p. 166). It includes the impassioned oratory of Isaiah, unequaled in the history of man for eloquence and divine fire, the melting lyrics of the Song of Songs, the melodious cadences of the Psalms (p. 227), the simple, idyllic narrative of Ruth (p. 330), the homely wisdom of Proverbs, and the fiery protests of Job (p. 159) against the assaults of Heaven. Practically every form of literature is represented save the epic and the drama, and certainly the spirit, if not the form, of the epic is present in the account of Moses's rescue of the Israelites, and the spirit of drama flashes forth in every speech of the great prophets, not to speak of the distinctly dramatic background and effect of the Book of Job. The extent of the influence exerted by this body of literature on modern life and thought is beyond human power to estimate.

The selections printed in this volume, by reason of their secular surroundings, may serve to call to the notice of readers already familiar with the Old Testament the purely literary value in these writings as distinct from their philosophical and religious significance.

Other Oriental literatures such as Sanskrit, Persian, and Arabian, began to make their strongest impression on the Western mind about the middle of the eighteenth century, when English and Continental scholars set about the work of placing translations at our disposal. Lacking the stimulus of religious interest the non-Biblical literature of the Orient gained recognition but slowly. With the rise of Romantic philosophy and the consequent enthusiasm over the remote beginnings of European culture, translations began to appear in large numbers. Sanskrit literature came into the ken of the West with the Vedic hymns, the epics, the dramas of Kalidasa, and various books of wisdom. The tales of the East, which had long been entertaining Europe in Western disguise, now came out under their own colors in the magnificent Thousand and One Nights (p. 432). Persia contributed the immortal epic story of Sohrab and Rustem in the Shah Nameh (Book of the Kings) and the pensive quatrains of Omar the Tent-maker (p. 453).

The reader who approaches Oriental literature for the first time is likely to find himself more surprised by its similarity to Western literature than by its strangeness. The current tendency toward the investing of all things Oriental with a mysterious and exotic garb has had a misleading effect. In bold military fervor the Shah Nameh is hardly inferior to the heroic tales of the West; the stories of the Thousand and One Nights are as literal and undecorative as the medieval fabliaux; and certainly the plays of Kalidasa are no more esoteric in tone than the religious dramas of England and France. * There are certain features, however, that we may note as characteristically Oriental: a rather marked tendency toward didacticism and sentimentality; an apparent indifference to the literary virtues of condensation and compactness; and a strongly sympathetic feeling for Nature.

Western European literature begins with the Greeks; specifically, with Homer. It is impossible to doubt that there was a long tradition of literary composition before him, but the records have disappeared, and the two great epics, the Iliad (p. 5) and the Odyssey (p. 29), remain for us the starting point. The spirit and the intellectual temper of the Greeks differed from that of the Orientals on the one hand and from that of Modern Europe on the other. * In the Greek mind there was clarity, vivaciousness, wit, majesty, — a dozen of those qualities which we most admire, and yet there was absent one quality which separates it definitely from the modern mind. Some call this quality a sense of infinity; others call it romance. For the

Although few of them learned to read Homer in Greek, they were able to catch the fire of his genius and to obtain a glimpse of departed glories. Once discovered, his fame spread rapidly. More translations were made, and, as the knowledge of Greek increased, editions were printed. The Troy material, already known to Europe through Dictys and Dares, received a fresh impetus from the rediscovery of the true Homeric version, and thenceforward Homer and the Fall of Troy became the literary property of the Western World.

The Iliad not only took its rightful place in the ranks of literature, but it also became a model for the construction of epic poetry. Much of the attention it received in this respect was a result of the popularity of Aristotle's rules of poetic art.¹ The followers of Aristotle looked upon Homer as the embodiment of all the Aristotelian excellences.

The first selection from the Iliad here given is from Book XI. Hence a brief résumé of the events leading up to that point will be useful. The Greeks are besieging the city of Troy in an attempt to regain possession of Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta. She has been abducted by Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy. At the time the story opens the Greeks are afflicted with a pestilence sent by the gods as punishment for the capture of Chryseis, daughter of a priest of Apollo. Chryseis is held by Agamemnon, brother of Menelaus, and, when he is forced to surrender her to avert further calamities, he demands that he be given Briseis, another captive, held by Achilles. This injustice arouses the wrath of Achilles and he withdraws from action, taking his men with him. He asks his mother Thetis to intercede with Jupiter for him. Jupiter yields to her plea and sets about distressing the Greeks in various ways. He sends to Agamemnon a false dream which leads him to propose immediate battle. The armies meet. Menelaus and Paris engage in single combat; Menelaus wins, but Paris is rescued by Venus. A truce is called to discuss terms of peace. Through the intervention of the gods, the truce is broken and war begins again. The story then takes up the exploits of a series of great heroes, one of the most prominent of whom is Diomed. In Book XI the tide of battle is turning against the Greeks.

The selections in this volume are from the translation of Edward, Earl of Derby. London and Toronto: J. M. Dent, New York: E. P. Dutton and Co., 1925.

BOOK XI

Agamemnon distinguishes himself. He is wounded, and retires. Diomed is wounded by Paris; Ulysses by Socus. Ajax with Menelaus flies to the relief of Ulysses, and Eurypylos, soon after, to the relief of Ajax. While he is employed in assisting Ajax, he is shot in the thigh by Paris, who also wounds Machaon. Nestor conveys Machaon from the field. Achilles despatches Patroclus to the tent of Nestor, and Nestor takes that occasion to exhort Patroclus to engage in battle, clothed in the armour of Achilles.

Now rose Aurora ² from Tithonus' bed,
To mortals and Immortals bringing light;
When to the ships of Greece came Discord
down, Despatch'd from Jove, with dire portents of war.
Upon Ulysses' lofty ship she stood,
The midmost, thence to shout to either side,

Or to the tents of Ajax Telamon,³
Or of Achilles, who at each extreme, Confiding in their strength, had moor'd their ships.

5 There stood the Goddess, and in accents
loud
And dread she call'd, and fix'd in ev'ry
breast
The fierce resolve to wage unwearied
10 war;

And dearer to their hearts than thoughts of
home

Or wish'd return, became the battlefield.
Atrides,⁴ loudly shouting, call'd the 15 Greeks

To arms: himself his flashing armour donn'd.

First on his legs the well-wrought greaves ⁵
he fix'd,

20 Fasten'd with silver clasps; his ample chest

A breastplate guarded, giv'n by Cinyras ⁶
In pledge of friendship; for in Cyprus' isle

² Ajax, son of Telamon, was second only to Achilles in heroic accomplishments.

³ Agamemnon, son of Atreus.

⁴ Father of Adonis.

⁵ Goddess of the dawn.

⁶ Armor for the leg below the knee.

He heard the rumour of the glorious fleet
 About to sail for Troy; and sought with gifts
 To win the favour of the mighty King.
 Ten bands were there inwrought of dusky bronze,
 Twelve of pure gold, twice ten of shining tin:
 Of bronze six dragons upwards tow'rd's the neck
 Their length extended, three on either side:
 In colour like the bow,¹ which Saturn's son
 Plac'd in the clouds, a sign to mortal men:
 Then o'er his shoulder threw his sword;
 bright flash'd
 The golden studs; the silver scabbard shone,
 With golden baldrick fitted; next his shield
 He took, full-siz'd, well-wrought, well-prov'd in fight;
 Around it ran ten circling rims of brass;
 With twenty bosses round of burnish'd tin,
 And, in the centre, one of dusky bronze.
 A Gorgon's head,² with aspect terrible,
 Was wrought, with Fear and Flight encircled round:
 Depending from a silver belt it hung;
 And on the belt a dragon, wrought in bronze,
 Twin'd his lithe folds, and turn'd on ev'ry side,
 Sprung from a single neck, his triple head.
 Then on his brow his lofty helm he plac'd,
 Four-crested, double-peak'd, with horse-hair plumes,
 That nodded, fearful, from the warrior's head.
 Then took two weighty lances, tipp'd with brass,
 Which fiercely flash'd against the face of Heav'n:
 Pallas³ and Juno⁴ thund'ring from on high
 In honour of Mycenæ's wealthy lord.⁵

Forthwith they order'd, each his charioteer,
 To stay his car beside the ditch,⁶ themselves,
 On foot, in arms accoutred, sallied forth,
 And loud, ere early dawn, the clamour rose.
 Advanc'd before the cars, they lin'd the ditch;
 Follow'd the cars, a little space between:
 But Jove with dire confusion fill'd their ranks,
 Who sent from Heav'n a show'r of blood-stain'd rain,
 In sign of many a warrior's coming doom,
 Soon to the viewless shades untimely sent.
 Meanwhile upon the slope, beneath the plain,
 The Trojan chiefs were gather'd; Hector's self,⁷ Polydamas, Æneas,⁸ as a God
 In rev'rence held; Antenor's three brave sons,
 Agenor's godlike presence, Polybus,
 And, heav'nly fair, the youthful Acamas.
 In front was seen the broad circumference
 Of Hector's shield; and as amid the clouds
 Shines forth the fiery dog-star, bright and clear,
 Anon beneath the cloudy veil conceal'd;
 So now in front was Hector seen, and now
 Pass'd to the rear, exhorting; all in brass,
 His burnish'd arms like Jove's own lightning flash'd.
 As in the corn-land of some wealthy
 Lord
 The rival bands of reapers mow the swathe,
 Barley or wheat; and fast the trusses fall;
 So Greeks and Trojans mow'd th' opposing ranks;
 Nor these admitted thought of faint retreat,
 But still made even head; while those, like wolves,

⁵ Agamemnon.

⁶ Apparently the besieging Greeks had constructed along the shore a temporary fortification, surrounded by a ditch. From this they sallied forth to meet the Trojans on the plain before the city walls.

⁷ Hector, son of Priam and brother of Paris, was the greatest warrior of the Trojans.

⁸ Son of Anchises, later immortalized by Vergil in the Æneid.

Rush'd to the onset; Discord, Goddess dire,
 Beheld, rejoicing; of the heav'nly pow'rs
 She only mingled with the combatants;
 The others all were absent; they, serene, 5
 Repos'd in gorgeous palaces, for each Amid Olympus' deep recesses built.
 Yet all the cloud-girt son of Saturn blam'd,
 Who will'd the vic'try to the arms of Troy.
 He heeded not their anger; but withdrawn 10
 Apart from all, in pride of conscious strength,
 Survey'd the walls of Troy, the ships of Greece,
 The flash of arms, the slayers and the slain. 15 While yet 'twas morn, and wax'd the youthful day,
 Thick flew the shafts, and fast the people
 fell
 On either side; but when the hour was 20
 come
 When woodmen, in the forest's deep recess, Prepare their food, and wearied with the toil
 Of felling loftiest trees, with aching arms 25
 Turn with keen relish to their midday
 meal;
 Then Grecian valour broke th' opposing ranks,
 As each along the line encourag'd each; 30
 First sprang the monarch Agamemnon
 forth,
 And brave Bienor slew, his people's guard;
 And, with the chief, his friend and charioteer,
 Oileus; he, down-leaping from the car,
 Stood forth defiant; but between his brows
 The monarch's spear was thrust; nor aught avail'd
 The brass-bound helm to stay the weapon's 40
 point;
 Through helm and bone it pass'd, and all the brain
 Was shatter'd; forward as he rush'd, he fell.
 Them left he there, their bare breasts 45
 gleaming white, Stripp'd of their arms; and hasten'd in pursuit
 Of Antiphus and Isus, Priam's sons,
 A bastard one, and one legitimate, 50
 Both on one car; the bastard held the reins:
 Beside him stood the gallant Antiphus.
 Them, as they fed their flocks on Ida's heights,
 Achilles once had captive made, and bound
 With willow saplings, till for ransom freed.
 5 The mighty monarch, Agamemnon, drove Through Isus' breast his spear; his weighty sword
 Descended on the head of Antiphus
 Beside the ear, and hurl'd him from his car;
 These of their armour he despoil'd in haste,
 Known to him both; for he had seen them
 oft Beside the ships, when thither captive brought 15 From Ida by Achilles, swift of foot.
 As when a lion in their lair hath seiz'd
 The helpless offspring of a mountain doe,
 And breaks their bones with ease, and with strong teeth 20 Crushes their tender life; nor can their dam,
 Though close at hand she be, avail them
 aught;
 For she herself, by deadly terror seiz'd,
 25 Through the thick coppice and the forest
 flies,
 Panting, and bath'd in sweat, the mon-
 ster's rush;
 So dar'd no Trojan give those brethren aid,
 30 Themselves in terror of the warlike Greeks.
 Peisander next, and bold Hippolochus,
 Sons of Antimachus ('twas he who chief,
 Seduc'd by Paris' gold and splendid gifts,
 Advis'd the restitution to refuse 35 Of Helen to her Lord), the King assail'd; Both on one car; but from their hands had dropp'd
 The broider'd reins; bewilder'd there they stood;
 40 While, with a lion's bound, upon them sprang
 The son of Atreus; suppliant, in the car,
 They clasp'd his knees; "Give quarter,
 Atreus' son,
 45 Redeem our lives; our sire Antimachus
 Possesses goodly store of brass and gold,
 And well-wrought iron; and of these he fain
 Would pay a noble ransom, could he hear
 That in the Grecian ships we yet surviv'd." 50 Thus they, with gentle words, and tears, imploring;
 But all ungentle was the voice they heard
 In answer; "If indeed ye be the sons

Of that Antimachus, who counsel gave,
When noble Menelaus came to Troy
With sage Ulysses, as ambassadors,
To slay them both, nor suffer their return,
Pay now the forfeit of your father's guilt."¹
He said, and with a spear-thrust through his breast

Peisander dash'd to earth; backward he fell.

Down leap'd Antilochus; but with his sword

Atrides sever'd both his hands and neck,
And in the dust, a headless block, he roll'd.
These left he there; and where the thickest throng

Maintain'd the tug of war, thither he flew,
And with him eager hosts of well-greav'd
Greeks.

Soon on the Trojans' flight enforc'd they hung,

Destroying; foot on foot, and horse on
horse;

While from the plain thick clouds of dust arose

Beneath the armèd hoofs of clatt'ring
steeds;

And on the monarch Agamemnon press'd, Still slaying, urging still the Greeks to arms.

As when amid a densely timber'd wood Light the devouring flames, by eddying
winds

Hither and thither borne, fast falls the copse

Prostrate beneath the fire's impetuous
course;

So thickly fell the flying Trojans' heads
Beneath the might of Agamemnon's arm;
And here and there, athwart the pass of
war,

Was many an empty car at random whirl'd
By strong-neck'd steeds, of guiding hands bereft;

Stretch'd on the plain they lay, more welcome sight

To carrion birds than to their widow'd wives.

But Hector, from the fray and din of war,
And dust, and blood, and carnage, Jove withdrew.

Still on Atrides press'd, the Greek pursuit
5 With eager shouts exciting; past the tomb
Of Ilus, ancient son of Dardanus,²

And tow'rd the fig tree, midway o'er the plain,

Straining to gain the town, the Trojans fled;

While loudly shouting, his unconquer'd
hands

With carnage dyed, Atrides urg'd their flight.

15 But when the Scæan³ gates of oak were reach'd,

They made a stand, and fac'd the foe's assault.

Some o'er the open plain were yet dis-pers'd;

20 As heifers, by a lion scatter'd wide,
At dead of night; all fly; on one descends
The doom of death; her with his pow'rful teeth

25 He seizes, and, her neck first broken, rends,
And on her entrails gorging, laps her blood;

So these the monarch Agamemnon chas'd,
Slaying the hindmost; they in terror fled:
Some headlong, backward some, Atrides'

30 hand
Hurl'd from their chariot many a warrior
bold;

So forward and so fierce he bore his spear.
But as he near'd the city, and stood be-

35 neath
The lofty wall, the Sire of Gods and men
From Heav'n descended; on the topmost height

Of Ida's⁴ spring-abounding hill he sat;
40 And while his hand the lightning grasp'd, he thus

To golden-wingèd Iris gave command:
"Haste thee, swift Iris,⁵ and to Hector
bear

45 From me this message; bid him, that as long

As Agamemnon in the van appears,

¹ The foregoing episode furnishes an example of the way in which Homer sketches in the incidents that preceded the story.

² Founder of Troy.

³ One of the entrances to Troy.

⁴ A mountain range not far from Troy from which the gods watched the combat. Another Mt. Ida in the center of Crete is connected with the worship of Zeus.

⁵ The female messenger of the gods, usually identified with the rainbow.

Raging, and dealing death among the ranks,

He from the battle keep himself aloof,
But urge the rest undaunted to maintain
The stubborn fight; but should Atrides, struck

By spear or arrow, to his car withdraw,
He shall from me receive such pow'r to slay,

As to the ships shall bear him, ere the sun Decline, and Darkness spread her hallow-
ing shade."

Thus he; to Troy, obedient to his word,
From Ida's heights swift-footed Iris sped:

Amid the horses and the well-fram'd cars
The godlike Hector, Priam's son, she found,
And stood beside him, and address'd him thus:

"Hector, thou son of Priam, sage as Jove

In council, he the Universal Lord
Sends thee by me this message; that as long

As Agamemnon in the van appears,
Raging, and dealing death amid the ranks,
Thou from the battle keep thyself aloof,
But urge the rest undaunted to maintain
The stubborn fight; but should Atrides, struck

By spear or arrow, to his car withdraw,
Thou shalt from him receive such pow'r to slay

As to the ships shall bear thee, ere the sun Decline, and Darkness spread her hallow-
ing shade."

Swift-footed Iris said, and disappear'd;
But from his chariot Hector leap'd to earth,

Hither and thither passing through the ranks,

With brandish'd jav'lins urging to the fight.

Loud, at his bidding, rose the battle cry;
Back roll'd the tide; again they fac'd the Greeks:

On th' other side the Greeks their masses form'd,

In line of battle rang'd; oppos'd they
stood;

And in the front, to none content to cede
The foremost place, was Agamemnon seen.

Say now, ye Nine,¹ who on Olympus dwell,

Of all the Trojans and their fam'd Allies,
Who first oppos'd to Agamemnon stood.
5 Iphidamas, Antenor's gallant son,
Stalwart and brave; in fertile Thracia bred,
Mother of flocks; him, in his infant years,
His grandsire Cisseus, fair Theano's sire,
In his own palace rear'd; and when he reach'd

The perfect measure of his glorious youth,
Still in his house retain'd him, and to wife
Gave him his daughter; from the marriage straight

15 He, with twelve beak'd ships that own'd his sway,

Set forth to join the glory of the Greeks.
His well-trimm'd ships upon Percote's shore

20 He left; and came himself on foot to Troy;
Who now confronted Atreus' godlike son.

When near they drew, Atrides miss'd his aim,

25 His spear diverging; then Iphidamas
Beneath the breastplate, striking on his belt,

Strove with strong hand to drive the weapon home;

30 Yet could not pierce the belt's close-plaited
work;

The point, encounter'd by the silver fold,
Was bent, like lead; then with his pow'rful hand

35 The monarch Agamemnon seiz'd the spear,
And tow'rd him drew, and with a lion's strength

Wrench'd from his foeman's grasp; then on his neck

40 Let fall his sword, and slack'd his limbs in death.

There, falling in his country's cause, he slept

The iron sleep of death; unhappy he,

45 Far from his virgin-bride, yet unpossess'd,
Though bought with costly presents; first he gave

A hundred steers; and promis'd thousands more

50 Of sheep and goats from out his countless flocks.

Him Agamemnon of his arms despoil'd,

¹ The nine Muses, divinities who presided over poetry, the arts, and sciences.

And to the crowd of Greeks the trophies bore.

But when Antenor's eldest-born beheld, Cöon, th' observ'd of all men, bitt' rest
grief

His eyes o'ershadow'd, for his brother's
fate;

And, unperceiv'd by Atreus' godlike son, Standing aside, he struck him with his
spear,

Through the mid arm, beneath the elbow's
bend;

And drove right through the weapon's glitt'ring point.

Writh'd with the pain the mighty King of
men;

Yet from the combat flinch'd he not, nor quail'd:

But grasping firm his weather-toughen'd
spear

On Cöon rush'd, as by the feet he drew
His father's son, Iphidamas, away,

Invoking all the bravest to his aid;
And as he drew the body tow'rd the crowd,

Beneath the bossy shield the monarch thrust

His brass-clad spear, and slack'd his limbs
in death;

Then near approaching, ev'n upon the corpse

Of dead Iphidamas, struck off his head:

So by Atrides' hand, Antenor's sons,
Their doom accomplish'd, to the shades were sent.

Then through the crowded ranks, with spear and sword,

And massive stones, he held his furious
course,

While the hot blood was welling from his arm;

But when the wound was dry, and stanch'd
the blood,

Keen anguish then Atrides' might subdued.

As when a woman in her labour-throes
Sharp pangs encompass, by Lucina sent,

Who rules o'er child-birth travail, ev'n so keen

The pangs that then Atrides' might subdued.

Mounting his car he bade his charioteer Drive to the ships; for sore his spirit was pain'd;

But loud and clear he shouted to the Greeks:

"O friends, the chiefs and councillors of
Greece,

5 Yours be it now our sea-borne ships to guard:

Since Jove, the Lord of counsel, through the day

Wills not that I the battle should maintain."

10 He said: and swiftly to the ships were driv'n

His sleek-skin'd coursers; nothing loth they flew;

15 With foam their chests were fleck'd, with dust their flanks,

As from the field their wounded Lord they
bore:

But Hector, as he saw the King retire,
20 To Trojans and to Lycians call'd aloud:

"Trojans and Lycians, and ye Dardans
fam'd

In close encounter, quit ye now like men;
Put forth your wonted valour; from the 25 field

Their bravest has withdrawn, and Jove on me

Great glory hath shed; now headlong on the Greeks

30 Urge your swift steeds, and endless honour gain."

His words fresh courage rous'd in ev'ry
breast:

And as a hunter cheers his sharp-fang'd hounds

On forest boar or lion; on the Greeks
So cheer'd the valiant Trojans Priam's

son,

Illustrious Hector, stern as blood-stain'd
40 Mars.

Bent on high deeds, himself in front ad-vanc'd,

Fell on the masses as a whirlwind falls,
Lashing with furious sweep the dark-blue

50 sea.

Say then, who first, who last, by Hector's hand,

Whom Jove had will'd to crown with honour, died.

50 Assæus first, and then Autonöus,
Opites, and Opheltius, Dolops, son

Of Clytus, and Æsumnus, Agelas
And Orus, and the brave Hipponöus;

All these the chiefs of Greece; the nameless
 crowd
 He scatter'd next; as when the west wind drives
 The clouds, and battles with the hurricane,
 Before the clearing blast of Notus¹ driv'n;
 The big waves heave and roll, and high aloft
 The gale, careering, flings the ocean spray;
 So thick and furious fell on hostile heads
 The might of Hector. Now had fearful deeds
 Been done, and Greeks beside their ships had fall'n
 In shameful rout, had not Ulysses thus
 To Diomed, the son of Tydeus, call'd:
 "Why, son of Tydeus, should we thus relax
 Our warlike courage? come, stand by me
 now,
 True friend! if Hector of the glancing helm
 Our ships should capture, great were our disgrace."
 Whom answer'd thus the valiant Diomed:
 "Beside thee will I stand, and still endure;
 But brief will be the term of our success,
 Since Jove, the Cloud-compeller, not to us,
 But to the Trojans, wills the victory."
 He said, and from his car Thymbræus hurl'd,
 Through the left breast transfix'd:
 Ulysses' hand
 His charioteer, the brave Molion, slew.
 These left they there, no more to share the
 fight;
 Then turning, spread confusion 'mid the
 crowd:
 As turn two boars upon the hunter's pack
 With desp'rate courage, turning so to bay,
 Those two, the Trojans scatt'ring, gave the Greeks,
 From Hector flying, time again to breathe.
 A car they seiz'd which bore two valiant chiefs,
 Sons of Percotian Merops; he, o'er all In lore prophetic skill'd, would fain at
 home
 Have kept them from the life-destroying
 war:
 But they, by adverse fate impell'd to seek Their doom of death, his warning voice despis'd.
 These two, of strength and life at once bereft,
 The son of Tydeus, valiant Diomed, Stripp'd of their armour; while Ulysses
 slew
 Hippodamus, and bold Hyperochus.
 Thus Jove, from Ida's height beholding,
 held
 His even scale, each party slaught'ring
 each.
 Then with his spear Tydides² through the loins
 15 Agastrophus, the son of Pæon, smote;
 No car had he at hand, whereto to fly:
 But, ill-advis'd, had in th' attendants' charge
 His horses left far off; while he himself 20 Rush'd 'mid the throng on foot, and met his doom.
 Hector's quick glance athwart the files beheld,
 And to the rescue, with a shout, he sprang, 25 The Trojan columns following; not unmov'd
 The valiant Diomed his coming saw,
 And thus bespoke Ulysses at his side:
 "On us this plague, this mighty Hector,
 falls:
 Yet stand we firm, and boldly meet the shock."
 He said, and, poising, hurl'd his pond'rous
 spear,
 And not in vain; on Hector's head it struck
 His helmet's crest, but, brass encount'ring brass,
 Himself it reach'd not; for the visor'd
 40 helm,
 Apollo's gift, three-plated, stay'd its force.
 Yet backward Hector sprang amid the
 crowd,
 And on his knees he dropp'd, his stalwart
 hand Propp'd on the ground; while darkness
 veil'd his eyes.
 But ere Tydides, following up his spear, Attain'd from far the spot whereon he
 fell,
 Hector reviv'd, and, mounting quick his car,
 Diomed, son of Tydeus,

¹ The south wind.² Diomed, son of Tydeus.

Drove 'mid the crowd, and 'scap'd the doom of death.

Then thus, with threat'ning spear, Tydides cried:

"Yet once again, vile hound, hast thou escap'd;

Thy doom was nigh; but thee thy God hath sav'd,

Phœbus, to whom, amid the clash of spears,

Well mayst thou pray! We yet shall meet again;

When I shall end thee, if a guardian God I too may claim; meanwhile from thee I turn,

And others seek on whom my hap may light."

He said, and turn'd him of his arms to strip

The son of Pæon; but beside the stone That mark'd where men of old had rais'd a mound

To Ilus, Dardan's son, the ancient chief, There crouching, Paris, fair-hair'd Helen's lord,

Against the son of Tydeus bent his bow.

He from the breast of brave Agastrophus Had stripp'd the corslet; from his shoulders broad

The buckler, and the helmet from his head, When Paris bent his bow, and not in vain His arrow launch'd; Tydides' dexter foot Right through it pierc'd, and pinn'd it to the ground.

Joyous he laugh'd, and from his hiding-place

Sprang forth, and thus in tones of triumph cried:

"Thou hast it! not in vain my shaft hath flown!

Would that, deep buried in thy flank, it touch'd

Thy very life! so should our Trojans lose Their panic fear, who now on thee with dread,

As bleating goats upon a lion, look."

To whom, unmov'd, the valiant Diomed:

"Poor archer, trusting to thy bow alone, Vile sland'rer and seducer! if indeed

Thou durst in arms oppos'd to me to stand, Nought would avail thy arrows and thy bow:

And now, because thy shaft hath graz'd my foot,

Thou mak'st thine empty boast: I heed thee not,

5 More than a woman or a puny child:

A worthless coward's weapon hath no point.

'Tis diff'rent far with me! though light it fall,

10 My spear is sharp, and whom it strikes it slays.

His widow's cheeks are mark'd with scars of grief,

His children orphans; rotting on the ground,

15 Red with his blood, he lies, his fun'ral rites By carrion birds, and not by women paid."

Thus while he spoke, Ulysses, spearman bold,

20 Drew near, and stood before him; he, behind,

Sat down protected, and from out his foot The arrow drew; whereat sharp anguish shot

25 Through all his flesh; and mounting on his car

He bade his faithful charioteer in haste Drive to the ships, for pain weigh'd down his soul.

30 Alone Ulysses stood; of all the Greeks Not one beside him; all were panic-struck: Then with his spirit, perturb'd, he commun'd thus:

"Me miserable! which way shall I choose?

35 Great were the mischief, should I fly, and so

Increase the people's terror; yet 'twere worse

Here to be caught alone; and Saturn's son 40 With panic fear the other Greeks hath fill'd.

Yet why, my soul, admit such thoughts as these?

I know that cowards from the battle fly; 45 But he who boasts a warrior's name must learn,

Wounded or wounding, firmly still to stand."

50 While in his mind and spirit thus he mus'd,

Onward the buckler'd ranks of Trojans came,

And, to their harm, encircled him around.

As when a boar, by dogs and stalwart youths
 Attack'd, the shelt'ring thicket leaves, and whets
 The tusks that gleam between his curvèd jaws;
 They crowd around, though ring his clatt'ring tusks,
 And, fearful though it be, await his rush:
 So crowded round Ulysses, dear to Jove, 10
 The Trojans; he, with brandish'd spear aloft,
 Sprang forth, and through the shoulder, from above,
 Deïopites wounded: Thöon next
 He slew, and Ennomus; then with his spear
 Chersidamas, in act to quit his car,
 Thrust through the loins below his bossy shield:
 Prone in the dust, he clutch'd the blood-stain'd soil.
 From these he turn'd; and wounded with his spear
 Charops, the high-born Socus' brother, son 25
 Of Hippasus; then forward sprang, to aid His brother, godlike Socus; close he stood Before Ulysses, and address'd him thus:
 "Far-fam'd Ulysses, as in arms, in wiles Unwearied, thou this day o'er both the 30
 sons
 Of Hippasus, two mighty warriors slain,
 And of their armour spoil'd, shalt make thy boast,
 Or by my spear thyself shalt lose thy life." 35
 He said, and on the shield's broad circle struck:
 Through the bright shield the sturdy weapon drove,
 And through the rich-wrought baldrick, 40
 from the ribs
 Tearing the flesh away; but Pallas seiz'd,
 And turn'd it from the vital parts aside.
 The wound, Ulysses knew, was not to death,
 And back he drew, and thus to Socus cried:
 "Ill-fated thou! thy doom hath found thee now!
 Me hast thou hinder'd from the war 50 awhile;
 But thee to swift destruction and dark death

This day I doom; great glory, of thee subdued, Shall I obtain, and Hades take thy soul."
 Thus he: and Socus, turning, sought to fly;
 But as he turn'd him round, Ulysses' spear
 Behind his neck, between the shoulder blades
 Was driv'n, and through his chest; thund'-ring he fell,
 And o'er his fall Ulysses, vaunting, thus:
 "Socus, thou son of warlike Hippasus,
 Here hast thou found, nor couldst escape, thy doom.
 15 Ill-fated thou! nor sire's nor mother's hand
 Shall gather up thy bones, but carrion birds
 O'er thee shall flap their baleful wings, and tear
 Thy mangled flesh; for me, whene'er I die
 20 The sons of Greece will build my fun'ral pile."
 From out his flesh, and from his bossy shield,
 The spear of Socus, as he spoke, he drew;
 And as he drew it forth, out gush'd his blood,
 With anguish keen. The Trojans, when they saw Ulysses' blood, with clam'rous shouts
 30 advanc'd
 Promiscuous; he, retiring, shouted loud
 To call his comrades; loud as head of man Could bear, he shouted thrice; and thrice his shout 35 The warlike Menelaus heard, and thus
 To Ajax, standing by his side, he spoke:
 "Ajax, thou Heav'n-born son of Telamon,
 Great chief of men, methinks I hear the voice
 Of stout Ulysses, as though left alone,
 And in the stubborn fight cut off from aid,
 By Trojans over-master'd. Haste we then,
 For so 'twere best, to give him present aid.
 45 Brave though he be, yet left alone, I fear Great cause we Greeks may have to mourn his loss."
 He spoke, and led the way; the godlike chief Follow'd his steps: Ulysses, dear to Jove, Surrounded by the Trojan host they found.
 As hungry jackals on the mountain side
 Around a stag, that from an archer's hand

Hath taken hurt, yet, while his blood was warm
 And limbs yet serv'd, has baffled his pursuit;
 But when the fatal shaft has drain'd his strength,
 Thirsting for blood, beneath the forest shade,
 The jackals seize their victim; then if chance
 A hungry lion pass, the jackals shrink
 In terror back, while he devours the prey;
 So round Ulysses, sage in council, press'd
 The Trojans, many and brave, yet nobly he Averted, spear in hand, the fatal hour;
 Till, with his tow'r-like shield before him borne,
 Appear'd great Ajax, and beside him stood.
 Hither and thither then the Trojans fled;
 While with supporting arm from out the crowd
 The warlike Menelaus led him forth,
 Till his attendant with his car drew near.
 Then Ajax, on the Trojans springing, slew
 Doryclus, royal Priam's bastard son;
 Next Pyrasus he smote, and Pandocus,
 Lysander, and Pylartes; as a stream,
 Swoll'n by the rains of Heav'n, that from the hills
 Pours down its wintry torrent on the plain;
 And many a blighted oak, and many a pine
 It bears, with piles of drift-wood, to the sea:
 So swept illustrious Ajax o'er the plain,
 O'erthrowing men and horses; though unknown
 To Hector; he, upon Scamander's banks
 Was warring on the field's extremest left,
 Where round great Nestor¹ and the war-like King
 Idomeneus, while men were falling fast,
 Rose, irrepressible, the battle cry.
 Hector, 'mid these, was working wondrous deeds,
 With spear and car, routing th' opposèd youth;
 Yet had the Greeks ev'n so their ground maintain'd,

But godlike Paris, fair-hair'd Helen's lord,
 Through the right shoulder, with a three-barb'd shaft,
 As in the front he fought, Machaon quell'd:
 For him the warrior Greeks were sore afraid,
 Lest he, as back the line of battle roll'd,
 Might to the foe be left; to Nestor then Idomeneus address'd his speech, and said:
 "O Nestor, son of Neleus, pride of Greece,
 Haste thee to mount thy car, and with thee take Machaon; tow'rd the vessels urge with speed Thy flying steeds; worth many a life is his,
 The skilful leech, who knows, with practis'd hand,
 T' extract the shaft, and healing drugs apply."
 He said: Gerenian Nestor at the word
 Mounted his car, Machaon at his side,
 The skilful leech, sage Æsculapius' son:
 He touch'd his horses; tow'rd the Grecian ships,
 As was his purpose, nothing loth, they flew.
 To Hector then Cebriones, who saw Confus'd the Trojans' right, drew near, and said:
 "Hector, we here, on th' outskirts of the field,
 O'erpow'r the Greeks; on th' other side, our friends
 In strange confusion mingled, horse and man,
 Are driv'n; among them Ajax spreads dismay,
 The son of Telamon; I know him well,
 And the broad shield that o'er his shoulders hangs;
 Thither direct we then our car, where most
 In mutual slaughter horse and foot engage,
 And loudest swells, uncheck'd, the battle cry."
 He said, and with the pliant lash he touch'd
 The sleek-skin'd horses; springing at the sound,

¹ On Mt. Ida have been found two springs answering to Homer's description of the double source of the Scamander.

² A warrior who joined the expedition against Troy in his old age. He was renowned for his wisdom in counsel.

Between the Greeks and Trojans, light they bore
 The flying car, o'er corpses of the slain
 And broken bucklers trampling; all beneath
 Was plash'd with blood the axle, and the rails
 Around the car, as from the horses' feet,
 And from the fellows of the wheels, were thrown
 The bloody gouts; yet on he sped, to join
 The strife of men, and break th' opposing ranks.
 His coming spread confusion 'mid the Greeks,
 His spear awhile withheld; then through the rest,
 With sword, and spear, and pond'rous stones he rush'd,
 But shunn'd the might of Ajax Telamon.
 But Jove, high thron'd, the soul of Ajax fill'd
 With fear; aghast he stood; his sev'nfold shield
 He threw behind his back, and, trembling, gaz'd
 Upon the crowd; then, like some beast of prey,
 Foot slowly following foot, reluctant turn'd.
 As when the rustic youths and dogs have driv'n
 A tawny lion from the cattle fold,
 Watching all night, and baulk'd him of his prey;
 Rav'ning for flesh, he still th' attempt renews,
 But still in vain: for many a jav'lin, hurl'd
 By vig'rous arms, confronts him to his face,
 And blazing faggots, that his courage daunt;
 Till, with the dawn, reluctant he retreats:
 So from before the Trojans Ajax turn'd,
 Reluctant, fearing for the ships of Greece.
 As near a field of corn, a stubborn ass,
 Upon whose sides had many a club been broke,
 O'erpow'rs his boyish guides, and, ent'ring in,
 On the rich forage grazes; while the boys
 Their cudgels ply, but vain their puny strength,
 Yet drive him out, when fully fed, with ease:
 Ev'n so great Ajax, son of Telamon,
 The valiant Trojans and their fam'd Allies,
 Still thrusting at his shield, before them
 5 drove:
 Yet would he sometimes, rallying, hold in check
 The Trojan host; then turn again to flight,
 Yet barring still the passage to the ships.
 10 Midway between the Trojans and the Greeks
 He stood defiant; many jav'lins, hurl'd
 By vig'rous arms, were in their flight received 15 On his broad shield; and many, ere they reach'd
 Their living mark, fell midway on the plain,
 Fix'd in the ground, in vain athirst for blood.
 20 Him thus, hard press'd by thick-thrown spears, beheld Eurypylus, Euæmon's noble son.
 He hasten'd up, and aim'd his glitt'ring spear;
 25 And Apisaon, Phausias' noble son,
 Below the midriff through the liver struck,
 And straight relax'd in sudden death his limbs.
 Forth sprang Eurypylus to seize the spoils:
 30 But godlike Paris saw, and as he stoop'd
 From Apisaon's corpse to strip his arms,
 Against Eurypylus he bent his bow,
 And his right thigh transfix'd; the injur'd limb
 35 Disabling, in the wound the arrow broke.
 He 'mid his friends, escaping death, withdrew,
 And to the Greeks with piercing shout he call'd:
 "O friends, the chiefs and councillors of Greece,
 Turn yet again, and from the doom of death
 Great Ajax save, hard press'd by hostile
 45 spears:
 Scarce can I hope he may escape with life
 The desp'rate fight; yet bravely stand, and aid
 The mighty Ajax, son of Telamon." 50 Thus spoke the wounded hero: round him they
 With sloping shields and spears uplifted stood:

Ajax to meet them came; and when he reach'd
 The friendly ranks, again he turn'd to bay.
 So rag'd, like blazing fire, the furious fight.
 Meanwhile the mares of Neleus, 5 By these a splendid goblet, which from drench'd with sweat, home
 Bore Nestor and Machaon from the field; Achilles saw, and mark'd them where he stood
 Upon his lofty vessel's prow, and watch'd 10
 The grievous toil, the lamentable rout.
 Then on his friend Patroclus from the ship
 He call'd aloud; he heard his voice, and
 forth,
 As Mars majestic, from the tent he came: 15
 (That day commenc'd his evil destiny)
 And thus Menœtius' noble son began:
 "Why call'st thou? what wouldst thou, Peleus' son?"
 To whom Achilles, swift of foot, replied: 20
 "Son of Menœtius, dearest to my soul, Soon must the suppliant Greeks before me
 kneel,
 So insupportable is now their need.
 But haste thee now, Patroclus, dear to Jove: 25
 Enquire of Nestor, from the battlefield Whom brings he wounded; looking from behind
 Most like he seem'd to Æsculapius' son,
 Machaon: but his face I could not see, 30
 So swiftly past the eager horses flew."
 He said: obedient to his friend's command,
 Quick to the tents and ships Patroclus ran.
 They, when they reach'd the tent of 35
 Neleus' son,
 Descended to the ground; Eurymedon
 The old man's mares unharness'd from the car,
 While on the beach they fac'd the cooling 40
 breeze,
 Which from their garments dried the sweat; then turn'd,
 And in the tent on easy seats repos'd.
 For them the fair-hair'd Hecamede mix'd 45
 A cordial potion; her from Tenedos,
 When by Achilles ta'en, the old man
 brought;
 Daughter of great Arsinöus, whom the Greeks
 On him, their sageest councillor, bestow'd.
 Before them first a table fair she spread,
 Well polish'd, and with feet of solid bronze;

On this a brazen canister she plac'd,
 And onions, as a relish to the wine,
 And pale clear honey, and pure barley
 meal:
 By these a splendid goblet, which from
 home
 Th' old man had brought, with golden studs adorn'd:
 Four were its handles, and round each two doves
 Appear'd to feed; at either end, a cup.
 Scarce might another move it from the board,
 When full; but aged Nestor rais'd with ease.
 In this, their goddess-like attendant first
 A gen'rous measure mix'd of Pramnian
 wine:
 Then with a brazen grater shredded o'er
 The goatsmilk cheese, and whitest barley
 meal,
 And of the draught compounded bade them drink.
 They drank, and then, reliev'd the parching thirst,
 With mutual converse entertain'd the hour.
 Before the gate divine Patroclus stood:
 The old man saw, and from his seat arose,
 And took him by the hand, and led him in,
 And bade him sit; but he, refusing, said:
 "No seat for me, thou venerable sire!
 I must not stay; for he both awe and fear
 Commands, who hither sent me to enquire What wounded man thou hast; I need not ask,
 I know Machaon well, his people's guard.
 My errand done, I must my message bear Back to Achilles; and thou know'st thyself,
 Thou venerable sire, how stern his mood:
 Nay, sometimes blames he, where no blame is due."
 To whom Gerenian Nestor thus replied:
 "Whence comes Achilles' pity for the
 Greeks
 By Trojan weapons wounded? knows he not What depth of suff'ring through the camp prevails?
 How in the ships, by arrow or by spear
 Sore wounded, all our best and bravest lie?
 The valiant son of Tydeus, Diomed, Pierc'd by a shaft; Ulysses by a spear,

And Agamemnon's self; Eurypylus
By a sharp arrow through the thigh transfix'd;

And here another whom but now I bring
Shot by a bow, from off the battlefield:
Achilles, valiant as he is, the while
For Grecian woes nor care nor pity feels.
Waits he, until our ships beside the sea,
In our despite, are burnt by hostile fires,
And we be singly slain? not mine is now
The strength I boasted once of active limbs.
Oh, that such youth and vigour yet were mine,

As when about a cattle-lifting raid
We fought th' Eleans; there Itymoneus
I slew, the son of brave Hyperochus,
Who dwelt in Elis¹; and my booty drove.
He sought to guard the herd; but from my
hand

A jav'lin struck him in the foremost ranks: 20
He fell, and terror seiz'd the rustic crowd.
Abundant store of plunder from the plain
We drove; of horn'd cattle fifty herds;
As many flocks of sheep, as many droves
Of swine, as many wide-spread herds of 25
goats,

And thrice so many golden-chestnut mares,
The foals of many running with their dams.
To Pylos, Neleus' city, these we drove By night; and much it gladden'd Neleus' 30
heart,

That I, though new to war, such prize had won.

When morn appear'd, the clear-voic'd heralds call'd

For all to whom from Elis debts were due;
Collected thus, the Pylians' leading men
Division made; for Elis ow'd us much;
Such wrongs we few in Pylos had sustain'd.
The might of Hercules in former years
Had storm'd our town, and all our bravest
slain.

Twelve gallant sons had Neleus; I of these Alone was left; the others all were gone.
Whence over-proud, th' Epeians treated us 45
With insult, and high-handed violence.

A herd of oxen now, and num'rous flock
Of sheep, th' old man selected for himself,
Three hundred, with their shepherds; for to him

Large compensation was from Elis due.
Train'd to the course, four horses, with their cars,

He for the Tripod² at th' Elean games
5 Had sent to run; these Augeas, King of
men,

Detain'd, and bade the drivers home return,
Bootless, and grieving for their horses' loss.
Th' old man his words resenting, and his 10 acts,

Large spoils retain'd; the rest among the
crowd

He shar'd, that none might lose his portion due.

15 These we dispos'd of soon, and to the Gods
Due off'rings made; but when the third day rose,

Back in all haste, in numbers, horse, and
foot,

Our foes return'd; with them the Molion
twins,

Yet boys, untutor'd in the arts of war.
Far off, by Alpheus' banks, th' extremest verge

Of sandy Pylos, is a lofty mound,
The city of Thryum; which around, intent
To raze its walls, their army was encamp'd.
The plain already they had overspread;
When Pallas from Olympus' heights came
30 down

In haste, and bade us all prepare for war.
On no unwilling ears her message fell,
But eager all for fight; but me, to arm
Neleus forbade, and ev'n my horses hid,
35 Deeming me yet unripe for deeds of war.

Yet so, albeit on foot, by Pallas' grace
A name I gain'd above our noblest horse.
There is a river, Minyis by name,
Hard by Arene, flowing to the sea,

40 Where we, the Pylian horse, expecting morn,

Encamp'd, by troops of footmen quickly
join'd.

Thence in all haste advancing, all in arms,
We reach'd, by midday, Alpheus' sacred stream.

There, too'er-ruling Jove our off'rings made,
To Alpheus and to Neptune each a bull,
To Pallas, blue-ey'd Maid, a heifer fair.

50 In order'd ranks we took our ev'ning meal,

¹ In the northwestern part of the Peloponnesus. In its principal town, Olympia, were held the celebrated games in honor of Zeus.

² Trophy.

And each in arms upon the river's brink
Lay down to rest; for close beside us lay Th' Epeians, on the town's destruction bent.

Then saw they mighty deeds of war dis- 5
play'd;

For we, as sunlight overspread the earth,
To Jove and Pallas praying, battle gave.
But when the Pyliaus and th' Epeians met,
I first a warrior slew, and seiz'd his car, 10
Bold spearman, Mulius; Augeas' son-in-law,

His eldest daughter's husband, Agamede,
The yellow-hair'd, who all the virtues knew 15
Of each medicinal herb the wide world grows.

Him, with my brass-tipp'd spear, as on he came,

I slew; he fell; I, rushing to his car,
Stood 'mid the foremost ranks; th' 20
Epeians brave

Fled diverse, when they saw their champion fall,

Chief of their horsemen, foremost in the fight.

With the dark whirlwind's force, I onward
rush'd,

And fifty cars I took; two men in each
Fell to my spear, and bit the bloody dust.

Then Actor's sons, the Molions, had I 30
slain,

Had not th' Earth-shaking God,¹ their mighty sire,

Veil'd in thick cloud, withdrawn them from the field. 35

Then Jove great glory to the Pyliaus gave;
For o'er the wide-spread plain we held
pursuit,

Slaying, and gath'ring up the scatter'd
arms,

Nor till corn-clad Buprasium and the rock
Olenian, and Alesium, term'd the Mound, Stay'd we our steeds; there Pallas bade us turn.

There the last man I slew, and left; the 45
Greeks

Back from Buprasium drove their flying cars
To Pylos, magnifying all the name,
'Mid men, of Nestor, as 'mid Gods, of Jove.

Such once was I 'mid men, while yet I was; 50
Now to himself alone Achilles keeps.

His valour; yet hereafter, when the Greeks Have perish'd all, remorse shall touch his soul.

Dear friend, remember now th' injunctions
giv'n

By old Menœtius, when from Phthian
land

He sent thee forth to Agamemnon's aid:

I, and Laertes' godlike son,² within,

10 Heard all his counsel; to the well-built house

Of Peleus we on embassy had come,
Throughout Achaia's fertile lands to raise The means of war; Menœtius there we found,

Achilles, and thyself within the house;

While in the court-yard aged Peleus slew
And to the Lord of thunder offer'd up

A fatten'd steer; and from a golden bowl
O'er the burnt off'ring pour'd the ruddy wine.

We two, while ye were busied with the flesh,

Stood at the gate; surpris'd, Achilles rose,

25 And took us by the hand, and bade us sit,
Dispensing all the hospitable rites.

With food and wine recruited, I began

My speech, and urg'd ye both to join the
war:

Nor were ye loth to go; much sage advice
Your elders gave; old Peleus bade his son

To aim at highest honours, and surpass

His comrades all; Menœtius, Actor's son,
To thee this counsel gave: 'My son,' he

35 said,
'Achilles is by birth above thee far;

Thou art in years the elder; he in strength
Surpasses thee; do thou with prudent words

And timely speech address him, and advise 40 And guide him; he will, to his good, obey.'

"Such were the old man's words; but thou hast let

His counsel slip thy mem'ry; yet ev'n now
Speak to Achilles thus, and stir his soul,

If haply he will hear thee; and who knows
But by the grace of Heav'n thou mayst prevail?

For great is oft a friend's persuasive pow'r.
But if the fear of evil prophesied,

Or message by his Goddess-mother³

² The sea nymph Thetis.

³ Ulysses.

From Jove, restrain him, let him send thee
forth

With all his force of warlike Myrmidons,¹ That thou mayst be the saving light of Greece.

Then let him bid thee to the battle bear
His glitt'ring arms; if so the men of Troy, Scar'd by his likeness, may forsake the
field,

And breathing time afford the sons of 10
Greece,

Toil-worn; for little pause has yet been theirs.

Fresh and unwearied, ye with ease may drive

To their own city, from our ships and tents,
The Trojans, worn and battle-wearied
men."

Thus he; Patroclus' spirit within him
burn'd,

And tow'rd Achilles' tent in haste he sped.
But, running, as Ulysses' ship he pass'd,
Where was the Council and the Justice-
seat,

And where were built the altars of the 25
Gods,

There met him, halting from the battle-
field,

Shot through the thigh, Euæmon's Heav'n-
born son,

Eurypylus; his head and shoulders dank
With clammy sweat, while from his grievous wound

Stream'd the dark blood; yet firm was still his soul.

Mencæti' noble son with pity saw,
And deeply sorrowing thus address'd the chief:

"Woe for the chiefs and councillors of Greece!

And must ye, far from friends and native
home,

Glut with your flesh the rav'ning dogs of Troy?

Yet tell me this, Heav'n-born Eurypylus; 45
Still do the Greeks 'gainst Hector's giant force

Make head? or fall they, vanquish'd by his spear?"

To whom with prudent speech, 50
Eurypylus:

"No source, Heav'n-born Patroclus, have
the Greeks

Of aid, but all must perish by their ships:
For in the ships lie all our bravest late,

5 By spear or arrow struck, by Trojan hands;
And fiercer, hour by hour, their onset
grows.

But save me now, and lead me to the ships;
There cut the arrow out, and from the wound

With tepid water cleanse the clotted blood:
Then soothing drugs apply, of healing
pow'r,

Which from Achilles, thou, 'tis said, hast learn'd, 15

From Chiron,² justest of the Centaurs, he.
For Podalirius and Machaon both,

Our leeches, one lies wounded in the tents,
Himself requiring sore the leech's aid;

20 The other on the plain still dares the fight."

To whom again Mencæti' noble son:

"How may this be? say, brave Eurypylus,
What must I do? a messenger am I,

Sent by Gerenian Nestor, prop of Greece,
With tidings to Achilles; yet ev'n so

I will not leave thee in this weary plight."

He said, and passing his supporting hand
Beneath his breast, the wounded warrior led

30 Within the tent; th' attendant saw, and spread

The ox-hide couch; then as he lay reclin'd,
Patroclus, with his dagger, from the thigh

45 Cut out the biting shaft; and from the wound .

With tepid water cleans'd the clotted
blood;

Then, pounded in his hands, a root applied
Astringent, anodyne, which all his pain

40 Allay'd; the wound was dried, and stanch'd the blood.

Between Book XI and Book XXII the battle continues, participated in by both gods and men. Patroclus, most beloved friend of Achilles, goes out clad in the latter's armour and is slain by Hector. A large part of the succeeding action is taken up with a description of the fight between the Trojans and the Greeks over his body. Filled with rage and grief for the death of his friend, Achilles re-enters the conflict. As Book XXII opens, Achilles has scattered the Trojans before him. All but Hector, who is guarded by Phæbus Apollo, take refuge within the city.

² The famed centaur who brought up Achilles and taught him riding, hunting, and music.

BOOK XXII

Achilles slays Hector

The fugitives, who thus, like tim'rous fawns,
Sought refuge in the city, dried their 10 sweat,

And drank, and quench'd their thirst, reclining safe

On the fair battlements; but nearer drew,
With slanted shields, the Greeks; yet 15 Hector still

In front of Ilium and the Scæan gate, Stay'd by his evil doom, remain'd without.
Then Phœbus thus to Peleus' godlike son:
"Achilles, why with active feet pursue, 20 Thou mortal, me Immortal? know'st thou not

My Godhead, that so hot thy fury burns?
Or heed'st thou not that all the Trojan host

Whom thou hast scar'd, while thou art here withdrawn,
Within the walls a refuge safe have found?
On me thy sword is vain! I know not death!"

Enrag'd, Achilles, swift of foot, replied:
"Deep is the injury, far-darting King,
Most hostile of the Gods, that at thy hand I bear, who here hast lur'd me from the walls,

Which many a Trojan else had fail'd to reach,

Ere by my hand they bit the bloody dust.
Me of immortal honour thou hast robb'd,
And them, thyself from vengeance safe, 40 hast sav'd:

Had I the pow'r, that vengeance thou shouldst feel."

Thus saying, and on mightiest deeds intent,

He turn'd him city-ward, with fiery speed;
As when a horse, contending for the prize,
Whirls the swift car, and stretches o'er the plain,

Ev'n so, with active limbs, Achilles rac'd. 50
Him first theaged Priam's eyes discern'd,

Scouring the plain, in arms all dazzling bright,

Like to th' autumnal star, whose brilliant ray

5 Shines eminent amid the depth of night,
Whom men the dog-star of Orion¹ call;
The brightest he, but sign to mortal man
Of evil augury, and fiery heat:

So shone the brass upon the warrior's breast.

The old man groan'd aloud, and lifting high

His hands, he beat his head, and with loud voice

Call'd on his son, imploring; he, unmov'd,
Held post before the gates, awaiting there
Achilles' fierce encounter; him his sire,
With hands outstretch'd and piteous tone, address'd:

20 "Hector, my son, await not here alone
That warrior's charge, lest thou to fate succumb,

Beneath Pelides' arm, thy better far!

Accurs'd be he! would that th' immortal 25 Gods

So favour'd him as I! then should his corpse

Soon to the vultures and the dogs be giv'n!
(So should my heart a load of anguish lose)

30 By whom I am of many sons bereav'd,
Many and brave, whom he has slain, or sold
To distant isles in slav'ry; and e'en now,
Within the city walls I look in vain
For two, Lycaon brave, and Polydore,

35 My gallant sons, by fair Læthœ:

If haply yet they live, with brass and gold
Their ransom shall be paid; good store of these

We can command; for with his daughter fair

A wealthy dow'ry aged Altes gave.

But to the viewless shades should they have gone,

Deep were their mother's sorrow and my 45 own;

But of the gen'ral public, well I know

Far lighter were the grief, than if they heard

That thou hadst fall'n beneath Achilles' hand.

Then enter now, my son, the city gates,

¹ The star Sirius which shines at night in the winter and spring only. At the end of summer, it appears just before dawn.

And of the women and the men of Troy
Be still the guardian; not to Peleus' son,
With thine own life, immortal glory give.
Look too on me with pity; me, on whom,
Ev'n on the threshold of mine age, hath
Jove

A bitter burthen cast, condemn'd to see My sons struck down, my daughters
dragg'd away

In servile bonds; our chambers' sanctity 10
Invaded; and our babes by hostile hands
Dash'd to the ground; and by ferocious
Greeks

Enslav'd the widows of my slaughter'd
sons.

On me at last the rav'ning dogs shall feed,
When by some foeman's hand, by sword or lance,

My soul shall from my body be divorc'd;
Those very dogs which I myself have bred, 20
Fed at my table, guardians of my gate, Shall lap my blood, and over-gorg'd shall lie

Ev'n on my threshold. That a youth should fall

Victim to Mars, beneath a foeman's spear,
May well beseem his years; and if he fall
With honour, though he die, yet glorious he!

But when the hoary head and hoary beard, 30
And naked corpse to rav'ning dogs are
giv'n,

No sadder sight can wretched mortals see."
The old man spoke, and from his head he tore

The hoary hair; yet Hector firm remain'd.
Then to the front his mother rush'd, in tears,

Her bosom bare, with either hand her
breast

Sustaining, and with tears address'd him
thus:

"Hector, my child, thy mother's breast
revere;

And on this bosom if thine infant woes 45
Have e'er been hush'd, bear now in mind,
dear child,

The debt thou ow'st; and from within the walls

Ward off this fearful man, nor in the field 50
Encounter; curs'd be he! should he prevail,

And slay thee, not upon the fun'ral bed,

My child, my own, the offspring of my womb,

Shall I deplore thee, nor thy widow'd wife,
But far away, beside the Grecian ships,
5 Thy corpse shall to the rav'ning dogs be
giv'n."

Thus they, with tears and earnest
pray'rs imploring,

Address'd their son; yet Hector firm re-main'd,

Waiting th' approach of Peleus' godlike
son.

As when a snake upon the mountain side,
With deadly venom charg'd, beside his hole

15 Awaits the traveller, and fill'd with rage, Coil'd round his hole, his baleful glances darts;

So fill'd with dauntless courage Hector
stood,

Scorning retreat, his gleaming buckler
propp'd

Against the jutting tow'r; then, deeply
mov'd,

Thus with his warlike soul communion
25 held:

"Oh, woe is me! if I should enter now
The city gates, I should the just reproach Encounter of Polydamas, who first

His counsel gave within the walls to lead
The Trojan forces, on that fatal night

When great Achilles in the field appear'd.
I heeded not his counsel; would I had!

Now, since my folly hath the people slain,
I well might blush to meet the Trojan

35 men,
And long-rob'd dames of Troy, lest some might say,

To me inferior far, 'This woful loss
To Hector's blind self-confidence we owe.'

40 Thus shall they say; for me, 'twere better far,

Or from Achilles, slain in open fight,
Back to return in triumph, or myself
To perish nobly in my country's cause.

45 What if my bossy shield I lay aside,
And stubborn helmet, and my pond'rous
spear

Propping against the wall, go forth to meet

Th' unmatch'd Achilles? What if I engage That Helen's self, and with her all the spoil,

And all that Paris in his hollow ships

Brought here to Troy, whence first this war arose,
 Should be restor'd; and to the Greeks be paid
 An ample tribute from the city's stores,
 Her secret treasures; by solemn oath
 Binding the Trojans nothing to conceal,
 But fairly to the distribution bring Whate'er of wealth our much-lov'd city holds?
 But wherefore entertain such thoughts,
 my soul?
 Should I so meet him, what if he should show
 Nor pity nor remorse, but slay me there,
 Defenceless as a woman, and unarm'd?
 Not this the time, nor he the man, with whom
 By forest oak or rock, like youth and maid,
 To hold light talk, as youth and maid 20 might hold.
 Better to dare the fight, and know at once
 To whom the vict'ry is decreed by Heav'n."

Thus, as he stood, he mus'd; but near 25
 approach'd
 Achilles, terrible as plum'd Mars;
 From his right shoulder brandishing aloft
 The ashen spear of Peleus,¹ while around Flash'd his bright armour, dazzling as the 30 glare
 Of burning fire, or of the rising sun.
 Fear at the sight on valiant Hector seiz'd;
 Nor dar'd he there await th' attack, but left
 The gates behind, and, terror-stricken,
 fled.
 Forward, with eager step, Pelides rush'd.
 As when a falcon, bird of swiftest flight,
 From some high mountain top, on tim'rous 40 dove
 Swoops fiercely down; she, from beneath,
 in fear,
 Evades the stroke; he, dashing through the brake,
 Shrill-shrieking, pounces on his destin'd
 prey;
 So, wing'd with desp'rate hate, Achilles
 flew,
 So Hector, flying from his keen pursuit,
 50 Beneath the walls his active sinews plied.

They by the watch-tow'r, and beneath the wall
 Where stood the wind-beat fig tree, rac'd
 amain
 5 Along the public road, until they reach'd
 The fairly-flowing fount whence issued
 forth,
 From double source, Scamander's eddying
 streams.
 10 One with hot current flows, and from beneath,
 As from a furnace, clouds of steam arise;
 'Mid summer's heat the other rises cold
 As hail, or snow, or water crystallis'd;
 15 Beside the fountains stood the washingtroughs
 Of well-wrought stone, where erst the wives of Troy
 And daughters fair their choicest garments
 wash'd,
 In peaceful times, ere came the sons of Greece.
 There rac'd they, one in flight, and one pursuing;
 25 Good he who fled, but better who pursu'd, With fiery speed; for on that race was stak'd
 No common victim, no ignoble ox:
 The prize at stake was mighty Hector's
 life.
 As when the solid-footed horses fly Around the course, contending for the prize,
 Tripod, or woman of her lord bereft;
 35 So rac'd they thrice around the walls of Troy
 With active feet; and all the Gods beheld.
 Then thus began the Sire of Gods and
 men:
 "A woful sight mine eyes behold; a man
 I love in flight around the walls! my heart
 For Hector grieves, who, now upon the crown
 Of deeply-furrow'd Ida, now again
 45 On Ilium's heights, with fat of choicest bulls Hath pil'd mine altar; whom around the walls,
 With flying speed, Achilles now pursues.
 50 Give me your counsel, Gods, and say, from
 death

¹ The gigantic spear of Achilles's father made from a whole ash tree by Chiron — which only Achilles had the strength to wield.

If we shall rescue him, or must he die,
Brave as he is, beneath Pelides' hand?"

To whom the blue-ey'd Goddess, Pallas,
thus:

"O Father, lightning-flashing, cloud-girt
King,

What words are these? wouldst thou a mortal man,

Long doom'd by fate, again from death preserve?

Do as thou wilt, but not with our consent."

To whom the Cloud-compeller thus replied:

"Be of good cheer, my child! unwillingly
I speak, yet loth thy wishes to oppose:
Have then thy will, and draw not back thy
hand."

His words fresh impulse gave to Pallas'
zeal,

And from Olympus' heights in haste she sped.

Meanwhile on Hector, with untiring hate,

The swift Achilles press'd: as when a hound,

Through glen and tangled brake, pursues
a fawn,

Rous'd from its lair upon the mountain
side;

And if awhile it should evade pursuit,
Low crouching in the copse, yet quests he
back,

Searching unwearied, till he find the trace;
So Hector sought to baffle, but in vain,

The keen pursuit of Peleus' active son.
Oft as he sought the shelter of the gates

Beneath the well-built tow'rs, if haply thence

His comrades' weapons might some aid afford;

So oft his foeman, with superior speed,
Would cut him off, and turn him to the plain.

He tow'rd the city still essay'd his flight;
And as in dreams, when one pursues in

vain,

One seeks in vain to fly, the other seeks
As vainly to pursue; so could not now

Achilles reach, nor Hector quit, his foe.
Yet how should Hector now the doom of

death

Have 'scaped, had not Apollo once again
And for the last time, to his rescue come,

And giv'n him strength and suppleness of limb?

Then to the crowd Achilles with his head Made sign that none at Hector should presume

To cast a spear, lest one might wound, and so

The greater glory obtain, while he himself
Must be contented with the second place.

10 But when the fourth time in their rapid
course

The founts were reach'd th' Eternal Father hung

His golden scales aloft, and plac'd in each
The lots of doom, for great Achilles one,

15 For Hector one, and held them by the midst:

Down sank the scale, weighted with Hector's death,

20 Down to the shades, and Phœbus left his side.

Then to Pelides came the blue-ey'd
Maid,

And stood beside him, and bespoke him
thus:

25 "Achilles, lov'd of Heav'n, I trust that
now

To thee and me great glory shall accrue
In Hector's fall, insatiate of the flight.

30 Escape he cannot now, though at the feet
Of ægis-bearing Jove, on his behalf,

With earnest pray'r Apollo prostrate fall.
But stay thou here and take thy breath,

while I

35 Persuade him to return and dare the
fight."

So Pallas spoke; and he, with joy obey-
ing,

40 Stood leaning on his brass-barb'd ashen
spear.

The Goddess left him there, and went (the form

And voice assuming of Deiphobus)
In search of godlike Hector; him she

found,

And standing near, with wing'd words
address'd:

"Sorely, good brother, hast thou been bested

By fierce Achilles, who around the walls
Hath chas'd thee with swift foot; now stand we both

For mutual succour, and his onset wait."

To whom great Hector of the glancing
helm:
"Deiphobus, of all my brothers, sons
Of Hecuba and Priam, thou hast been Still dearest to my heart; and now the more
I honour thee who dar'st on my behalf,
Seeing my peril, from within the walls
To sally forth, while others skulk behind." To whom the blue-ey'd Goddess thus replied:
"With many pray'rs, good brother, both our sire
And honour'd mother, and our comrades
all
Successively implored me to remain;
Such fear is fall'n on all; but in my soul
On thine account too deep a grief I felt.
Now, forward boldly! spare we not our
spears;
Make trial if Achilles to the ships
From both of us our bloody spoils can bear,
Or by thine arm himself may be subdued."
Thus Pallas lur'd him on with treach'- rous wile;
But when the two were met, and close at
hand,
First spoke great Hector of the glancing
helm:
"No more before thee, Peleus' son, I
fly:
Thrice have I fled around the walls, nor dar'd
Await thine onset; now my spirit is rous'd
To stand before thee, to be slain, or slay.
But let us first th' immortal Gods invoke;
The surest witnesses and guardians they
Of compacts: at my hand no foul disgrace
Shalt thou sustain, if Jove with victory Shall crown my firm endurance, and thy
life
To me be forfeit; of thine armour stripp'd
I promise thee, Achilles, to the Greeks
Thy body to restore; do thou the like."
With fierce regard Achilles answer'd
thus:
"Hector, thou object of my deadly hate,
Talk not to me of compacts; as 'tween men
And lions no firm concord can exist,
Nor wolves and lambs in harmony unite,
But ceaseless enmity between them dwells:
So not in friendly terms, nor compact firm,
Can thou and I unite, till one of us
Glut with his blood the mail-clad warrior
Mars.
Mind thee of all thy fence; behoves thee
now
To prove a spearman skill'd, and warrior brave.
For thee escape is none; now, by my spear,
Hath Pallas doom'd thy death; my comrades' blood,
Which thou hast shed, shall all be now
aveng'd."
He said, and poising, hurl'd his weighty
spear;
But Hector saw, and shunn'd the blow;
he stoop'd,
And o'er his shoulder flew the brass-tipp'd
spear,
And in the ground was fix'd; but Pallas
drew
The weapon forth, and to Achilles' hand,
All unobserv'd of Hector, gave it back.
Then Hector thus to Peleus' matchless
son:
"Thine aim has fail'd; nor truly has my
fate,
Immortal son of Peleus, been to thee
From Heav'n reveal'd; such was indeed thy boast;
But now it seems that flippant was thy
speech,
And cunningly devis'd, in hopes that I Might by thy vaunts be terrified, and so Forgetful of my fame and prowess prove.
Not in my back will I receive thy spear,
if Jove
But through my breast, confronting thee,
Have to thine arm indeed such triumph
giv'n.
Now, if thou canst, my spear in turn elude;
May it be deeply buried in thy flesh!
For lighter were to Troy the load of war,
If thou, the greatest of her foes, wert
slain."
He said, and poising, hurl'd his pond'- rous spear;
Nor miss'd his aim; full in the midst he struck Pelides' shield; but glancing from the shield
The weapon bounded off. Hector was griev'd,
That thus his spear had bootless left his
hand.

He stood aghast; no second spear was nigh:
And loudly on Deiphobus he call'd
A spear to bring; but he was far away.
Then Hector knew that he was dup'd, and
cried,
"O Heav'ns! the Gods above have doom'd my death!
I deem'd indeed that brave Deiphobus
Was near at hand; but he within the walls
Is safe, and I by Pallas am betray'd.
Now is my death at hand, nor far away:
Escape is none; since so hath Jove decreed,
And Jove's far-darting son,¹ who heretofore
Have been my guards; my fate hath found me now.
Yet not without a struggle let me die,
Nor all inglorious; but let some great act,
Which future days may hear of, mark my fall."
Thus as he spoke, his trenchant sword he drew,
Pond'rous and vast, suspended at his side;
Collected for the spring, and forward
dash'd:
As when an eagle, bird of loftiest flight,
Through the dark clouds swoops downward on the plain,
To seize some tender lamb, or cowering
hare;
So Hector rush'd, and wav'd his sharpedg'd sword.
Achilles' wrath was rous'd: with fury wild His soul was fill'd: before his breast he bore
His well-wrought shield; and fiercely on his brow
Nodded the four-plum'd helm, as on the breeze
Floated the golden hairs, with which the crest
By Vulcan's² hand was thickly interlac'd;
And as amid the stars' unnumber'd host,
When twilight yields to night, one star
appears,
Hesper,³ the brightest star that shines in Heav'n, Gleam'd the sharp-pointed lance, which in his right

Achilles pois'd, on godlike Hector's doom Intent, and scanning eagerly to see Where from attack his body least was fenc'd.
All else the glitt'ring armour guarded well,
Which Hector from Patroclus' corpse had stripp'd;
One chink appear'd, just where the collar bone
The neck and shoulder parts, beside the throat,
Where lies expos'd the swiftest road of
death.
There levell'd he, as Hector onward rush'd;
Right through the yielding neck the lance was driv'n,
But sever'd not the windpipe, nor destroy'd
His pow'r of speech; prone in the dust he
fell;
And o'er him, vaunting, thus Achilles
spoke:
"Hector, Patroclus stripping of his arms,
Thy hope was that thyself wast safe;
and I,
Not present, brought no terror to thy soul:
Fool! in the hollow ships I yet remain'd,
I, his avenger, mightier far than he;
I, who am now thy conqu'ror. By the dogs
And vultures shall thy corpse be foully torn,
While him the Greeks with fun'ral rites shall grace."
Whom answer'd Hector of the glancing
helm;
Prostrate and helpless: "By thy soul, thy knees,
Thy parents' heads, Achilles, I beseech,
Let not my corpse by Grecian dogs be torn.
Accept the ample stores of brass and gold,
Which as my ransom by my honour'd sire
And mother shall be paid thee; but my corpse
Restore, that so the men and wives of Troy
May deck with honours due my fun'ral pyre."
To whom, with fierce aspect, Achilles
thus:
"Knee me no knees, vile hound! nor prate
to me
Of parents! such my hatred, that almost

² The Evening Star.

³ Son of Jupiter, god of fire, and divine armorer.

I could persuade myself to tear and eat Thy mangled flesh; such wrongs I have to avenge.

He lives not, who can save thee from the dogs;

Not though with ransom ten and twenty fold

He here should stand, and yet should promise more;

No, not though Priam's royal self should sue

To be allow'd for gold to ransom thee;

No, not ev'n so, thy mother shall obtain

To lay thee out upon the couch, and mourn O'er thee, her offspring; but on all thy limbs

Shall dogs and carrion vultures make their feast."

To whom thus Hector of the glancing
helm,

Dying: "I know thee well; nor did I hope
To change thy purpose; iron is thy soul.

But see that on thy head I bring not down
The wrath of Heav'n, when by the Scæan gate

The hand of Paris, with Apollo's aid

Brave warrior as thou art, shall strike thee
down."

Ev'n as he spoke, his eyes were clos'd in
death;

And to the viewless shades his spirit fled,
Mourning his fate, his youth and vigour
lost.

To him, though dead, Achilles thus
replied:

"Die thou! my fate I then shall meet,
whene'er

Jove and th' immortal Gods shall so decree."

He said, and from the corpse his spear
withdrew,

And laid aside; then stripp'd the armour
off,

With blood besmear'd; the Greeks around him throng'd,

Gazing on Hector's noble form and face,
And none approach'd that did not add a
wound:

And one to other look'd, and said, "Good faith,

Hector is easier far to handle now,
Than when erewhile he wrapp'd our ships in fire."

Thus would they say, then stab the dead
anew.

But when the son of Peleus, swift of foot,
Had stripp'd the armour from the corpse,

5 he rose,

And, standing, thus th' assembled Greeks
address'd:

"O friends, the chiefs and councillors of
Greece,

10 Since Heav'n hath granted us this man to slay,

Whose single arm hath wrought us more of ill

Than all the rest combin'd, advance we
now

Before the city in arms, and trial make

What is the mind of Troy; if, Hector slain,

They from the citadel intend retreat,

Or still, despite their loss, their ground maintain.

20 But wherefore entertain such thoughts,
my soul?

Beside the ships, unwept, unburied, lies Patroclus; whom I never can forget,

25 While number'd with the living, and my limbs

Have pow'r to move; in Hades though the dead

May be forgotten, yet ev'n there will I

30 The mem'ry of my lov'd companion keep.

Now to the ships return we, sons of Greece,

Glad pæans singing! with us he shall go;

Great glory is ours, the godlike Hector
slain,

35 The pride of Troy, and as a God rever'd."

He said, and foully Hector's corpse misus'd;

Of either foot he pierc'd the tendon
through,

40 That from the ankle passes to the heel,

And to his chariot bound with leathern
thongs,

Leaving the head to trail along the ground;

Then mounted, with the captur'd arms,

45 his car,

And urg'd his horses; nothing loth, they flew.

A cloud of dust the trailing body rais'd:

Loose hung his glossy hair; and in the dust

50 Was laid that noble head, so graceful once;

Now to foul insult doom'd by Jove's decree,

In his own country, at a foeman's hand.

So lay the head of Hector; at the sight
 His aged mother tore her hair, and far From off her head the glitt'ring veil she threw,
 And with loud cries her slaughter'd son 5
 bewail'd.
 Piteous, his father groan'd; and all around
 Was heard the voice of wailing and of woe.
 Such was the cry, as if the beetling height
 Of Ilium all were smould'ring in the fire. 10 Scarce was the old man by the crowd restrain'd
 From issuing forth beyond the Dardan
 gates;
 Low in the dust he roll'd, imploring all, 15
 Entreating by his name each sev'ral man:
 "Forbear, my friends; though sorrowing,
 stay me not;
 Leave me to reach alone the Grecian ships,
 And there implore this man of violence, 20
 This haughty chief, if haply he my years
 May rev'rence, and have pity on my age.
 For he too has a father, like to me;
 Peleus, by whom he was begot, and bred,
 The bane of Troy; and, most of all, to 25
 me
 The cause of endless grief, who by his hand
 Have been of many stalwart sons bereft.
 Yet all, though griev'd for all, I less lament,
 Than one, whose loss will sink me to the grave.
 Hector! oh, would to Heav'n that in mine
 arms
 He could have died; with mourning then 35 and tears
 We might have satisfied our grief, both she Who bore him, hapless mother, and myself."
 Weeping, he spoke; and with him wept 40
 the crowd:
 Then, 'mid the women, Hecuba pour'd
 forth
 Her vehement grief: "My child, oh, whither now, 45
 Heart-stricken, shall I go, of thee bereft,
 Of thee, who wast to me by night and day
 A glory and a boast; the strength of all
 The men of Troy, and women? as a God
 They worshipp'd thee: for, living, thou on 50
 all Great glory shedd'st; but fate hath found thee now."

Weeping, she spoke; but nought as yet was known
 To Hector's wife; to her no messenger
 Had brought the tidings, that without the walls
 Remain'd her husband; in her house withdrawn
 A web she wove, all purple, double woof,
 With varied flow'rs in rich embroidery,
 And to her neat-hair'd maids she gave command
 To place the largest caldrons on the fire,
 That with warm baths, returning from the
 fight,
 15 Hector might be refresh'd; unconscious
 she,
 That by Achilles' hand, with Pallas' aid,
 Far from the bath, was godlike Hector
 slain.
 The sounds of wailing reach'd her from the tow'r;
 Totter'd her limbs, the distaff left her
 hand,
 And to her neat-hair'd maidens thus she spoke:
 "Haste, follow me, some two, that I may know
 What mean these sounds; my honour'd mother's voice
 30 I hear; and in my breast my beating heart Leaps to my mouth; my limbs refuse to move;
 Some evil, sure, on Priam's house impends.
 Be unfulfill'd my words! yet much I fear
 Lest my brave Hector be cut off alone,
 By great Achilles, from the walls of Troy,
 Chas'd to the plain, the desp'rate courage
 quench'd,
 Which ever led him from the gen'ral ranks Far in advance, and bade him yield to none."
 Then from the house she rush'd, like one distract,
 With beating heart; and with her went 45
 her maids.
 But when the tow'r she reach'd, where stood the crowd,
 And mounted on the wall, and look'd
 around,
 And saw the body trailing in the dust,
 Which the fleet steeds were dragging to the ships,
 A sudden darkness overspread her eyes;

Backward she fell, and gasp'd her spirit
 away.
 Far off were flung th' adornments of her
 head,
 The net, the fillet, and the woven bands; 5
 The nuptial veil by golden Venus giv'n,
 That day when Hector of the glancing
 helm
 Led from Eëtion's house his wealthy bride.
 The sisters of her husband round her 10
 press'd,
 And held, as in the deadly swoon she lay.
 But when her breath and spirit return'd
 again,
 With sudden burst of anguish thus she 15
 cried:
 "Hector, oh, woe is me! to misery
 We both were born alike; thou here in
 Troy
 In Priam's royal palace; I in Thebes, 20
 By wooded Placos, in Eëtion's house,
 Who nurs'd my infancy; unhappy he,
 Unhappier I! would I had ne'er been
 born!
 Now thou beneath the depths of earth art 25
 gone,
 Gone to the viewless shades; and me hast
 left
 A widow in thy house, in deepest woe;
 Our child, an infant still, thy child and 30
 mine,
 Ill-fated parents both! nor thou to him,
 Hector, shalt be a guard, nor he to thee:
 For though he 'scape this tearful war with Greece, 35
 Yet nought for him remains but ceaseless
 woe,
 And strangers on his heritage shall seize.
 No young companions own the orphan
 boy:
 With downcast eyes, and cheeks bedew'd
 with tears,
 His father's friends approaching, pinch'd with want,
 He hangs upon the skirt of one, of one
 He plucks the cloak; perchance in pity
 some
 May at their tables let him sip the cup, Moisten his lips, but scarce his palate
 touch;
 While youths, with both surviving parents
 bless'd,
 May drive him from their feast with blows
 and taunts,
 'Begone! thy father sits not at our board':
 Then weeping, to his widow'd mother's arms
 He flies, that orphan boy, Astyanax,
 Who on his father's knees erewhile was fed
 On choicest marrow, and the fat of lambs;
 And, when in sleep his childish play was hush'd,
 Was lull'd to slumber in his nurse's arms
 On softest couch, by all delights surrounded.
 But grief, his father lost, awaits him now,
 Astyanax, of Trojans so surnam'd, Since thou alone wast Troy's defence and
 guard.
 But now on thee, beside the beak'd ships,
 Far from thy parents, when the rav'ning
 dogs
 Have had their fill, the wriggling worms shall feed;
 On thee, all naked; while within thy house Lies store of raiment, rich and rare, the work 35
 Of women's hands; these will I burn with fire;
 Not for thy need — thou ne'er shalt wear them more — 40 But for thine honour in the sight of Troy."
 Weeping she spoke; the women join'd her wail.

THE ODYSSEY

The Iliad is a story of fighting: the Odyssey is a story of wandering and discovery. In the wanderings of Ulysses (Odysseus) we see reflected the growing national consciousness of the extent of the world. There are some who incline to the opinion that every nation undergoes a period of exploration and that tales of wandering are products of the experiences of that period. Such, it is maintained, are the Arabian Voyages of Sinbad, the Hebrew Exodus (Wanderings) of Moses, the Indian Ramayana and the Irish Voyage of Brendan. The Odyssey served as a model for the wandering part of the Aeneid, as the Iliad did for the fighting part. The spirit of the poem is, in general, more romantic than that of the Iliad. It deals with strange peoples and far-off lands; with giants, sirens, and sorceresses, with islands where all is peace and plenty, with shipwrecks and hairbreadth escapes. Odysseus is far different from Achilles, the hero of the Iliad. He is the very embodiment of bold craftiness and resourcefulness, and more realistic than the sentimental hero of sophisticated romance.

The adventure here given is the famous escape from the cave of the Cyclops, a terrible one-eyed giant. Like a considerable number of Odysseus's adventures, it is brought into the poem as related by the hero some time after the actual occurrence. Odysseus, whose home was on the island of Ithaca, accompanied the Greek heroes to Troy much against his will. At the siege of Troy he was distinguished for his bravery and cunning, and his wisdom in counsel. On his way home after the fall of Troy he was driven out of his course and had a series of adventures. These constitute the substance of the Odyssey. He visited the land of the Lotus Eaters, the island of the Cyclops, the island of Æolus, keeper of the winds, and the island of cannibals. He resisted the spells of Circe, the sorceress; he visited the underworld; he heard the song of the Sirens and lived to tell the tale; he passed successfully between the perilous whirlpool and rock of Scylla and Charybdis; he visited the island of the sacred oxen of the Sun; he was shipwrecked and cast ashore on the island of Ogygia and remained there for eight years with the lovely enchantress Calypso; he was again shipwrecked and thrown upon the shores of the island of the Phæacians, where he was kindly received by the beautiful princess Nausicaa and by her father King Alcinous. Through the help of the Phæacians he finally reached his home again. Here he found his wife Penelope besieged by unwelcome suitors but still faithful to him. He slew the suitors unceremoniously and resumed his quiet life as king of Ithaca. Tennyson, following another and later tradition preserved by Dante, represents him in his Ulysses as tiring of the monotony of life at home, setting forth with a few chosen followers, sailing far out into the Atlantic Ocean toward the Happy Isles, and finally being swept into the great gulf at the edge of the world.

The selection in this volume is from the translation of Sir William Marris, Oxford University Press, London, etc., 1925.

BOOK IX

Then deep Odysseus answered him and said:

"Alcinous, Prince, renowned o'er all the people,

Yea, 'tis a joy to listen to a minstrel

Such as is this one, like the gods in voice. 10

For me, I know of no such perfect pleasure

As when good cheer hath hold of all the people,

And feasters in the halls in order sitting

List to a singer, having tables by them

Laden with bread and meat, and the wine-bearer

Draws from the mixing bowl and serves the wine

And pours it in the cups: this to my mind 20

Is of all things the fairest. But thy heart

Inclines to ask me of my mournful sorrows —

More pain and grief for me! What shall I tell thee

Or first, or last of all? for woes abundant

The gods who live in heaven have given me.

First will I tell my name, so that ye too May know it; and that I hereafter, when

5 I have escaped the day that knows not pity,

May be your host, though far away I dwell.

"I am Laertes' son, Odysseus, known

To men for all my wiles, and unto heaven

My fame has gone. I live in Ithaca,

Clear-seen, where is a mountain, Neriton,

With waving woods, conspicuous from afar:

15 And round about are many islands lying

One by another close, Dulichium,

And Samê, and Zacynthus of the woods.

Low on the sea it lies, nearest the gloom;

Apart, the others face the dawn and sun:

A rugged isle, but a good nurse of youth.

And for myself, no sweeter sight I know

Than a man's land. Calypso, that fair goddess,

Would, well I know, have kept me with 25 her there

In her deep caves, desiring me for mate:

So too would Circe, that Ææan witch,
Have kept me by her, wanting me for mate;

But they could never sway my heart
within me;

So surely nought is sweeter than a man's Own land and parents, even though he dwell

Far off in a rich house in a strange land, Away from his begetters. But come, let
me

Tell thee too of my woful journeying,
Which Zeus laid on me as I came from Troy.

"The wind that carried me from Ilios ¹ 15
bore me

Nigh to the Cicones, to Ismarus;

And there I sacked their town and slew their men,

And from the town the women and much ²⁰
wealth

We took, and shared them, that so far as lay

With me, no one might go without his share.

Then I insisted we should flee hot-foot,
But they in their great folly would not hearken:

Much wine was drunk, and by the shore
they slew

Whole herds of sheep and rolling, shamb-ling kine.

But meanwhile went the Cicones and called

For help to other Cicones, their neigh- ³⁵
bours,

But braver and more numerous, who dwelt

Up-country, and could fight from chariots,
Or, if need were, on foot. So in the morn- ⁴⁰
ing

They came, as thick as leaves or flowers that spring

In season; there and then encompassed
us,

Unlucky men, an evil doom from Zeus,
To make us suffer heavily. They set Their battle in array by the swift ships
And fought, and either host assailed the other

With bronze-tipped spears. As long as it was morn

And sacred day was waxing, we maintained

Our ground and kept their greater masses
off;

⁵ But when the sun turned to the loosing time

Of cattle, then the Cicones drove in
And routed us Achæans; of each ship

Fell six mailed comrades, but the rest of us
Escaped from death and doom.

"Thence we sailed onward, sorrowful
at heart,

Glad of escape from death, but having lost
Our dear companions: nor would I let move

My curving ships, till we had called three times

On each of those poor fellows who had fallen

²⁰ Slain by the Cicones upon the plain.

But Zeus who rolls the clouds stirred the North wind

Against my ships in fearful storm, and hid Both land and sea: and night tore down from heaven. ²⁵

Then headlong drave the ships, and sails were rent

To ribbons by the violence of the gale:

And so we stowed them in the hold, in fear ³⁰ Of death, and pulled for land with all our strength.

There without break we lay two days and nights

Eating our hearts in pains and weariness,
But when at last the fair-haired Dawn fulfilled

The third day, then we stepped the masts and hoisted

White sails, and down we sate, while winds and pilots

Guided the ships. And now should I have
come

To mine own land unscathed, but wave and current

⁴⁵ And North wind beat me back, as I was rounding

Cape Malea, and swept me past Cythera.

"There for nine days was I by ravening
winds

⁵⁰ Borne o'er the fishy deep; but on the tenth

We lighted on the Lotus Eaters' land,

¹ Troy.

Who eat a flowery food. We went ashore
 there,
 And took in water, and my comrades made
 Their meal at once by the swift ships.
 Now when We had tasted meat and drink, I sent forth
 some
 Of my command to go and learn what manner
 Of men were these who lived on earth by 10
 bread.
 Two men I chose, and sent a third as herald.
 So straight they went, and with the Lotus Eaters
 They mixed, nor did the Lotus Eaters plot
 My fellows' death, but gave them of the lotus
 To taste. Now whosoe'er of them did eat
 The honeyed lotus fruit had no more wish 20
 To bring back news nor to return; but longed
 To sojourn there among the Lotus Eaters,
 Eating the lotus, careless of return.
 Therefore by force I brought them back 25
 in tears,
 And dragged and bound them in the hollow ships
 Below the thwarts: and ordered all the rest
 Of my true comrades to make haste aboard
 The speedy ships, lest anyone should eat
 The lotus, and forget his homeward way.
 So quickly they embarked, and sitting well
 In order smote the grey sea with their oars. 35
 "Thence we sailed onward, sorrowful at
 heart,
 And reached the land of the Cyclôpes, proud
 And lawless folk. They plant not with 40 their hands
 Nor plough, relying on the immortal gods;
 But all things grow for them unsown, un-
 tilled,
 Barley and wheat and vines, with clusters 45 full
 Of wine, and Zeus sends rain to prosper
 them.
 They have no gatherings in moot, nor laws;
 But dwell upon the tops of the high hills 50
 In hollow caves, and each lays down the law

Unto his wives and children; and they reckon
 Nothing of one another.
 "Athwart the harbour of the Cyclôpes'
 5 land
 A shaggy island stretches, neither near
 To shore nor yet far off, a wooded isle
 Where multitudinous the wild goats breed;
 For no man's tread affrights them, nor do trackers,
 Used to a hard life in the woods as they Range o'er the mountain tops, come ever thither:
 Nor is it overrun with flocks or ploughings,
 15 But all the time unsown, untilled it lies Forlorn of men, and feeds the bleating
 goats.
 For the Cyclôpes have by them no ships
 With vermeil¹ cheeks; nor keep they ship-builders
 To build them sturdy barks which might fulfil
 All their desires, sailing to towns of men
 (As oft men cross the sea in ships to go To one another) such as might have made Even their isle a thriving settlement.
 For in no wise is it a sorry land,
 But would bear all things in their season, since
 30 It has soft water-meadows by the shores
 Of the grey sea, where never vines need fail,
 And level arable there is, whence they Might cut deep crops in season, for the 35 soil
 Is very rich below. Also the isle
 Has a fair haven, with no need of moorings,
 Nor to cast anchor nor to fasten ropes,
 But one may beach one's ship and tarry
 there
 Till crews are minded to put forth, and
 winds
 Blow fair: and at the harbour's head a spring
 45 Of sparkling water wells up from a cave,
 And round it poplars grow. In there we sailed,
 And through the dark night some god
 guided us;
 50 Light there was none to see by; for a fog
 Lay thick about the ships, and the moon gave

No light from heaven, but was beset by clouds.
 Then no man's eyes beheld the island, nor Saw we the long waves rolling on the beach,
 Before we ran our sturdy ships ashore.
 And having beached them there, we lowered all
 The sails, and stepped out on the strand ourselves,
 And fell asleep and waited for bright Dawn.
 "But when the early rose-fingered Dawn Appeared, we roamed in wonder through the isle;
 And the wood nymphs, daughters of Zeus 15 who bears
 The ægis,¹ stirred the mountain goats, to give My company a meal. Anon we took Our curving bows and long spears from the 20
 ships,
 And forming in three troops began the chase,
 And soon the god gave us abundant game.
 Twelve ships had I with me; to each nine 25
 goats
 Fell, and for me alone they picked out ten.
 So all day long till set of sun we sate Feasting on meat abundant and sweet
 wine;
 For the red wine was not yet spent from
 out
 Our ships, but some was left; for each of us Had drawn great store in pitchers, when we took
 The sacred fortress of the Cicones.
 And we looked out upon the Cyclôpes'
 land
 Who dwelt near by, and saw the smoke and heard
 The noise of men and sheep and goats.
 But when
 The sun had set and darkness had come on Then we lay down to rest upon the beach.
 And at the break of rosy-fingered Dawn 45
 I called my men together and I spake
 For all to hear:
 "Stay here, the rest of you, my trusty
 mates,
 But I will go with mine own ship and crew 50
 To prove yon men, what kind of folk they are,
 And whether cruel, savage, and unjust,
 Or good to guests, and of god-fearing mind.'
 "With that aboard my ship I went and bade
 5 My comrades board her too, and loose the moorings.
 Quickly they boarded her and manned the thwarts,
 10 And sitting well in order smote with oars
 The grey salt sea. But when we neared
 the land
 That lay hard by, at the land's end we saw Close to the sea a high cave roofed with laurels,
 Where many flocks of sheep and goats were used To lie o' nights: and round about was built
 A high enclosure of deep-bedded stones,
 Set with tall pines and lofty leafy oaks.
 That was the night lair of a monster man,
 Who kept his lonely flocks far off, nor mixed
 25 With others, but in solitude he lived And thought his lawless thoughts. For he was fashioned
 A fearsome monstrous thing — not like a man
 30 Who lives by bread, but like some shaggy peak
 Of towering hill that stands out all alone.
 "And now I bade the rest of my true
 men
 35 Abide there by the ship, and guard the ship.
 While I picked out the twelve best of my mates
 And took them with me. Now I had a skin 40 Of dark, sweet wine: 'twas Maro gave it
 me, Euanthes' son, priest of Apollo who Is guardian god of Ismarus, because Him we had rescued with his wife and child 45 And treated with all reverence, for he Dwelt in Apollo's densely wooded grove.
 Fine gifts they were he gave me; of wrought gold
 Seven talents, and a bowl of solid silver;
 And furthermore he filled a dozen jars
 With sweet unwatered wine, a drink for gods:

None of his slaves or handmaids knew of it,
Only his wife and he, and one house-dame:
Whene'er they drank that honey-sweet red
wine,

He used to mix one cup of it with twenty Measures of water, and the mixing bowl Gave forth a marvellous sweet smell; and then

Indeed it were no pleasure to abstain.

With that same wine I filled up a great skin,

And took it, and some victuals in a wallet;
For my high spirit instantly foreboded

That there would come against me a wild
man,

Clad in great strength, nor knowing rights nor laws.

"Soon to the cave we came, but found him not

Within, for he was herding his fat flocks
Afield; so we explored the cave and stared At all it held. The crates were full of cheeses;

The pens were crammed with lambs and kids; each kind

Was penned apart, the firstlings by themselves,

And then the later lambs, and then the younglings.

With whey the pans were swimming, and the pails

And well-made buckets into which he milked.

Then spake my men and begged me first to take

Some cheeses and be gone; and then to haste

And drive the kids and lambs out from the pens

To our swift ship, and so make sail across Salt water. Yet I did not listen to them

(Far better if I had!), but stayed to see The man himself, and whether he would give me

The due of strangers. But his coming was not

Predestined to bring gladness to my men.

"So then we lit a fire and sacrificed,

And of the cheeses took ourselves and ate,
And sate inside and waited for him, till

Driving his flocks he came. A mighty load
He carried of dry wood for supper-time,

And tossed it with a crash inside the cave,

And shuddering in a niche we shrank: but he

Drave his fat flocks into the roomy cave —
I mean, all those he used to milk — the males,

Both sheep and goats, he left in the deep yard

Outside. And then he raised a huge great stone

And sealed the door. Not two and twenty wains —

Stout four-wheel wains — could lift from earth a rock

As big as that wherewith he barred the door.

Then down he sate and all in turn he milked

The ewes and bleating goats, and 'neath
each dam

He placed her young. And presently he curdled

Half the white milk, and set and laid it by
In wicker bowls, and half he stood in pans

For him to take and drink at supper-time;
And having finished all his busy work,

Then he relit the fire, and sighted us,
And asked:

"Strangers, who are ye? and from whence d'ye sail

The waterways? are ye out after trade,
Or roving free like pirates o'er the brine,

Who roam abroad at hazard of their lives
And bring mischance on men of alien lands?"

"So said he, and our hearts within were broken

For fear of his deep voice and monstrous
self;

Yet even so I spake and answered him:
"See thou, we are Achæans, wanderers

From Troy, and straggling o'er the great sea gulf

With every wind that blows. Making for home

We have come another road, by other paths:

For doubtless Zeus was pleased to will it
so.

We claim that we are Agamemnon's men,
The son of Atreus: even now his fame

Is highest under heaven, because he sacked
So great a city and destroyed much people.

But we have lighted here, and to thy knees

Are come, if haply thou wilt show us wel-
 come,
 Or otherwise endow us, as is due To strangers. Nay, strong sir, regard the gods;
 We are thy suppliants, and Zeus vindicates Strangers and suppliants, that god of strangers
 Who still attendeth reverend sojourners.'
 • "I spake, and quickly from his iron heart 10
 He answered me. 'Stranger, thou art a fool,
 Or thou art come from far, that biddest me
 Or fear or shun the gods. We Cyclopes folk Care not for Zeus who bears the ægis, nor
 The blessed gods, because we are in truth Much better folk than they: nor would I spare
 Thee or thy friends, to shun the wrath of 20
 Zeus,
 Save as my own heart bade. But at thy coming
 Tell me, where hast thou moored thy sturdy ship,
 At the land's end? or near by? let me
 know.'
 "He spake to try me, but I knew too
 much
 For him to catch me so: and in my turn 30
 I made him answer with a cunning tale.
 "'My ship Poseidon, lord of earthquake, smote
 And brake upon the rocks at your land's
 end:
 For he had brought her all too nigh the headland,
 And the wind swept her in from the deep
 sea:
 But I and these escaped the plunge to 40
 death.'
 "I spake; and he out of his iron heart Made me no answer; but sprang up and laid Hands on my comrades. Two at once he 45 gripped
 And smashed them down like puppies on the ground,
 And the brain stuff ran out and wet the
 earth.
 Then limb from limb he carved them, and prepared
 His supper; like a mountain lion he ate
 And left not guts nor flesh nor marrow bones.
 But with a wail we raised our hands to
 Zeus,
 5 At sight of deeds so foul, and helplessness Laid hold on us. But when the Cyclopes had Filled his big belly, eating human flesh
 And drinking pure milk after, down he lay Inside the cave, stretched out among his flocks.
 Then bracing up my nerves I planned to steal
 Up near, and draw my sharp sword from my thigh,
 15 And pierce his chest, just where the midriff holds
 The liver, feeling for the spot to strike;
 But second thoughts restrained me, for right there
 We too had plunged to death; because our
 hands
 Had not the strength to shove from the tall door
 25 The ponderous stone he set against it. So We waited moaning for the flush of Dawn.
 "But when the early rosy-fingered Dawn
 Appeared, then he relit the fire, and milked
 His goodly flocks all in due turn, and set Her young beneath each ewe. Then when he had Finished his busy work, once more he clutched
 Two men at once, and got his breakfast
 35 ready.
 And having fed, he drave his fat flocks
 forth
 Moving the big stone lightly, though he set it
 Back in its place again, as one might fit
 A lid upon a quiver. Then he turned His fat flocks to the mountains, whistling
 loud.
 But I was left behind devising evil Deep in my heart, if anyway I might Take vengeance, and Athene grant me glory.
 "Now to my mind seemed this the best device.
 50 Beside a pen there lay the Cyclopes' club.
 A huge one, of green olive; he had cut it To walk with, when it should be dry. And we,

Beholding it, compared it to the mast
Of a black ship of twenty oars for size,
Some portly freighter crossing the great gulf;

So long it was, so thick to look upon.
To this I came and cut off as it were
A fathom's length and gave it to my men
And bade them fine it down: they made it smooth,

And I stood by and sharpened it; and next 10
I took and hardened it in the bright fire;
And then I hid it carefully away
Under the dung which lay about the cave
In heaps: and told my comrades to cast lots

Among them, which should brave the risk
with me,

To lift the beam and grind it in his eye,
When sweet sleep came on him. Now the lot fell

On those whom I myself would fain have picked;

Four men, and I was numbered as the fifth.

"At evening then he came, herding his 25
flocks

Of goodly fleece. Into the cave he drove
His fatlings, one and all, and left outside
None in the court; or of his own presage,
Or as some god directed. Then he lifted 30
And set the great stone in its place again,
And sate and milked his sheep and bleating
goats

In order, and to each ewe set her young.
And when he had finished all his busy work, 35
Again he seized two men, and got his supper.

Then near I drew, holding an ivy bowl
Of the dark wine, and to the Cyclops said:

"Take and drink wine, O Cyclops, 40
now that thou

Hast eaten of man's meat, and know what kind

Of drink was this our galley stowed: for I Was bringing thee drink offering in the 45
hope

That thou wouldst pity me and send me
home;

But thy mad rage is past endurance.
Monster,

How can another of all men that be Ever again come nigh thee, seeing that Thy deeds are so unrighteous?"

"At that he took the cup and emptied it,
And tasting the sweet drink was wildly
pleased,

And asked me for it yet a second time:

5 "'Give me again, of thy good will: and say

What is thy name at once, that I may give thee

A stranger's gift whereat thou mayst be glad.

'Tis true, among my folk grain-giving
earth

Bears mighty clusters of the grape, and
Zeus

15 Sends rain to give them increase: but this is

A rill of nectar and ambrosia.'

"At that I gave him the bright wine
again,

20 Nay, thrice I brought and gave it him,
and thrice

He drank it up, the fool. Howbeit when The wine had run around the Cyclops' wits,

I said to him at last persuasively:

"Cyclops, thou askest me my famous
name.

Well, I will tell thee, and do thou grant me
A stranger's gift, as thou hast promised me.

My name is Noman. Noman I am called
By those who got me, and by all my men.'

"So said I, and anon he answered me

Out of his iron heart: 'Noman will I

Eat last among his company, and all

35 The rest before him: that shall be thy gift.'

"He spake, and reeled and fell upon his
back;

And there he lay, with his gross neck awry,
And sleep that conquers all laid hold of
him.

And from his gullet came forth wine and bits

Of human flesh, and in his drunken stupor
He vomited. Then, then I thrust the stake

In the deep ashes till it should grow hot,
And heartened all my men with cheering
words,

That no one out of fright should flinch
from me;

50 And when the bar of olive presently,
Green though it was, was ready to catch
fire

And had a horrid glow, then I came near And drew it from the fire. My men stood by,
 And some god breathed great courage into
 us.
 They took the sharpened stake of olive wood
 And rammed it in his eye, and from above
 I pressed and twirled it round. As when a man
 Bores a ship's timber with a drill, which those
 Below keep spinning with a strap of hide
 Held at each end, while still the drill runs
 on,
 So in his eye we held and twirled the stake Pointed with fire, and round the red-hot thing Ran out the blood. His eyelids and his brows
 Were all singed round with burning, as the eyeball Burned out until its roots cracked in the flame.
 And as a smith dips a great axe or adze
 To temper it, loud-hissing, in cold water
 (For hence it is the iron gets its strength)
 So hissed his eyeball round the olive stake.
 Then horribly he screamed till the rock rang,
 And back we shrank in terror, while he pulled
 The stake all foul with blood out of his eye
 And flung it from him, writhing with his
 hands.
 Then loud he called on the Cyclôpes, who Dwelt round in caves along the windy
 heights;
 And at his cry from every side they thronged,
 And asked what ailed him, gathering round
 the cave:
 "'What hath distressed thee, Poly-phemus, so,
 That thus thou criest through the im-45
 mortal night, Making us sleepless? Can it be some mortal
 Is driving off thy flocks, in spite of thee
 Or slaying thee thyself by guile or force?' 50
 "Then said strong Polyphemus from the cave:

'Friends, Noman is it that is killing me
 By guile, and not by force.'
 "And they replied to him with wingéd
 words:
 5 'If no man then is doing violence
 To thee there all alone, thou canst not hope
 To 'scape a sickness sent by mighty Zeus.
 No, pray thou to our father, king Posei-10 don.'
 "With that away they went; and my heart laughed
 That the smart trick I played them with my name
 15 Had so misled them. But the Cyclôps, groaning
 And travailing in pain, groped with his
 hands
 And pulled away the door-stone, and him-
 20 self Sate at the door with both hands out, to catch
 Whoever tried to slip out with the sheep:
 Apparently he hoped I was a fool!
 25 But I thought hard — 'What is the very best
 To do? If only I can find some way To save my comrades and myself from
 death!'
 30 All kinds of counsels and of craft I wove
 As will a man for life; for mighty harm
 Was nigh; and this plan seemed to me the best.
 "There were the rams — well-fed and 35 thick of fleece,
 Fine beasts and large, with violet-dark wool;
 Them very quietly I lashed together
 With twisted withes¹ whereon that law-40 less monster,
 The Cyclôps, used to sleep. Three at a time
 I took: now of the three, each middle ram
 Would bear a man, while those on either flank Would screen him as they walked. Every three sheep
 Thus bore their man. But as for me — one ram
 There was, by far the best of all the flock;
 Him by the back I seized, and curled below

His woolly paunch, and face upturned lay
 there,
 Twisting my hands into his wondrous fleece,
 And clung with steadfast heart. So for 5
 the time
 Moaning we waited for the flush of dawn.
 "As soon as early rosy-fingered Dawn Appeared, then all the rams dashed out to graze,
 While round the pens bleated the ewes
 un milked,
 Their udders tight to bursting. Now their master,
 Worn with great torment, felt along the 15 backs
 Of all the sheep as they stood up before
 him,
 But lacked the wit to guess how 'neath the breasts
 Of his fine fleecy sheep my men were lashed.
 Rearguard of all the flock, stalked out the ram Cumbered with wool and with my cunning 25
 self:
 And handling him strong Polyphemus said:
 "'Old ram, why is it, pray, thou art
 the last
 Of all the flock to leave the cave? Of old 30 Thou wert not wont to lag behind the sheep,
 But with thy bounding stride wert far the first
 To graze upon the soft bloom of the grass, 35
 The first to gain the river streams, the first
 To hurry home to fold at eventide;
 But now art last of all! Thou mournest surely
 For thy lord's eye, which a bad man put 40
 out,
 He and his scurvy fellows, when he had Made weak my wits with wine, I mean Noman,
 Who has not yet, I say, escaped perdition. 45
 Oh, couldst thou feel as I do, and become Articulate to tell me where he skulks Shunning my wrath, then would I batter
 him,
 And dash his brains out broadcast on the 50
 floor!
 So should my heart be lightened of the ills
 Which good-for-nothing Noman hath brought me.'
 "So saying he sent forth from him the
 ram.
 Now having gone a space from cave and
 court,
 First I unloosed myself from 'neath the
 ram,
 And then I freed my men. Quick we drove
 on
 That herd of long-legs, rich in fat, and often Turned to look round, until we reached the ship.
 And to our mates glad was the sight of us
 Who had escaped from death, and for the others
 They would have moaned and wailed; but I forbade 20 And with a frown I checked them, and gave orders
 To throw the mob of fleecy sheep on board,
 And sail the salt sea water. They made
 haste
 Aboard and manned the thwarts,¹ and sitting well
 In order smote the grey sea with their oars:
 And being gone as far as shouts would carry
 I called unto the Cyclôps, mocking him:
 "'So, Cyclôps, 'twas no coward's company
 That thou wert going to eat by brutal force
 Within thy hollow cave! Thine evil deeds
 Were fated to come home to thee full tale, Thou cruel wretch, that hadst no shame
 to eat
 The guests beneath thy roof: wherefore hath Zeus
 And all the other gods requited thee.'
 "So said I, and the more enraged at
 heart
 He grew, and snapped the top off a great hill,
 And heaved it at us, and it plunged in front
 Of my blue-headed ship, and 'neath the splash Surged up the sea. The back wash like a flood Bore back the ship and drave her to the shore;

¹ Rowers' seats reaching athwart a boat.

But I caught up a long pole in my hands
 And thrust her sideways. With a nod I urged
 My men, and bade them bend them to their oars
 To 'scape the danger: so they bent and rowed.
 And having now put twice the space of water
 Between us, then once more was I about 10
 To hail the Cyclôps, but my comrades stayed me,
 First one and then another, with soft
 words:
 "Mad fool, why want to rouse a savage 15
 man,
 Who but now cast his missile in the deep
 And drave our ship back to the land?
 Why, we Thought we had perished there! If he had 20
 heard
 The slightest speech or sound from one of
 us,
 He would have heaved a jagged rock and smashed
 Our timbers, and our heads: so strong he throws."
 "But all they said could not dissuade my pride,
 And in my wrath I called to him again: 30
 'Cyclôps, if any man of mortal men
 Shall ask thee of thy blind deformity,
 Say that it was Odysseus made thee blind,
 Sacker of fortresses, Laertes' son,
 Who dwells in Ithaca.'
 "So said I, and he answered with a groan:
 'Lo now, in very truth the oracles
 Of old have found me out! Here there was once
 A seer, a good tall man, called Telemus,
 The son of Eurymus, pre-eminent
 In prophecy, who prophesied in his old age
 Among the Cyclôpes folk: he told me that 45
 These things should all hereafter be fulfilled,
 And I be blinded at Odysseus' hands.
 But I was looking always for some tall Fine man, clad in great strength, to come 50
 this way;
 And now a puny, worthless, weakling fellow Hath robbed me of mine eye, when he had made me
 Undone with wine! But come thou here,
 Odysseus,
 5 That I may set before thee gifts of friendship,
 And speed thy sending, that the great Earth-shaker
 May grant it thee, seeing I am his son
 And he avows his fatherhood. And he Will heal me, if it is his will; but none

 'Would that I were as sure of strength to

 Of life and soul and send thee on thy way
 To Hades' house, as I am sure that even
 The lord of earthquake will not heal thine

 "So said I, and he prayed to king
 Poseidon,
 Stretching his hands out to the starry heaven:

 earth,
 Thou dark-haired lord! if I am thy true
 son,
 And thou avowest thee my father, grant

 His well-built house and mother country,
 then

 His comrades lost, upon a stranger ship;

 And swung and hurled it, putting in his

 Of our stout ships were lying all together,
 Our comrades seated round about them grieving,
 And watching for us still, on making land
 We beached our ship upon the sands and stepped Ourselves out on the shore. And then we took
 The Cyclops' sheep out of the hollow ship,
 And shared them, that so far as in me lay 15
 No man should go without his equal share;
 Only the ram my armoured fellows chose,
 When they made distribution of the flock,

 And burned the thigh pieces. But he misprised
 My offering, and was planning to destroy

 Feasting on meat abundant and sweet wine,
 And when the sun set and the dark came on,
 Then we lay down to sleep upon the shore.

 In order smote the grey sea with their oars.
 So we sailed onward, sorrowful at heart,
 Glad at escape from death, but having lost
 Our dear companions."

APOLLONIUS RHODIUS

(ca. B.C. 235-181)

Apollonius of Rhodes, poet and grammarian, was born, perhaps at Alexandria, about the middle of the third century B.C. He was a pupil of the famous Alexandrian poet Callimachus, but in later life disagreed with his teacher rather sharply on certain critical questions. Their chief point of difference was that Callimachus was out of patience with the old models and was looking toward the new, while Apollonius despised the artificial and learned poetry of the Alexandrians and used as his models the ancient epic poets.

After his disagreement with Callimachus, Apollonius left Alexandria and went to Rhodes, where he was well received as a teacher of rhetoric. Later he returned to Alexandria and held the post of librarian from about 194 B.C. until his death.

His only surviving work is the Argonautica.

ARGONAUTICA

The Argonautica is an epic poem in four books dealing with the quest of Jason and his companions for the Golden Fleece. The narrative is simple and straightforward, and the author makes much use of the artistic devices of Homer. No one could mistake it for one of the ancient epics, however, for its representation of the heroic age is easily recognizable as the product of study rather than of direct experience. It also differs from the early Greek epic in its emphasis on the strange and romantic. It contains many passages of fine descriptive force, and the character of Medea is drawn with strong dramatic feeling. The poem was very popular among the Romans of the Augustan Age, and Vergil used parts of it as sources for some of his finest scenes. Apollonius's Medea is looked upon by many as the literary forerunner of Vergil's Dido. The poem as a whole was imitated by Valerius Flaccus in a Latin work of the same title.

The general outline of the story upon which the Argonautica is based is as follows: Pelias, king of Iolcus in Thessaly, had deprived his half-brother Æson of the sovereignty. He wished also to get rid of Æson's son Jason. Accordingly he induced Jason to undertake the quest of the golden fleece which hung on an oak tree in the grove of Ares in Colchis, and was guarded by a dragon. Jason commanded Argus, son of Phrixus, to build a ship, which was called the Argo. Accompanied by a group of famous heroes, he set sail for Colchis. After many adventures, the voyagers landed in Colchis at the mouth of the river Phasis. Medea, daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis, fell in love with Jason and helped him to get possession of the fleece, on condition that he would take her back to Thessaly as his wife. The Argonauts fled, taking with them the fleece and Medea. They were pursued by various bands of Colchians, especially by the one in charge of Apsyrtus, Medea's brother. The selection given here deals with the capture of the fleece and the escape. The subsequent history of Medea is related in Seneca's tragedy which bears her name, printed in this volume. (See pp. 117-134.)

The selection in this volume is from the translation of R. C. Seaton, William Heinemann, London, 1912.

BOOK IV

Now do thou thyself, goddess Muse, daughter of Zeus, tell of the labor and wiles of the Colchian maiden. Surely my soul within me wavers with speechless amazement as I ponder whether I should call it the lovesick grief of mad passion or a panic flight, through which she left the Colchian folk.

Æetes all night long with the bravest captains of his people was devising sheer treachery against the heroes, with fierce wrath in his heart at the issue of the hateful contest; nor did he deem at all that these things were being accomplished without the knowledge of his daughters.

But into Medea's heart Hera¹ cast most grievous fear; and she trembled like a nimble fawn whom the baying of hounds hath terrified amid the thicket of a deep copse. For at once she truly forboded that the aid she had given was not hidden from her father, and that quickly she would fill up the cup of woe. And she dreaded the guilty knowledge of her handmaids; her eyes were filled with fire and her ears rung with a terrible cry. Often did she clutch at her throat, and often did she drag out her hair by the roots and groan in wretched despair. There on that very day the maiden would have tasted the drugs and perished and so have made void the purposes of Hera, had not the goddess driven her, all bewildered, to flee with the sons of Phrixus; and her fluttering soul within her was comforted; and then she poured from her bosom all the drugs back again into the casket. Then she kissed her bed, and the folding doors on both sides, and stroked the walls, and, tearing away in her hands a long tress of hair, she left it in the chamber for her mother, a memorial of her maidenhood, and thus lamented with passionate voice:

"I go, leaving this long tress here in my stead, O mother mine; take this farewell from me as I go far hence; farewell Chalciope, and all my home. Would that the sea, stranger, had dashed thee to pieces, ere thou camest to the Colchian land!"

Thus she spake, and from her eyes shed copious tears. And as a bondmaid steals away from a wealthy house, whom fate has lately severed from her native land, nor yet has she made trial of grievous toil, but, still unschooled to misery and shrinking in terror from slavish tasks, goes about beneath the cruel hands of a mistress; even so the lovely maiden rushed forth from her home. But to her the bolts of the doors gave way self-moved, leaping backwards at the swift strains of her magic song. And with bare feet she sped along the narrow paths, with her left hand holding her robe over her brow to veil her face and fair cheeks, and with her right lifting up the hem of her tunic. Quickly along the dark track, outside the towers of the spacious city, did she come in fear; nor did any of the warders note her, but she sped on unseen by them. Thence she was minded to go to the temple; for well she knew the way, having often aforetime wandered there in quest of corpses and noxious roots of the earth, as a sorceress is wont to do; and her soul fluttered with quivering fear. And the Titanian goddess,¹ the moon, rising from a far land, beheld her as she fled distraught, and fiercely exulted over her, and thus spake to her own heart:

"Not I alone then stray to the Latmian cave, nor do I alone burn with love for fair Endymion²; oft times with thoughts of love have I been driven away by thy crafty spells, in order that in the darkness 10 of night thou mightest work thy sorcery at ease, even the deeds dear to thee. And now thou thyself too hast part in a like mad passion; and some god of affliction has given thee Jason to be thy grievous woe. Well, go on, and steel thy heart, wise though thou be, to take up thy burden of pain, fraught with many sighs."

Thus spake the goddess; but swiftly the maiden's feet bore her, hasting on. 20 And gladly did she gain the high bank of the river and beheld on the opposite side the gleam of fire, which all night long the heroes were kindling in joy at the contest's issue. Then through the gloom, 25 with clear-pealing voice from across the stream, she called on Phrontis, the youngest of Phrixus' sons, and he with his brothers and Æson's son recognised the maiden's voice; and in silence his comrades wondered when they knew that it was so in truth. Thrice she called, and thrice at the bidding of the company Phrontis called out in reply; and meantime the heroes were rowing with swift- 35 moving oars in search of her. Not yet were they casting the ship's hawsers upon the opposite bank, when Jason with light feet leapt to land from the deck above, and after him Phrontis and Argus, sons 40 of Phrixus, leapt to the ground; and she, clasping their knees with both hands, thus addressed them:

"Save me, the hapless one, my friends, from Æëtes, and yourselves too, for all is 45 brought to light, nor doth any remedy come. But let us flee upon the ship, before the king mounts his swift chariot. And I will lull to sleep the guardian serpent and give you the fleece of gold; but do thou, stranger, make the gods witness 5 of the vows thou hast taken on thyself for my sake; and now that I have fled far from my country, make me not a mark for blame and dishonour for want of kinsmen."

She spake in anguish; but greatly did the heart of Æson's son rejoice, and at once, as she fell at his knees, he raised her gently and embraced her, and spake words of comfort: "Lady, let Zeus of Olympus 15 himself be witness to my oath, and Hera, queen of marriage, bride of Zeus, that I will set thee in my halls my own wedded wife, when we have reached the land of Hellas on our return."

Thus he spake, and straightway clasped her right hand in his; and she bade them row the swift ship to the sacred grove near at hand, in order that, while it was still night, they might seize and carry off the 25 fleece against the will of Æëtes. Word and deed were one to the eager crew. For they took her on board, and straightway thrust the ship from shore; and loud was the din as the chieftains strained at their oars, but she, starting back, held out her hands in despair towards the shore. But Jason spoke cheering words and restrained her grief.

Now at the hour when men have cast sleep from their eyes — huntsmen, who, trusting to their hounds, never slumber away the end of night, but avoid the light of dawn lest, smiting with its white beams, it efface the track and scent of the quarry — then did Æson's son and the maiden 35 step forth from the ship over a grassy spot, the "Ram's couch," as men call it, where it first bent its wearied knees in rest, bearing on its back the Minyan son³ of Athamas. And close by, all smirched with soot, was the base of the altar, which the Æolid Phrixus⁴ once set up to Zeus,

⁴ Brother of Helles, after whom the Hellespont was named. The ram with the golden fleece was the aider of fugitives, when he sacrificed the golden wonder at the bidding of Hermes¹ who graciously met him on the way. There by the counsels of Argus the chieftains put them ashore.

And they two by the pathway came to the sacred grove, seeking the huge oak tree on which was hung the fleece, like to a cloud that blushes red with the fiery beams of the rising sun. But right in front the serpent with his keen sleepless eyes saw them coming, and stretched out his long neck and hissed in awful wise; and all round the long banks of the river echoed and the boundless grove. Those heard it who dwelt in the Colchian land very far from Titanian Æa, near the outfall of Lycus,² the river which parts from loud-roaring Araxes³ and blends his sacred stream with Phasis,² and they twain flow on together in one and pour their waters into the Caucasian Sea. And through fear young mothers awoke, and round their new-born babes, who were sleeping in their arms, threw their hands in agony, for the small limbs started at that hiss. And as when above a pile of smouldering wood countless eddies of smoke roll up mingled with soot, and one ever springs up quickly after another, rising aloft from beneath in wavering wreaths; so at that time did that monster roll his countless coils covered with hard dry scales. And as he writhed, the maiden came before his eyes, with sweet voice calling to her aid Sleep, highest of gods, to charm the monster; and she cried to the queen of the underworld,³ the night-wanderer, to be propitious to her enterprise. And Æson's son followed in fear, but the serpent, already charmed by her song, was relaxing the long ridge of his giant spine, and lengthening out his myriad coils, like a dark wave, dumb and noiseless, rolling over a sluggish sea; but still he raised aloft his grisly head, eager to enclose them both in his murderous jaws. But she with a newly cut spray of juniper, dipping and drawing untempered charms from her mystic brew, sprinkled his eyes, while she chanted her song; and all around the potent scent of the charm cast sleep; and on the very spot he let his jaw sink down; and far behind through the wood with its many trees were those countless coils stretched out.

Hereupon Jason snatched the golden fleece from the oak, at the maiden's bidding; and she, standing firm, smeared with the charm the monster's head, till Jason himself bade her turn back towards their ship, and she left the grove of Ares, dusky with shade. And as a maiden catches on her finely wrought robe the gleam of the moon at the full, as it rises above her high-roofed chamber; and her heart rejoices as she beholds the fair ray; so at that time did Jason uplift the mighty fleece in his hands; and from the shimmering of the flocks of wool there settled on his fair cheeks and brow a red flush like a flame. And great as is the hide of a yearling ox or stag, which huntsmen call a brocket, so great in extent was the fleece all golden above. Heavy it was, thickly clustered with flocks; and as he moved along, even beneath his feet the sheen rose up from the earth. And he strode on now with the fleece covering his left shoulder from the height of his neck to his feet, and now again he gathered it up in his hands; for he feared exceedingly, lest some god or man should meet him and deprive him thereof.

Dawn was spreading over the earth when they reached the throng of heroes; and the youths marvelled to behold the mighty fleece, which gleamed like the lightning of Zeus. And each one started up eager to touch it and clasp it in his hands. But the son of Æson restrained them all, and threw over it a mantle newly woven; and he led the maiden to the stern and seated her there, and spake to them all as follows:

"No longer now, my friends, forbear to return to your fatherland. For now the task for which we dared this grievous voyage, toiling with bitter sorrow of heart, has been lightly fulfilled by the maiden's counsels. Her — for such is her will — I will bring home to be my wedded wife; do ye preserve her, the glorious saviour of all Achæa and of yourselves. For of a surety, I ween, will Æëtes come with his host to bar our passage from the river into the sea. But do some of you toil at the oars in turn, sitting man by man; and half of you raise your shields of oxhide, a ready defence against the darts of the enemy, and guard our return. And now in our hands we hold the fate of our children and dear country and of our aged parents; and on our venture all Hellas depends, to reap either the shame of failure or great renown."

Thus he spake, and donned his armour of war; and they cried aloud, wondrously eager. And he drew his sword from the sheath and cut the hawsers at the stern. And near the maiden he took his stand ready armed by the steersman Ancæus, and with their rowing the ship sped on as they strained desperately to drive her clear of the river.

By this time Medea's love and deeds had become known to haughty Æëtes and to all the Colchians. And they thronged to the assembly in arms; and countless as the waves of the stormy sea when they rise crested by the wind, or as the leaves that fall to the ground from the wood with its myriad branches in the month when the leaves fall — who could reckon their tale? — so they in countless number poured along the banks of the river shouting in frenzy; and in his shapely chariot Æëtes shone forth above all with his steeds, the gift of Helios,¹ swift as the blasts of the wind. In his left hand he raised his curved shield, and in his right a huge pine-torch, and near him in front stood up his mighty spear. And Apsyrtus held in his hands the reins of the steeds. But already the ship was cleaving the sea before her, urged on by stalwart oarsmen and the stream of the mighty river rushing down. But the king in grievous anguish lifted his hands and called on Helios and Zeus to bear witness to their evil deeds; and terrible threats he uttered against all his people, that unless they should with their own hands seize the maiden, either on the land or still finding the ship on the swell of the open sea, and bring her back, that so he might satisfy his eager soul with vengeance for all those deeds, at the cost of their own lives they should learn and abide all his rage and revenge.

Thus spake Æëtes; and on that same day the Colchians launched their ships and cast the tackle on board, and on that same day sailed forth on the sea; thou wouldst not say so mighty a host was a fleet of ships, but that a countless flight of birds, swarm on swarm, was clamouring over the sea.

Swiftly the wind blew, as the goddess Hera planned, so that most quickly Ææan Medea might reach the Pelasgian² land, a bane to the house of Pelias, and on the third morn they bound the ship's stern cables to the shores of the Paphlagonians,³ at the mouth of the river Halys. For Medea bade them land and propitiate Hecate⁴ with sacrifice. Now all that the maiden prepared for offering the sacrifice may no man know, and may my soul not urge me to sing thereof. Awe restrains my lips, yet from that time the altar which the heroes raised on the beach to the goddess remains till now a sight to men of a later day.

And straightway Æson's son and the rest of the heroes bethought them of Phineus,⁵ how that he had said that their course from Æa should be different, but to all alike his meaning was dim. Then Argus spake, and they eagerly hearkened: "We go to Orchomenus,⁶ whither that unerring seer, whom ye met aforetime, foretold your voyage. For there is another course, signified by those priests of the immortal gods, who have sprung from Tritonian Thebes.¹ As yet all the stars that wheel in the heaven were not, nor yet, though one should inquire, could aught be heard of the sacred race of the Danaï.² Apidanæan Arcadians alone existed, Arcadians who lived even before the moon, it is said, eating acorns on the hills; nor at that time was the Pelasgian land ruled by the glorious sons of Deucalion,³ in the days when Egypt, mother of men of an older time, was called the fertile Morning-land, and the river fair-flowing Triton,⁴ by which all the Morning-land is watered; and never does the rain from Zeus moisten the earth; but from the flooding of the river abundant crops spring up. From this land, it is said, a king made his way all round through the whole of Europe and Asia, trusting in the might and strength and courage of his people; and countless cities did he find wherever he came, whereof some are still inhabited and some not; many an age hath passed since then. But Æea⁵ abides unshaken even now and the sons of those men whom that king settled to dwell in Æea. They preserve the writings of their fathers, graven on pillars, whereon are marked all the ways and the limits of sea and land as ye journey on all sides round. There is a river, the uttermost horn of Ocean, broad and exceeding deep, that a merchant ship may traverse; they call it Ister⁶ and have marked it far off; and for a while it cleaves the boundless tilth alone in one stream; for beyond the blasts of the north wind, far off in the Rhipæan⁷ mountains, its springs burst forth with a roar. But when it enters the boundaries of the Thracians and Scythians, here, dividing its stream into two, it sends its waters partly into the Ionian sea,⁸ and partly to the south into a deep gulf that bends upwards from the Trinacrian sea,⁹ that sea which lies along your land, if indeed Achelous¹⁰ flows forth from your land."

Thus he spake, and to them the goddess granted a happy portent, and all at the sight shouted approval that this was their appointed path. For before them appeared a trail of heavenly light, a sign where they might pass. And gladly they left behind there the son of Lycus and with canvas outspread sailed over the sea, with their eyes on the Paphlagonian mountains. But they did not round Carambis, for the winds and the gleam of the heavenly fire stayed with them till they reached Ister's mighty stream.

Now some of the Colchians, in a vain search, passed out from Pontus through the Cyanean rocks¹¹; but the rest went to the river, and then Apsyrtus led, and, turning aside, he entered the mouth called Fair. Wherefore he outstripped the heroes by crossing a neck of land into the furthest gulf of the Ionian sea. For a certain island is enclosed by Ister, by name Peuce, three-cornered, its base stretching along the coast, and with a sharp angle towards the river; and round it the outfall is cleft in two. One mouth they call the mouth of Narex, and the other, at the lower end, the Fair mouth. And through this Apsyrtus and his Colchians rushed with all speed; but the heroes went upwards far away towards the highest part of the island. And in the meadows the country shepherds left their countless flocks for dread of the ships, for they deemed that they were beasts coming forth from the monster-teeming sea. For never yet before had they seen seafaring ships, neither the Scythians mingled with the Thracians, nor the Sigynni, nor yet the Gaucenii, nor the Sindi that now inhabit the vast desert plain of Laurium. But when they had passed near the mount Angurum, and the cliff of Cauliacus, far from the mount Angurum, round which Ister, dividing his stream, falls into the sea on this side and on that, and the Laurian plain, then indeed the Colchians went forth into the Cronian sea and cut off all the ways, to prevent their foes' escape. And the heroes came down the river behind and reached the two Brygean isles of Artemis near at hand. Now in one of them was a sacred temple; and on the other they landed, avoiding the host of Apsyrtus; for the Colchians had left these islands out of many within the river, just as they were, through reverence for the daughter of Zeus; but the rest, thronged by the Colchians, barred the ways to the sea. And so on other islands too, close by, Apsyrtus left his host as far as the river Salangon and the Nestian land.¹

There the Minyæ would at that time have yielded in grim fight, a few to many; but ere then they made a covenant, shunning a dire quarrel; as to the golden fleece, that since Æëtes himself had so promised them if they should fulfil the contests, they should keep it as justly won, whether they carried it off by craft or even openly in the king's despite; but as to Medea — for that was the cause of strife — that they should give her in ward to Leto's daughter² apart from the throng, until some one of the kings that dispense justice should utter his doom, whether she must return to her father's home or follow the chieftains to the land of Hellas.

Now when the maiden had mused upon all this, sharp anguish shook her heart unceasingly; and quickly she called forth Jason alone apart from his comrades, and led him aside until they were far away, and before his face uttered her speech all broken with sobs:

"What is this purpose that ye are now devising about me, O son of Æson? Has thy triumph utterly cast forgetfulness upon thee, and reckest thou nothing of all that thou spakest when held fast by necessity? Whither are fled the oaths by Zeus the suppliants' god, whither are fled thy honied promises for which in no seemly wise, with shameless will, I have left my country, the glories of my home and even my parents — things that were dearest to me? And far away all alone I am borne over the sea with the plaintive kingfishers because of thy trouble, in order that I might save thy life in fulfilling the contests with the oxen and the earthborn men. Last of all the fleece — when the matter became known, it was by my folly thou didst win it; and a foul reproach have I poured on womankind. Wherefore I say that as thy child, thy bride and thy sister, I follow thee to the land of Hellas. Be ready to stand by me to the end, abandon me not left forlorn of thee when thou dost visit the kings. But only save me; let justice and right, to which we have both agreed, stand firm; or else do thou at once shear through this neck with the sword, that I may gain the guerdon due to my mad passion. Poor wretch! If the king, to whom you both commit your cruel covenant, doom me to belong to my brother! How shall I come to my father's sight? Will it be with a good name? What revenge, what heavy calamity shall I not endure in agony for the terrible deeds I have done? And wilt thou win the return that thy heart desires? Never may Zeus' bride, the queen of all, in whom thou dost glory, bring that to pass. Mayst thou sometime remember me when thou art racked with anguish; may the fleece like a dream vanish into the nether darkness on the wings of the wind! And may my avenging Furies³ forthwith drive thee from thy country, for all that I have suffered through thy cruelty! These curses will not be allowed to fall unaccomplished to the ground. A mighty oath hast thou transgressed, ruthless one; but not long shalt thou and thy comrades sit at ease casting eyes of mockery upon me, for all your covenants."

Thus she spake, seething with fierce wrath; and she longed to set fire to the ship and to hew it utterly in pieces, and herself to fall into the raging flame. But Jason, half afraid, thus addressed her with gentle words:

"Forbear, lady; me too this pleases not. But we seek some respite from battle, for 10 such a cloud of hostile men, like to a fire, surrounds us on thy account. For all that inhabit this land are eager to aid Apsyrtus, that they may lead thee back home to thy father, like some captured 15 maid. And all of us would perish in hateful destruction if we closed with them in fight; and bitterer still will be the pain if we are slain and leave thee to be their prey. But this covenant will weave a web 20 of guile to lead him to ruin. Nor will the people of the land for thy sake oppose us, to favour the Colchians, when their prince is no longer with them, who is thy champion and thy brother; nor will I shrink 25 from matching myself in fight with the Colchians if they bar my way homeward."

Thus he spake soothing her; and she uttered a deadly speech: "Take heed now. 30 For when sorry deeds are done we must needs devise sorry counsel, since at first I was distraught by my error, and by heaven's will it was I wrought the accomplishment of evil desires. Do thou in the 35 turmoil shield me from the Colchians' spears; and I will beguile Apsyrtus to come into thy hands — do thou greet him with splendid gifts — if only I could persuade the heralds on their departure to 40 bring him alone to hearken to my words. Thereupon if this deed pleases thee, slay him and raise a conflict with the Colchians, I care not."

web of guile for Apsyrtus, and provided many gifts such as are due to guests, and among them gave a sacred robe of Hypsipyle, of crimson hue. The Graces¹ 5 with their own hands had wrought it for Dionysus² in sea-girt Dia,³ and he gave it to his son Thoas thereafter, and Thoas left it to Hypsipyle, and she gave that fair-wrought guest-gift with many another marvel to Æson's son to wear. Never couldst thou satisfy thy sweet desire by touching it or gazing on it. And when she had worked upon the heralds to induce her brother to come, as soon as she reached the temple of the goddess, according to the agreement, and the darkness of night surrounded them, that so she might devise with him a cunning plan for her to take the mighty fleece of gold and return to the home of Æëtes, for, she said, the sons of Phrixus had given her by force to the strangers to carry off; with such 50 beguiling words she scattered to the air and the breezes her witching charms, which even from afar would have drawn down the savage beast from the steep mountain height.

LATIN

VERGIL

(70 B.C.-19 B.C.)

Publius Vergilius Maro was born in a little village near Mantua (hence the epithet Mantuan, which is often applied to him by later writers). His father was a small landholder, engaged in farming and the keeping of bees. He was educated at Cremona and Milan, and also at Naples, where he received instruction in Greek from Parthenius. As he was rather frail, he was not able to gain distinction by the usual methods open to Roman citizens, that is, by oratory or fighting; in fact he was actually deprived of his land for the benefit of a military officer. He was fortunate, however, in making the acquaintance of Mæcenas, a wealthy and powerful patron of the arts. It was largely through the patronage of this rich friend that he was able to pursue his literary career and gain the public ear. It was through Mæcenas, moreover, that he was brought to the attention of Augustus, who was anxious to enlist the services of literary men in his plan for the social rehabilitation of Rome and for his own glorification. Once safely established in the good graces of the most powerful personages in Rome, Vergil had little to worry him. His principal writings were the Eclogues, a set of pastorals, of which more will be said later; the Georgics, a set of agricultural poems somewhat in the manner of Hesiod's Works and Days; and the Æneid.

THE ÆNEID

The Æneid, the national epic of Rome, consists of twelve books, about evenly divided between the wanderings of Æneas after the fall of Troy and the struggles in Latium incident to the founding of Rome. As compared with the Iliad it is characterized by more emphasis on rhetorical effects, detailed analysis of character, and greater care in piecing together the story according to the established rules of narrative art. The writer's purpose was to provide the Romans with a properly constituted set of traditions, to renew their interest in the ancient virtues, and to imbue them with respect for their nobility by showing their descent from famous Trojan heroes. The matter of Trojan descent was particularly emphasized in the case of Augustus, whose ancestry was traced back to Iulus, son of Æneas. Vergil took as the basis of his story a set of Greek traditions concerning the wanderings of Æneas. He selected and recast these traditions in such a way as to bring Æneas to places important in Roman history. To this he added material from popular Roman tradition, from his own imagination, and from the epics of Homer. In form the Æneid is, generally speaking, a combination of the Iliad and the Odyssey, the first six books being based on the latter, the last six on the former.

Regardless of what may be said of the absolute excellence of the Æneid, it is certainly, next to the poems of Homer, the most famous piece of imaginative literature in the world. It was more fortunate than the Homeric poems in that it was known directly to literary men throughout the Middle Ages. As far as we are able to discern there was not a generation that did not know Vergil. He was freely quoted and referred to in ages when Homer was unknown. However unfortunate we may regard the fact that it was through Vergil, rather than through Homer, that classical epic poetry first became known to Western Europe, we must grant to Vergil the distinction of being the greatest single literary force to carry directly through from ancient to modern times. As for his influence on Western European literature, it is so tremendous that it is difficult to convey any idea of it in a single statement. Perhaps we may content ourselves with saying that stories, characters, or passages from the Æneid are found in the writings of nearly every man of letters from Vergil's own time down to the present day.

Although the Æneid as a whole is an indispensable part of the intellectual baggage of every educated person, limitation of space permits us to include here only one book. Book II relates the actual destruction of Troy, which is implied but not described in the Iliad. It is brought into the poem as a narrative related by Æneas at the court of Dido, queen of Carthage, on whose shores he and his men have been shipwrecked. This manner of introducing background material is similar to that employed by Homer in the Odyssey.

The selection in this volume is from Dryden's translation in Chalmers's English Poets, XIX, pp. 366-374.

BOOK II

Æneas relates how the city of Troy was taken, after a ten years' siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the fixed resolution he had taken not to survive the ruin of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defence of it: at last, having been before advised by Hector's ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevailed upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to do this, he carries off his father on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterwards appears to him, and tells him the land which was designed for him.

All were attentive to the godlike man,
When, from his lofty couch, he thus began: 20
"Great queen! ¹ what you command me to relate

Renews the sad remembrance of our fate,
An empire from its old foundations rent,
And every woe the Trojans underwent:
A peopled city made a desert place;
All that I saw, and part of which I was,
Not ev'n the hardest of our foes could hear,
Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear.

And now the latter watch of wasting night, 30
And setting stars, to kindly rest invite.

But, since you take such interest in our
woe,

And Troy's disastrous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell 35
What in our last and fatal night befell.

"By destiny compell'd, and in despair,
The Greeks grew weary of the tedious war:
And, by Minerva's ² aid, a fabric rear'd,
Which, like a steed of monstrous height, 40
appear'd;

The sides were plank'd with pine, they feign'd it made

For their return, and this the vow they paid.

Thus they pretend; but in the hollow side
Selected numbers of their soldiers hide:
With inward arms the dire machine they load,

5 And iron bowels stuff the dark abode.

In sight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle (While fortune did on Priam's empire smile)

Renown'd for wealth; but since a faithless
bay, 10

Where ships expos'd to winds and weather
lay.

There was their fleet conceal'd: we thought for Greece

15 The sails were hoisted, and our fears release.

The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so
long,

Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng,
Like swarming bees, and with delight survey

The camp deserted where the Grecians lay:
The quarters of the several chiefs they show'd,

25 'Here Phœnix,³ here Achilles made abode, Here join'd the battles, there the navy rode.'

Part on the pile their wondering eyes employ

(The pile by Pallas rais'd to ruin Troy).
Thymætës first ('tis doubtful whether hir'd,

Or so the Trojan destiny requir'd)
Mov'd that the ramparts might be broken
down, 35

To lodge the monster fabric in the town.
But Capys,⁴ and the rest of sounder mind,
The fatal present to the flames design'd;
Or to the watery deep: at least to bore
The hollow sides, and hidden frauds explore:

The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide,
With noise say nothing, and in parts divide.

45 Laocoön, followed by a numerous crowd,

¹ Dido.

² Goddess of wisdom, the Roman counterpart of the Greek Pallas Athene.

³ Achilles's teacher in the arts of eloquence and war.

⁴ Grandfather of Æneas.

Ran from the fort; and cry'd, from far,
 aloud:
 'O wretched countrymen! what fury reigns?
 What more than madness has possess'd your brains?
 Think you the Grecians from your coasts are gone,
 And are Ulysses' arts no better known?
 This hollow fabric either must enclose,
 Within its blind recess, our secret foes;
 Or 'tis an engine rais'd above the town,
 T' o'erlook the walls, and then to batter
 down.
 Somewhat is sure design'd, by fraud or
 force;
 Trust not their presents, nor admit the
 horse.
 Thus having said, against the steed he threw
 His forceful spear, which, hissing as it flew,
 Pierc'd through the yielding planks of jointed wood,
 And trembling in the hollow belly stood.
 The sides transpierc'd return a rattling
 sound,
 And groans of Greeks enclos'd come issuing through the wound.
 And had not Heaven the fall of Troy
 design'd,
 Or had not men been fated to be blind,
 Enough was said and done, t' inspire a better mind:
 Then had our lances pierc'd the treacherous wood,
 And Ilian towers and Priam's empire
 stood.
 Meantime, with shouts, the Trojan shepherds bring
 A captive Greek in bands before the king:
 Taken, to take; who made himself their
 prey,
 T' impose on their belief, and Troy betray;
 Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
 To die undaunted, or to circumvent.
 About the captive, tides of Trojans flow;
 All press to see, and some insult the foe.

Now hear how well the Greeks their wiles
 disguis'd,
 Behold a nation in a man compris'd.
 Trembling the miscreant stood, unarm'd and bound:
 He star'd, and roll'd his haggard eyes
 around;
 Then said, 'Alas! what earth remains,
 what sea
 Is open to receive unhappy me!
 What fate a wretched fugitive attends, Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends!'

He said, and sigh'd, and cast a rueful eye:
 Our pity kindles, and our passions die.
 We cheer the youth to make his own defence,
 And freely tell us what he was, and whence:
 What news he could impart, we long to
 know,
 And what to credit from a captive foe.
 "His fear at length dismiss'd, he said,
 'Whate'er

My fate ordains, my words shall be sincere¹:
 I neither can, nor dare, my birth disclaim;
 Greece is my country, Sinon is my name:
 Though plung'd by fortune's power in misery,
 'Tis not in fortune's power to make me lie.
 If any chance has hither brought the name
 Of Palamedes,² not unknown to fame,
 Who suffer'd from the malice of the times,
 Accus'd and sentenc'd for pretended crimes,
 Because the fatal wars he would prevent,
 Whose death the wretched Greeks too late lament,
 Me, then a boy, my father, poor and bare
 Of other means, committed to his care,
 His kinsman and companion in the war.
 While fortune favour'd, while his arms support
 The cause, and rul'd the counsels of the
 court,
 I made some figure there; nor was my
 name
 Obscure, nor I without my share of fame.
 But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,

¹ So convincing is the story of Sinon that even the modern reader, knowing full well the treachery behind it, can hardly avoid being temporarily deceived.

² The messenger sent to persuade Ulysses to join the Greek cause.

Had made impression in the people's hearts;
 And forg'd a treason in my patron's name (I speak of things too far divulg'd by fame),
 My kinsman fell; then I, without support,
 In private mourn'd his loss, and left the
 court.
 Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate
 With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the state:
 And curs'd the direful author of my woes.
 'Twas told again, and hence my ruin rose.
 I threaten'd, if indulgent Heaven once
 more
 Would land me safely on my native shore,
 His death with double vengeance to restore.
 This mov'd the murderer's hate, and soon ensu'd
 Th' effects of malice from a man so proud.
 Ambiguous rumours through the camp he
 spread,
 And sought, by treason, my devoted head:
 New crimes invented, left unturn'd no
 stone
 To make my guilt appear, and hide his
 own,
 Till Calchas ¹ was by force and threatening wrought:
 But why — why dwell I on that anxious thought?
 If on my nation just revenge you seek,
 And 'tis t' appear a foe, t' appear a
 Greek,
 Already you my name and country know, Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike
 the blow:
 My death will both the kingly brothers
 please,
 And set insatiate Ithacus ² at ease.
 This fair unfinish'd tale, these broken starts,
 Rais'd expectations in our longing hearts,
 Unknowing as we were in Grecian arts.
 His former trembling once again renew'd,
 With acted fear, the villain thus pursu'd:
 "Long had the Grecians (tir'd with fruitless care,
 And weary'd with an unsuccessful war)

Resolv'd to raise the siege, and leave the town;
 And, had the gods permitted, they had
 gone.
 5 But oft the wintry seas and southern
 winds
 Withstood their passage home, and chang'd their minds.
 Portents and prodigies their souls amaz'd;
 But most, when this stupendous pile was rais'd:
 Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were seen,
 And thunders rattled through a sky serene:
 15 Dismay'd, and fearful of some dire event,
 Eurypylus, t' inquire their fate, was sent;
 He from the gods this dreadful answer
 brought:
 20 "'O Grecians! when the Trojan shores
 you sought,
 Your passage with a virgin's blood ³ was bought!
 So must your safe return be bought again, 25 And Grecian blood once more atone the main!'
 The spreading rumour round the people ran;
 All fear'd, and each believ'd himself the
 man.
 30 Ulysses took th' advantage of their fright;
 Call'd Calchas, and produc'd in open
 sight:
 Then bade him name the wretch, ordain'd
 35 by fate
 The public victim, to redeem the state.
 Already some presag'd the dire event,
 And saw what sacrifice Ulysses meant.
 For twice five days the good old seer with-
 stood 40 Th' intended treason, and was dumb to
 blood.
 Till, tir'd with endless clamours, and pursuit
 45 Of Ithacus, he stood no longer mute:
 But, as it was agreed, pronounc'd that I
 Was destin'd by the wrathful gods to die!
 All prais'd the sentence, pleas'd the storm
 should fall
 50 On one alone, whose fury threaten'd all.

² Ulysses (Odysseus), whose home was Ithaca.

³ This refers to the sacrifice of Iphigenia by her father Agamemnon, a story made famous by the tragedian Euripides in his play Iphigenia at Aulis.

The dismal day was come, the priests prepare
 Their leaven'd cakes, and fillets for my hair.
 I follow'd nature's laws, and must avow
 I broke my bonds, and fled the fatal blow.
 Hid in a weedy lake all night I lay,
 Secure of safety when they sail'd away.
 But now what further hopes for me remain,
 To see my friends or native soil again?
 My tender infants, or my careful sire,
 Whom they returning will to death require?
 Will perpetrate on them their first design, 15
 And take the forfeit of their heads for mine!
 Which, oh, if pity mortal minds can move,
 If there be faith below, or gods above,
 If innocence and truth can claim desert, 20
 Ye Trojans, from an injur'd wretch avert.
 False tears true pity move: the king commands
 To loose his fetters, and unbind his hands:
 Then adds these friendly words: 'Dismiss 25
 thy fears,
 Forget the Greeks, be mine as thou wert
 theirs:
 But truly tell, was it for force or guile,
 Or some religious end, you rais'd this pile.' 30
 Thus said the king. He, full of fraudulent arts,
 This well invented tale for truth imparts:
 'Ye lamps of Heaven!' he said, and lifted
 high
 His hands now free, 'thou venerable sky,
 Inviolable powers, ador'd with dread,
 Ye fatal fillets, that once bound this head,
 Ye sacred altars, from whose flames I fled,
 Be all of you abjur'd; and grant I may, 40
 Without a crime, th' ungrateful Greeks betray!
 Reveal the secrets of the guilty state,
 And justly punish whom I justly hate!
 But you, O king! preserve the faith you 45
 gave,
 If I, to save myself, your empire save.
 The Grecian hopes, and all th' attempts they made,
 Were only founded on Minerva's aid. 50

But from the time when impious Diomede,²
 And false Ulysses, that inventive head,
 Her fatal image from the temple drew,
 5 The sleeping guardians of the castle slew,
 Her virgin statue with their bloody hands
 Polluted, and profan'd her holy bands:
 From thence the tide of fortune left their
 shore,
 10 And ebb'd much faster than it flow'd before:
 Their courage languish'd, as their hopes
 decay'd,
 And Pallas, now averse, refus'd her aid,
 15 Nor did the goddess doubtfully declare
 Her alter'd mind, and alienated care:
 When first her fatal image touch'd the
 ground,
 She sternly cast her glaring eyes around, 20 That sparkled as they roll'd, and seem'd to threaten;
 Her heavenly limbs distill'd a briny sweat.
 Thrice from the ground she leap'd, was seen to wield
 25 Her brandish'd lance, and shake her horrid
 shield!
 Then Calchas bade our host for flight prepare,
 And hope no conquest from the tedious
 war:
 Till first they sail'd for Greece; with prayers besought
 Her injur'd power, and better omens
 brought.
 35 And now their navy ploughs the watery
 main,
 Yet, soon expect it on your shores again,
 With Pallas pleas'd: as Calchas did or-
 dain.
 But first, to reconcile the blue-ey'd maid,
 For her stol'n statue, and her tower betray'd,
 Warn'd by the seer, to her offended name
 We rais'd, and dedicate this wondrous frame,
 So lofty, lest through your forbidden
 gates
 It pass, and intercept our better fates.
 For, once admitted there, our hopes are
 lost;

² Second only to Achilles among the Greek heroes. He wounded Æneas in one of the battles.

And Troy may then a new Palladium¹ boast.
 For so religion and the gods ordain,
 That if you violate with hands profane
 Minerva's gift, your town in flames shall burn (Which omen, O ye gods, on Græcia turn)!
 But if it climb, with your assisting hands,
 The Trojan walls, and in the city stands,
 Then Troy shall Argos and Mycenæ burn,¹⁰
 And the reverse of fate on us return.'
 "With such deceits he gain'd their easy hearts,
 Too prone to credit his perfidious arts,
 What Diomed, nor Thetis's greater son,²
 A thousand ships, nor ten years' siege had done:
 False tears and fawning words the city won.
 A greater omen, and of worse portent,
 Did our unwary minds with fear torment,
 Concurring to produce the dire event.
 Laocoön,³ Neptune's priest by lot that year,
 With solemn pomp then sacrific'd a steer.
 When, dreadful to behold, from sea we spy'd
 Two serpents rank'd abreast, the seas divide,
 And smoothly sweep along the swelling tide.
 Their flaming crests above the waves they show,
 Their bellies seem to burn the seas below,
 Their speckled tails advance to steer their course,
 And, on the sounding shore, the flying billows force.
 And now the strand, and now the plain⁴⁰
 they held,
 Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were fill'd:
 Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,
 And lick'd their hissing jaws that sputter'd flame.
 We fled amaz'd; their destin'd way they take,
 And to Laocoön and his children make:
 And first around the tender boys they wind,
 Then with their sharpen'd fangs their limbs and bodies grind.
 The wretched father, running to their aid
 With pious haste, but vain, they next invade:
 Twice round his waist their winding volumes roll'd,
 And twice about his gasping throat they fold.
 The priest, thus doubly chok'd, their crests divide,
 And, towering o'er his head, in triumph ride.
 With both his hands he labours at the knots,
 His holy fillets the blue venom blots:
 His roaring fills the flitting air around.
 Thus, when an ox receives a glancing wound,
 He breaks his bands, the fatal altar flies,
 And, with loud bellowings, breaks the yielding skies.
 Their tasks perform'd, the serpents quit their prey,
 And to the tower of Pallas make their way:
 Couch'd at her feet, they lie protected there,
 By her large buckler, and protended spear.
 Amazement seizes all; the general cry
 Proclaims Laocoön justly doom'd to die,
 Whose hand the will of Pallas had withstood,
 And dar'd to violate the sacred wood.
 All vote t' admit the steed, that vows be paid,
 And incense offer'd, to th' offended maid.
 A spacious breach is made, the town lies bare,⁴⁵

¹ The celebrated statue of Minerva in Troy which was supposed to have fallen from heaven. Tradition had it that Troy would last as long as this statue remained within it. It was stolen by Diomed and Ulysses.

² Achilles.

³ The scene which follows is represented also in a famous statue by Agesander and Athenodorus. This passage in the Æneid and the statue, now preserved in the Vatican, were used by the great German critic, Lessing, as a starting point for a comparison between the essential natures of plastic and literary art.

Some hoisting levers, some the wheels prepare,
 And fasten to the horse's feet: the rest
 With cables haul along th' unwieldy beast.
 Each on his fellow for assistance calls:
 At length the fatal fabric mounts the walls,
 Big with destruction. Boys with chaplets crown'd,
 And choirs of virgins, sing and dance around.
 Thus rais'd aloft, and then descending down,
 It enters o'er our heads, and threats the town.
 O sacred city! built by hands divine!
 O valiant heroes of the Trojan line!
 Four times he stuck; as oft the clashing sound
 Of arms was heard, and inward groans rebound.
 Yet, mad with zeal, and blinded with our fate,
 We haul along the horse in solemn state;
 Then place the dire portent within the tower.
 Cassandra ¹ cry'd, and curs'd the unhappy hour;
 Foretold our fate; but, by the gods' decree,
 All heard, and none believ'd, the prophecy.
 With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste
 In jollity the day ordain'd to be the last.
 Meantime the rapid heavens roll'd down the light,
 And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night:
 Our men secure, nor guards nor sentries held,
 But easy sleep their weary limbs compell'd.
 The Grecians had embark'd their naval powers
 From Tenedos, and sought our well-known shores:
 Safe under covert of the silent night,
 And guided by th' imperial galley's light.
 When Sinon, favour'd by the partial gods,
 Unlock'd the horse, and op'd his dark abodes;
 Restor'd to vital air our hidden foes,
 Who joyful from their long confinement rose.
 Tysander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
 And dire Ulysses, down the cable slide:
 5 Then Thoas, Athamas, and Pyrrhus haste;
 Nor was the Podalirian hero last:
 Nor injur'd Menelaus, nor the fam'd Epeus,
 Who the fatal engine fram'd.
 A nameless crowd succeed; their forces join 10 T' invade the town, oppress'd with sleep and wine.
 Those few they find awake first meet their fate,
 15 Then to their fellows they unbar the gate.
 'Twas in the dead of night, when sleep repairs
 Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares, 20 When Hector's ghost before my sight appears:
 A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in tears.
 Such as he was, when, by Pelides ² slain,
 25 Thessalian coursers dragg'd him o'er the plain.
 Swol'n were his feet, as when the thongs were thrust
 Through the bor'd holes, his body black with dust.
 Unlike that Hector, who return'd from toils
 Of war triumphant, in Æacian spoils:
 Or him, who made the fainting Greeks retire,
 And launch'd against their navy Phrygian fire.
 His hair and beard stood stiffen'd with his gore;
 And all the wounds, he for his country bore,
 Now stream'd afresh, and with new purple ran:
 I wept to see the visonary man:
 45 And, while my trance continu'd, thus began:
 'O light of Trojans, and support of Troy,
 Thy father's champion, and thy country's joy!

¹ Daughter of Priam, who, though endowed with the gift of prophecy, was doomed never to be believed. At the sack of Troy she fell to the lot of Agamemnon, brother of Menelaus. Æschylus's tragedy Agamemnon tells of her death at the hands of Clytemnestra, Agamemnon's wife.

² Achilles. See the account of his slaying of Hector, Iliad, Book XXII, pp. 21-29.

O long expected by thy friends! from whence
 Art thou so late return'd for our defence?
 Do we behold thee, weary'd as we are,
 With length of labours, and with toils of war?
 After so many funerals of thy own,
 Art thou restor'd to thy declining town?
 But say, what wounds are these? What new disgrace
 Deforms the manly features of thy face?
 To this the spectre no reply did frame;
 But answer'd to the cause for which he came:
 And, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
 This warning, in these mournful words, express'd:
 'O goddess-born!¹ escape, by timely flight,
 The flames and horrors of this fatal night.
 The foes, already, have possess'd the wall,
 Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.
 Enough is paid to Priam's royal name,
 More than enough to duty and to fame.
 If by a mortal hand my father's throne
 Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone:
 Now Troy to thee commends her future state,
 And gives her gods companions of thy fate:
 From their assistance happier walls expect,
 Which, wandering long, at last thou shalt erect.²
 He said, and brought me, from their blest abodes,
 The venerable statues of the gods.
 With ancient Vesta² from the sacred choir
 The wreaths and relics of th' immortal fire.
 "Now peals of shouts come thundering from afar,
 Cries, threats, and loud laments, and mingled war!
 The noise approaches, though our palace stood Aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood.
 Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms
 Of human cries distinct, and clashing arms!
 Fear broke my slumbers: I no longer stay,
 But mount the terrace, thence the town survey:
 And hearken what the fruitful sounds convey!
 Thus when a flood of fire by wind is borne,
 Crackling it rolls, and mows the standing corn:
 Or deluges, descending on the plains,
 Sweep o'er the yellow year, destroy the pains
 Of labouring oxen, and the peasant's gains:
 Unroot the forest oaks, and bear away
 Flocks, folds, and trees, an undistinguish'd prey!
 The shepherd climbs the cliff, and sees, from far,
 The wasteful ravage of the watery war.
 Then Hector's faith was manifestly clear'd;
 And Grecian frauds in open light appear'd!
 The palace of Deïphobus ascends
 In smoky flames, and catches on his friend's;
 Ucalegon burns next; the seas are bright
 With splendour not their own, and shine with Trojan light.
 New clamours and new clangours now arise,
 The sound of trumpets mix'd with fighting cries!
 With frenzy seiz'd, I run to meet th' alarms,
 Resolv'd on death, resolv'd to die in arms!
 But first to gather friends, with them to oppose,
 If fortune favour'd, and repel the foes;
 Spurr'd by my courage, by my country fir'd,
 With sense of honour, and revenge inspir'd!
 "Pantheus, Apollo's priest, a sacred name,
 Had 'scap'd the Grecian swords, and pass'd the flame;
 With relics loaden, to my doors he fled,
 And, by the hand, his tender grandson led.

¹ Æneas was the son of Venus and Anchises.² Goddess of the hearth.

'What hope, O Pantheus! whither can we run?
 Where make a stand? and what may yet be done?'
 Scarce had I said, when Pantheus, with a
 groan,
 'Troy is no more, and Ilium was a town!
 The fatal day, th' appointed hour, is come,
 When wrathful Jove's irrevocable doom
 Transfers the Trojan state to Grecian
 hands.
 The fire consumes the town, the foe commands!
 And armed hosts, an unexpected force,
 Break from the bowels of the fatal horse!
 Within the gates proud Sinon throws about
 The flames, and foes for entrance press without,
 With thousand others, whom I fear to
 name,
 More than from Argos or Mycenæ came.
 To several posts their parties they divide;
 Some block the narrow streets, some scour
 the wide.
 The bold they kill, th' unwary they surprise;
 Who fights finds death, and death finds him who flies.
 The warders of the gate but scarce maintain
 Th' unequal combat, and resist in vain.'
 I heard; and Heaven, that well-born souls inspires,
 Prompts me, through lifted swords and rising fires,
 To run, where clashing arms and clamour calls,
 And rush undaunted to defend the walls!
 Ripheus and Iphitus by my side engage,
 For valour one renown'd, and one for age.
 Dymas and Hypanis by moonlight knew My motions and my mien, and to my party
 drew;
 With young Chorcæbus, who by love was led
 To win renown, and fair Cassandra's bed;
 And lately brought his troops to Priam's
 aid,
 Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid.
 Whom, when I saw, resolv'd in arms to
 fall,
 And that one spirit animated all.

'Brave souls,' said I, 'but brave, alas!
 in vain:
 Come, finish what our cruel fates ordain;
 You see the desperate state of our affairs,
 And Heaven's protecting powers are deaf to prayers.
 The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
 Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
 Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
 To save a sinking town involv'd in fire.
 Then let us fall, but fall amidst our foes:
 Despair of life, the means of living shows.'
 So bold a speech encouraged their desire
 Of death, and added fuel to their fire!
 "As hungry wolves, with raging appetite,
 Scour through the fields, nor fear the stormy night,
 Their whelps at home expect the promis'd
 food,
 And long to temper their dry chaps in
 blood,
 So rush'd we forth at once, resolv'd to die,
 Resolv'd in death the last extremes to try!
 We leave the narrow lanes behind, and dare
 Th' unequal combat in the public square:
 Night was our friend, our leader was Despair.
 What tongue can tell the slaughter of that night!
 What eyes can weep the sorrows and af-fright!
 An ancient and imperial city falls,
 The streets are fill'd with frequent funerals:
 Houses and holy temples float in blood,
 And hostile nations make a common flood.
 Not only Trojans fall, but, in their turn,
 The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors mourn.
 Ours take new courage from despair and
 night;
 Confus'd the fortune is, confus'd the fight.
 All parts resound with tumults, complaints,
 and fears,
 And grisly death in sundry shapes appears!
 Androgeos fell among us, with his band,
 Who thought us Grecians newly come to
 land:
 'From whence,' said he, 'my friends, this long delay?

You loiter, while the spoils are borne away.
 Our ships are laden with the Trojan store,
 And you, like truants, come too late ashore.
 He said, but soon corrected his mistake, Found by the doubtful answers which we make:
 Amaz'd he would have shunn'd th' unequal fight,
 But we, more numerous, intercept his flight.
 As when some peasant, in a bushy brake,
 Has, with unwary footing, press'd a snake,
 He starts aside, astonish'd, when he spies
 His rising crest, blue neck, and rolling eyes;
 So from our arms surpris'd Androgeos
 flies!
 In vain; for him and his we compass
 round,
 Possess'd with fear, unknowing of the
 ground;
 And of their lives an easy conquest found.
 Thus Fortune on our first endeavour
 smil'd;
 Chorcæbus then, with youthful hopes be-guil'd,
 Swol'n with success, and of a daring mind,
 This new invention fatally design'd.
 'My friends,' said he, 'since Fortune shows the way,
 'Tis fit we should th' auspicious guide obey.
 For what has she these Grecian arms bestow'd,
 But their destruction, and the Trojans'
 good?
 Then change we shields, and their devices
 bear,
 Let fraud supply the want of force in war.
 They find us arms.' This said, himself he dress'd
 In dead Androgeos' spoils, his upper vest,
 His painted buckler, and his plummy crest.
 Thus Rypheus, Dymas, all the Trojan
 train,
 Lay down their own attire, and strip the
 slain.
 Mix'd with the Greeks, we go with ill
 presage,
 Flatter'd with hopes to glut our greedy
 rage:
 Unknown, assaulting whom we blindly
 meet,

And strew, with Grecian carcasses, the street.
 Thus while their straggling parties we defeat,
 Some to the shore and safer ships retreat:
 And some, oppress'd with more ignoble
 fear, Remount the hollow horse, and pant in secret there.
 "But ah! what use of valour can be
 made,
 When Heaven's propitious powers refuse their aid!
 Behold the royal prophetess, the fair
 Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevell'd
 hair;
 Whom not Minerva's shrine, nor sacred
 bands,
 In safety could protect from sacrilegious
 hands:
 On Heaven she cast her eyes, she sigh'd,
 she cry'd ('Twas all she could), her tender arms were ty'd.
 So sad a sight Chorcæbus could not bear;
 But, fir'd with rage, distracted with despair,
 Amid the barbarous ravishers he flew;
 Our leader's rash example we pursue;
 But storms of stones, from the proud
 temple's height,
 Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight:
 We from our friends receiv'd this fatal
 blow,
 Who thought us Grecians, as we seem'd in
 show.
 They aim at the mistaken crests, from
 high,
 And ours beneath the ponderous ruin lie.
 Then, mov'd with anger and disdain, to see
 Their troops dispers'd, the royal virgin
 free,
 The Grecians rally, and their powers unite,
 With fury charge us, and renew the fight.
 The brother-kings with Ajax join their
 force,
 And the whole squadron of Thessalian
 horse.
 "Thus, when the rival winds their quarrel try,
 Contending for the kingdom of the sky,

South, east, and west, on airy coursers borne,
 The whirlwind gathers, and the woods are
 torn:
 Then Nereus¹ strikes the deep, the bil-lows rise,
 And, mix'd with ooze and sand, pollute
 the skies.
 The troops we squander'd first again appear
 From several quarters, and enclose the rear:
 They first observe, and to the rest betray,
 Our different speech; our borrow'd arms
 survey.
 Oppress'd with odds, we fall; Choroëbus
 first,
 At Pallas's altar, by Peneleus pierc'd.
 Then Rypheus follow'd, in th' unequal
 fight,
 Just of his word, observant of the right:
 Heaven thought not so: Dymas their fate attends,
 With Hypanis, mistaken by their friends.
 Nor Pantheus, thee, thy mitre, nor the bands
 Of awful Phœbus, sav'd from impious
 hands.
 Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear
 What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd
 there:
 No sword avoiding in the fatal strife,
 Expos'd to death, and prodigal of life.
 Witness, ye Heavens! I live not by my fault:
 I strove to have deserv'd the death I sought.
 But when I could not fight, and would have dy'd,
 Borne off to distance by the growing tide,
 Old Iphitus and I were hurry'd thence,
 With Pelias wounded, and without defence.
 New clamours from th' invested palace
 ring;
 We run to die, or disengage the king.
 So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,
 While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose,
 As all the Dardan and Argolic race²

Had been contracted in that narrow space:
 Or as all Ilium else were void of fear,
 And tumult, war, and slaughter only there.
 Their targets in a tortoise cast, the foes
 Secure advancing, to the turrets rose:
 Some mount the scaling ladders; some,
 more bold,
 Swerve upwards, and by posts and pillars
 hold:
 10 Their left hand gripes their bucklers in th'
 ascent,
 While with the right they seize the battle-
 ment.
 From the demolish'd towers the Trojans
 15 throw
 Huge heaps of stones, that, falling, crush
 the foe:
 And heavy beams and rafters from the sides
 20 (Such arms their last necessity provides):
 And gilded roofs come tumbling from on
 high,
 The marks of state and ancient royalty.
 The guards below, fix'd in the pass, attend 25 The charge undaunted, and the gate defend.
 Renew'd in courage, with recover'd breath,
 A second time we ran to tempt our
 death:
 To clear the palace from the foe, succeed
 The weary living, and revenge the dead.
 A postern door, yet unobserv'd and free,
 Join'd by the length of a blind gallery,
 To the king's closet led, a way well known 35 To Hector's wife, while Priam held the throne:
 Through which she brought Astyanax,
 unseen,
 To cheer his grandsire and his grandsire's
 queen.
 Through this we pass, and mount the tower from whence,
 With unavailing arms, the Trojans make defence.
 45 From this the trembling king had oft de-scry'd
 The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
 Beams from his lofty height with swords
 50 we hew;

¹ A genial old man of the sea, distinguished for his prophetic gifts, his knowledge, and his love of truth and justice.

² The races of Troy and of Argos.

Then, wrenching with our hands, th' assault renew.
 And, where the rafters on the columns
 meet,
 We push them headlong with our arms and feet:
 The lightning flies not swifter than the fall,
 Nor thunder louder than the ruin'd wall:
 Down goes the top at once; the Greeks
 beneath
 Are piecemeal torn, or pounded into death.
 Yet more succeed, and more to death are sent;
 We cease not from above, nor they below
 relent.
 Before the gate stood Pyrrhus,¹ threatening loud,
 With glittering arms conspicuous in the crowd.
 So shines, renew'd in youth, the crested snake,
 Who slept the winter in a thorny brake:
 And, casting off his slough, when spring
 returns,
 Now looks aloft, and with new glory burns:
 Restor'd with poisonous herbs, his ardent sides
 Reflect the Sun, and, rais'd on spires, he rides;
 High o'er the grass, hissing he rolls along,
 And brandishes, by fits, his forked tongue.
 Proud Periphas, and fierce Automedon,
 His father's charioteer, together run
 To force the gate: the Scyrian infantry
 Rush on in crowds, and the barr'd passage
 free.
 Entering the court, with shouts the skies
 they rend,
 And flaming firebrands to the roofs ascend.
 Himself, among the foremost, deals his blows,
 And, with his ax, repeated strokes bestows
 On the strong doors: then all their shoulders ply,
 Till from the posts the brazen hinges fly.
 He hews apace, the double bars at length
 Yield to his ax, and unresisted strength.
 A mighty breach is made; the rooms con-ceal'd
 Appear, and all the palace is reveal'd:
 The halls of audience, and of public state,
 And where the lonely queen in secret sat.

Arm'd soldiers now by trembling maids are seen,
 With not a door, and scarce a space between.
 The house is fill'd with loud laments and cries,
 And shrieks of women rend the vaulted skies.
 The fearful matrons run from place to place,
 And kiss the thresholds, and the posts
 embrace.
 The fatal work inhuman Pyrrhus plies,
 And all his father sparkles in his eyes.
 Nor bars, nor fighting guards, his force sustain;
 The bars are broken, and the guards are
 slain.
 In rush the Greeks, and all th' apartments
 fill;
 Those few defendants whom they find they kill.
 Not with so fierce a rage, the foaming
 flood Roars, when he finds his rapid course with-
 stood:
 Bears down the dams with unresisted
 sway,
 And sweeps the cattle and the cots away.
 These eyes beheld him, when he march'd between
 The brother-kings: I saw th' unhappy
 queen,
 The hundred wives, and where old Priam
 stood,
 To stain his hallow'd altar with his blood.
 The fifty nuptial beds (such hopes had he,
 So large a promise of a progeny).
 The posts of plated gold and hung with spoils
 Fell the reward of the proud victor's toils.
 Where'er the raging fire had left a space,
 The Grecians enter, and possess the place.
 Perhaps you may of Priam's fate inquire:
 He, when he saw his regal town on fire,
 His ruin'd palace, and his entering foes,
 On every side inevitable woes,
 In arms disus'd, invests his limbs decay'd
 Like them, with age: a late and useless
 aid.
 His feeble shoulders scarce the weight
 sustain:

Loaded, not arm'd, he creeps along with
 pain,
 Despairing of success, ambitious to be
 slain!
 Uncover'd but by Heaven, there stood in view
 An altar; near the hearth a laurel grew, Dodder'd with age, whose boughs encompass round
 The household gods, and shade the holy
 ground.
 Here Hecuba, with all her helpless train
 Of dames, for shelter sought, but sought in
 vain.
 Driven like a flock of doves along the sky, 15
 Their images they hug, and to their altars
 fly.
 The queen, when she beheld her trembling
 lord,
 And hanging by his side a heavy sword, 20
 'What rage,' she cry'd, 'has seiz'd my husband's mind;
 What arms are these, and to what use
 design'd?
 These times want other aids: were Hector 25
 here,
 Ev'n Hector now in vain, like Priam,
 would appear.
 With us, one common shelter thou shalt find,
 Or in one common fate with us be join'd.'
 She said: and with a last salute embrac'd
 The poor old man, and by the laurel plac'd.
 Behold Polites, one of Priam's sons,
 Pursued by Pyrrhus, there for safety runs. 35
 Through swords and foes, amaz'd and hurt
 he flies
 Through empty courts, and open galleries:
 Him Pyrrhus, urging with his lance, pursues,
 And often reaches, and his thrusts renews.
 The youth transfix'd, with lamentable
 cries,
 Expires, before his wretched parents'
 eyes.
 Whom, gasping at his feet, when Priam
 saw,
 The fear of death gave place to nature's
 law.
 And, shaking more with anger than with 50
 age,
 'The gods,' said he, 'requite thy brutal
 rage:

As sure they will, barbarian; sure they must,
 If there be gods in Heaven, and gods be just:
 Who tak'st in wrongs an insolent delight,
 With a son's death t' infect a father's
 sight.
 Not he, whom thou and lying fame con-
 spire
 To call thee his: not he, thy vaunted sire, Thus us'd my wretched age: the gods he fear'd,
 The laws of nature and of nations heard.
 He cheer'd my sorrows, and, for sums of
 gold,
 The bloodless carcase of my Hector sold,
 Pity'd the woes a parent underwent,
 And sent me back in safety from his tent.'
 "This said, his feeble hand a javelin
 threw,
 Which, fluttering, seem'd to loiter as it
 flew:
 Just, and but barely, to the mark it held,
 And faintly tinkled on the brazen shield.
 "Then Pyrrhus thus: 'Go thou from me to fate;
 And to my father my foul deeds relate.
 Now die': with that he dragg'd the trembling sire,
 30 Sliddering through clotted blood and holy mire
 (The mingled paste his murder'd son had
 made),
 Haul'd from beneath the violated shade,
 And on the sacred pile the royal victim
 laid.
 His right hand held his bloody falchion
 bare;
 His left he twisted in his hoary hair:
 40 Then, with a speeding thrust, his heart he
 found:
 The lukewarm blood came rushing through the wound,
 And sanguine streams distain'd the sacred
 ground.
 45 Thus Priam fell, and shar'd one common
 fate
 With Troy in ashes, and his ruin'd state:
 He, who the sceptre of all Asia sway'd,
 Whom monarchs, like domestic slaves,
 obey'd.
 On the bleak shore now lies th' abandon'd
 king,

A headless carcase, and a nameless thing.
 "Then, not before, I felt my curdled
 blood
 Congeal with fear, my hair with horror
 stood:
 My father's image fill'd my pious mind,
 Lest equal years might equal fortune find.
 Again I thought on my forsaken wife,
 And trembled for my son's abandon'd life.
 I look'd about, but found myself alone,
 Deserted at my need, my friends were
 gone.
 Some spent with toil, some with despair
 oppress'd, Leap'd headlong from the heights; the flames consum'd the rest.
 Thus, wandering in my way, without a
 guide,
 The graceless Helen in the porch I spy'd
 Of Vesta's temple; there she lurk'd alone;
 Muffled she sat, and, what she could, unknown:
 But, by the flames, that cast their blaze
 around,
 That common bane of Greece and Troy
 I found.
 For Ilium burnt, she dreads the Trojan's
 sword;
 More dreads the vengeance of her injur'd
 lord;
 Ev'n by those gods, who refug'd her, abhorr'd.
 Trembling with rage, the strumpet I regard;
 Resolv'd to give her guilt the due reward.
 'Shall she triumphant sail before the wind,
 And leave in flames unhappy Troy behind?
 Shall she her kingdom and her friends re-
 view,
 In state attended with a captive crew;
 While unreveng'd the good old Priam
 falls,
 And Grecian fires consume the Trojan
 walls?
 For this the Phrygian fields and Xanthian
 flood
 Were swell'd with bodies, and were drunk with blood!
 'Tis true, a soldier can small honour gain,
 And boast no conquest from a woman
 slain;
 Yet shall the fact not pass without applause,
 5 Of vengeance taken in so just a cause.
 The punish'd crime shall set my soul at ease:
 And murmuring manes of my friends appease.'
 10 Thus while I rave, a gleam of pleasant
 light
 Spread o'er the place, and, shining heavenly bright,
 My mother stood reveal'd before my sight.
 15 Never so radiant did her eyes appear;
 Nor her own star confess'd a light so clear.
 Great in her charms, as when the gods
 above
 She looks, and breathes herself into their love.
 She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break:
 Then, from her rosy lips, began to speak:
 'My son, from whence this madness, this neglect
 Of my commands, and those whom I protect?
 Why this unmanly rage? recall to mind
 Whom you forsake, what pledges leave 30 behind.
 Look if your hapless father yet survive;
 Or if Ascanius,¹ or Creüsa,¹ live.
 Around your house the greedy Grecians
 err;
 35 And these had perish'd in the nightly war,
 But for my presence and protecting care.
 Not Helen's face, nor Paris, was in fault:
 But by the gods was this destruction
 brought.
 40 Now cast your eyes around; while I dissolve
 The mists and films that mortal eyes involve:
 Purge from your sight the dross, and make 45 you see
 The shape of each avenging deity.
 Enlighten'd thus, my just commands
 fulfil:
 Nor fear obedience to your mother's will.
 50 Where yon disorder'd heap of ruin lies,

¹ Son of Æneas, later known as Iulus. This change in his name enabled Vergil to convey the idea that he was the ancestor of the Julian family, to which Augustus belonged. Creüsa was the wife of Æneas.

Stones rent from stones, where clouds of dust arise,
 Amid that smother, Neptune holds his
 place:
 Below the wall's foundation drives his mace:
 And heaves the building from the solid base.
 Look where, in arms, imperial Juno stands,
 Full in the Scæan gate, with loud com- 10
 mands,
 Urging on shore the tardy Grecian bands.
 See Pallas, of her snaky buckler proud, Bestrides the tower, refulgent through the cloud:
 See Jove new courage to the foe supplies,
 And arms against the town the partial deities.
 Haste hence, my son; this fruitless labour
 end:
 Haste where your trembling spouse and sire attend:
 Haste, and a mother's care your passage shall befriend.'
 She said: and swiftly vanish'd from my 25
 sight,
 Obscure in clouds, and gloomy shades of
 night.
 I look'd, I listen'd; dreadful sounds I hear;
 And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
 Troy sunk in flames I saw, nor could prevent;
 And Ilium from its old foundations rent.
 Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the 35
 winds;
 And stood the sturdy strokes of labouring
 hinds:
 About the roots the cruel ax resounds,
 The stumps are pierc'd with oft-repeated 40 wounds.
 The war is felt on high, the nodding crown
 Now threatens a fall, and throws the leafy honours down.
 To their united force it yields, though late; 45
 And mourns, with mortal groans, th' approaching fate:
 The roots no more their upper load sus-tain;
 But down she falls, and spreads a ruin 50
 through the plain.
 "Descending thence, I 'scape through foes, and fire:

Before the goddess, foes and flames retire.
 Arriv'd at home, he for whose only sake,
 Or most for his, such toils I undertake,
 The good Anchises, whom, by timely flight,
 I purpos'd to secure on Ida's height,
 Refus'd the journey; resolute to die,
 And add his funerals to the fate of Troy:
 Rather than exile and old age sustain.
 'Go you, whose blood runs warm in every vein:
 Had Heaven decreed that I should life
 enjoy,
 Heaven had decreed to save unhappy
 Troy.
 15 'Tis sure enough, if not too much for one,
 Twice to have seen our Ilium overthrown.
 Make haste to save the poor remaining crew,
 And give this useless corpse a long adieu.
 20 These weak old hands suffice to stop my breath:
 At least the pitying foes will aid my death,
 To take my spoils: and leave my body
 bare:
 As for my sepulchre let Heaven take care.
 'Tis long since I, for my celestial wife, Loath'd by the gods, have dragg'd a lingering life:
 Since every hour and moment I expire,
 30 Blasted from Heaven by Jove's avenging
 fire.'
 This oft repeated, he stood fix'd to die:
 Myself, my wife, my son, my family,
 Entreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry.
 What, will he still persist, on death resolve,
 And in his ruin all his house involve?
 He still persists his reasons to maintain;
 Our prayers, our tears, our loud laments,
 are vain.
 "Urg'd by despair, again I go to try
 The fate of arms, resolv'd in fight to die.
 What hope remains, but what my death must give?
 Can I without so dear a father live?
 You term it prudence, what I baseness call:
 Could such a word from such a parent fall?
 If fortune please, and so the gods ordain,
 That nothing should of ruin'd Troy remain;
 And you conspire with fortune, to be slain;
 The way to death is wide, th' approaches
 near:
 For soon relentless Pyrrhus will appear,

Reeking with Priam's blood: the wretch who slew
 The son (inhuman) in the father's view,
 And then the sire himself to the dire altar drew.
 "O goddess-mother, give me back to fate;
 Your gift was undesir'd, and came too late.
 Did you for this unhappy me convey
 Through foes and fires to see my house a prey?
 Shall I, my father, wife, and son, behold
 Weltering in blood, each other's arms unfold?
 Haste! gird my sword, though spent and overcome:
 'Tis the last summons to receive your doom.
 I hear thee, fate, and I obey thy call:
 Not unreveng'd the foe shall see my fall.
 Restore me yet to the unfinish'd fight:
 My death is wanting to conclude the night.
 Arm'd once again, my glittering sword I wield!
 While th' other hand sustains my weighty shield:
 And forth I rush to seek th' abandon'd field.
 I went; but sad Creüsa stopp'd my way,
 And, cross the threshold, in my passage lay;
 Embrac'd my knees; and, when I would have gone,
 Shew'd me my feeble sire, and tender son.
 'If death be your design, at least,' said she, 'Take us along to share your destiny.
 If any further hopes in arms remain,
 This place, these pledges of your love maintain.
 To whom do you expose your father's life, Your son's, and mine, your now forgotten wife!'
 While thus she fills the house with clamorous cries,
 Our hearing is diverted by our eyes;
 For while I held my son, in the short space,
 Betwixt our kisses and our last embrace,
 Strange to relate, from young Iulus' head
 A lambent flame arose, which gently spread Around his brows, and on his temples fed.
 Amaz'd, with running water we prepare
 To quench the sacred fire, and slake his hair;
 But old Anchises, vers'd in omens, rear'd
 His hand to Heaven, and this request preferr'd:
 'If any vows, almighty Jove, can bend
 Thy will, if piety can prayers commend,
 Confirm the glad presage which thou art pleas'd to send.'
 Scarce had he said, when, on our left, we hear
 A peal of rattling thunder roll in air:
 There shot a streaming lamp along the sky,
 Which on the winged lightning seem'd to fly;
 From o'er the roof the blaze began to move;
 And trailing vanish'd in th' Idean grove.
 It swept a path in Heaven, and shone a guide;
 Then in a steaming stench of sulphur dy'd.
 "The good old man with suppliant hands implor'd
 The gods' protection, and their star ador'd.
 'Now, now,' said he, 'my son, no more delay,
 I yield, I follow where Heaven shows the way.
 Keep (O my country gods!) our dwelling place,
 And guard this relic of the Trojan race,
 This tender child; these omens are your own;
 And you can yet restore the ruin'd town.
 At least accomplish what your signs fore-show:
 I stand resign'd, and am prepar'd to go.'
 "He said: the crackling flames appear on high,
 And driving sparkles dance along the sky.
 With Vulcan's rage the rising winds conspire;
 And near our palace rolls the flood of fire.
 'Haste, my dear father ('tis no time to wait)
 And load my shoulders with a willing freight.
 Whate'er befalls, your life shall be my care,
 One death, or one deliverance, we will share.

My hand shall lead our little son; and
 you,
 My faithful consort, shall our steps pursue.
 Next, you, my servants, heed my strict commands:
 Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
 To Ceres¹ hallow'd once, a cypress nigh
 Shoots up her venerable head on high;
 By long religion kept: there bend your
 feet;
 And, in divided parties, let us meet.
 Our country gods, the relics, and the
 bands,
 Hold you, my father, in your guiltless
 hands:
 In me 'tis impious holy things to bear,
 Red as I am with slaughter, new from war:
 Till, in some living stream, I cleanse the guilt
 Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt.²
 Thus, ordering all that prudence could provide,
 I clothe my shoulders with a lion's hide,
 And yellow spoils: then, on my bending
 back,
 The welcome load of my dear father take.
 While, on my better hand, Ascanius hung,
 And, with unequal paces, tript along.
 Creüsa kept behind: by choice we stray
 Through every dark and every devious³⁰
 way.
 I, who so bold and dauntless, just before,
 The Grecian darts and shocks of lances
 bore,
 At every shadow now am seiz'd with fear:³⁵
 Not for myself, but for the charge I bear.
 Till near the ruin'd gate arriv'd at last,
 Secure, and deeming all the danger past,
 A frightful noise of trampling feet we hear;
 My father, looking through the shades⁴⁰
 with fear,
 Cry'd out, 'Haste, haste, my son, the foes
 are nigh!
 Their swords and shining armour I descry.'
 Some hostile god, for some unknown of-⁴⁵
 fence,
 Had sure bereft my mind of better sense:
 For while, through winding ways, I took my flight,
 And sought the shelter of the gloomy night,⁵⁰
 Alas! I lost Creüsa: hard to tell
 If by her fatal destiny she fell,

Or weary sat, or wander'd with affright;
 But she was lost for ever to my sight.
 I knew not, or reflected, till I met
 My friends, at Ceres' now deserted seat:
⁵ We met: not one was wanting, only she Deceiv'd her friends, her son, and wretched
 me.
 What mad expressions did my tongue refuse!
¹⁰ Whom did I not of gods or men accuse!
 This was the fatal blow, that pain'd me
 more
 Than all I felt from ruin'd Troy before.
 Stung with my loss, and raving with de-¹⁵ spair,
 Abandoning my now forgotten care,
 Of counsel, comfort, and of hope bereft,
 My sire, my son, my country gods, I left.
 In shining armour once again I sheath
²⁰ My limbs, not feeling wounds, nor fearing
 death.
 Then headlong to the burning walls I run,
 And seek the danger I was forc'd to shun.
 I tread my former tracks: through night
²⁵ explore
 Each passage, every street I cross'd before.
 All things were full of horror and affright,
 And dreadful ev'n the silence of the night.
 Then to my father's house I make repair,
 With some small glimpse of hope to find her there:
 Instead of her, the cruel Greeks I met:
 The house was fill'd with foes, with flames beset.
 Driven on the wings of winds, whole sheets
 of fire,
 Through air transported, to the roofs
 aspire.
 From thence to Priam's palace I resort,
 And search the citadel, and desert court.
 Then, unobserv'd, I pass'd by Juno's church;
 A guard of Grecians had possess'd the porch:
 There Phoenix and Ulysses watch the
 prey,
 And thither all the wealth of Troy convey.
 The spoils which they from ransack'd houses brought,
 And golden bowls from burning altars caught.

The tables of the gods, the purple vests,
 The peoples' treasure, and the pomp of priests.
 A rank of wretched youths, with pinion'd
 hands,
 And captive matrons, in long order stands.
 Then, with ungovern'd madness, I proclaim,
 Through all the silent streets, Creüsa's
 name.
 Creüsa still I call: at length she hears;
 And, sudden, thro' the shades of night
 appears.
 Appears no more Creüsa, nor my wife,
 But a pale spectre, larger than the life.
 Aghast, astonish'd, and struck dumb with
 fear,
 I stood; like bristles rose my stiffen'd hair,
 Then thus the ghost began to soothe my
 grief:
 'Nor tears, nor cries, can give the dead
 relief;
 Desist, my much-lov'd lord, t' indulge your
 pain:
 You bear no more than what the gods or-
 dain.
 My fates permit me not from hence to
 fly;
 Nor he, the great comptroller of the sky.
 Long wandering ways for you the powers decree:
 On land hard labours, and a length of sea.
 Then, after many painful years are past,
 On Latium's¹ happy shore you shall be cast:
 Where gentle Tiber from his bed beholds
 The flowery meadows, and the feeding folds.
 There end your toils: and there your fates provide

A quiet kingdom and a royal bride:
 There fortune shall the Trojan line restore;
 And you for lost Creüsa weep no more.
 Fear not that I shall watch, with servile
 5 shame,
 Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian dame:
 Or, stooping to the victor's lust, disgrace
 My goddess-mother,² or my royal race.
 10 And now farewell: the parent of the gods
 Restrains my fleeting soul in her abodes:
 I trust our common issue to your care.'
 She said: and gliding pass'd unseen in air.
 I strove to speak, but horror ty'd my 15 tongue;
 And thrice about her neck my arms I flung:
 And, thrice deceiv'd, on vain embraces
 hung.
 20 Light as an empty dream at break of day,
 Or as a blast of wind, she rush'd away.
 "Thus, having pass'd the night in fruitless pain,
 I to my longing friends return again.
 25 Amaz'd th' augmented number to behold,
 Of men and matrons mix'd, of young and old:
 A wretched exil'd crew together brought,
 With arms appointed, and with treasure fraught.
 Resolv'd and willing under my command,
 To run all hazards both of sea and land.
 The Morn began, from Ida, to display
 Her rosy cheeks, and Phosphor³ led the 35 day:
 Before the gates the Grecians took their post:
 And all pretence of late relief were lost.
 I yield to fate, unwillingly retire,
 40 And, loaded, up the hill convey my sire."

DRAMA

GREEK

ÆSCHYLUS

(525-456 B.C.)

Very little reliable information has come down to us regarding Æschylus. It seems fairly certain that he was born of noble parents at Eleusis, the center of the worship of Demeter. During his earlier years he achieved some success as a soldier in the wars against Persia. Tradition has it that he fought in the battles of Marathon, Artemisium, Salamis, and Platæa (490-479 B.C.). His first dramatic work was presented at Athens in 499, when he was twenty-six years old, and he apparently composed some eighty or ninety plays between this date and his last presentation in 458. Of these plays only seven are extant in their entirety. They are The Suppliants, The Persians, Prometheus Bound (ca. 475 B.C.), The Seven Against Thebes, Agamemnon, The Libation Bearers, and The Eumenides, composed probably in the order named. There are fragments of about seventy others and frequent references to them in Greek literature. Æschylus was highly regarded by his own and succeeding generations in Greece. He was at least a dozen times victor in the dramatic contests at Athens, and even after his death the performances of his plays were subsidized by the government. Along with Pindar, Simonides, and Bacchylides he was accorded the patronage of Hiero the First, tyrant of Syracuse (478-467). Æschylus's services to the development of Greek tragedy were of the utmost importance. His introduction of a regularly constituted second actor was the step which transformed a mere lyric interlude into full-fledged drama. Aristotle uses Æschylus's dramas frequently as illustrations in his discussion of tragedy.

It is supposed that the play here presented, Prometheus Bound, was the second of a trilogy, of which the first was Prometheus the Fire-Bringer and the third, Prometheus Unbound. It is regarded by many as the greatest piece of dramatic literature in existence. However that may be, there is no doubt that the theme — the unconquerable will of Man in the face of the onslaughts of Heaven — is one that has inspired some of the most famous pieces of literature. It appears in various guises in The Book of Job, in Milton's Paradise Lost, in Goethe's Faust, in Byron's Manfred, and in Shelley's Prometheus Unbound.

The selection is taken from Æschylus, Tragedies and Fragments, translated by E. H. Plumptre, D. C. Heath & Co., Vol. I, pp. 113-160.

PROMETHEUS BOUND

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ

PROMETHEUS	HERMES
OKEANOS	STRENGTH
HEPHÆSTOS	FORCE

Chorus of Ocean Nymphs

In the old time, when Cronos was sovereign of the Gods, Zeus, whom he had begotten, rose up against him, and the Gods were divided in their counsels, some, the Titans chiefly, siding with the father, and some with the son. And Prometheus, the son of Earth or Themis, though one of the Titans, supported Zeus, as did also Okeanos, and by his counsels Zeus obtained the victory, and Cronos was chained in Tartaros, and the Titans buried under mountains, or kept in bonds in Hades. And then Prometheus, seeing the miseries of the race of men, of whom Zeus took little heed, stole the fire which till then had belonged to none but Hephæstos and was used only for the Gods, and gave it to mankind, and taught them many arts whereby their wretchedness was lessened. But Zeus, being wroth with Prometheus for this deed, sent Hephæstos, with his two helpers, Strength and Force, to fetter him to a rock on Caucasos.

And in yet another story was the cruelty of the Gods made known. For Zeus loved Io,¹ the daughter of Inachos, king of Argos, and she was haunted by visions of the night, telling her of his passion, and she told her father thereof. And Inachos, sending to the God at Delphi, was told to drive Io forth from her home. And Zeus gave her the horns of a cow, and Hera, who hated her because she was dear to Zeus, sent with her a gadfly that stung her, and gave her no rest, and drove her over many lands.

SCENE. — Skythia,² on the heights of Caucasos. The Euxine seen in the distance. Enter HEPHÆSTOS, STRENGTH and FORCE, leading PROMETHEUS in chains.³

STRENGTH. Lo! to a plain, earth's boundary remote,
We now are come — the tract as Skythian known,
A desert inaccessible: and now,
Hephæstos, it is thine to do the hests⁴
The Father gave thee, to these lofty crags

To bind this crafty trickster fast in chains²⁵
Of adamantine bonds that none can break;
For he thy choice flower stealing, the bright glory
Of fire that all arts spring from, hath³⁰ bestowed it

On mortal men. And so for fault like this
He now must pay the Gods due penalty,
That he may learn to bear the sovereign rule

Of Zeus, and cease from his philanthropy.

HEPH. O Strength, and thou, O Force,
the hest of Zeus,

As far as touches you, attains its end,
And nothing hinders. Yet my courage⁴⁰ fails

To bind a God of mine own kin by force

To this bare rock where tempests wildly sweep;

And yet I needs must muster courage for it:

5 'Tis no slight thing the Father's words to scorn.

O thou of Themis⁵ [to PROMETHEUS] wise in counsel son,

Full deep of purpose, lo! against my will,
10 I fetter thee against thy will with bonds
Of bronze that none can loose, to this lone height,

Where thou shalt know nor voice nor face of man,

15 But, scorching in the hot blaze of the sun,
Shalt lose thy skin's fair beauty. Thou shalt long

For starry-mantled night to hide day's sheen,

20 For sun to melt the rime of early dawn;
And evermore the weight of present ill Shall wear thee down. Unborn as yet is he

Who shall release thee: this the fate thou gain'st

As due reward for thy philanthropy.

For thou, a God not fearing wrath of Gods,
In thy transgression gav'st their power to men;

And therefore on this rock of little ease
Thou still shalt keep thy watch, nor lying down,

Nor knowing sleep, nor ever bending knee;
And many groans and wailing profitless

35 Thy lips shall utter; for the mind of Zeus Remains inexorable. Who holds a power
But newly gained⁶ is ever stern of mood.

STRENGTH. Let be! Why linger in this idle pity?

Why dost not hate a God to Gods a foe,
Who gave thy choicest prize to mortal men?

¹ It was from Io that the one (Heracles) who was to free Prometheus from torture was to be descended.

² Skythia was the name applied by classic authors to an extensive territory in southeastern Europe and in Asia.

³ The entrance of these four characters might make it appear that here Æschylus was allowing more than the conventional two characters on the stage. However, Force does not speak at all, and Prometheus does not speak until Strength and Force have retired. It is probable that at first Prometheus is represented by an effigy of gigantic size. If so, only two regular actors were required for the play. The actor who appears as Hephæstos retires and then takes up his position behind the effigy. The other actor could appear successively as Strength, Okeanos, Io, and Hermes.

⁴ Behests.

⁵ Prometheus (Forethought) was son of Themis (Right). The meaning of these names, however, is not to be regarded as an indication that the play is allegorical.

⁶ Zeus had but recently displaced Cronos as King of Heaven.

- HEPH. Strange is the power of kin and intercourse.¹
- STRENGTH. I own it; yet to slight the Father's words,
How may that be? Is not that fear the worse?
HEPH. Still art thou ruthless, full of savagery.
STRENGTH. There is no help in weeping over him:
Spend not thy toil on things that profit not.
HEPH. O handicraft to me intolerable!
STRENGTH. Why loath'st thou it? Of these thy present griefs
That craft of thine is not one whit the cause.
HEPH. And yet I would some other had that skill.
STRENGTH. All things bring toil except for Gods to reign;
For none but Zeus can boast of freedom true.
HEPH. Too well I see the proof, and gainsay not.
STRENGTH. Wilt thou not speed to fix the chains on him,
Lest He, the Father, see thee loitering here?
HEPH. Well, here the handcuffs thou may'st see prepared.
STRENGTH. In thine hands take him. Then with all thy might Strike with thine hammer; nail him to the rocks.
HEPH. The work goes on, I ween, and not in vain.
STRENGTH. Strike harder, rivet, give no whit of ease:
A wondrous knack has he to find resource,
Even where all might seem to baffle him.
HEPH. Lo! this his arm is fixed inextricably.
STRENGTH. Now rivet thou this other fast, that he May learn, though sharp, that he than Zeus is duller.
HEPH. No one but him could justly blame my work.
- STRENGTH. Now drive the stern jaw of the adamant wedge Right through his chest with all the strength thou hast.
HEPH. Ah me! Prometheus, for thy woes I groan.
STRENGTH. Again, thou 'rt loth, and for the foes of Zeus
Thou groanest: take good heed to it lest thou Ere long with cause thyself commiserate.
HEPH. Thou see'st a sight unsightly to our eyes.
STRENGTH. I see this man obtaining his deserts:
Nay, cast thy breast-chains round about his ribs.
HEPH. I must needs do it. Spare thine o'er much bidding;
Go thou below and rivet both his legs.²
STRENGTH. Nay, I will bid thee, urge thee to thy work.
HEPH. There it is done, and that with no long toil.
STRENGTH. Now with thy full power fix the galling fetters;
Thou hast a stern o'erlooker of thy work.
HEPH. Thy tongue but utters words that match thy form.
STRENGTH. Choose thou the melting mood; but chide not me
For myself-will and wrath and ruthlessness.
HEPH. Now let us go, his limbs are bound in chains.
STRENGTH. Here then wax proud, and stealing what belongs To the Gods, to mortals give it. What can they Avail to rescue thee from these thy woes?
Falsely the Gods have given thee thy name,
Prometheus, Forethought; forethought thou dost need
To free thyself from this rare handiwork.
(Exeunt HEPHÆSTOS, STRENGTH, and FORCE, leaving PROMETHEUS on the rock.)
PROM. Thou firmament of God, and swift-winged winds,³

¹ Hephæstos, the Greek Vulcan, had taught Prometheus the use of fire.

² This is an indication of the gigantic size of the effigy used to represent Prometheus.

³ It is probable that the silence of Prometheus up to this point is due to the demands of the two-actor convention (see above), but it produces a very fine dramatic effect. The proud captive maintains a grim silence until his torturers have departed.

Ye springs of rivers, and of ocean waves
That smile innumerable! Mother of us all,
O Earth, and Sun's all-seeing eye, behold,
I pray, what I a God from Gods endure.

Behold in what foul case
I for ten thousand years
Shall struggle in my woe
In these unseemly chains.

Such doom the new-made Monarch of the
Blest

Hath now devised for me.

Woe, woe! The present and the oncoming pang

I wail, as I search out

The place and hour when end of all these ills

Shall dawn on me at last.

What say I? All too clearly I foresee
The things that come, and nought of pain shall be

By me unlooked-for; but I needs must
bear

My destiny as best I may, knowing well
The might resistless of Necessity.

And neither may I speak of this my fate,
Nor hold my peace. For I, poor I, through giving

Great gifts to mortal men, am prisoner
made

In these fast fetters; yea, in fennel stalk ¹ 30
I snatched the hidden spring of stolen fire,
Which is to men a teacher of all arts,
Their chief resource. And now this penalty

Of that offense I pay, fast riveted
In chains beneath the open firmament.

Ha! ha! What now?

What sound, what odour floats invisibly?
Is it of God or man, or blending both?

And has one come to this remotest rock
To look upon my woes? Or what wills he?

Behold me bound, a God to evil doomed,
The foe of Zeus, and held

In hatred by all Gods

Who tread the courts of Zeus:

And this for my great love,

Too great, for mortal men.

Ah me! what rustling sounds.

Hear I of birds not far?

With the light whirr of wings

The air re-echoeth:

All that draws nigh to me is cause of fear.

5 Enter Chorus of OCEAN NYMPHS, with wings, floating in the air.

CHOR. Nay, fear thou nought: in love

All our array of wings

In eager race hath come

10 To this high peak, full hardly gaining o'er

Our Father's mind and will;

And the swift-rushing breezes bore me on:

For lo! the echoing sound of blows on iron

15 Pierced to our cave's recess, and put to flight

My shamefast modesty,

And I in unshod haste, on winged car,

To thee rushed hitherward.

20 PROM. Ah me! ah me!

Offsprings of Tethys blest with many a child,

Daughters of Old Okeanos that rolls ²

25 Round all the earth with never-sleeping
stream.

Behold ye me, and see

With what chains fettered fast,

I on the topmost crags of this ravine

Shall keep my sentry-post unenviable.

CHOR. I see it, O Prometheus, and a mist

Of fear and full of tears comes o'er mine
eyes,

Thy frame beholding thus,

35 Writhing on these high rocks

In adamantine ills.

New pilots now o'er high Olympos rule,

And with new-fashioned laws

Zeus reigns, down-trampling right,

40 And all the ancient powers He sweeps
away.

PROM. Ah! would that 'neath the Earth, 'neath Hades, too,

Home of the dead, far down to Tartaros ³

45 Unfathomable He in fetters fast

In wrath had hurled me down:

So neither had a God

Nor any other mocked at these my woes;

¹ A large stalk filled with pith, which, when dry, was a convenient means of carrying fire.

² The older of two dynasties of the sea flourished during the rule of Cronos and was founded by the Titans Oceanus and Tethys, from whom sprang three thousand river and numberless ocean nymphs.

³ Tartaros was the name given to the abysmal region below Hades.

But now, the wretched plaything of the winds,

I suffer ills at which my foes rejoice.

CHOR. Nay, which of all the Gods
Is so hard-hearted as to joy in this?
Who, Zeus excepted, doth not pity thee

In these thine ills? But He,
Ruthless, with soul unbent, Subdues the heavenly host, nor will He cease

Until his heart be satiate with power
Or some one seize with subtle stratagem
The sovran might that so resistless seemed.

PROM. Nay, of a truth, though put to evil shame,

In massive fetters bound,
The Ruler of the Gods
Shall yet have need of me, yea, e'en of me,
To tell the counsel new

That seeks to strip from him
His sceptre and his might of sovereignty.

In vain will He with words
Or suasion's honeyed charms

Sooth me, nor will I tell
Through fear of his stern threats,

Ere He shall set me free
From these my bonds, and make,

Of his own choice, amends
For all these outrages.

CHOR. Full rash art thou, and yield'st
In not a jot to bitterest form of woe;
Thou art o'er-free and reckless in thy
speech:

But piercing fear hath stirred
My inmost soul to strife;

For I fear greatly touching thy distress,
As to what heaven of these woes of thine
Thou now must steer: the son of Cronos¹ hath

A stubborn mood and heart inexorable.

PROM. I know that Zeus is hard,
And keeps the Right supremely to himself;

But then, I trow, He'll be Full pliant in his will,
When He is thus crushed down.

Then, calming down his mood
Of hard and bitter wrath,
He'll hasten unto me,

As I to him shall haste,
For friendship and for peace.

CHOR. Hide it not from us, tell us all the tale:

For what offence Zeus, having seized thee
thus,

So wantonly and bitterly insults thee:
If the tale hurt thee not, inform thou us.

5 PROM. Painful are these things to me
e'en to speak;

Painful is silence; everywhere is woe.
For when the high Gods fell on mood of
wrath,

10 And hot debate of mutual strife was stirred,

Some wishing to hurl Cronos from his
throne,

That Zeus, forsooth, might reign; while 15 others strove,

Eager that Zeus might never rule the Gods:
Then I, full strongly seeking to persuade

The Titans, yea, the sons of Heaven and
Earth,

20 Failed of my purpose. Scorning subtle
arts,

With counsels violent, they thought that they

By force would gain full easy mastery.

25 But then not once or twice my mother
Themis

And Earth, one form though bearing many names,

Had prophesied the future, how 'twould
run,

That not by strength nor yet by violence,
But guile, should those who prospered gain
the day.

And when in my words I this counsel gave,
35 They deigned not e'en to glance at it at all.

And then of all that offered, it seemed best
To join my mother, and of mine own will,

Not against his will, take my side with
Zeus,

40 And by my counsels, mine, the dark deep pit

Of Tartaros the ancient Cronos holds, Himself and his allies. Thus profiting

By me, the mighty ruler of the Gods

45 Repays me with these evil penalties:

For somehow this disease in sovereignty
Inheres, of never trusting to one's friends.

And since ye ask me under what pretence
He thus maltreats me, I will show it you;

50 For as soon as He upon his father's throne
Had sat secure, forthwith to divers Gods

He divers gifts distributed, and his realm

¹ A Titan, and father of Zeus.

Began to order. But of mortal men
He took no heed, but purposed utterly
To crush their race and plant another new;

And, I expected, none dared cross his will; 5
But I did dare, and mortal men I freed
From passing on to Hades thunder-stricken;

And therefore am I bound beneath these
woes,

Dreadful to suffer, pitiable to see:
And I, who in my pity thought of men
More than myself, have not been worthy deemed

To gain like favour, but all ruthlessly 15
I thus am chained, foul shame this sight to Zeus.

CHOR. Iron-hearted must he be and made of rock
Who is not moved, Prometheus, by thy 20
woes:

Fain could I wish I ne'er had seen such things,

And, seeing them, am wounded to the heart.

PROM. Yea, I am piteous for my friends to see.

CHOR. Did'st thou not go to farther lengths than this?

PROM. I made men cease from con- 30
templating death.¹

CHOR. What medicine did'st thou find for that disease?

PROM. Blind hopes I gave to live and dwell with them. 35

CHOR. Great service that thou did'st for mortal men!

PROM. And more than that, I gave them fire, yes I.

CHOR. Do short-lived men the flaming 40
fire possess?

PROM. Yea, and full many an art they'll learn from it.

CHOR. And is it then on charges such as these 45
That Zeus maltreats thee, and no respite gives

Of many woes? And has thy pain no end?

PROM. End there is none, except as pleases Him. 50

CHOR. How shall it please? What hope hast thou? See'st not

That thou hast sinned? Yet to say how thou sinned'st

Gives me no pleasure, and is pain to thee.
Well! let us leave these things, and, if we may, 5

Seek out some means to 'scape from this thy woe.

PROM. 'Tis a light thing for one who has his foot

10 Beyond the reach of evil to exhort

And counsel him who suffers. This to me
Was all well known. Yea, willing, willingly
I sinned, nor will deny it. Helping men,
I for myself found trouble: yet I thought
not 15

That I with such dread penalties as these Should wither here on these high-towering crag,

Lighting on this lone hill and neighbour-less.

Wherefore wail not for these my present
woes.

But, drawing nigh, my coming fortunes
hear, 25

That ye may learn the whole tale to the
end.

Nay, hearken, hearken; show your sympathy

With him who suffers now. 'Tis thus that woe, 30

Wandering, now falls on this one, now on that.

CHOR. Not to unwilling hearers hast thou uttered,

35 Prometheus, thy request,
And now with nimble foot abandoning

My swiftly rushing car,
And the pure æther, path of birds of
heaven,

40 I will draw near this rough and rocky land,
For much do I desire

To hear this tale, full measure, of thy
woes.

Enter OKEANOS, on a car drawn by a winged gryphon.

OKEAN. Lo, I come to thee, Prometheus,

Reaching goal of distant journey,

Guiding this my winged courser

By my will, without a bridle;

And thy sorrows move my pity.

Force, in part, I deem, of kindred

¹ I made men cease from contemplating death by providing them with interests and occupations.

Leads me on nor know I any,
Whom apart from kin I honour
More than thee in fuller measure.
This thou shalt own true and earnest:
I deal not in glozing speeches.
Come then, tell me how to help thee:
Ne'er shalt thou say that one more friendly

Is found than unto thee is Okean.

PROM. Let be. What boots it? Thou 10
then too art come

To gaze upon my sufferings. How did'st
dare,

Leaving the stream that bears thy name,
and caves

Hewn in the living rock, this land to visit,
Mother of iron? What then, art thou come
To gaze upon my fall and offer pity?

Behold this sight: see here the friend of
Zeus,

Who helped to seat him in his sovereignty,
With what foul outrage I am crushed by
him!

OKEAN. I see, Prometheus, and I wish to give thee

My best advice, all subtle though thou be.
Know thou thyself, and fit thy soul to moods

To thee full new. New king the Gods have
now;

But if thou utter words thus rough and sharp,

Perchance, though sitting far away on
high,

Zeus yet may hear thee, and his present 35
wrath

Seem to thee but as child's play of distress.
Nay, thou poor sufferer, quit the rage thou hast,

And seek a remedy for these thine ills. 40
A tale thrice-told, perchance, I seem to speak:

Lo! this, Prometheus, is the punishment
Of thine o'er lofty speech, nor art thou yet

Humbled, nor yieldest to thy miseries,
And fain would'st add fresh evils unto
these.

But thou, if thou wilt take me as thy teacher,

Wilt not kick out against the pricks,
seeing well

A monarch reigns who gives account to
none.

5 And now I go, and will an effort make,
If I, perchance, may free thee from thy
woes;

Be still then, hush thy petulance of speech,
Or knowest thou not, o'er-clever as thou
art,

That idle tongues must still their forfeit pay?

PROM. I envy thee, seeing thou art free from blame

15 Though thou shared'st all,¹ and in my cause wast bold;

Nay, let me be, nor trouble thou thy-
self;

Thou wilt not, canst not soothe Him; very 20 hard

Is He of soothing. Look to it thyself, Lest thou some mischief meet with in the
way.

OKEAN. It is thy wont thy neighbours' minds to school

25 Far better than thine own. From deeds, not words,

I draw my proof. But do not draw me
back

30 When I am hasting on, for lo, I deem,
I deem that Zeus will grant this boon to
me,

That I should free thee from these woes of thine.

PROM. I thank thee much, yea, ne'er will cease to thank;

For thou no whit of zeal dost lack; yet
take,

I pray, no trouble for me; all in vain
Thy trouble, nothing helping, e'en if thou Should'st care to take the trouble. Nay, be still;

Keep out of harm's way; sufferer though I
be,

45 I would not therefore wish to give my
woes

A wider range o'er others. No, not so:
For lo! my mind is wearied with the grief

Of that my kinsman Atlas,² who doth
50 stand

¹ Okeanos had given his daughter Hesione in marriage to Prometheus.

² Some of the Titans were supposed to have been buried under mountains. Atlas, however, became identified with a mountain, probably the one now known as Teneriffe.

In the far West, supporting on his shoulders
The pillars of the earth and heaven, a burden
His arms can ill but hold: I pity too
The giant dweller of Kilikian ¹ caves,
Dread portent, with his hundred hands, subdued
By force, the mighty Typhon ² who arose
'Gainst all the Gods, with sharp and dreadful jaws
Hissing out slaughter, and from out his eyes
There flashed the terrible brightness as of one
Who would lay low the sovereignty of Zeus.
But the unsleeping dart of Zeus came on
him,
Down-swooping thunderbolt that breathes
out flame,
Which from his lofty boastings startled
him,
For he i' the heart was struck, to ashes
burnt,
His strength all thunder-shattered; and he lies
A helpless, powerless carcase, near the strait
Of the great sea, fast pressed beneath the roots
Of ancient Etna, where on highest peak
Hephæstos sits and smites his iron red-hot,
From whence hereafter streams of fire shall burst,
Devouring with fierce jaws the golden plains
Of fruitful, fair Sikelia. Such the wrath
That Typhon shall belch forth with bursts of storm,
Hot, breathing fire, and unapproachable,
Though burnt and charred by thunderbolts of Zeus.
Not inexperienced art thou, nor dost need
My teaching: save thyself, as thou know'st how;
And I will drink my fortune to the dregs, Till from his wrath the mind of Zeus shall
rest.

OKEAN. Know'st thou not this, Prometheus, even this,
Of wrath's disease wise words the healers
are?

5 PROM. Yea, could one soothe the troubled heart in time, Nor seek by force to tame the soul's proud flesh.

OKEAN. But in due forethought with bold daring blent,
What mischief see'st thou lurking? Tell me this.

PROM. Toil bootless, and simplicity full fond.

15 OKEAN. Let me, I pray, that sickness suffer, since
'Tis best being wise to have not wisdom's
show.

PROM. Nay, but this error shall be deemed as mine.

OKEAN. Thy word then clearly sends me home at once.

PROM. Yea, lest thy pity for me make a
foe. . . .

25 OKEAN. What! of that new king on his mighty throne?

PROM. Look to it, lest his heart be vexed with thee.

OKEAN. Thy fate, Prometheus, teaches me that lesson.

PROM. Away, withdraw! keep thou
the mind thou hast.

OKEAN. Thou urgest me who am in act
to haste;

35 For this my bird four-footed flaps with wings

The clear path of the æther; and full fain
Would he bend knee in his own stall at home. (Exit.)

STROPHE I

CHOR. I grieve, Prometheus, for thy dreary fate

Shedding from tender eyes

The dew of plenteous tears;

With streams, as when the watery south
wind blows,

My cheek is wet;

50 For lo! these things are all unenviable,

¹ Cilicia was the name for southeastern Asia Minor.

² Typhon, father of the winds, was another of the Titans. He is said by Hesiod to be lying with his head and breast under Ætna and his feet extending to Cumæ.

And Zeus, by his own laws his sway maintaining,

Shows to the elder Gods
A mood of haughtiness.

ANTISTROPHE I

And all the country echoeth with the moan,

And poureth many a fear
For that magnificent power

Of ancient days far-seen that thou did'st share

With those of one blood sprung;
And all the mortal men who hold the plain
Of holy Asia as their land of sojourn,
They grieve in sympathy
For thy woes lamentable.

STROPHE II

And they, the maiden band¹ who find their home

On distant Colchian² coasts,
Fearless of fight,

Or Skythian horde in earth's remotest clime,
By far Mæotic lake³;

ANTISTROPHE II

And warlike glory of Arabia's tribes,
Who nigh to Caucasos
In rock-fort dwell,

An army fearful, with sharp-pointed spear
Raging in war's array.

STROPHE III

One other Titan only have I seen,

One other of the Gods,

Thus bound in woes of adamantine strength —

Atlas, who ever groans
Beneath the burden of a crushing might,
The out-spread vault of heaven.

ANTISTROPHE III

And lo! the ocean billows murmur loud
In one accord with him;

The sea-depths groan, and Hades' swarthy pit

Re-echoeth the sound,

And fountains of clear rivers, as they flow,
5 Bewail his bitter griefs.

PROM. Think not it is through pride or stiff self-will

That I am silent. But my heart is worn,
Self-contemplating, as I see myself

10 Thus outraged. Yet what other hand than mine

Gave these young Gods in fulness all their gifts?

But these I speak not of; for I should tell
To you that know them. But those woes of men,

List ye to them, — how they, before as babes,

By me were roused to reason, taught to think;

And this I say, not finding fault with men,
But showing my good-will in all I gave.

For first, though seeing, all in vain they saw,

25 And hearing, heard not rightly. But, like forms

Of phantom-dreams, throughout their life's whole length

They muddled all at random; did not know

30 Houses of brick that catch the sunlight's warmth,

Nor yet the work of carpentry. They dwelt

35 In hollowed holes, like swarms of tiny ants,
In sunless depth of caverns; and they had

No certain signs of winter, nor of spring
Flower-laden, nor of summer with her fruits;

40 But without counsel fared their whole life long,

Until I showed the risings of the stars,
And settings hard to recognise. And I Found Number for them, chief device of all,

Groupings of letters, Memory's handmaid that,

And mother of the Muses. And I first Bound in the yoke wild steeds, submissive

50 made

² Colchis was the name of a country in Asia, the legendary land of Medea and the Golden Fleece.

³ The sea of Asov.

Or to the collar or men's limbs, that so They might in man's place bear his greatest toils;
 And horses trained to love the rein I yoked
 To chariots, glory of wealth's pride of
 state;
 Nor was it any one but me that found
 Sea-crossing, canvas-winged cars of ships:
 Such rare designs inventing (wretched
 me!)
 For mortal men, I yet have no device
 By which to free myself from this my
 woe.
 CHOR. Foul shame thou sufferest: of thy sense bereaved, Thou errest greatly: and, like leech unskilled,
 Thou lovest heart when smitten with disease,
 And know'st not how to find the remedies
 Wherewith to heal thine own soul's sicknesses.
 PROM. Hearing what yet remains thou'lt wonder more
 What arts and what resources I devised:
 And this the chief: if any one fell ill,
 There was no help for him, nor healing
 food,
 Nor unguent, nor yet potion; but for want Of drugs they wasted, till I showed to
 them
 The blendings of all mild medicaments, Wherewith they ward the attacks of sickness sore.
 I gave them many modes of prophecy;
 And I first taught them what dreams needs must prove True visions, and made known the ominous sounds
 Full hard to know; and tokens by the
 way.
 And flights of taloned birds I clearly marked, —
 Those on the right propitious to mankind,
 And those sinister, — and what form of
 life
 They each maintain, and what their enmities
 Each with the other, and their loves and friendships;
 And of the inward parts the plumpness smooth,
 And with what colour they the Gods would
 please,
 And the streaked comeliness of gall and liver:
 And with burnt limbs enwrap in fat, and chine,
 I led men on to art full difficult:
 And I gave eyes to omens drawn from fire, Till then dim-visioned. So far then for this.
 And 'neath the earth the hidden boons for
 men,
 Bronze, iron, silver, gold, who else could say
 That he, ere I did, found them? None, I
 know,
 Unless he fain would babble idle words.
 In one short word, then, learn the truth condensed, —
 All arts of mortals from Prometheus
 spring.
 CHOR. Nay, be not thou to men so overkind,
 While thou thyself art in sore evil case;
 For I am sanguine that thou too, released
 From bonds, shalt be as strong as Zeus himself.
 PROM. It is not thus that Fate's decree is fixed;
 But I, long crushed with twice ten thousand woes
 And bitter pains, shall then escape my bonds;
 Art is far weaker than Necessity.
 CHOR. Who guides the helm, then, of Necessity?
 PROM. Fates triple-formed, Erinnyes¹
 unforgetting.
 CHOR. Is Zeus, then, weaker in his might than these?
 PROM. Not even He can 'scape the thing decreed.
 CHOR. What is decreed for Zeus but still to reign?
 PROM. Thou may'st no further learn,
 ask thou no more.
 CHOR. 'Tis doubtless some dread secret which thou hidest.
 PROM. Of other theme make mention, for the time
 Is not yet come to utter this, but still
 It must be hidden to the uttermost;

For by thus keeping it it is that I Escape my bondage foul, and these my pains.

Of mortal men break through
The harmony of Zeus.

STROPHE I

CHOR. Ah! ne'er may Zeus the Lord,
Whose sovran sway rules all,
His strength in conflict set Against my feeble will!
Nor may I fail to serve
* The Gods with holy feast
Of whole burnt-offerings,
Where the stream ever flows
That bears my father's name,
The great Okeanos!
Nor may I sin in speech!
May this grace more and more Sink deep into my soul
And never fade away!

ANTISTROPHE I

Sweet is it in strong hope
To spend long years of life,
With bright and cheering joy
Our heart's thoughts nourishing.
I shudder, seeing thee
Thus vexed and harassed sore
By twice ten thousand woes;
For thou in pride of heart,
Having no fear of Zeus,
In thine own obstinacy,
Dost show for mortal men,
Prometheus, love o'ermuch.

STROPHE II

See how that boon, dear friends,
For thee is bootless found.
Say, where is any help?
What aid from mortals comes?
Hast thou not seen this brief and powerless
life,
Fleeting as dreams, with which man's purblind race
Is fast in fetters bound?
Never shall counsels vain

ANTISTROPHE II

5 This lesson have I learnt
Beholding thy sad fate, Prometheus! Other strains
Come back upon my mind,
When I sang wedding hymns around thy 10 bath,
And at thy bridal bed, when thou did'st
take
In wedlock's holy bands
One of the same sire born, 15 Our own Hesione,
Persuading her with gifts
As wife to share thy couch.

Enter Io¹ in form like a fair woman with a heifer's horns, followed by the Spectre of ARGOS.

IO. What land is this? What people?
Whom shall I Say that I see thus vexed
With bit and curb of rock?
25 For what offense dost thou Bear fatal punishment?
Tell me to what far land
I've wandered here in woe.
Ah me! ah me!
30 Again the gadfly stings me miserable.
Spectre of Argos, thou, the earth-born one —
Ah, keep him off, O Earth!
I fear to look upon that herdsman dread.
35 Him with ten thousand eyes²:
Ah lo! he cometh with his crafty look,
Whom Earth refuses even dead to hold;
But coming from beneath
He hunts me miserable,
40 And drives me famished o'er the sea-beach sand.

STROPHE

And still his waxened reed-pipe soundeth clear
A soft and slumberous strain.
O heavens! O ye Gods!

¹ For the connection of Io with the story of Prometheus, see page 67, note 1. It may be furthermore that the poet was interested in Io as another person suffering at the hands of Zeus.

² Argos, with ten thousand eyes, who was sent by Hera, wife of Zeus, to guard Io. At the instigation of Zeus he was killed by Hermes.

- Whither do these long wanderings lead me on?
For what offence, O son of Cronos, what,
Hast thou thus bound me fast
In these great miseries!
Ah me! ah me!
And why with terror of the gadfly's sting Dost thou thus vex me, frenzied in my soul?
Burn me with fire, or bury me in earth, 10
Or to wild sea-beasts give me as a prey:
Nay, grudge me not, O King,
An answer to my prayers:
Enough my many-wandered wanderings
Have exercised my soul, 15
Nor have I power to learn
How to avert the woe.
(To PROMETHEUS). Hear'st thou the voice of maiden crowned with horns?
PROM. Surely I heard the maid by gad- 20 fly driven,
Daughter of Inachos, who warmed the
heart
Of Zeus with love, and now through Hera's
hate 25
Is tried, perforce, with wanderings overlong!
- ANTISTROPHE
- IO. How is it that thou speak'st my father's name?
Tell me, the suffering one,
Who art thou, who, poor wretch,
Who thus so truly nam'st me miserable, 35
And tell'st the plague from Heaven,
Which with its haunting stings
Wears me to death? Ah woe!
And I with famished and unseemly bounds 40
Rush madly, driven by Hera's jealous craft.
Ah, who of all that suffer, born to woe,
Have trouble like the pain that I endure?
But thou, make clear to me
What yet for me remains,
What remedy, what healing for my pangs.
Show me, if thou dost know:
Speak out and tell me,
The maid by wanderings vexed. 50
PROM. I will say plainly all thou seek'st
to know;
- Not in dark tangled riddles, but plain
speech,
As it is meet that friends to friends should
speak;
5 Thou see'st Prometheus who gave fire to
men.
IO. O thou to men as benefactor known,
Why, poor Prometheus, sufferest thou this
pain?
PROM. I have but now mine own woes ceased to wail.
IO. Wilt thou not then bestow this boon on me?
PROM. Say what thou seek'st, for I will tell thee all.
IO. Tell me, who fettered thee in this ravine?
PROM. The counsel was of Zeus, the hand Hephæstos'.
IO. Of what offence dost thou the forfeit pay?
PROM. Thus much alone am I content to tell.
IO. Tell me, at least, besides, what end shall come
To my drear wanderings; when the time
shall be.
PROM. Not to know this is better than
to know.
IO. Nay, hide not from me what I have to bear.
PROM. It is not that I grudge the boon
to thee.
IO. Why then delayest thou to tell the whole?
PROM. Not from ill will, but loth to vex thy soul.
IO. Nay, care thou not beyond what pleases me.
PROM. If thou desire it I must speak.
Hear then.
CHOR. Not yet though; grant me share of pleasure too.
Let us first ask the tale of her great woe,
45 While she unfolds her life's consuming chances;
Her future sufferings let her learn from thee.
PROM. 'Tis thy work, Io, to grant these their wish,
On other grounds and as thy father's kin¹:

¹ Io's father, Inachos, was son of Okeanos, and hence a brother to the sea nymphs.

For to bewail and moan one's evil chance,
Here where one trusts to gain a pitying
tear

From those who hear, — this is not labour
lost.

IO. I know not how to disobey your wish;

So ye shall learn the whole that ye desire
In speech full clear. And yet I blush to tell The storm that came from God, and 10 brought the loss

Of maiden face, what way it seized on me.
For nightly visions, coming evermore
Into my virgin bower, sought to woo me
With glozing words. "O virgin greatly 15
blest,

Why art thou still a virgin when thou might'st

Attain to highest wedlock? For with dart
Of passion for thee Zeus doth glow, and 20
fain

Would make thee his. And thou, O child, spurn not

The bed of Zeus, but go to Lerna's¹ field,
Where feed thy father's flocks and herds, 25
That so the eye of Zeus may find repose
From this his craving." With such visions I

Was haunted every evening, till I dared
To tell my father all these dreams of night, 30
And he to Pytho and Dodona² sent Full many to consult the Gods, that he Might learn what deeds and words would please Heaven's lords.

And they came bringing speech of oracles 35 Shot with dark sayings, dim and hard to know.

At last a clear word came to Inachos Charging him plainly, and commanding
him

To thrust me from my country and my
home,

To stray at large to utmost bounds of
earth;

And, should he gainsay, that the fiery 45
bolt

Of Zeus should come and sweep away his race.

And he, by Loxias'³ oracles induced,

Thrust me, against his will, against mine
too,

And drove me from my home; but, spite of
all,

5 The curb of Zeus constrained him this to do.

And then forthwith my face and mind were changed;

And horned, as ye see me, stung to the quick

By biting gadfly, I with maddened leap Rushed to Kerchneia's fair and limpid
stream,

And fount of Lerna. And a giant herds-
man,

Argos, full rough of temper, followed me,
With many an eye beholding, on my track.

And him a sudden and unlooked-for doom

Deprived of life. And I, by gadfly stung, By scourge from Heaven am driven from land to land.

What has been done thou hearest. And if thou

Can'st tell what yet remains of woe, declare it;

Nor in thy pity soothe me with false words;
For hollow words, I deem, are worst of ills.

CHOR. Away, away, let be:

Ne'er thought I that such tales
Would ever, ever come unto mine ears;
Nor that such terrors, woes, and outrages,
Hard to look on, hard to bear,

Would chill my soul with sharp goad, double-edged.

Ah fate! Ah fate!

I shudder, seeing Io's fortune strange.

PROM. Thou art too quick in groaning, full of fear:

40 Wait thou a while until thou hear the rest.

CHOR. Speak thou and tell. Unto the sick 'tis sweet

Clearly to know what yet remains of pain.

PROM. Your former wish ye gained full easily.

Your first desire was to learn of her
The tale she tells of her own sufferings;
Now therefore hear the woes that yet remain

² Pytho is identified with Delphi, seat of the oracle of Apollo. Dodona was the seat of the old Greek oracle dedicated to Zeus.

³ Surname of Apollo.

For this poor maid to bear at Hera's hands.
And thou, O child of Inachos! take heed
To these my words, that thou may'st hear the goal

Of all thy wanderings.

Prometheus then describes the first part of Io's wanderings, bringing her as far as the coast of Asia.

For great as are the ills thou now hast
heard,

Know that as yet not e'en the prelude's
known.

IO. Ah woe! woe! woe!

PROM. Again thou groan'st and criest.
What wilt do

When thou shalt learn the evils yet to
come?

CHOR. What! are there troubles still to come for her?

PROM. Yea, stormy sea of woe most lamentable.

IO. What gain is it to live? Why cast I
not

Myself at once from this high precipice,
And, dashed to earth, be free from all my woes?

Far better were it once for all to die
Than all one's days to suffer pain and grief.

PROM. My struggles then full hardly thou would'st bear,

For whom there is no destiny of death;
For that might bring a respite from my
woes:

But now there is no limit to my pangs
Till Zeus be hurled out from his sovereignty.

IO. What! shall Zeus e'er be hurled from his high state?

PROM. Thou would'st rejoice, I trow, to see that fall.

IO. How should I not, when Zeus so foully wrongs me?

PROM. That this is so thou now may'st hear from me.

IO. Who then shall rob him of his sceptred sway?

PROM. Himself shall do it by his own rash plans.

IO. But how? Tell this, unless it bringeth harm.

PROM. He shall wed one for whom one day he'll grieve.

IO. Heaven-born or mortal? Tell, if tell thou may'st.

PROM. Why ask'st thou who? I may not tell thee that.

IO. Shall his bride hurl him from his throne of might?

PROM. Yea; she shall bear child mightier than his sire.¹

IO. Has he no way to turn aside that doom?

PROM. No, none; unless I from my bonds be loosed.

IO. Who then shall loose thee 'gainst
the will of Zeus?

PROM. It must be one of thy posterity.

IO. What, shall a child of mine free thee from ills?

PROM. Yea, the third generation after ten.

IO. No more thine oracles are clear to
me.

PROM. Nay, seek not thou thine own drear fate to know.

IO. Do not, a boon presenting, then withdraw it.

PROM. Of two alternatives, I'll give thee choice.

IO. Tell me of what, then give me leave to choose.

PROM. I give it then. Choose, or that I should tell

Thy woes to come, or who shall set me
free.

CHOR. Of these be willing one request to grant

To her, and one to me; nor scorn my
words;

Tell her what yet of wanderings she must
bear,

And me who shall release thee. This I crave.

PROM. Since ye are eager, I will not refuse

To utter fully all that ye desire.

Here is related the remainder of Io's wanderings, which end on the banks of the Nile.

There Zeus shall give thee back thy mind
again,

¹ This refers to the legend that Zeus, becoming enamored of Thetis, daughter of Nereus, followed her to the Caucasus. There Prometheus warned him that a child born of their union should overthrow his father.

With hand that works no terror touching
thee, —

Touch only — and thou then shalt bear a child

Of Zeus begotten, Epaphos, "Touch- 5
born,"

Swarthy of hue, whose lot shall be to reap
The whole plain watered by the broadstreamed Neilos;

And in the generation fifth from him
A household numbering fifty shall return
Against their will to Argos, in their flight From wedlock with their cousins. And they too

(Kites but a little space behind the doves) 15
With eager hopes pursuing marriage rites Beyond pursuit shall come; and God shall grudge

To give up their sweet bodies. And the land

Pelasgian¹ shall receive them, when by stroke

Of woman's murderous hand these men shall lie

Smitten to death by daring deed of night: 25
For every bride shall take her husband's
life,

And dip in blood the sharp two-edged
sword

(So to my foes may Kypris show herself!) 30
Yet one of that fair band² shall love persuade

Her husband not to slaughter, and her will Shall lose its edge; and she shall make her choice

Rather as weak than murderous to be known.

And she at Argos shall a royal seed Bring forth (long speech 'twould take to tell this clear)

Famed for his arrows, who shall set me
free³ 40

From these my woes. Such was the oracle
Mine ancient mother Themis, Titan-born, Gave to me; but the manner and the 45 means,—

That needs a lengthy tale to tell the whole,
And thou can'st nothing gain by learning
it.

Io. Eleleu! Oh, Eleleu! 50
The throbbing pain inflames me, and the mood

Of frenzy-smitten rage;
The gadfly's pointed sting,
Not forged with fire, attacks,
And my heart beats against my breast
with fear.

Mine eyes whirl round and round:
Out of my course I'm borne
By the wild spirit of fierce agony,
And cannot curb my lips,
10 And turbid speech at random dashes on
Upon the waves of dread calamity.

STROPHE I

CHOR. Wise, very wise was he Who first in thought conceived this maxim sage,
And spread it with his speech,—
That the best wedlock is with equals
20 found,
And that a craftsman, born to work with
hands,
Should not desire to wed
Or with the soft luxurious heirs of wealth, 25 Or with the race that boasts its lineage
high.

ANTISTROPHE I

Oh, ne'er, oh ne'er, dread Fates,
May ye behold me as the bride of Zeus,
The partner of his couch,
Nor may I wed with any heaven-born spouse!
35 For I shrink back, beholding Io's lot
Of loveless maidenhood, Consumed and smitten low exceedingly
By the wild wanderings from great Hera sent!

STROPHE II

To me, when wedlock is on equal terms,
It gives no cause to fear:
45 Ne'er may the love of any of the Gods,
The strong Gods, look on me
With glance I cannot 'scape!

ANTISTROPHE II

50 That fate is war that none can war against,
Source of resourceless ill;

Nor know I what might then become of me:

I see not how to 'scape
The counsel deep of Zeus.

PROM. Yea, of a truth shall Zeus, 5
though stiff of will,
Be brought full low. Such bed of wedlock
now

Is he preparing, one to cast him forth
In darkness from his sovereignty and 10
throne.

And then the curse his father Cronos spake
Shall have its dread completion, even that
He uttered when he left his ancient throne;
And from these troubles no one of the Gods 15
But me can clearly show the way to 'scape.
I know the time and manner: therefore
now

Let him sit fearless, in his peals on high Putting his trust, and shaking in his hands 20 His darts fire-breathing. Nought shall they avail

To hinder him from falling shamefully
A fall intolerable. Such a combatant
He arms against himself, a marvel dread, 25
Who shall a fire discover mightier far
Than the red levin, and a sound more dread

Than roaring of the thunder, and shall shiver 30

That plague sea-born that causeth earth to quake,

The trident, weapon of Poseidon's
strength:

And, stumbling on this evil, he shall learn 35
How far apart a king's lot from a slave's.

CHOR. What thou dost wish thou mut-terest against Zeus.

PROM. Things that shall be, and things
I wish, I speak. 40

CHOR. And must we look for one to master Zeus?

PROM. Yea, troubles harder far than these are his.

CHOR. Art not afraid to vent such 45 words as these?

PROM. What can I fear whose fate is not to die?

CHOR. But He may send on thee worse pain than this. 50

PROM. So let Him do: nought finds me unprepared.

CHOR. Wisdom is theirs whoAdrasteia worship.¹

PROM. Worship then, praise and flatter him that rules;

My care for Zeus is nought, and less than nought:

Let Him act, let Him rule this little while,
E'en as He will; for long He shall not rule
Over the Gods. But lo! I see at hand
The courier of the Gods, the minister Of our new sovereign. Doubtless he has
come

To bring me tidings of some new device.

Enter HERMES.

HERM. Thee do I speak to, — thee, the teacher wise,
The bitterly o'er-bitter, who 'gainst Gods
Hast sinned in giving gifts to short-lived
men —

I speak to thee, the filcher of bright fire.
The Father bids thee say what marriage
thou

Dost vaunt, and who shall hurl Him from his might;

And this too not in dark mysterious speech,
But tell each point out clearly. Give me
not,

Prometheus, task of double journey.
Zeus,

Thou seest, is not with such words appeased.

PROM. Stately of utterance, full of haughtiness

Thy speech, as fits a messenger of Gods.
Ye yet are young in your new rule, and think

To dwell in painless towers. Have I not Seen two great rulers driven forth from thence?

And now the third, who reigneth, I shall see

In basest, quickest fall. Seem I to thee To shrink and quail before these new-made Gods?

Far, very far from that am I. But thou, Track once again the path by which thou camest;

Thou shalt learn nought of what thou askest me. 50

HERM. It was by such self-will as this before

¹ Those who believe in an inevitable retribution, independent even of the gods.

That thou did'st bring these sufferings on thyself.

PROM. I for my part, be sure, would never change

My evil state for that thy bonds slave's 5
lot.

HERM. To be the bonds slave of this rock, I trow,
Is better than to be Zeus' trusty herald!

PROM. So it is meet the insulter to in- 10
sult.

HERM. Thou waxest proud, 'twould seem, of this thy doom.

PROM. Wax proud! God grant that I may see my foes 15
Thus waxing proud, and thee among the
rest!

HERM. Dost blame me then for thy calamities?

PROM. In one short sentence — all the 20
Gods I hate,
Who my good turns with evil turns repay.

HERM. Thy words prove thee with no slight madness plagued.

PROM. If to hate foes be madness, 25
mad I am.

HERM. Not one could bear thee wert thou prosperous.

PROM. Ah me!

HERM. That word is all un- 30 known to Zeus.

PROM. Time waxing old can many a lesson teach.

HERM. Yet thou at least hast not true wisdom learnt.

PROM. I had not else addressed a slave like thee.

HERM. Thou wilt say nought the Father asks, 'twould seem.

PROM. Fine debt I owe him, favour to 40 repay.

HERM. Me as a boy thou scornest then,
forsooth.

PROM. And art thou not a boy, and sillier far,
If that thou thinkest to learn aught from
me?

There is no torture nor device by which Zeus can impel me to disclose these things

Before these bonds that outrage me be loosed.

Let then the blazing levin-flash be hurled;

With white-winged snow-storm and with earth-born thunders

Let Him disturb and trouble all that is;
Nought of these things shall force me to declare

Whose hand shall drive him from his sovereignty.

HERM. See if thou findest any help in
this.

PROM. Long since all this I've seen,
and formed my plans.

HERM. O fool, take heart, take heart at last in time,

To form right thoughts for these thy present woes.

PROM. Like one who soothes a wave, thy speech in vain

Vexes my soul. But deem not thou that I,
Fearing the will of Zeus, shall e'er become

As womanised in mind, or shall entreat
Him whom I greatly loathe, with upturned

hand,
In woman's fashion, from these bonds of mine

To set me free. Far, far am I from that.

HERM. It seems that I, saying much,
shall speak in vain;

For thou in nought by prayers art pacified,
Or softened in thy heart, but like a colt

Fresh harnessed, thou dost champ thy bit, and strive,

And fight against the reins. Yet thou art stiff

In weak device; for self-will, by itself,
35 In one who is not wise, is less than nought.

Look to it, if thou disobey my words,
How a great storm and triple wave of ills,

Not to be 'scaped, shall come on thee; for first

With thunder and the levin's blazing flash
The Father this ravine of rock shall crush,

And shall thy carcass hide, and stern
embrace

Of stony arms shall keep thee in thy place.
45 And having traversed space of time full

long,
Thou shalt come back to light, and then his hound,

The winged hound of Zeus, the ravening
eagle,

50 Shall greedily make banquet of thy flesh,
Coming all day an uninvited guest,

And glut himself upon thy liver dark.

And of that anguish look not for the end,
Before some god shall come to bear thy woes,¹

And will to pass to Hades' sunless realm,
And the dark cloudy depths of Tartaros. 5 Wherefore take heed. No feigned boast is
this,

But spoken all too truly; for the lips
Of Zeus know not to speak a lying speech,
But will perform each single word. And 10
thou,

Search well, be wise nor think that selfwilled pride

Shall ever better prove than counsel good.

CHOR. To us doth Hermes seem to utter 15
words

Not out of season; for he bids thee quit
Thy self-willed pride and seek for counsel
good.

Hearken thou to him. To the wise of 20
soul

It is foul shame to sin persistently.

PROM. To me who knew it all

He hath this message borne;

And that a foe from foes 25

Should suffer is not strange.

Therefore on me be hurled

The sharp-edged wreath of fire;

And let heaven's vault be stirred

With thunder and the blasts 30

Of fiercest winds; and Earth

From its foundations strong,

E'en to its deepest roots,

Let storm-wind make to rock;

And let the Ocean wave, 35

With wild and foaming surge,

Be heaped up to the paths

Where move the stars of heaven;

And to dark Tartaros

Let Him my carcass hurl, 40

With mighty blasts of force:

Yet me he shall not slay.

HERM. Such words and thoughts from one

Brain-stricken one may hear 45

What space divides his state

From frenzy? What repose

Hath he from maddened rage?

But ye who pitying stand,
And share his bitter griefs,
Quickly from hence depart,
Lest the relentless roar
Of thunder stun your soul.

CHOR. With other words attempt
To counsel and persuade,
And I will hear; for now
Thou hast this word thrust in
That we may never bear.

How dost thou bid me train
My soul to baseness vile?

With him I will endure

Whatever is decreed.

Traitors I've learned to hate,

Nor is there any plague

That more than this I loathe.

HERM. Nay, then, remember ye

What now I say, nor blame

Your fortune: never say

That Zeus hath cast you down

To evil not foreseen.

Not so; ye cast yourselves:

For now with open eyes,

Not taken unawares,

In Ate's endless net

Ye shall entangled be

By folly of your own.

(A pause and then flashes of lightning and peals of thunder.)

PROM. Yea, now in very deed,

No more in word alone,

The earth shakes to and fro,

And the loud thunder's voice

Bellows hard by, and blaze

The flashing levin-fires;

And tempests whirl the dust,

And gusts of all wild winds

On one another leap,

In wild conflicting blasts,

And sky with sea is blent:

Such is the storm from Zeus

That comes as working fear,

In terrors manifest.

O Mother venerable!

O Æther! rolling round,

The common light of all,

See'st thou what wrongs I bear?

¹ In a later legend, Cheiron resigns his immortality and submits to die in the place of the doomed Prometheus, — a curious foreshadowing of the doctrine of vicarious atonement.

ARISTOPHANES

(ca. 440-ca. 380 B.C.)

Aristophanes, the greatest comic poet of antiquity, was born in Athens about 440 B.C. Little is known of his life. In 427 he brought out his first comedy under an assumed name. Of forty-four pieces originally written by him only eleven remain. Of these the most famous are The Acharnians, The Birds (ca. 400 B.C.), The Wasps, The Clouds, Lysistrata, and The Frogs. These are the very flower of Attic comedy. To appreciate them, however, requires considerable familiarity with Athenian life of the period, for Aristophanes's plays are filled with references to contemporary politics, customs, and literature. Next to his keen and brilliant wit the most noteworthy characteristic of Aristophanes is his truly Attic grace and polish. It was said of him that the Graces sought out his soul as a dwelling-place. He was conservative in his political and social ideas. He clung to the older ideals of art, learning, and manners; hence his attack upon Socrates in The Clouds and upon Euripides, the dramatic innovator, in The Frogs. The freedom of the old comedy afforded ample play for his satirical gifts, and he made such good use of them that no weakness of god or man was exempt from his assaults.

In view of the difficulty of understanding Aristophanes without an introduction to the purpose and form of his comedies, it has been thought advisable to include somewhat full excerpts from the illuminating explanatory notes of the translator.

The following selection is from The Plays of Aristophanes, a metrical version with notes by John Hookham Frere, London, George Routledge and Sons, Ltd., and New York, E. P. Dutton & Co.

THE BIRDS

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ

PEISTHETAIRUS, an Athenian citizen, but disgusted with his own country, starts on his travels proposing to seek his fortune in the kingdom of the Birds. He is represented as the essential man of business and ability, the true political adventurer, the man who directs everything and everybody, who is never in the wrong, never at a loss, never at rest, never satisfied with what has been done by others, uniformly successful in his operations. He maintains a constant ascendancy, or, if he loses it for a moment, recovers it immediately.

EUPEIDES, a simple, easy-minded, droll companion, his natural follower and adherent, as the merry-andrew is of the mountebank. It will be seen that, like the merry-andrew, he interposes his buffoonish comments on the grand oration delivered by his master.

EPOPS, King of the Birds, formerly Tereus king of Thrace, but long ago, according to the records of mythology, transformed into a Hoopoe. He appears as the courteous dignified sovereign of a primitive uncivilized race whom he is desirous to improve; he gives a gracious reception to strangers arriving from a country more advanced in civilization, and adopts the projects of aggrandizement suggested to him by Peisthetairus.

THE CHORUS OF BIRDS, his subjects, retain, on the contrary, their hereditary hatred and suspicion of the human race; they are ready to break out into open mutiny against their king, and to massacre his foreign (human) advisers upon the spot. It is with the greatest difficulty that they can be prevailed upon to hear reason, and attend to the luminous exposition of Peisthetairus. His harangue has the effect of conciliating and convincing them: his projects are adopted without a dissentient voice. War is not immediately declared against the gods, but a sort of Mexican blockade is established by proclamation.

PROMETHEUS, a malcontent deity, the ancient patron of the human race, still retaining a concealed attachment to the deposed dynasty of Saturn. He comes over secretly with intelligence which Peisthetairus avails himself of, and which proves ultimately decisive in the subjugation of the gods.

NEPTUNE, HERCULES, TRIBALLUS, or the TRIBALLIAN, joint ambassadors from the gods commissioned to treat with Peisthetairus. Neptune is represented as a formal, dignified personage of the old school, Hercules as a passionate, wrong-headed, greedy blockhead; he is cajoled and gained over by Peisthetairus, and in his turn intimidates the Triballian, an ignorant barbarian deity who is hardly able to speak intelligibly. They join together, Neptune is outvoted, and Peisthetairus concludes a treaty by which his highest pretensions are realized.

The characters above mentioned are the only ones who contribute in any way to the progress of the drama; the remainder, a very amusing set of persons, are introduced in detached scenes, exemplifying the various interruptions and annoyances incident to the man of business, distracting his attention and embarrassing him in the exercise of his authoritative functions. There are, however, exceptions.

IRIS, who is brought in, having been captured and detained for an infringement of the blockade.

A PRIEST, who comes to sacrifice at the inauguration of the new city.

TWO MESSENGERS, arriving from different quarters with very interesting and satisfactory intelligence.

The rest are a mere series of intruders on the time and attention of the great man.

POET, a ragged vagabond, who comes begging with an inaugural ode on the foundation of the new city.

A SOOTHISAYER, arriving with Oracles relative to the same important event, and a demand of perquisites due to himself by divine authority.

METON, the Astronomer, proposes to make a plan and survey of the new city.

A COMMISSIONER from Athens, a very authoritative personage.

A VENDOR of copies of decrees; he enters reading them aloud like a hawker to attract purchasers.

PARRICIDE, a young man, who has beaten his father and proposes to strangle him, offers himself as a desirable acquisition to the new colony.

KINESIAS, the dithyrambic poet, applies for a pair of wings.

INFORMER, a young man, whose hereditary trade is that of an informer, and whose practice extends to the islands, comes with the same application.

SCENE. — A wild desolate country with a bare open prospect on one side, and some upright rocks covered with shrubs and brushwood in the centre of the stage. PEISTHETAIROS and EUELPIDES appear as a couple of worn-out pedestrian travellers, the one with a raven and the other with a jackdaw on his hand. They appear to be seeking for a direction from the motions and signals made to them by the Birds.

EUELPIDES. (speaking to his jackdaw)
Right on, do ye say? to the tree there in the distance?

PEISTHETAIROS. (speaking first to his raven, and then to his companion)
Plague take ye! Why this creature calls us back!

EU. What use can it answer tramping up and down?
We're lost, I tell ye: our journey's come to nothing.

PEIS. To think of me travelling a thousand stadia¹
With a raven for my adviser!

EU. Think of me, too,
Going at the instigation of a jackdaw,
To wear my toes and my toe-nails to pieces!

PEIS. I don't know even the country where we've got to.

EU. And yet you expect to find a country here,

A country for yourself!

PEIS. Truly not I;

5 Not even Excestides² could do it,
That finds himself a native everywhere.

EU. Oh dear! We're come to ruin, utter ruin!

PEIS. Then go that way, can't ye:
10 'the Road to Ruin'!

EU. He has brought us to a fine pass, that crazy fellow,

Philocrates the poulterer; he pretended
To enable us to find where Tereus lives;
15 The king that was, the Hoopoe that is now;
Persuading us to buy these creatures of him,

That raven there for threepence, — and this other,

This little Tharrelides³ of a jackdaw,
He charged a penny for: but neither of 'em

Are fit for anything but to bite and scratch.
(Speaking to his jackdaw.)

25 Well, what are ye after now? — gaping and poking!

You've brought us straight to the rock.
Where would you take us?

There's no road here!

30 PEIS. No, none, not even a path.

¹ A stadion was the equivalent of about 600 feet.

² A foreign "barbarian" arrogating to himself the privileges of a true-born Athenian.

³ One Tharrelides was nicknamed Jackdaw, and Euelpides calls his pet Tharrelides! Peisthetairus is the bearer of the raven; his companion is equipped with a jackdaw.

EU. Nor don't your raven tell us anything?
 PEIS. She's altered somehow — she croaks differently.
 EU. But which way does she point? 5 What does she say?
 PEIS. Say? Why, she says, she'll bite my fingers off.
 EU. Well, truly it's hard upon us, hard indeed,
 To go with our own carcasses to the crows,
 And not be able to find 'em after all.
 (Turning to the audience.)¹
 For our design, most excellent spectators (Our passion, our disease, or what you 15 will),
 Is the reverse of that which Sacas² feels;
 For he, though not a native, strives perforce
 To make himself a citizen: whilst we, 20 Known and acknowledged as Athenians born (Not hustled off, nor otherwise compelled),
 Have deemed it fitting to betake ourselves
 To these our legs, and make our person 25 scarce.
 Not through disgust or hatred or disdain
 Of our illustrious birthplace, which we deem Glorious and free; with equal laws or- 30 dained
 For fine and forfeiture and confiscation,
 With taxes universally diffused;
 And suits and pleas abounding in the Courts.
 For grasshoppers sit only for a month
 Chirping upon the twigs; but our Athenians
 Sit chirping and discussing all the year,
 Perched upon points of evidence and law. 40
 Therefore we trudge upon our present travels,
 With these our sacrificial implements,
 To seek some easier unlitigious place;
 Meaning to settle there and colonize.
 Our present errand is in search of Tereus
 (The Hoopoe that is now), to learn from him
 If in his expeditions, flights, and journeys,
 He ever chanced to light on such a spot.
 PEIS. Holloh!
 EU. What's that?
 PEIS. My raven
 here points upwards.
 Decidedly!
 EU. Ay, and here's my jackdaw too,
 Gaping as if she saw something above.
 10 Yes, — I'll be bound for it; this must be the place:
 We'll make a noise, and know the truth of it.
 PEIS. Then 'kick against the rock'.
 EU. Knock you your head Against the rock! — and make it a double knock!
 PEIS. Then fling a stone at it!
 EU. With all my heart,
 20 Holloh there!
 PEIS. What do you mean with your Holloh?
 You should cry Hoop for a Hoopoe.
 EU. Well then, Hoop!
 Hoop and holloh, there! — Hoopoe, Hoopoe, I say!
 TROCHILUS. What's here? Who's bawling there? Who wants my master?
 (The door is opened, and both parties start at seeing each other.)
 EU. Oh mercy, mighty Apollo! what a beak!
 TR. Out! out upon it! a brace of bird-catchers!
 35 EU. No, no; don't be disturbed; think better of us.
 TR. You'll both be put to death.
 EU. But we're not men.
 TR. Not men! what are ye? what do ye call yourselves?
 EU. The fright has turned me into a yellow-hammer.
 TR. Poh! Stuff and nonsense!
 EU. I can prove it to ye.
 45 Search!
 TR. But your comrade here; what bird is he?
 PEIS. I'm changed to a golden pheasant just at present.

¹ Peisthetairus, it will be seen, allows his companion to put himself forward with the newly discovered natives; he allows him also to address the audience, not choosing to compromise himself by unnecessary communications.

² Acestor, a tragical poet, not being a genuine Athenian, was called Sacas, from the name of a Thracian tribe.

- EU. Now tell me, in heaven's name, what creature are ye?
 TR. I'm a slave bird.
 EU. A slave? how did it happen?
 Were you made prisoner by a fighting cock?
 TR. No. When my master made himself a Hoopoe,
 He begged me to turn bird to attend upon him.
 EU. Do birds then want attendance?
 TR. Yes, of course.
 In his case, having been a man before,
 He longs occasionally for human diet,
 His old Athenian fare: pilchards, for instance.
 Then I must fetch the pilchards; sometimes porridge;
 He calls for porridge, and I mix it for him.
 EU. Well, you're a dapper waiter, a didapper;
 But didapper, I say, do step within there,
 And call your master out.
 TR. But just at present
 He's taking a little rest after his luncheon,
 Some myrtle berries and a dish of worms.
 EU. No matter, call him here. We wish to speak to him.
 TR. He'll not be pleased, I'm sure; but notwithstanding,
 Since you desire it, I'll make bold to call him. (Exit.)
 PEIS. (looking after him)
 Confound ye, I say, you've frightened me to death.
 EU. He has scared away my jackdaw; it's flown away.
 PEIS. You let it go yourself, you coward.
 EU. Tell me, Have not you let your raven go?
 PEIS. Not I.
 EU. Where is it then?
 PEIS. Flown off of its own accord.
 EU. You did not let it go! you're a brave fellow!
 (The HOOPOE from within.)
 HOO. Open the door, I say; let me go forth.
- The royal HOOPOE appears with a tremendous beak and crest.*
 EU. O Hercules, what a creature! What a plumage!
 And a triple tier of crests; what can it be!
 HOO. Who called? who wanted me?
 EU. May the heavenly powers . . . Confound ye, I say (aside)
 HOO. You mock at me perhaps, Seeing these plumes. But, stranger, you must know —
 That once I was a man.
 EU. We did not laugh At you, Sir.
 HOO. What, then, were you laughing at?
 EU. Only that beak of yours seemed rather odd.
 HOO. It was your poet Sophocles that reduced me To this condition¹ with his tragedies.
 EU. What are you, Tereus? Are you a bird, or what?
 HOO. A bird.
 EU. Then where are all your feathers?
 HOO. Gone.
 EU. In consequence of an illness?
 HOO. No, the birds At this time of the year leave off their feathers,
 But you! What are ye? Tell me.
 EU. Mortal men.
 HOO. What countrymen?
 EU. Of the country of the Triremes.²
 HOO. Jurymen, I suppose?
 EU. Quite the reverse. We're anti-jurymen.
 HOO. Does that breed still Continue amongst you?
 EU. Some few specimens³ You'll meet with, here and there, in country places.
 HOO. And what has brought you here? What was your object?
 EU. We wished to advise with you.
 HOO. With me! For what?

² Galleys with three banks of oars. The Athenians were at that time undisputed masters of the sea.

³ The love of litigation and the passion for sitting on juries, with the exception of a few who retained their old agricultural habits, had infected the whole Athenian community.

- EU. Because you were a man: the same as us;
 And found yourself in debt: the same as us;
 And did not like to pay: the same as us;
 And after that, you changed into a bird;
 And ever since have flown and wandered far
 Over the lands and seas, and have acquired
 All knowledge that a bird or man can learn.
 Therefore we come as suppliants, to beseech
 Your favour and advice to point us out
 Some comfortable country, close and snug,
 A country like a blanket or a rug,
 Where we might fairly fold ourselves to rest.
 HOO. Do you wish then for a greater State than Athens?
 EU. Not greater; but more suitable for us.
 HOO. It's clear you're fond of aristocracy.
 EU. What him, the son of Scellias' Aristocrates?
 I abhor him.
 HOO. Well, what kind of a town, would suit ye?
 EU. Why, such a kind of town as this, for instance,
 A town where the importunities and troubles
 Are of this sort. Suppose a neighbour calls Betimes in the morning with a sudden summons:
 'Now, don't forget', says he, 'for heaven's sake,
 To come to me to-morrow; bring your friends,
 Children and all; we've wedding cheer at home.
 Come early, mind ye, and, if you fail me now,
 Don't let me see your face, when I'm in trouble'.
 HOO. So, you're resolved to encounter all these hardships!
- (To PEISTHETAIRUS.)
 And what say you?
 PEIS. My fancy's much the same.
 HOO. How so?
 PEIS. To find a place of the same sort;
 A kind of place, where a good jolly father Meets and attacks me thus: 'What's come to ye
 With my young people? You don't take to 'em.
 What! they're not reckoned ugly! You might treat 'em,
 As an old friend, with a little attention surely,
 And take a trifling civil freedom with 'em'.
 HOO. Ay! You're in love I see with difficulties
 And miseries. Well, there's a city in fact Much of this sort; one that I think might suit ye,
 Near the Red Sea.
 EU. No, no! not near the sea!¹
 Lest I should have the Salaminian galley²
 Arriving some fine morning, with a summons
 Sent after me, and a pursuivant to arrest me.
 But could not you tell us of some Grecian city?
 HOO. Why, there's in Elis there the town of Lepreum.
 EU. No, no! No Lepreums: nor no lepers neither.
 No leprosy for me. Melanthius³
 Has given me a disgust for leprosy.
 HOO. Then there's Opuntius in the land of Locris.
 EU. Opuntius? Me to be like Opuntius! With his one eye! Not for a thousand drachmas.
 But tell me, among the birds here, how do ye find it?
 What kind of an existence?
 HOO. Pretty fair;
 Not much amiss. Time passes smoothly enough;

¹ A humorous blunder. The Red Sea was in fact as inaccessible to ancient European navigation as the Caspian.

² The Salaminian galley had been sent to arrest Alcibiades, then one of the joint commanders in Sicily. This was one of the most fatal acts of the popular insanity which it was the poet's object to mitigate and counteract.

³ Melanthius, a tragic poet, said to have been leprous.

And money is out of the question. We don't use it.

EU. You've freed yourselves from a great load of dross.

HOO. We've our field sports. We spend 5 our idle mornings

With banqueting and collations in the gardens,

With poppy-seeds and myrtle.

EU. So your time 10 Is passed like a perpetual wedding-day.

(PEISTHETAIRUS, who has hitherto felt his way by putting EUCLIPIDES forward, and allowing him to take the lead, and who has paid no attention to this trifling inconclusive conversation, breaks out as from a profound reflective reverie.)

PEIS. Ha! What a power is here! What opportunities!

If I could only advise you. I see it all! 20 The means for an infinite empire and command!

HOO. And what would you have us do? What's your advice?

PEIS. Do? What would I have ye do? 25 Why first of all

Don't flutter and hurry about all open-mouthed,

In that undignified way. With us, for instance, 30

At home, we should cry out 'What creature's that?'

And Teleas would be the first to answer, 'A mere poor creature, a weak restless animal,

A silly bird, that's neither here nor there'.

HOO. Yes, Teleas might say so. It would be like him.

But tell me, what would you have us do?

PEIS. (emphatically) Concentrate! 40 Bring all your birds together. Build a city.

HOO. The birds! How could we build a city? Where?

PEIS. Nonsense. You can't be serious. What a question! Look down.

HOO. I do.

PEIS. Look up now.

HOO. So I do.

PEIS. Now turn your neck round. 50

HOO. I should sprain it though.

PEIS. Come, what d'ye see?

HOO. The clouds and sky; that's all.

PEIS. Well, that we call the pole and the atmosphere:

And would it not serve you birds for a metropole?

HOO. Pole? Is it called a pole?

PEIS. Yes, that's the name.

Philosophers of late call it the pole;

Because it wheels and rolls itself about, As it were, in a kind of a roly-poly way.

Well, there then, you may build and fortify,

And call it your Metropolis — your Acropolis.

From that position you'll command mankind,

And keep them in utter, thorough subjugation,

Just as you do the grasshoppers and locusts.

And if the gods offend you, you'll blockade 'em,

And starve 'em to a surrender.

HOO. In what way?

PEIS. Why thus. Your atmosphere is placed, you see,

In a middle point, just betwixt earth and heaven.

A case of the same kind occurs with us.

Our people in Athens, if they send to Delphi 30

With deputations, offerings, or what not, Are forced to obtain a pass from the Boeotians:

Thus when mankind on earth are sacrificing, 35

If you should find the gods grown mutinous

And insubordinate, you could intercept All their supplies of sacrificial smoke.

HOO. By the earth and all its springs springs and nooses!

Odds nets and snares! This is the cleverest notion:

And I could find it in my heart to venture, 45 If the other birds agree to the proposal.

PEIS. But who must state it to them?

HOO. You yourself.

They'll understand ye. I found them mere barbarians,

But, living here a length of time amongst them,

I have taught them to converse and speak correctly.

PEIS. How will you summon them?

HOO. That's easy enough;
I'll just step into the thicket here hard by,
And call my nightingale. She'll summon
them.

And when they hear her voice, I promise
you
You'll see them all come running here pell-mell.¹

PEIS. My dearest, best of birds! don't 10
lose a moment,
I beg, but go directly into the thicket;
Nay, don't stand here, go call your nightingale.

(Exit HOOPOE.) 15

(Song from behind the scene, supposed to be sung by the HOOPOE.)

Awake! awake!
Sleep no more, my gentle mate! 20
With your tiny tawny bill,
Wake the tuneful echo shrill,
On vale or hill;
Or in her airy, rocky seat,
Let her listen and repeat
The tender ditty that you tell, 25
The sad lament,
The dire event,
To luckless Itys² that befell.
Thence the strain 30
Shall rise again,
And soar amain,
Up to the lofty palace gate,
Where mighty Apollo sits in state,
In Jove's abode, with his ivory lyre, 35
Hymning aloud to the heavenly choir.
While all the gods shall join with thee
In a celestial symphony.

(A solo on the flute, supposed to be the nightingale's call.) 40

PEIS. O Jupiter! the dear, delicious bird!
With what a lovely tone she swells and
falls,
Sweetening the wilderness with delicate 45
air.

EU. Hist!

PEIS. What?

EU. Be quiet, can't ye?

PEIS. What's the matter?

EU. The Hoopoe is just preparing for a song.

HOO. Hoop! hoop!
Come in a troop,
Come at a call,
One and all,
Birds of a feather
All together.
Birds of a humble, gentle bill,
Smooth and shrill,
Dieted on seeds and grain,
Rioting on the furrowed plain,
Pecking, hopping,
Picking, popping,
Among the barley newly sown.
Birds of bolder, louder tone,
Lodging in the shrubs and bushes,
Mavises and thrushes,
On the summer berries brousing,
On the garden fruits carousing,
All the grubs and vermin smousing.
You that in a humbler station,
With an active occupation,
Haunt the lowly watery mead,
Warring against the native breed,
The gnats and flies, your enemies,
In the level marshy plain
Of Marathon, pursued and slain.

You that in a squadron driving
From the seas are seen arriving,
With the cormorants and mews
Haste to land and hear the news!
All the feathered airy nation,
Birds of every size and station,
Are convened in convocation.
For an envoy, queer and shrewd,
Means to address the multitude,
And submit to their decision
A surprising proposition,
For the welfare of the State.

Come in a flurry,
With a hurry-scurry,
Hurry to the meeting and attend to the debate.

¹ The song was executed by a female performer on the flute, a great favorite of the public and with the poet.

² Son of Tereus, King of Thrace. He was killed by his mother, Procne, and her sister, Philomela, and was served as food to Tereus in revenge for the latter's treatment of his wife. The gods in indignation transformed Procne into a swallow, Philomela into a nightingale forever bemoaning the fate of Itys, and Tereus into a hawk or, according to some, into a hoopoe.

- EU. How they thicken, how they muster,¹
 How they clutter, how they cluster!
 Now they ramble here and thither,
 Now they scramble all together. 5
 What a fidgeting and clattering!
 What a twittering and chattering!
 Don't they mean to threaten us?
 What think ye?
- PEIS. Yes, methinks they do. 10
- EU. They're gaping with an angry look against us both.
- PEIS. It's very true.
- CHOR. Where is he, the magistrate that assembled us to deliberate? 15
- HOO. Friends and comrades, here am I,
 your old associate and ally.
- CHOR. What have ye to communicate for the benefit of the State?
- HOO. A proposal safe and useful, practicable, profitable. 20
- Two projectors are arrived here, politicians shrewd and able.
- CHOR. Whee! Whaw! Where?
 Where? 25
 What? What? What? What?
 What?
- HOO. I repeat it — human envoys are arrived, a steady pair,
 To disclose without reserve a most stupendous, huge affair. 30
- CHOR. Chief, of all that ever were, the worst the most unhappy one!
 Speak, explain!
- HOO. Don't be alarmed! 35
- CHOR. Alas! alas! what have you done?
- HOO. I've received a pair of strangers, who desired to settle here.
- CHOR. Have you risked so rash an act?
- HOO. - I've done it, and I persevere. 40
- CHOR. But, where are they?
- HOO. Near beside you; near as I am; very near.
- CHOR. Oút alás! oút alás!
- We are betrayed, cruelly betrayed
 To a calamitous end,
 Our comrade and our friend,
 Our companion in the fields and in the pastures
 Is the author of all our miseries and disasters.
 Our ancient sacred laws and solemn oath Transgressing both!
 Treasonably delivering us as a prize
 To our horrible immemorial enemies,
 To a detestable race
 Execrably base!
 For the bird our chief, hereafter he must answer to the State;
 With respect to these intruders, I propose,
 without debate,
 On the spot to tear and hack them.
- EU. There it is, our death and ruin!
 Ah, the fault was all your own, you know
 it; it was all your doing;
 You that brought me here; and why?
- PEIS. Because I wanted an attendant.
- EU. Here, to close my life in tears.
- PEIS. No, that's a foolish fear, depend on't.
- EU. Why a foolish fear?
- PEIS. Consider; when you're left without an eye,
 It's impossible in nature; how could you contrive to cry?
- CHOR. Form in rank, form in rank;
 Then move forward and out-flank:
 Let me see them overpowered,
 Hacked, demolished and devoured;
 Neither earth, nor sea, nor sky,
 Nor woody fastnesses on high,
 Shall protect them if they fly.

¹ The first appearance of the Chorus must have been a critical point for the success of a play. The audience had been brought into good humor by their favorite musical performer, by whom all the preceding songs were probably executed; for the dialogue on the stage passes solely between Peisthetairus and Euelpides, and the Hoopoe, who is supposed to sing, does not appear. The Chorus now appears, and, in the original, forty lines follow, in which Peisthetairus and Euelpides act as showmen to the exhibition of twenty-four figures, dressed in imitation of the plumage of as many different kinds of birds, which are passed in review with suitable remarks as they successively take their places in the orchestra. This passage is here omitted. The language of the birds consists almost wholly of short syllables, the effect of which it is impossible to imitate in English. Some accents, which are added, may serve to approximate it.

- Where's the Captain? What detains him?
 What prevents us to proceed?
 On the right there, call the Captain! Let him form his troop and lead.
 EU. There it is, where can I fly?
 PEIS. Sirrah, be quiet, wait a bit.
 EU. What, to be devoured amongst
 them!
 PEIS. Will your legs or will your wit
 Serve to escape them?
 EU. I can't tell.
 PEIS. But I can tell; do as you're bid;
 Fight we must; you see the pot, just there before ye; take the lid,
 And present it for a shield; the spit will serve you for a spear;
 With it you may scare them off, or spike them if they venture near.
 EU. What can I find to guard my eyes?
 PEIS. Why there's the very thing you wish,
 Two vizard helmets ready made, the cullender and skimming dish.
 EU. What a clever, capital, lucky device, sudden and new!
 Nicias,¹ with all his tactics, is a simpleton
 to you.
 CHOR. Steady, birds! present your beaks! in double time, charge and attack;
 Pounce upon them, smash the potlid,
 clapperclaw them, tear and hack.
 HOO. Tell me, most unworthy creatures, scandal of the feathered race,
 Must I see my friends and kinsmen massacred before my face?
 CHOR. What! do you propose to spare them? where will your forbearance
 cease,
 Hesitating to destroy destructive creatures
 such as these?
 HOO. Enemies they might have been;
 but here they come, with fair design,
 With proposals of advice, for your advantage and for mine.
 CHOR. Enemies time out of mind! they that have spilt our fathers' blood, How should they be friends of ours, or give us counsel for our good?
 HOO. Friendship is a poor adviser;
 politicians deep and wise
- Many times are forced to learn a lesson
 from their enemies;
 Diligent and wary conduct is the method soon or late 5 Which an adversary teaches; whilst a friend or intimate Trains us on to sloth and ease, to ready confidence; to rest,
 In a careless acquiescence; to believe and hope the best.
 10 Look on earth! behold the nations, all in emulation vying,
 Active all, with busy science engineering,
 fortifying;
 15 To defend their hearths and homes, with patriotic industry,
 Fencing every city round with massy walls of masonry:
 Tactical devices old they modify with new design;
 Arms offensive and defensive to perfection
 they refine;
 Galleys are equipped and armed, and armies trained to discipline.
 25 Look to life, in every part; in all they practise, all they know, Every nation has derived its best instruction from the foe.
 CHOR. We're agreed to grant a hearing;
 30 if an enemy can teach Anything that's wise or useful, let him prove it in his speech.
 PEIS. (aside) Let's retire a pace or two;
 you see the change in their behaviour.
 HOO. Simple justice I require, and I request it as a favour.
 CHOR. Faith and equity require it, and the nation hitherto Never has refused to take direction and advice from you.
 PEIS. (aside) They're relenting by degrees;
 Recover arms and stand at ease.
 CHOR. Back to the rear! resume your station,
 Ground your wrath and indignation!
 Sheathe your fury! stand at ease,
 While I proceed to question
 these:
 What design has brought them
 here?

Ho, there, Hoopoe! can't he hear?

HOO. What's your question?

CHOR. Who are these?

HOO. Strangers from the land of Greece.

CHOR. What design has brought them thence?

What's their errand or pretence? 10

HOO. They come here simply with a view

To settle and reside with you;
Here to remain and here to live.

CHOR. What is the reason that they give?

HOO. A project marvellous and strange.

CHOR. Will it account for such a change, 20

Coming here so vast a distance?

Does he look for our assistance

To serve a friend or harm a foe?

HOO. Mighty plans he has to show
(Hinted and proposed in brief) 25

For a power beyond belief;

Ocean, earth, he says, and air,

All creation everywhere,

Everything that's here or there,

An empire and supremacy 30

Over all beneath the sky,

Is attainable by you,

Your just dominion and your

due.

CHOR. Tell us, was he fool or mad? 35

HOO. No, believe me; grave and sad.

CHOR. Did his reasons and replies

Mark him as discreet and wise?

HOO. With a force, a depth, a reach

Of judgment, a command of 40

speech,

An invention, a facility,

An address, a volubility,

More than could be thought believable; 45

'Tis a varlet inconceivable!

CHOR. Let us hear him! let us hear him!

Bid him begin! for raised on high

Our airy fancy soars; and I Am rapt in hope; ready to fly. 50

The King Hoopoe now gives some orders in a pacific spirit, directing that all warlike weapons be removed and hung up at the back of the chimney as before. He then calls upon Peisthetairus to communicate to the assembled commonalty the propositions which had been before discussed in private conference between themselves. Peisthetairus, however, sees his advantage and insists upon the previous conclusion of a formal treaty of peace: this is done, and the Chorus swear to it (relapsing for a moment into their real character) 'as they hope to win the prize by a unanimous vote'. But if they should fail they imprecate upon themselves the penalty of (gaining the prize notwithstanding, but) 'gaining it only by a casting vote'. Peace is proclaimed, the armament is dissolved by proclamation, and the Chorus recommences singing.

(To the CHORUS.)

HOO. Here you, take these same arms,
in the name of heaven,

And hang them quietly in the chimney corner;

(Turning to PEISTHETAIRUS.)

And you communicate your scheme, exhibiting

Your proofs and calculations — the discourse

Which they were called to attend to.

PEIS. No, not I!

By Jove; unless they agree to an armistice,

Such as the little poor baboon, our neighbour,

The sword cutler, concluded with his wife,

That they sha'n't bite me, or take unfair advantage

In any way.

CHOR. We won't.

PEIS. Well, swear it then!

CHOR. We swear; by our hope of gaining the first prize,

With the general approval and consent

Of the whole audience, and of all the judges —

And if we fail, may the reproach befall us,

Of gaining it, only by the casting vote.

HERALD. Hear, ye good people all! the troops are ordered

To take their arms within doors;
and consult

On the report and entry to be
made

Upon our journal of this day's proceedings.

CHOR. Since time began

The race of man

Has ever been deceitful, faithless ever.

Yet may our fears be vain!

Speak therefore and explain:

If, in this realm of ours,

Your clearer intellect, searching and clever,

Has noticed means or powers,

Unknown and undetected,

In unambitious indolence neglected,

Guide and assist our ignorant endeavour:

You for your willing aid, and ready wit,

Will share with us the common benefit. 20

Now speak to the business and be not afraid;

The birds will adhere to the truce that we
made.

We omit here a rather long debate on the question of the safety of the birds' trusting their life-long enemies, men. Peisthelaïrus, by a great show of literary and historical references, succeeds in persuading them to accept him. We resume with a choral song, one of the finest in all the work of Aristophanes. This type of ode, called the "parabasis," was a distinctive feature of Attic comedy. It was addressed by the chorus to the audience during intermission in the action and concerned itself mainly with public affairs and personages. It was usually followed by choral comments, called "epirrema" and "ante-pirrema," at the conclusion of which the actors appear again on the stage.

Ye Children of Man! whose life is a span,
Protracted with sorrow from day to day, 40

Naked and featherless, feeble and querulous,

Sickly, calamitous creatures of clay!

Attend to the words of the Sovereign
Birds

(Immortal, illustrious lords of the air),

Who survey from on high, with a merciful
eye,

Your struggles of misery, labour, and care.

When you may learn and clearly discern

Such truths as attract your inquisitive turn;

Which is busied of late, with a mighty
debate,

5 A profound speculation about the creation,
And organical life, and chaotical strife,
And various notions of heavenly motions,
And rivers and oceans, and valleys and mountains,

10 And sources of fountains, and meteors on
high,

And stars in the sky. We propose by-and-
by

(If you'll listen and hear) to make it all clear.

And Prodicus henceforth shall pass for a dunce,

When his doubts are explained and expounded at once.

Before the creation of Æther and light,
Chaos and Night together were plight,

In the dungeon of Erebus ¹ foully bedight.
Nor Ocean, or Air, or substance was there,

25 Or solid or rare, or figure or form,

But horrible Tartarus ² ruled in the storm:

At length, in the dreary chaotical closet
Of Erebus old was a privy deposit,

By Night the primæval in secrecy laid;

30 A Mystical Egg, that in silence and shade
Was brooded and hatched; till time came about:

And Love, the delightful, in glory flew out,
In rapture and light, exulting and bright,

35 Sparkling and florid, with stars in his fore-
head,

His forehead and hair, and a flutter and flare,

As he rose in the air, triumphantly furnished

To range his dominions, on glittering pinions,

All golden and azure, and blooming and burnished:

45 He soon, in the murky Tartarean recesses,

With a hurricane's might, in his fiery caresses

Impregnated Chaos; and hastily snatched

50 To being and life, begotten and hatched,

¹ Offspring of Chaos who represents the mysterious darkness that is under the earth, the realm of Pluto.

² Pluto.

The primitive Birds: but the Deities all,
 The celestial Lights, the terrestrial Ball,
 Were later of birth, with the dwellers on
 earth,
 More tamely combined, of a temperate 5
 kind;
 When chaotical mixture approached to a fixture.
 Our antiquity proved, it remains to be shown,
 That Love is our author, and master
 alone.
 Like him, we can ramble, and gambol and
 fly
 O'er ocean and earth, and aloft to the sky: 15
 And, all the world over we're friends to the lover,
 And, when other means fail, we are found to prevail,
 When a peacock or pheasant is sent as a 20
 present.
 All lessons of primary daily concern,
 You have learnt from the Birds, and continue to learn,
 Your best benefactors and early instruc- 25
 tors.
 We give you the warning of seasons returning.
 When the cranes are arranged, and muster afloat
 In the middle air, with a creaking note,
 Steering away to the Lybian sands,
 Then careful farmers sow their lands;
 The crazy vessel is hauled ashore,
 The sail, the ropes, the rudder and oar 35
 Are all unshipped, and housed in store.
 The shepherd is warned, by the kite
 reappearing,
 To muster his flock, and be ready for shearing.
 You quit your old cloak, at the swallow's behest,
 In assurance of summer, and purchase a vest.
 For Delphi, for Ammon, Dodona, in 45
 fine,
 For every oracular temple and shrine,
 The Birds are a substitute equal and fair,
 For on us you depend, and to us you repair
 For counsel and aid, when a marriage is 50
 made,

A purchase, a bargain, a venture in trade:
 Unlucky or lucky, whatever has struck ye,
 An ox or an ass, that may happen to pass,
 A voice in the street, or a slave that you
 5 meet,
 A name or a word by chance overheard,
 If you deem it an omen, you call it a Bird;
 And if birds are your omens, it clearly will follow,
 10 That birds are a proper prophetic Apollo.
 Then take us as gods, and you'll soon find the odds;
 We'll serve for all uses, as Prophets and Muses;
 We'll give ye fine weather, we'll live here together;
 We'll not keep away, scornful and proud,
 a-top of a cloud
 (In Jupiter's way), but attend every day,
 To prosper and bless all you possess,
 And all your affairs, for yourselves and your heirs.
 And, as long as you live, we shall give You wealth and health, and pleasure and 25 treasure,
 In ample measure;
 And never bilk you of pigeon's milk,
 Or potable gold; you shall live to grow old,
 In laughter and mirth, on the face of the 30 earth,
 Laughing, quaffing, carousing, bousing;
 Your only distress shall be the excess
 Of ease and abundance and happiness.

SEMICHORUS

Muse, that in the deep recesses
 Of the forest's dreary shade,
 Vocal with our wild addresses,
 40 Or in the lonely lowly glade,
 Attending near, art pleased to hear
 Our humble bill tuneful and shrill:

When, to the name of omnipotent Pan ¹
 Our notes we raise, or sing in praise
 Of mighty Cybele,² from whom we began,
 Mother of Nature, and every creature,
 Winged or unwinged, of birds or man,
 Aid and attend, and chant with me
 The music of Phrynichus, open and plain,
 The first that attempted a loftier strain,

¹ Son of Mercury and god of woods and fields.

² The Phrygian conception of Rhea, wife of Cronos, mother of Jupiter, and goddess of the earth.

Ever busy like the bee, with the sweets of harmony.

EPIRREMA

Is there any person present sitting a spectator here,
Who desires to pass his time, freely without restraint or fear?
Should he wish to colonize, he never need 10
be checked or chid,
For the trifling indiscretions, which the testy laws forbid.
Parricides are in esteem: among the birds we deem it fair,
A combat honourably fought betwixt a game-cock and his heir!
There the branded runagate, branded and mottled in the face,
Will be deemed a motley bird; a motley 20
mark is no disgrace.
Spintharus,¹ the Phrygian born, will pass a muster there with ease, Counted as a Phrygian fowl; and even Excecestides,
Once a Carian and a slave, may there be nobly born and free, Plume himself on his descent, and hatch a proper pedigree.

SEMICHORUS

Thus the swans in chorus follow,
On the mighty Thracian stream,
Hymning their eternal theme —
Praise to Bacchus and Apollo:
The welkin rings, with sounding wings,
With songs and cries and melodies;
Up to the thunderous Æther ascending: Whilst all that breathe, on earth be-
neath,
The beasts of the wood, the plain and
the flood,
In panic amazement are crouching and 45
bending;

With the awful qualm, of a sudden calm,
Ocean and air in silence blending.
The ridge of Olympus is sounding on
5 high,
Appalling with wonder the lords of the sky,
And the muses and Graces
Enthroned in their places,
Join in the solemn symphony.

ANTEPIRREMA

Nothing can be more delightful than the having wings to wear!
15 A spectator sitting here, accommodated with a pair, Might for instance (if he found a tragic chorus dull and heavy) Take his flight, and dine at home; and if he did not choose to leave ye, Might return in better humour, when the weary drawl was ended.
Introduce then wings in use — believe me,
matters will be mended:
25 Patroclides would not need to sit there,
and befoul his seat;
Flying off he might return, eased in a moment, clean and neat.
Trust me wings are all in all! Diitrephes²
30 has mounted quicker
Than the rest of our aspirants, soaring on his wings of wicker:
Basket work, and crates, and hampers,
first enabled him to fly;
35 First a captain, then promoted to command the cavalry;
With his fortunes daily rising, office and preferment new,
An illustrious, enterprising, airy, gallant cockatoo.
40 PEIS. Well, there it is!³ Such a comical set out,
By Jove, I never saw!
EU. Why, what's the matter?
What are you laughing at?
45 PEIS. At your pen feathers:

² Diitrephes gained his fortune through the manufacture of baskets, hampers, etc.

³ The persons of the drama appear again upon the stage, Peisthetairus and Euelpides having both been in the meanwhile equipped with a sumptuous pair of wings. They are supposed to have been entertained behind the scenes with a royal collation in the palace of the Hoopoe. Peisthetairus is accordingly in extreme good humor, and, being now in the height of his advancement, recollects that it will be right to behave to his former comrade with the hearty familiarity of an old acquaintance; he accordingly begins with a ludicrous simile on his appearance.

- I'll tell ye exactly now the thing you're like;
 You're just the perfect image of a goose,
 Drawn with a pen in a writing master's flourish.
- EU. And you're like a plucked black-bird to a tittle.
- PEIS. Well then, according to the line in Æschylus,
 'It's our own fault, the feathers are our own'.¹
- EU. Come, what's to be done?
- HOO. First, we must choose a name,
 Some grand sonorous name, for our new city:
 Then we must sacrifice.
- EU. I think so too.
- PEIS. Let's see — let's think of a name — what shall it be?
- What say ye, to the Lacedæmonian name? Sparta sounds well — suppose we call it Sparta.
- EU. Sparta! What Sparto? — Rushes! — no, not I;
 I'd not put up with Sparto for a mattress,² Much less for a city — we're not come to that.
- PEIS. Come then, what name shall it be?
- EU. Something appropriate,
 Something that sounds majestic, striking and grand,
 Alluding to the clouds and the upper regions.
- PEIS. What think ye of clouds and cuckoos? Cuckoo-cloudlands Or Nephelococcugia?
- HOO. That will do;
 A truly noble and sonorous name.
- EU. I wonder, if that Nephelococcugia
 Is the same place I've heard of: people tell me,
 That all Theagenes's rich possessions
 Lie there; and Æschines's whole estate.³
- PEIS. Yes! and a better country it is by far,
- Than all that land in Thrace, the fabulous plain
 Of Phlegra; where those earthborn landed giants
 Were bullied and out-vapoured by the gods.
- EU. It will be a genteelish, smart concern, I reckon,
 This city of ours. . . . Which of the deities Shall we have for a patron? We must weave our mantle,
 Our sacred mantle of course . . . the yearly mantle
 To one or other of 'em.
- PEIS. Well, Minerva?⁴
 Why should not we have Minerva? she's established,
 Let her continue; she'll do mighty well.
- EU. No — there I object; for a well-ordered city,
 The example would be scandalous; to see
 The goddess, a female born, in complete armour
 From head to foot; and Cleisthenes⁵ with a distaff.
- PEIS. What warden will ye appoint for the Eagle tower,
 Your citadel, the fort upon the rock?
- HOO. That charge will rest with a chief of our own choice,
 Of Persian race, a chicken of the game,
 An eminent warrior.
- EU. Oh my chick-hiddy —
 My little master. I should like to see him, Strutting about and roosting on the rock.
- PEIS. Come, you now! please to step to the atmosphere;
 And give a look to the work, and help the workmen;
 And between whiles fetch brick and tiles,
 and such like;
 Draw water, stamp the mortar — do it barefoot;
 Climb up the ladders; tumble down again:
 Keep constant watch and ward; conceal your watch lights;

¹ Æschylus alludes to a fable in which an eagle complains of being wounded by an arrow feathered from his own wings.

² Sparto still retains its name, under the form "esparto," and is still used for mattresses and occasionally for cordage.

³ Theagenes and Æschines, in boasting of wealth they did not possess, pretended to have estates in Thrace.

⁴ Athena.

⁵ An effeminate Greek.

Then go the rounds, and give the counter-
sign,

Till you fall fast asleep. Send heralds off,
A brace of them — one to the gods above;
And another, down below there, to man- 5
kind.

Bid them, when they return, inquire for
me.

EU. For me! for me! You may be hanged for me. 10

PEIS. Come, friend, go where I bid
you; never mind;

The business can't go on without you,
anyhow.

It's just a sacrifice to these new deities, 15
That I must wait for; and the priest that's coming.

Holloh, you boy there! bring the basin and ewer!

CHOR. We urge, we exhort you, and ad- 20
vise,

To ordain a mighty sacrifice;

And before the gods to bring

A stupendous offering;

Either a sheep or some such 25
thing!

To please the critics of the age,

Sacrificed upon the stage.

Sound amain the Pythian strain!

Let Chœris¹ be brought here to sing. 30

PEIS. Have done there with your puffing . . . heaven and earth,

What's here! I've seen a many curious
things,

But never saw the like of this before, 35

A crow with a flute and a mouthpiece.

Priest, your office:

Perform it! Sacrifice to the new deities!

PRI. I will — but where's the boy gone with the basket?

Let us pray to the holy flame,

And the holy hawk that guards the same;

To the sovereign deities, 45

All and each, of all degrees,
Female and male!

CHOR. Hail, thou hawk of Sunium, hail!

PRI. To the Delian and the Pythian swan,

And to the Latonian quail,

All hail!

CHOR. To the bird of awful stature,
Mother of gods, mother of man;

Great Cybele! nurse of Nature!

Glorious ostrich, hear our cry!

Fearful and enormous creature,

Hugest of all things that fly,

O preserve and prosper us,

Thou mother of Cleocritus!²

Grant the blessings that we seek,

For us and for the Chians' eke!

PEIS. That's right, the Chians³ —
Don't forget the Chians!

PRI. To the heroes, birds, and heroes'
sons,

We call at once, we call and cry,

To the woodpecker, the jay, the pie,

To the mallard and the wigeon,

To the ringdove and the pigeon,

To the petrel and the sea-mew,

To the dottrel and the curlew,

To the vultures and the hawks,

To the cormorants and the storks,

To the rail, to the quail,

To the peewit, to the tomtit.

PEIS. Have done there!⁴ Call no more of them; are you mad? —

Inviting all the cormorants and the vultures,

For a victim such as this! Why, don't you see,

40 A kite at a single swoop would carry it off?

Get out of my way there with your crowns and fillets!

I'll do it myself! I'll make the sacrifice!

PRI. Then I must commence again,
In a simple, humble strain;

¹ Chœris, a bad musician (the constant butt of the comic poets), is called for, to complete the shabbiness of the performance. His representative, the crow (who is the Chœris among the birds), sounds some discordant notes till Peisthetairus stops him.

² Nothing is known of him except that his figure resembled that of an ostrich.

³ Inhabitants of Chios, one of the islands that claimed to be Homer's birthplace.

⁴ Peisthetairus, who can do everything better than everybody else, undertakes to perform the sacrifice. This is sufficiently in character. By making him the chief operator, a greater comic effect is given to the series of interruptions which disturb him, until in despair he determines to transfer the sacrifice elsewhere. In this way the poet avoids the vulgar reality which he had before ridiculed.

And invite the gods anew
To visit us — but very few —
Or only just a single one,
All alone,

In a quiet easy way;
Wishing you may find enough
If you dine with us to-day.
Our victim is so poor and thin,
Merely bones, in fact, and skin.

PEIS. We sacrifice and pray to the 10 winged deities.

Enter a POET, very ragged and shabby, with a very mellifluous submissive mendicatory demeanour. Peisthetairus, the essential man of business and activity, entertaining 15 a supreme contempt for his profession and person, is at no great pains to conceal it;
but, recollecting at the same time that it is advisable to secure the suffrages of the literary world, and that the character of a 20 patron is creditable to a great man, he patronizes him accordingly, not at his own expense, but by bestowing upon him certain articles of apparel put in requisition for that purpose. This first act of confiscation is directed against the property 25
of the Church; the Scholiast informs us, that he begins by stripping the Priest.

POET. 'For the festive, happy day,
Muse prepare an early lay,
To Nephelococcugia.'

PEIS. What's here to do? What are you? Where do you come from?

POET. An humble menial of the Muses'
train,

As Homer expresses it. 35

PEIS. A menial, are you?

With your long hair? ¹ A menial!

POET. 'Tis not that,

No! but professors of the poetical art
Are simply styled the 'Menials of the 40
Muses',

As Homer expresses it.

PEIS. Ay, the Muse has given you
A ragged livery. Well, but friend, I say — Friend! — Poet! — What the plague has 45 brought you here?

POET. I've made an ode upon your new-built city,
And a charming composition for a
chorus,

And another, in Simonides's ² manner.

PEIS. When were they made? What time? How long ago?

POET. From early date, I celebrate in
song

5 The noble Nephelococcugian State.

PEIS. That's strange, when I'm just sacrificing here,

For the first time, to give the town a name.

POET. Intimations, swift as air,
To the Muses' ear, are carried,
Swifter than the speed and
force,

Of the fiery-footed horse,

Hence, the tidings never tarried;

Father, patron, mighty lord,
Founder of the rising State,

What thy bounty can afford,
Be it little, be it great,

With a quick resolve, incline
To bestow on me and mine.

PEIS. This fellow will breed a bustle,
and make mischief,

If we don't give him a trifle, and get rid of
him.

You there, you've a spare waistcoat; pull it off!

And give it this same clever, ingenious poet —

30 There, take the waistcoat, friend! Ye seem to want it!

POET. Freely, with a thankful heart,
What a bounteous hand bestows

Is received in friendly part;

But amid the Thracian snows,
Or the chilly Scythian plain,

He the wanderer, cold and lonely,

With an under-waistcoat only,
Must a further wish retain;

Which, the Muse averse to mention,

To your gentle comprehension,
Trusts her enigmatic strain.

PEIS. I comprehend it enough; you want a jerkin;

Here, give him yours; one ought to encourage genius.

50 There, take it, and good-by to ye!

POET. Well, I'm going;

¹ Slaves were forbidden to wear long hair.

² One of the most prolific of Greek poets, particularly famous for The Lamentation of Danaë.

And as soon as I get to the town, I'll set to work,
And finish something, in this kind of way:

'Seated on your golden throne,
Muse, prepare a solemn ditty,
To the mighty,
To the flighty,
To the cloudy, quivering, shivering,
To the lofty-seated city'.

PEIS. Well, I should have thought, that jerkin might have cured him
Of his 'quiverings and shiverings'. How the plague
Did the fellow find us out? I should not 15 have thought it.

Come, once again, go round with the basin and ewer.
Peace! Silence! Silence!

Enter a SOOTHSAYER with a great air of arrogance and self-importance. He comes on the authority of a book of Oracles (which he pretends to possess, but which he never produces), in virtue of which he lays claim to certain sacrificial perquisites and fees. 25 Peisthetairus encounters him with a different version composed upon the spot; in virtue of which he dismisses the Soothsayer with a good lashing.

SOOTH. Stop the sacrifice! 30

PEIS. What are you?

SOOTH. A Soothsayer, that's what I am.

PEIS. The worse luck for ye.

SOOTH. Friend, are you in your senses?

Don't trifle absurdly with religious mat- 35 ters.

Here's a prophecy of Bakis, which expresses Alludes to Nephelococcugia.

PEIS. How came it, then, you never 40 prophesied

Your prophecies before the town was built?

SOOTH. The spirit withheld me.

PEIS. And is it allowable now,
To give us a communication of them? 45

SOOTH. Hem!
'Moreover, when the crows and daws unite,

To build and settle, in the midway right,
Between tall Corinth and fair Sicyon's 50
height,

Then to Pandora ¹ let a milk white goat

Be slain and offered, and a comely coat
Given to the Soothsayer, and shoes a pair;

When he to you this Oracle shall bear'.

5 Following the Soothsayer, various other typical characters come in, an Astronomer, a Commissioner, and a Hawker, and are disposed of in summary fashion. This part we omit, and return to the play with the following choral song, the opening lines of which are descriptive of the cruel madness of the times. Diagoras was a foreign poet living in Athens, and was consequently suspected of being implicated in an imaginary plot.

EPIRREMA

At the present urgent crisis, all your efforts and attention

Are directed to secure Diagoras's apprehension:

20 Handsome bounties have been offered of a talent for his head.

Likewise, with respect to tyrants (tyrants that are gone and dead)

25 Bounties of a talent each, for all that can be killed or caught:

With a zealous emulation, we, the Birds, have also thought

Just and proper, to proclaim, from this time forth, that we withdraw

From Philocrates the fowler the protection of the law:

Furthermore, we fix a price, for bringing him alive or dead;

35 Four, if he's secured alive; a single talent for his head:

He, that ortolans and quails to market has presumed to bring;

And the sparrows, six a penny, tied together in a string;

With a wicked art retaining, sundry doves in his employ,

Fastened, with their feet in fetters, forced to serve for a decoy;

45 Farther, we declare and publish our command to men below,

All the birds you keep in prison, to release, and let them go.

We shall, else, revenge ourselves, and we shall teach the tyrants yet,

How to chirp and dance in fetters in the tangles of a net.

CHORUS

Blest are they,
 The birds alway,
 With perfect clothing,
 Fearing nothing,
 Cold or sleet or summer heat.
 As it chanches,
 As he fancies,
 Each his own vagary follows,
 Dwelling in the dells and hollows;
 When, with eager weary strain,
 The shrilly grasshoppers complain,
 Parched upon the sultry plain,
 Maddened with the raging heat,
 We secure a cool retreat,
 In the shady nooks and coves,
 Recesses of the sacred groves,
 Many a herb, and many a berry
 Serves to feast, and make us merry.

ANTEPIRREMA

To the judges of the prize, we wish to mention, in a word,
 The return we mean to make, if our performance is preferred.
 First then, in your empty coffers, you shall see the sterling owl,¹
 From the mines of Laurium, familiar as a common fowl;
 Roosting among the bags and pouches,
 each at ease upon his nest;
 Undisturbed, rearing and hatching little broods of interest;
 If you wish to cheat in office, but are inex-
 pert and raw,
 You should have a kite for agent, capable to gripe and claw;
 Cranes and cormorants shall help you, to a stomach and a throat,
 When you feast abroad; but, if you give a vile, unfriendly vote, Hasten and provide yourselves, each, with a little silver plate,
 Like the statues of the gods, for the protection of his pate;
 Else, when forth abroad you ramble, on a summer holiday,
 We shall take a dirty vengeance, and
 befoul your best array.

PEISTHETAIRUS

Well, friends and birds! the sacrifice has succeeded,
 Our omens have been good ones: good and fair.
 But, what's the meaning of it? We've no news
 From the new building yet! No messenger!
 Oh! there, at last, I see — there's somebody
 Running at speed, and panting like a racer.
Enter a MESSENGER, quite out of breath; and speaking in short snatches.
 MESS. Where is he? Where? Where is he? Where? Where is he? —
 The president Peisthetairus?
 PEIS. (coolly) Here am I.
 MESS. (in a gasp of breath) Your for-tification's finished.
 PEIS. Well! that's well.
 MESS. A most amazing, astonishing work it is!
 So, that Theagenes and Proxenides² Might flourish and gasconade and prance
 away,
 Quite at their ease, both of them four-in-
 hand,
 Driving abreast upon the breadth of the wall,
 Each in his own new chariot.
 PEIS. You surprise me.
 MESS. And the height (for I made the measurement myself)
 Is exactly a hundred fathoms.
 PEIS. Heaven and earth!
 How could it be? such a mass! who could have built it?
 MESS. The Birds; no creature else, no
 foreigners,
 Egyptian bricklayers, workmen or masons,
 But, they themselves, alone, by their own efforts
 (Even to my surprise, as an eye-witness) —
 The Birds, I say, completed everything:
 There came a body of thirty thousand cranes
 (I won't be positive, there might be more)
 With stones from Africa, in their craws and gizzards,

Which the stone-curlews and stone-chatterers

Worked into shape and finished. The sand-martins

And mud-larks, too, were busy in their department,

Mixing the mortar, while the water birds,
As fast as it was wanted, brought the water

To temper, and work it.

PEIS. (in a fidget) But, who served the masons?

Whom did you get to carry it?

MESS. To carry it?

Of course, the carrion crows and carrying pigeons.

PEIS. (in a fuss, which he endeavours to conceal)

Yes! yes! But after all, to load your hods,
How did you manage that?

MESS. Oh capitally,

I promise you. There were the geese, all barefoot

Trampling the mortar, and, when all was ready,

They handed it into the hods, so cleverly,
With their flat feet!

PEIS. (A bad joke, as a vent for irritation)

They footed it, you mean —

Come; it was handily done though, I confess.

MESS. Indeed, I assure you, it was a sight to see them;

And trains of ducks there were, clambering
the ladders,

With their duck legs, like bricklayer's
'prentices,

All dapper and handy, with their little trowels.

PEIS. In fact, then, it's no use engaging
foreigners,

Mere folly and waste, we've all within ourselves.

Ah, well now, come! But about the woodwork? Heh!

Who were the carpenters? Answer me
that!

MESS. The woodpeckers, of course;
and there they were,

Labouring upon the gates, driving and banging,

With their hard hatchet beaks, and such a din,

Such a clatter, as they made, hammering
and hacking,

In a perpetual peal, pelting away Like shipwrights, hard at work in the arsenal.

And now their work is finished, gates and
all,

Staples and bolts, and bars and everything;
The sentries at their posts; patrols appointed;

The watchmen in the barbican; the beacons

Ready prepared for lighting; all their signals

Arranged — but I'll step out, just for a moment,

To wash my hands. You'll settle all the rest. (Exit.)

PEISTHETAIRUS, surprised at the rapid conclusion of the work, feeling, from the volubility and easy manner of the Messenger, the blow which his authority has received, seeing that nothing is left for him to superintend, nothing to direct, nothing to suggest, or to find fault with, remains in an attitude of perplexity and astonishment, with his hands clasped across his forehead.

CHOR. (to PEISTHETAIRUS, in a sort of self-satisfied drawling tone)

Heigh-day! Why, what's the matter with ye? Sure!

Ah! well now, I calculate, you're quite astonished;

You did not know the nature of our birds:
I guess you thought it an impossible
thing,

To finish up your fortification job

Within the time so cleverly.

PEIS. (recovering himself and looking round) Yes, truly

Yes, I'm surprised indeed; I must confess —

I could almost imagine to myself

It was a dream, an illusion, altogether —

But, there's the watchman of the town,
I see!

In alarm and haste, it seems! He's running here —

The WATCHMAN enters, with a shout of alarm.

Well, what's the matter?

W. A most dreadful business:

One of the gods, just now — Jupiter's
gods —

Has bolted through the gates, and driven
on

Right into the atmosphere, in spite of us,
And all the jackdaws, that were mounting
guard.

PEIS. (animated at the prospect of having something to manage)

What an outrage! what an insult! Which of 'em?

Which of the gods?

W. We can't pretend to say;
We just could ascertain that he wore wings.
We're clear upon that point.

PEIS. But a light party Ought surely to have been sent in such a case;

A detachment —

W. A detachment has been sent Already: a squadron of ten thousand hawks,

Besides a corps of twenty thousand hobby
hawks,

As a light cavalry, to scour the country:
Vultures and falcons, ospreys, eagles, all Have sallied forth; the sound of wings is
heard,

Rushing and whizzing round on every side,
In eager search. The fugitive divinity Is not far off, and soon must be discovered.

PEIS. Did nobody think of slingers?
Where are they?

Where are the slingers got to? Give me a sling.

Arrows and slings, I say! — Make haste with 'em.

CHORUS

The verses which follow belong to a species of 40 songs, which are alluded to in Aristophanes more than once. They may properly be called 'Watch-songs', being sung by the Watchmen and Soldiers on guard, to keep themselves and their comrades awake and alert.

War is at hand,
On air and land,
Proclaimed and fixt.
War and strife,
Eager and rife,
Are kindled atwixt

This State of ours,
And the heavenly powers.

Look with care,
To the circuit of air.

Watch lest he,
The deity,
Whatever he be,
Should unaware Escape and flee.

But hark! the rushing sound of hasty
wings

Approaches us. The deity is at hand.

PEIS. Holloh you! Where are ye flying?
Where are ye going?

Hold! Halt! Stop there, I tell ye! —
Stop this instant!

What are ye? Where do you come from?
Speak, explain.

IRIS. Me? From the gods, to be sure!
the Olympian gods.

PEIS. (pointing to the flaunting appendages of her dress)

What are ye? With all your flying trumpery!

A helmet? or a galley? What's your name?

IRIS. Iris, the messenger of the gods.

PEIS. A messenger!

Oh! you're a naval messenger, I reckon,

30 The Salaminian galley, or the Paralian? ¹

You're in full sail, I see.

IRIS. What's here to do?

PEIS. Are there no birds in waiting?

Nobody

To take her into custody?

IRIS. Me, to custody?

Why, what's all this?

Peis. You'll find to your cost, I promise ye.

IRIS. Well, this seems quite unac-countable!

PEIS. Which of the gates Did ye enter at, ye jade? How came you
here?

45 IRIS. Gates! — I know nothing about your gates, not I.

PEIS. Fine innocent ignorant airs, she gives herself!

You applied to the pelicans, I suppose? —

50 The captain

Of the cormorants on guard admitted
you?

¹ The two sacred galleys of the Athenians.

- IRIS. Why, what the plague! what's this?
- PEIS. So, you confess! You come without permission!
- IRIS. Are you mad? 5
- PEIS. Did neither the sitting magistrates nor bird-masters Examine and pass you?
- IRIS. Examine me, forsooth!
- PEIS. This is the way then! — without 10 thanks or leave
You ramble and fly, committing trespasses
In an atmosphere belonging to your neighbours!
- IRIS. And where would you have us fly 15 then? Us, the gods!
- PEIS. I neither know nor care. But, I know this,
They sha'n't fly here. And another thing I know.
I know — that, if there ever was an instance
Of an Iris or a rainbow, such as you,
Detected in the fact, fairly condemned,
And justly put to death — it would be you. 25
- IRIS. But, I'm immortal.
- PEIS. (coldly and peremptorily) That would make no difference:
We should be strangely circumstanced indeed,
With the possession of a sovereign power,
And you, the gods, in no subordination,
No kind of order! fairly mutinying,
Infringing and disputing our commands.
— Now then, you'll please to tell me where you're going?
Which way you're steering with those wings of yours?
- IRIS. I? . . . I'm commissioned from 40 my father Jove,
To summon human mortals to perform
Their rites and offerings and oblations, due To the powers above.
- PEIS. And whom do you mean? what 45 powers?
- IRIS. What powers? Ourselves, the Olympian deities!
- PEIS. So then! you're deities, the rest of ye! 50
- IRIS. Yes, to be sure. What others should there be?
- PEIS. Remember — ! once for all — ! that we, the Birds,
Are the only deities, from this time forth;
And not your father Jove. By Jove! not he!
- IRIS. Oh! rash, presumptuous wretch! Incense no more
The wrath of the angry gods! lest ruin drive
Her ploughshare o'er thy mansion; and destruction,
With hasty besom, sweep thee to the dust;
Or flaming lightning smite thee with a flash,
Left in an instant smouldering and extinct.
- PEIS. Do ye hear her? — Quite in tragedy! — quite sublime!
Come, let me try for a bouncer in return.
20 Let's see. Let's recollect. 'Me dost thou deem,
Like a base Lydian or a Phrygian slave,
With hyperbolical bombast to scare?'
I tell ye, and you may tell him. Jupiter —
If he provokes me, and pushes things too far —
Will see some eagles of mine, to outnumber his,
With firebrands in their claws about his house.
30 And, I shall send a flight of my Porphyrions¹
A hundred covey or more, armed cap-à-pie
To assault him in his sublime celestial towers:
35 Perhaps, he may remember in old times,
He found enough to do with one Porphyrion.
And for you, Madam Iris, I shall strip
Your rainbow-shanks, if you're impertinent,
Depend upon it, and I myself, in person
Will ruin you, myself — ! Old as I am.
IRIS. Curse ye, you wretch, and all your filthy words.
PEIS. Come, scuttle away; convey your person elsewhere;
Be brisk, and leave a vacancy. Brush off.
IRIS. I shall inform my father. He shall know Your rudeness and impertinence. He shall, —

He'll settle ye and keep ye in order. You shall see.

PEIS. Oh dear! is it come to that! No, you're mistaken,

Young woman, upon that point; I'm not your man,

I'm an old fellow grown; I'm thunder-proof,

Proof against flames and darts and female arts:

You'd best look out for a younger customer.

CHORUS

Notice is hereby given,

To the deities of heaven;

Not to trespass here,

Upon our atmosphere;

Take notice; from the present day,

No smoke or incense is allowed

To pass this way.

PEIS. Quite strange it is! quite unaccountable!

That herald to mankind, that was despatched,

What has become of him? He's not yet returned.

Enter HERALD.

HER. O Peisthetairus, happiest, wisest, best,

Cleverest of men! Oh! most illustrious!

Oh! most inordinately fortunate!

Oh! most . . . Oh! do for shame, do, bid me have done.

PEIS. What are you saying?

HER. All the people of Earth Have joined in a complimentary vote, decreeing

A crown of gold to you, for your exertions.

PEIS. I'm much obliged to the people of Earth. But why?

What was their motive?

HER. O most noble founder Of this supereminent celestial city,

You can't conceive the clamour of applause,

The enthusiastic popularity, That attends upon your name; the impulse and stir,

That moves among mankind, to colonize And migrate hither. In the time before, There was a Spartan mania, and people went

5 Stalking about the streets, with Spartan staves,

With their long hair, unwashed and slovenly,

Like so many Socrates's: but, of late, 10 Birds are the fashion — Birds are all in all —

Their modes of life are grown to be mere copies

Of the birds' habits; rising with the lark; 15 Scratching and scrabbling suits and informations;

Picking and pecking upon points of law; Brooding and hatching evidence. In short,

It has grown to such a pitch, that names of 20 birds

Are given to individuals; Chærephon Is called an owl, Theagenes a goose, Philocles a cock sparrow, Midias A dunghill cock. And all the songs in vogue

25 Have something about birds, swallows or doves;

Or about flying, or a wish for wings.

Such is the state of things, and I must 30 warn you,

That you may expect to see some thousands of them

Arriving here, almost immediately, With a clamorous demand for wings and claws:

I advise you to provide yourself in time.

PEIS. Come, it won't do then, to stand dawdling here:

Go you, fill the hampers and the baskets 40 there

With wings, and bid the loutish porter bring them,

While I stop here, to encounter the newcomers.

CHORUS¹

Shortly shall the noble town,

Populous and gay,

Shine in honour and renown.

PEIS. (drily) Why, perhaps she may.

CHOR. The benignant powers of love,

¹ As before, the author relieves himself of the embarrassment of the presence of the chorus by ridiculing its attributes. In this instance he uses the poetic and imaginative quality of the chorus as

- From their happy sphere,
From the blest abodes
above . . .
- PEIS. (venting his ill humour on the servant)
Curse ye, rascal! can't ye move!
- CHOR. . . . Are descending here,
Where in all this earthly range,
He that wishes for a change
Can he find a seat,
Joyous and secure as this,
Filled with happiness and bliss,
Such a fair retreat?
Here are all the lovely faces,
Gentle Venus and the Graces,
And the little Cupid;
Order, ease and harmony,
Peace and affability.
- PEIS. The scoundrel is so stupid,
Quicker, sirrah! bring it quicker!
- CHOR. Let him bring the woven wicker
With the winged store.
I, myself, in very deed,
With the varlet will proceed,
And smite him more and more;
Like a sluggish ass he seems,
Or even, as a man that dreams,
Therefore smite him sore.
- PEIS. He's a lazy rogue, it's true.
- CHOR. Now range them forth, displayed in order due,
Feathers of every form and size and hue,
With shrewd intent, adapting every pinion,
To the new residents of your dominion.
- PEIS. I vow by the hawks and eagles!
I won't bear it;
I'll beat ye, I will myself, you lazy rascal!
- Enter a YOUNG MAN, singing*
- 'Oh! for an eagle's force and might,
Loftily to soar
Over land and sea, to light
On a lonely shore'.
- PEIS. Well, here's a song that's something to the purpose.
- Y. MAN. Ay, ay, there's nothing like it — wings and flying!
- Wings are your only sort. I'm a bird-fancier.
In the new fashion quite. I've taken a notion
To settle and live amongst ye. I like your laws.
PEIS. What laws do you mean? We've many laws amongst us.
Y. MAN. Your laws in general; but particularly
The law that allows of beating one's own father.
PEIS. Why, truly, yes! we esteem it a point of valour,
In a chicken, if he clapperclaws the old cock.
Y. MAN. That was my view, feeling a wish in fact
To throttle mine, and seize the property.
PEIS. Yes, but you'd find some difficulties here,
An obstacle insurmountable, I conceive;
An ancient statute standing unrepealed,
Engraved upon our old Ciconian columns.
It says, that when a stork or a ciconia
Has brought his lawful progeny of young storks
To bird's estate, and enabled them to fly,
The sire shall stand entitled to a maintenance
At the son's cost and charge in his old age.
Y. MAN. I've managed finely it seems to mend myself!
Forced to maintain my father after all!
PEIS. No, no; not quite so bad; since you're come here,
As a well-wisher to the establishment,
Zealous and friendly, we'll contrive to equip you
With a suit of armour, as a soldier's orphan.
And now, young man, let me suggest some notions,
Things that were taught me when a boy.
'Your father?'
'Strike him not' — rather take this pair of wings,

a contrast to the practical, bustling spirit of Peisthetairus. The latter at first favors them with a gruff acquiescence, then loses all patience and vents his ill humor in scolding his servant, and later tries to evade their sympathy by relapsing into comparative good humor. When the chorus begins its usual practice of exhorting and advising, he flies into a pretended rage with his servant and is running off the stage to beat him when the first specimens of the new colonists make their appearance.

- And this cockspur; imagine you've a coxcomb
Upon your head, to serve you for a helmet;
Look out for service, and enlist yourself;
Get into a garrison; live upon your pay;
And let your father live. You're fond of fighting,
And fond of flying — take a flight to Thrace;
There you may please yourself; and fight your fill.
Y. MAN. By Jove, you're right. The notion's not a bad one.
I'll follow it up!
PEIS. (very gravely and quietly)
You'll find it the best way. (Exit Y. MAN.)
- Enter CINESIAS,¹ singing*
- 'Fearless, I direct my flight
To the vast Olympian height;
Thence at random, I repair,
Wafted in the whirling air,
With an eddy, wild and strong,
Over all the fields of song'.
PEIS. Ah! well, Cinesias, I'm quite glad to see ye;
But, what has brought ye and all your songs and music,
Hobbling along with your old chromatic joints?
CIN. (singing) 'Let me live, and let me sing,
Like a bird upon the wing'.
PEIS. No more of that; but tell us plainly in prose,
What are ye come for? what's your scheme, your object?
CIN. I was anxious to procure a pair of wings,
To say the truth; wishing to make a tour
Among the clouds, collecting images
And metaphors, and things of that description.
PEIS. How so! do you procure 'em from the clouds?
CIN. Entirely! Our dithyrambic business absolutely
- Depends upon them; our most approved commodities,
The dusty, misty, murky articles,
With the suitable wings and feathers, are imported Exclusively from thence. I'll give you a sample,
A thing of my own composing. You shall judge.
PEIS. But, indeed, I'd rather not.
CIN. But, indeed, you must;
It's a summary view of flying, comprehending it
In all its parts, in every point of view.
- CINESIAS, singing
- 'Ye gentle feathered tribes,
Of every plume and hue,
That, in uninhabited air,
Are hurrying here and there;
Oh! that I, like you,
Could leave this earthly level,
For a wild aerial revel:
O'er the waste of ocean,
To wander, and to dally
With the billow's motion;
Or, in an eager sally,
Soaring to the sky,
To range and rove on high
With my plummy sails.
Buffeted and baffled, with the gusty gales,
Buffeted and baffled. . . '
- (While CINESIAS is repeating these last lines, PEISTHETAIRUS comes behind him, and gives him a flap with a huge pair of wings.)
CIN. A pretty, civil joke indeed!
PEIS. What joke?
I'm only buffeting you with the plummy sails, I thought it was what you wanted.
CIN. Well, that's fine!
Pretty respect for a master such as me,
A leader of the band, that all the tribes
Are ready to fight for, to bespeak him first.
PEIS. Well, we've a little unfledged chorus here,
That Leotrophides² hatched, poor puny nestlings,
I'll give 'em you for scholars.
- CIN. Ah, laugh on!

¹ Cinesias, a lame dithyrambic poet and musician, arrives in the hopes of being able to provide himself with wings, which will enable him to look after his concerns among the clouds, the great emporium for business with all persons who are embarked in the dithyrambic line.

² Cinesias and Leotrophides were both ridiculed for their flimsy figures.

Laugh on! but take my word for it, here I stay,
 Till you provide me with a pair of wings,
 Proper to circumnavigate the skies.

(Exit CIN.) 5

*Enter SYCOPHANT, singing*¹

'Tell us who the strangers are,
 Gentle swallow. Birds of air,
 Party-coloured, poor and bare,
 Tell us who the strangers are;
 Gentle swallow, tell me true'.

PEIS. Here's a fine plague broke out.
 See yonder fellow

Sauntering along this way, swaggering and 15 singing.

SYC. Ho! gentle swallow! I say, my gentle swallow,

My gentle swallow! how often must I call?

PEIS. Why, there it is; the prodigal in 20
 the fable

Seeking for swallows in a ragged coat.

SYC. (in an arrogant overbearing tone)

Who's he, that's set to serve out wings?
 Where is he?

PEIS. 'Tis I, but what do you want? 25
 You should explain.

SYC. Wings! Wings! You need not have asked me. Wings I want.

PEIS. Do you mean to fly for flannel 30 to Pellene?²

SYC. (a little disconcerted at this allusion to his attire)

No, no! But I'm employed . . . I employ myself,

In fact, among the allies and islanders;
 I'm in the informing line.

PEIS. (in a tone of very grave irony, which the SYCOPHANT, not perceiving, proceeds more fluently than before)

I wish you joy.

SYC. And a mover and manager for prosecutions,

In criminal suits, and so forth, you understand me;

So I wish to equip myself with a pair of
 wings,

To whisk about, and trounce the islanders.

PEIS. Would it be doing things in better
 form,

To serve a summons flying, think ye?

SYC. (not knowing very well what to make of him) No,

Not that, but just to avoid the risk of pirates,

To return in company with a flight of cranes

(As they do with the gravel in their giz-zards),

10 With a bellyful of lawsuits for my ballast.

PEIS. (in a grave, primitive, and somewhat twaddling tone, intended to reanimate
 the impertinence of the SYCOPHANT)

So, this is your employment! A young man

Like you, to be an informer! Is it possible?

SYC. Why shouldn't it? I was never bred to labour.

PEIS. (as before) But sure, there are other lawful occupations,

In which a brisk young fellow, such as you,
 Might earn an honest, decent livelihood

In credit and goodwill, without informing.

SYC. (thoroughly taken in, and, thinking
 he has to deal with a mere silly well-meaning old man, becomes emphatically insolent)

Wings, my good fellow! wings I want —
 not words.

PEIS. (drily) I'm giving you wings, already.

SYC. (a little puzzled and taken aback)
 What, with words?

Is that your way?

35 PEIS. (in a tone of very grave banter)

Yes, for mankind in general Are winged as it were, and brought to plume themselves

In different ways by speeches and discourse.

40 SYC. (confused and puzzled)

What, all?

PEIS. (as before) Yes, all. I'll give you a striking instance:

45 You must have heard, yourself, elderly people

Sitting conversing in the barber's shop.

And one says, 'Well, Diitrephes has talked
 So much to my young man, he has brought

50 him at last

¹ If any one passage were to be selected from the remains of Aristophanes as particularly illustrative of the manner in which he delights to exhibit character, perhaps it would be this.

² Famous for woolen cloth, pieces of which were given for prizes at the games.

To plume himself in driving.' And another

Says that his son is quite amongst the clouds,

Grown flighty of late, with studying tragedy.

SYC. (with a sort of hesitating laugh)

So, words are wings, you say.

PEIS. No doubt of it.

I say it, and I repeat it; human nature is marvellously raised and elevated

By words. I was in hopes, that I might raise you

By words of good advice, to another sphere;

To live in an honest calling.

SYC. (feeling himself bantered and beaten, but restive and angry)

But I won't though.

PEIS. (coolly) Why, what will you do? 20

SYC. (sulkily at first, but animating as he proceeds)

Why, I won't disgrace my family; My father and my grandfather before him

Served as informers; and I'll stick to it, 25

The profession. So, you'll please to hand 'em me out;

A pair of your best wings, vulture's or hawk's,

To fly to the Islands, with my summonses, 30

And home again, to record them in the courts,

And out again, to the Islands.

PEIS. (in a tone of interest and sympathy, as if he was himself an amateur desirous of displaying his professional knowledge) 35

Yes, that's well,

I understand ye, I think; your method is, To be beforehand with 'em? Your defendant, 40

You get him cast for non-appearance, heh?

Before he can arrive; and finish him

In his absence, heh?

SYC. (completely taken in, delighted — rubbing his hands)

By Jove, you're up to it!

PEIS. Then, whilst he's sailing here you get the start,

And fly, to pounce upon the property,

To rummage out the chattels.

SYC.

That's the trick,

The notion of it! — I see, you're up to it.

10 A man must whisk about, here and away, Just like a whipping-top.

PEIS.

Ay, yes, you're right,

I understand you — the instance is a good one.

15 A whipping-top, you say. Well, by good luck

I've here a capital slashing suit of wings, To serve ye, made of a cow-hide from Coryra.

SYC. O heaven! what's there? a horse-whip?

PEIS.

Wings, I tell ye,

To whisk ye about, to flog ye, and make ye fly.

SYC. Oh dear! oh dear!

PEIS. Scamper away, you scoundrel!

Vanish, you vagabond! whisk yourself off! I'll pay ye for your practices in the courts,

Your pettifoggicorascalities. (Exit SYC.)

(To the attendants.)

Come bundle up the wings. Let's take 'em back. (Exeunt.)

CHORUS: STROPHE

We have flown, and we have run,¹

Viewing marvels, many a one;

In every land beneath the sun.

But, the strangest sight to see

Was a huge exotic tree,

Growing, without heart or pith,

Weak and sappy, like a wyth;

But, with leaves and boughs withal,

Comely, flourishing and tall.

¹ Fabulous notions respecting the unknown portions of the world seem to have been nearly the same (or at least of the same character) in the time of Aristophanes as in the days of Sir John Mandeville. But it will be seen that by a strange coincidence wonderful and remote objects have an unaccountable analogy to things and persons at Athens; as in the following instance of the enormous tree, which by the botanists was considered as belonging to the sycophant genus, but which was vulgarly called Cleonymus; whereas at Athens there happened to be a person of precisely the same name, equally distinguished for his size, and having the same peculiarity of being classed among the Sycophants. And, what is more singular, as the Athenian Cleonymus had lost his shield in battle, it so happened that his vegetable counterpart was a deciduous tree, with leaves of a scutiform or shield-like shape, which it was also in the habit of losing.

This the learned all ascribe
 To the sycophantic tribe;
 But the natives there, like us,
 Call it a Cleonymus.
 In the spring's delightful hours,
 It blossoms with rhetoric flowers;
 I saw it standing in the field,
 With leaves, in figure like a shield;
 On the first tempestuous day,
 I saw it cast those leaves away.

ANTISTROPHE ¹

There lies a region out of sight,
 Far within the realm of night,
 Far from torch and candle light.
 There in feasts of meal and wine,
 Men and demigods may join,
 There they banquet, and they dine,
 Whilst the light of day prevails;
 At sunset, their assurance fails.
 If any mortal then presumes,
 Orestes, sallying from the tombs,
 Like a fierce heroic sprite,
 Assaults and strips the lonely wight.

PROMETHEUS, PEISTHETAIRUS,
CHORUS

PRO. (enters muffled up, peeping about 30 him with a look of anxiety and suspicion) Oh dear! If Jupiter should chance to see
 me!

Where's Peisthetairus? Where?

PEIS. Why, what's all this? 35
 This fellow muffled up?

PRO. Do look behind me;
 Is anybody watching? any gods
 Following and spying after me?

PEIS. No, none, 40
 None that I can see, there's nobody. But
 you!

What are ye?

PRO. Tell me, what's the time of day?

PEIS. Why, noon, past noon; but tell 45 me, who are ye? Speak.

PRO. Much past, — how much?

PEIS. (aside) Confound the fool, I say!
 The insufferable blockhead!

PRO. How's the sky?

Open or overcast? Are there any clouds?

PEIS. (aloud and angrily)

Be hanged!

5 PRO. Then I'll disguise myself no longer.

PEIS. My dear Prometheus!

PRO. Hold your tongue, I beg;

Don't mention my name! If Jupiter
 10 should see me,

Or overhear ye, I'm ruined and undone.

But now, to give you a full complete account

Of everything that's passing, there in 15 heaven —

The present state of things. . . . But first I'll trouble you

To take the umbrella, and hold it overhead,
 Lest they should overlook us.

20 PEIS. What a thought!
 Just like yourself! A true Promethean
 thought!

Stand under it, here! Speak boldly; never fear.

25 PRO. D'ye mind me?

PEIS. Yes, I mind ye. Speak away.

PRO. (emphatically) Jupiter's ruined.

PEIS. Ruined! How? Since when?

PRO. From the first hour you fortified and planted

Your atmospheric settlements. Ever since,
 There's not a mortal offers anything In the shape of sacrifice. No smoke of victims!

No fumes of incense! Absolutely nothing!
 We're keeping a strict fast — fasting per-
 force,

From day to day — the whole community.
 And the inland barbarous gods in the upper country

Are broken out, quite mutinous and savage,

With hunger and anger; threatening to come down

With all their force, if Jupiter refuses To open the ports, and allow them a free traffic

For their entrails and intestines, as before.

¹ The antistrophe is a romantic and mysterious description of a junketing public-house, which seems to have been popular, but from which it was not safe to return to town after dusk. Orestes, an heroic name, was also the name or the nickname of a noted robber. It was reckoned extremely dangerous to meet a demigod after sunset.

- PEIS. (a little annoyed at being obliged to ask the question)
 What — are there other barbarous gods, besides,
 In the upper country?
 PRO. Barbarous? — to be sure! They're all of Excecestides's kindred.
 PEIS. (as before hesitating, but with a sort of affected ease)
 Well — but — the name now. The same 10 I need not tell you that.
 barbarous deities —
 What name do you call 'em?
 PRO. (surprised at PEISTHETAIRUS'S ignorance)
 Call them! The Triballi! 15
 PEIS. (giving vent to his irritation by a forced joke)
 Ah! well then, that accounts for our old saying:
 Confound the Tribe of them! 20
 PRO. (annoyed and drily) Precisely so. But, now to business. Thus much, I can tell ye;
 That envoys will arrive immediately
 From Jupiter, and those upland wild Tri- 25
 balli,
 To treat for a peace. But, you must not consent
 To ratify or conclude, till Jupiter Acknowledges the sovereignty of the 30
 birds;
 Surrendering up to you the sovereign queen,
 Whom you must marry.
 PEIS. Why, what queen is that? 35
 PRO. What queen? A most delightful charming girl,
 Jove's housekeeper, that manages his matters,
 Serves out his thunderbolts, arranges 40
 everything;
 The constitutional laws and liberties,
 Morals and manners, the marine department,
 Freedom of speech, and threepence for the 45
 juries.
 PEIS. Why, that seems all in all.
 PRO. Yes, everything,

I tell ye, in having her, you've everything:
 I came down hastily to say thus much;
 I'm hearty, ye know; I stick to principle.
 Steady to the human interest — always 5 was.

PEIS. Yes! we're obliged to you for our roast victuals.

PRO. And I hate these present gods, you know, most thoroughly.

PEIS. (with a sort of half-sneer) No, no, you need not,

You're known of old, for an enemy to the gods.

PRO. Yes, yes, like Timon,¹ I'm a perfect Timon;

Just such another. But I must be going;

Give me the umbrella; if Jupiter should see me,

He'll think that I'm attending a procession.

PEIS. That's well, but don't forget the folding chair,

For a part of your disguise. Here, take it with you. (Exeunt.)

CHORUS

Beyond the navigable seas,²
 Amongst the fierce Antipodes,
 There lies a lake, obscure and holy,
 Lazy, deep, melancholy,
 Solitary, secret, hidden,
 Where baths and washing are forbidden.
 Socrates, beside the brink,
 Summons from the murky sink
 Many a disembodied ghost;
 And Pisander reached the coast
 To raise the spirit that he lost;
 With a victim, strange and new,
 A gawky camel, which he slew
 Like Ulysses — whereupon,
 The grizzly sprite of Chœrephon
 Flitted round him; and appeared
 With his eyebrows and his beard,
 Like a strange infernal fowl,
 Half a vampire, half an owl.

² Under the same form of a description of the wonders of the Terra Incognita, we have here again one of those pieces of personal satire peculiar to the ancient comedy. It is directed against Socrates and his school, including by name his friend Chœrephon. The uncleanly habits imputed to them have already been alluded to, but it is difficult to conceive what is the imputation conveyed by describing them as engaged in the evocation of spirits.

NEPTUNE, the TRIBALLIAN ENVOY, HERCULES¹

NEP. There's Nephelococcugia, that's the town,
The point we're bound to, with our embassy.

(Turning to the TRIBALLIAN.)

But you! What a figure have ye made yourself!

What a way to wear a mantle! slouching
off

From the left shoulder! hitch it round, I tell ye,

On the right side. For shame — come — 15
so; that's better,

These folds, too, bundled up. There, throw them round

Even and easy — so. Why, you're a savage,

A natural born savage. Oh! democracy!
What will it bring us to? When such a ruffian

Is voted into an embassy!

TRI. (to NEPTUNE, who is pulling his 25 dress about)

Come, hands off!

Hands off!

NEP. Keep quiet, I tell ye, and hold your tongue,

For a very beast: in all my life in heaven,
I never saw such another — Hercules,

I say, what shall we do? What should you think?

HER. What would I do? What do I 35 think? I've told you Already. . . . I think to throttle him —

the fellow,

Whoever he is, that's keeping us blockaded.

NEP. Yes, my good friend; but we were sent, you know,

To treat for a peace. Our embassy is for peace.

HER. That makes no difference; or if 45
it does,

It makes me long to throttle him the more.

PEIS. (very busy, affecting not to see
them)

Give me the Silphium spice. Where's the cheese-grater?

Bring cheese here, somebody! Mend
the charcoal fire.

5 HER. Mortal, we greet you and hail you! Three of us —

Three deities.

PEIS. (without looking up) But I'm engaged at present;

10 A little busy, you see, mixing my sauce.

HER. Why sure! How can it be?
what dish is this?

Birds seemingly!

PEIS. (without looking up) Some individual birds,

Opposed to the popular democratic birds,
Rendered themselves obnoxious.

HER. So, you've plucked them,

And put them into sauce, provisionally?

20 PEIS. (looking up) Oh! bless me,
Hercules, I'm quite glad to see you.

What brings you here?

HER. We're come upon an embassy
From heaven, to put an end to this same
war. . . .

SERV. (to PEISTHETAIRUS)

The cruet's empty, our oil is out.

PEIS. No matter,

Fetch more, fetch plenty, I tell ye. We shall want it.

30 HER. For, in fact it brings no benefit to us,

The continuance of the war prolonging it;
And you yourselves, by being on good terms

Of harmony with the gods . . . why, for the future,

You'd never need to know the want of rain,

40 For water in your tanks; and we could serve ye

With reasonable, seasonable weather,
According as you wished it, wet or dry.

And this is our commission coming here,
As envoys, with authority to treat.

PEIS. Well, the dispute, you know, from the beginning

Did not originate with us. The war
(If we could hope in any way to bring you

¹ See Dramatis Personæ, page 84. It is usual with Aristophanes to omit the explanation which a poet of the new comedy would have put into a soliloquy or a confidential conversation. Hence, a conversation is begun, a recognition takes place, the ice is broken, and the negotiation opened; while Neptune is left with his dignity in the background.

To reasonable terms) might be concluded.
Our wishes, I declare it, are for peace.
If the same wish prevails upon your part,
The arrangement in itself is obvious,
A retrocession on the part of Jupiter,
The birds again to be reintegrated
In their estate of sovereignty. This seems
The fair result; and, if we can conclude,
I shall hope to see the ambassadors to supper.

HER. Well, this seems satisfactory;
I consent.

NEP. (to HERCULES) What's come to ye? What do ye mean? Are ye gone mad?

You glutton; would you ruin your own father,

Depriving him of his ancient sovereignty?

PEIS. (to NEPTUNE) Indeed! And would not it be a better method

For all your deities, and confirm your power,

To leave the birds to manage things below?

You sit there, muffled in your clouds
above,

While all mankind are shifting, skulking,
lurking,

And perjuring themselves here out of sight.

Whereas, if you would form a steady strict

Alliance with the Birds, when any man

(Using the common old familiar oath —
'By Jupiter and the crow') foreswore
himself,

The crow would pick his eyes out, for his
pains.

NEP. Well, that seems plausible — that's fairly put.

HER. I think so, too.

PEIS. (to the TRIBALLIAN) Well, what say you?

TRIB. Say true.

PEIS. Yes. He consents, you see!
But I'll explain now

The services and good offices we could do
you.

Suppose a mortal made a vow, for instance,

To any of you; then he delays and shuffles,
And says 'the gods are easy creditors'.

In such a case, we could assist ye, I say,
To levy a fine.

NEP. (open to conviction, but anxious to proceed on sure ground)

How would you do it? Tell me.

PEIS. Why, for example, when he's counting money,

Or sitting in the bath, we give the warrant
To a pursuivant of ours, a kite or magpie;

5 And they pounce down immediately, and distrain

Cash or apparel, money or money's worth,
To twice the amount of your demand upon
him.

10 HER. Well, I'm for giving up the sovereignty,

For my part.

NEP. (convinced, but wishing to avoid responsibility, by voting last)

15 The Triballian, what says he?

HER. (aside to the TRIBALLIAN, showing his fist)

You, sir; do you want to be well banged or not?

20 Mind, how you vote! Take care how you provoke me.

TRIB. Yaw, yaw. Goot, goot.

HER. He's of the same opinion.

NEP. Then, since you're both agreed,
I must agree.

25 HER. (shouting to PEISTHETAIRUS, the negotiators having withdrawn to consult at the extremity of the stage)

Well, you! we've settled this concern,
30 you see,

About the sovereignty; we're all agreed.

PEIS. Oh faith, there's one thing more,
I recollect,

Before we part; a point that I must 35 mention.

As for dame Juno, we'll not speak of her;
I've no pretensions, Jupiter may keep her;

But, for that other queen, his manager,

The sovereign goddess, her surrender to me

40 Is quite an article indispensable.

NEP. Your views, I find, are not disposed for peace:

We must turn homewards.

45 PEIS. As you please, so be it.
Cook, mind what you're about there with the sauce;

Let's have it rich and savoury, thicken it
up!

50 HER. How now, man? Neptune! are you flying off?

Must we remain at war, here, for a woman?

NEP. But what are we to do?

HER. Do? Why, make peace

NEP. I pity you really! I feel quite ashamed

And sorry to see you; ruining yourself!
If anything should happen to your father,
After surrendering the sovereignty,
What's to become of you? When you yourself

Have voted away your whole inheritance:
At his decease, you must remain a beggar.

PEIS. (aside to HERCULES) Ah there! I thought so; he's coming over ye;
Step here a moment! Let me speak to ye!
Your uncle's chousing you, my poor dear friend,
You've not a farthing's worth of expectation,

From what your father leaves. Ye can't inherit

By law: ye're illegitimate, ye know.

HER. Heigh-day! Why, what do you mean?

PEIS. I mean the fact!
Your mother was a foreigner; Minerva
Is counted an heiress, everybody knows;
How could that be, supposing her own father

To have had a lawful heir?

HER. But, if my father
Should choose to leave the property to me,
In his last will.

PEIS. The law would cancel it!
And Neptune, he that's using all his influence
To work upon ye, he'd be the very first
To oppose ye, and oust ye, as the testator's brother.

I'll tell ye what the law says, Solon's¹ law:

'A foreign heir shall not succeed,
Where there are children of the lawful breed:

But, if no native heir there be,
The kinsman nearest in degree
Shall enter on the property.'

HER. Does nothing come to me, then? Nothing at all,
Of all my father leaves?

PEIS. Nothing at all,
I should conceive. But you perhaps can tell me.

Did he, your father, ever take ye with him,
To get ye enrolled upon the register?

HER. No, truly I . . . thought it strange . . . he . . . never did.

PEIS. Well, but don't think things strange. Don't stand there, stammering, Puzzling and gaping. Trust yourself to me, 'Tis I must make your fortune after all!

If you'll reside and settle amongst us here,

I'll make you chief commander among the birds,

Captain, and Autocrat and everything.
Here you shall domineer and rule the roast,
With splendour and opulence and pigeon's milk.

HER. (in a more audible voice, and in a formal, decided tone)

I agreed with you before: I think your argument

Unanswerable. I shall vote for the surrender.

PEIS. (to NEPTUNE) And what say you?

NEP. (firmly and vehemently) Decidedly I dissent.

PEIS. Then it depends upon our other friend,

It rests with the Triballian; what say you?

TRI. Me tell you; pretty girl, grand beautiful queen,

Give him to birds.

HER. Ay, give her up, you mean.

NEP. Mean! He knows nothing about it. He means nothing

But chattering like a magpie.

PEIS. Well, 'the magpies' He means, the magpies or the birds in general.

The republic of the birds — their government —

That the surrender should be made to them.

NEP. (in great wrath) Well, settle it yourselves; amongst yourselves;

In your own style: I've nothing more to say.

HER. (to PEISTHETAIRUS)

Come, we're agreed in fact, to grant your terms;

But you must come, to accompany us to the sky;

To take back this same queen, and the other matters.

PEIS. (very quietly) It happens lucky enough, with this provision
 For a marriage feast. It seems prepared on purpose.
 HER. Indeed, and it does. Suppose, in the meanwhile,
 I superintend the cookery, and turn the roast,
 While you go back together.
 NEP. (with a start of surprise and disgust) 10 Turn the roast!
 A pretty employment! Won't you go with us?
 HER. No, thank ye; I'm mighty comfortable here.
 PEIS. Come, give me a marriage robe; I must be going.

CHORUS

Along the Sycophantic shore,¹
 And where the savage tribes adore
 The waters of the Clepsydra,²
 There dwells a nation, stern and strong,
 Armed with an enormous tongue,
 Wherewith they smite and slay:

With their tongues, they reap and sow,
 And gather all the fruits that grow,
 The vintage and the grain;
 Gorgias is their chief of pride,
 And many more there be beside
 Of mickle might and main.

Good they never teach, nor show
 But how to work men harm and woe,
 Unrighteousness and wrong;
 And hence the custom doth arise,
 When beasts are slain in sacrifice,
 We sever out the tongue.

HARBINGER OR HERALD, ANNOUNCING THE APPROACH OF PEISTHETAIRUS

O fortunate! O triumphant! O beyond 45 Jupiter, that god sublime,

All power of speech or thought, supremely blest, Prosperous happy birds! Behold your king,
 5 Here in his glorious palace! Mark his entrance,
 Dazzling all eyes, resplendent as a star;
 Outshining all the golden lights, that beam
 From the rich roof, even as a summer sun,
 Or brighter than the sun, blazing at noon.
 He comes; and at his side a female form
 Of beauty ineffable; wielding on high,
 In his right hand, the winged thunderbolt, Jove's weapon. While the fumes of incense spread 15 Circling around, and subtle odours steal
 Upon the senses from the wreathed smoke,
 Curling and rising in the tranquil air.
 See, there he stands! Now must the sacred Muse 20 Give with auspicious words her welcome due.

SEMICHORUS

25 Stand aside and clear the ground,
 Spreading in a circle round
 With a worthy welcoming;
 To salute our noble king
 30 In his splendour and his pride,
 Coming hither, side by side,
 With his happy lovely bride.
 O the fair delightful face!
 35 What a figure! What a grace!
 What a presence! What a carriage!
 What a noble worthy marriage.

Let the birds rejoice and sing,
 40 At the wedding of the king:
 Happy to congratulate Such a blessing to the State.
 Hymen, Hymen, Ho!

¹ We have here another satiric song. The poet had exhibited a caricature of the Socratic school of philosophy. The same vein of ridicule is now directed against the Sophists, who tended equally to produce an undesirable change in the general character of the nation. Their public exhibitions had operated as an incentive to the natural propensity of the Athenian people, already disposed to divert their attention to litigation and speechifying. At the same time their private lessons were purchased in some instances at an enormous price by young men of wealth aspiring to political eminence and celebrity.

² A clock marking the time allotted to each advocate in the courts of justice. The name also belonged to certain springs and streams.

When the Fates, in former time,
 Matched him with the Queen of Heaven,
 At a solemn banquet given,
 Such a feast was held above;
 And the charming God of Love,
 Being present in command,
 As a Bridesman took his stand,
 With the golden reins in hand.
 Hymen, Hymen, Ho!

PEIS. I accept and approve the marks of your love,
 Your music and verse I applaud and admire.

But rouse your invention, and raising it 15
 higher,

Describe me the terrible engine of Jove,
 The thunder of earth and the thunder
 above.

CHORUS

O dreaded bolt of heaven,
 The clouds with horror cleaving,

And ye terrestrial thunders deep and
 low
 Closed in the subterranean caves below,
 That even at this instant growl and rage,
 5 Shaking with awful sound this earthly stage,
 Our king by you has gained his due;
 By your assistance, yours alone,
 Everything is made his own,
 10 Jove's dominion and his throne;
 And his happiness and pride,
 His delightful lovely bride.
 Hymen, Hymen, Ho!

PEISTHETAIRUS

Birds of ocean and of air,
 Hither in a troop repair,
 To the royal ceremony,
 20 Our triumphant matrimony!
 Come for us to feast and feed ye!
 Come to revel, dance, and sing! —
 Lovely creature! Let me lead ye Hand in hand, and wing to wing.

LATIN

SENECA

(4 B.C.—65 A.D.)

Lucius Annæus Seneca, son of Marcus Annæus Seneca the rhetorician, was born in Cordova, Spain, about the beginning of the Christian era. He was best known to the Roman world as a philosopher and politician. He came to Rome early in life and readily won recognition as an orator. Suspected of intimacy with Julia, niece of Claudius, he was banished to Corsica. After eight years he was recalled, A.D. 59, and made the tutor of the young Nero. When Nero became emperor, Seneca was retained as one of his chief advisers. At length Nero became impatient of his former tutor's restraint upon his vicious practices and seized upon the pretext of the conspiracy of Piso to sentence him to death.

Nine tragedies are ascribed to Seneca: Hercules Furens, Thyestes, Phænissa, Phædra, Edipus, Hecuba, Medea, Agamemnon, and Hercules Elæus. These tragedies, as the titles indicate, dealt with subjects taken from Greek tradition, many of which had been treated by the great masters of the Golden Age of Greece. Seneca's tragedies are inferior dramatically to those of the Greeks. •They are marred by over-emphasis on intrigue, by the accentuation of the horrible and sensational, and by artificiality of diction and redundancy of ornament. In spite of all this, however, they have their merits. They are excellent in finish and technique and contain many fine passages. The apothegms and philosophical reflections drawn from the writer's interpretation of Stoic doctrines, although an obstacle to dramatic effectiveness, gave to the world a large number of succinct and very quotable pieces of wisdom. Perhaps their greatest importance lies in the fact that they represent an important step in the development of drama as a form. The action falls into about five well-defined divisions — later to become "acts." The chorus recedes into a mere decoration, preparing the way for the transfer of its functions to a person of the play.

It is possible that Seneca's tragedies were not intended for stage production, but rather for recitation. It is difficult to see, however, why the dramatists of the Renaissance should have been so attracted by non-stage plays. Seneca's influence upon the drama of the Renaissance was powerful, especially in France and England. In France his influence is apparent in the work of the early dramatists Jodelle, Garnier, and Hardy. In England Gorboduc, Ferrex and Porrex, and The Misfortunes of Arthur were direct imitations of Seneca. His indirect influence is felt in many later plays, perhaps the most noteworthy being Kyd's Spanish Tragedy. In fact, we may safely say that most Elizabethan dramatists looked upon him as the greatest of all writers of tragedy, and that he is to a very large degree responsible for the melodramatic element in Elizabethan tragedy. He has been called "the most modern of the ancients."

The romantic story of the strange barbarian sorceress, Medea, which we give here, had been treated by Euripides in his tragedy Medea, and by the Greek Apollonius of Rhodes in the Argonautica, part of which is printed in this volume. Probably the most famous treatment in modern times is that of the French neo-classicist Corneille. The general theme is utilized also by Lessing in his Miss Sara Sampson. The background of the story as used by Seneca is as follows: When Jason came to Colchis in search of the Golden Fleece, Medea, daughter of the king of Colchis, helped him to get possession of it (see the notes on the Argonautica). She then accompanied Jason in his flight. They were pursued by Absyrtus, Medea's brother. Medea, however, lured him into an interview and slew him. Jason took Medea back to Colchis with him as his wife. When they reached Jason's home, they found that Pelias had killed Æson, Jason's father, and Jason asked Medea to contrive revenge. Accordingly Medea persuaded the daughters of Pelias to cut him up and boil him in a cauldron in order to restore him to youth and vigor. Needless to say, the experiment failed. His son Acastus expelled Jason and Medea from the kingdom. They went to Corinth, where Jason attempted to rehabilitate himself by arranging a marriage with Creusa, daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. The rest is set forth in the play.

To the modern reader the attempts of Jason to justify his desertion of Medea must seem weak. The indignation of an ancient audience, however, would be softened somewhat by the knowledge that Medea, being a foreigner, had no legal status in Greece, and therefore was not to be regarded as a legitimate wife, whatever her moral claims might be; and that Jason, like Admetus who allowed his wife to die in his stead (Cf. Euripides' Alcestis), was hampered by his obligations as a king — obligations which, in primitive society, could not be ignored.

This selection is from The Tragedies of Seneca, rendered into English verse by Ella Isabel Harris, London, Oxford University Press, 1904.

MEDEA

CHARACTERS OF THE PLAY

MEDEA, daughter of Æetes, King of Colchis.

JASON, Chief of the Argonauts; nephew of Pelias, King of Iolcos in Thessaly.

CREON, ruler of Corinth.

ÆGEUS, King of Athens.

NURSE of Medea.

TWO CHILDREN of Jason and Medea.

ATTENDANT on the Children.

A MESSENGER.

CHORUS of Corinthian women, with their LEADER, soldiers and attendants.

The scene is laid in Corinth, and represents the front of Medea's house in Corinth. A road to the right leads toward the royal castle, one on the left to the harbor.

ACT I

SCENE I

MEDEA. (alone) Ye gods of marriage; 5
 Lucina,¹ guardian of the genial bed;
 Pallas,² who taught the tamer of the seas
 To steer the Argo³; stormy ocean's lord;
 Titan,⁴ dividing bright day to the world;
 And thou three-formed Hecate,⁵ who dost 10
 shed Thy conscious splendor on the hidden rites!
 Ye by whom Jason plighted me his troth;
 And ye Medea rather should invoke: 15
 Chaos of night eternal; realm opposed
 To the celestial powers; abandoned souls;
 King of the dusky realm; Persephone,⁶
 By better faith betrayed; you I invoke,
 But with no happy voice. Approach, ap- 20
 proach,
 Avenging goddesses with snaky hair,⁷ Holding in blood-stained hands your sulphurous torch!
 Come now as horrible as when of yore 25
 Ye stood beside my marriage-bed; bring
 death
 To the new bride, and to the royal seed,
 And Creon; worse for Jason I would ask — Life! Let him roam in fear through un- 30 known lands,
 An exile, hated, poor, without a home;
 A guest now too well known, let him, in
 vain,
 Seek alien doors, and long for me, his wife! 35
 And, yet a last revenge, let him beget Sons like their father, daughters like their mother!
 'Tis done; revenge is even now brought
 forth — 40
 I have borne sons to Jason. I complain
 Vainly, and cry aloud with useless words;

Why do I not attack mine enemies?
 I will strike down the torches from their
 hands,
 The light from heaven. Does the sun see
 this,
 The author of our race, and still give light?
 And, sitting in his chariot, does he still Run through the accustomed spaces of the sky,
 Nor turn again to seek his rising place,
 And measure back the day? Give me the reins;
 Father,⁸ let me in thy paternal car
 Be borne aloft the winds, and let me curb 15 With glowing bridle those thy fiery steeds!
 Burn Corinth; let the parted seas be joined!
 This still remains — for me to carry up
 The marriage torches to the bridal room,
 And, after sacrificial prayers, to slay
 The victims on their altars. Seek, my soul —
 If thou still livest, or if aught endures
 Of ancient vigor — seek to find revenge 25 Through thine own bowels; throw off woman's fears,
 Intrench thyself in snowy Caucasus.
 All impious deeds Phasis⁹ or Pontus⁹ saw, Corinth shall see. Evils unknown and wild,
 Hideous, frightful both to earth and
 heaven,
 Disturb my soul, — wounds, and the scattered corpse,
 35 And murder. I remember gentle deeds,
 A maid did these; let heavier anguish
 come,
 Since sterner crimes befit me now, a wife!
 Gird thee with wrath, prepare thine ut-40 most rage,
 That fame of thy divorce may spread as

³ The ship in which Jason sailed to seek the Golden Fleece. Cf. the story of the Argonauts by Apollonius Rhodius, p. 40.

⁴ Here the Sun.

⁵ Goddess of moon and night, of childbirth, and of the underworld and magic. Her threefold function caused her to be represented in triple form.

⁶ Persephone, or Proserpine. She was daughter of Zeus and Demeter and was carried off to Hades by Pluto.

⁷ The furies.

⁸ Medea was granddaughter of Phœbus, the Sun.

⁹ The Phasis was a river of Colchis at the mouth of which the Argonauts landed. Pontus Euxinus was the name of the Black Sea.

As of thy marriage! Make no long delay.
How dost thou leave thy husband? As thou cam'st.
Homes crime built up, by crime must be dissolved.

SCENE II

Enter CHORUS of Corinthian women, singing the marriage song of Jason and Creusa.

CHORUS. Be present at the royal marriage feast,
Ye gods who sway the scepter of the deep,
And ye who hold dominion in the heavens;
With the glad people come, ye smiling gods!
First to the scepter-bearing thunderers
The white-backed bull shall stoop his lofty head;
The snowy heifer, knowing not the yoke, 20
Is due to fair Lucina; and to her
Who stays the bloody hand of Mars, and gives
To warring nations peace, who in her horn
Holds plenty, sacrifice a victim mild. 25
Thou who at lawful bridals dost preside,
Scattering darkness with thy happy torch,
Come hither with slow step, dizzy with wine,
Binding thy temples with a rosy crown. 30
Thou star that bringest in the day and night,
Slow-rising on the lover, ardently
For thy clear shining maids and matrons long.
In comeliness the virgin bride excels
The Athenian women and the strong-limbed maids
Of Sparta's unwall'd town, who on the top
Of high Taygetus¹ try youthful sports; 40
Or those who in the clear Æonian stream,²
Or in Alpheus'³ sacred waters bathe.
The child of the wild thunder,⁴ he who tames

And fits the yoke to tigers, is less fair
Than the Aæonian prince. The glorious god
Who moves the tripod, Dian's brother
5 mild⁵;
The skillful boxer Pollux⁶; Castor,⁶ too,
Must yield the palm to Jason. O ye gods
Who dwell in heaven, ever may the bride
Surpass all women, he excel all men!
10 Before her beauty in the women's choir
The beauty of the other maids grows dim;
So with the sunrise pales the light of stars,
So when the moon with brightness not her own 15 Fills out her crescent horns, the Pleiads fade.
Her cheeks blush like white cloth 'neath
Tyrian dyes,
Or as the shepherd sees the light of stars
Grow rosy with the dawn. O happy one,
Accustomed once to clasp unwillingly
A wife unloved and reckless, snatched
away
From that dread Colchian marriage, take 25 thy bride,
The Æolian virgin — 'tis her father's will.
Bright offspring of the thyrsus-bearing god,⁷
The time has come to light the torch of 30 pine;
With fingers dripping wine flash out the fires,
Sound the gay music of the marriage song,
Let the crowd pass their jests; 'tis only she 35 Who fled her home to wed a stranger guest Need steal away into the silent dark.

ACT II

SCENE I

MEDEA, NURSE.

MEDEA. Alas, the wedding chorus
strikes my ears;

² The fountain of Aganippe in Æonia, a part of Boeotia. It was said that this spring was frequented by the Muses.

³ The chief river of Peloponnesus.

⁴ Apollo.

⁵ Bacchus.
⁶ Brothers who were known also as the Dioscuri, Zeus-born. Castor was famous for his skill in taming and managing horses, Pollux for his boxing. They were companions of Jason in the quest for the Golden Fleece.

⁷ Bacchus. The thyrsus was a staff entwined with ivy and surmounted by a pine cone. It was usually waved in the air by the Mænads, the women attendants of Bacchus.

Woe, woe to me! I could not hitherto Believe — can hardly yet believe such wrong.

And this is Jason's deed? Of father, home,
And kingdom reft, can he desert me now, Alone and in a foreign land? Can he Despise my worth who saw the flames and seas

By my art conquered? thinks, perchance, all crime

Exhausted! Tossed by every wave of doubt,

I am distracted, seeking some revenge.

Had he a brother! Ah, he has a bride;

Through her be thrust the steel! Is this 15 enough?

If Grecian or barbarian cities know

Crime that this hand knows not, that crime be done!

Thy sins return to mind exhorting thee:

The stolen treasure of a kingdom, too;

Thy little comrade, wicked maid, destroyed,

Torn limb from limb and scattered on the sea

An offering to his father; Pelias old

Killed in the boiling cauldron. I have shed Blood basely, but not yet, not yet have shown

The power of wrath, unhappy love did all. 30

Had Jason any choice, by foreign law

And foreign power constrained? He should have bared

His breast to feel the sword. O bitter
grief,

Speak milder, milder words. Let Jason live;

Mine as he was, if this be possible,

But, if not mine, still let him live secure,

To spare me still the memory of my gift! 40

The fault is Creon's; he abuses power

To annul our marriage, sever strongest ties,

And tear the children from their mother's
breast;

Let Creon pay the penalty he owes.

I'll heap his home in ashes, the dark flame Shall reach Malea's dreaded cape, where ships

Find passage only after long delay.

NURSE. Be silent, I implore thee, hide thy pain

Deep in thy bosom. He who silently

Bears grievous wounds, with patience, and a mind

Unshaken, may find vengeance. Hidden
wrath

5 Finds strength, when open hatred loses hope

Of vengeance.

MEDEA. Light is grief that hides itself,
And can take counsel. Great wrongs lie

10 not hid.

I am resolved on action.

NURSE. Foster-child,

Restrain thy fury; hardly art thou safe

Though silent.

MEDEA. Fortune tramples on the meek,
But fears the brave.

NURSE. When courage is in place

It wins approval.

MEDEA. It can never be 20 That courage should be out of place.

NURSE. To thee,

In thy misfortune, hope points out no way.

MEDEA. The man who cannot hope should naught despair.

25 NURSE. Colchis is far away, thy husband lost;

Of all thy riches nothing now remains.

MEDEA. Medea now remains! Land, sea, sword, fire,

30 God and the thunderbolt, are found in me.

NURSE. The king is to be feared.

MEDEA. I claim a king

For father.

NURSE. Hast thou then no fear of arms?

35 MEDEA. I, who saw warriors spring from earth?

NURSE.

Thou'lt die!

MEDEA. I wish it.

NURSE. Flee!

MEDEA. Nay, I repent of flight.

NURSE. Thou art a mother.

MEDEA. And thou seest by whom.

NURSE. Wilt thou not fly?

MEDEA. I fly, but first revenge.

45 NURSE. Vengeance may follow thee.

MEDEA. I may, perchance,

Find means to hinder it.

NURSE. Restrain thyself

And cease to threaten madly; it is well

50 That thou adjust thyself to fortune's change.

MEDEA. My riches, not my spirit, fortune takes.

The hinge creaks, — who is this? Creon
himself,
Swelling with Grecian pride.

SCENE II

CREON with Attendants, MEDEA.

CREON. What, is Medea of the hated
race
Of Colchian Æetes not yet gone?
Still she is plotting evil; well I know
Her guile, and well I know her cruel hand.
Whom does she spare, or whom let rest secure?
Verily I had thought to cut her off
With the swift sword, but Jason's prayers availed
To spare her life. She may go forth un-harm'd
If she will set our city free from fear.
Threatening and fierce, she seeks to speak with us;
Attendants, keep her off, bid her be still,
And let her learn at last, a king's commands
Must be obeyed. Go, haste, and take her
hence.

MEDEA. What fault is punished by my banishment?

CREON. A woman, innocent, doth ask, 30
'What fault?'

MEDEA. If thou wilt judge, examine;
or if king,
Command.

CREON. Unjust or just, a king must be 35
Obeyed.

MEDEA. An unjust king not long endures.

CREON. Go! 'Plain to Colchis!

MEDEA. Willingly I go; 40
Let him who brought me hither take me
hence.

CREON. Thy words come late, my edict has gone forth.

MEDEA. The man who judges, one 45 side still unheard,
Were hardly a just judge, though he judge justly.

CREON. Pelias for listening to thee died,
but speak,

Let me give time to hear so fair a plea.

MEDEA. How hard it is to calm a wrathful soul,

How he who takes the scepter in proud
5 hands

Deems his own will sufficient, I have learned;

Have learned it in my father's royal house.
For though the sport of fortune, suppliant,

10 Banished, alone, forsaken, on all sides
Distressed, my father was a noble king.

I am descended from the glorious sun.

What lands the Phasis in its winding course Bathes, or the Euxine touches where the

15 sea
Is freshened by the water from the lakes,
Or where armed maiden cohorts try their skill

Beside Thermodon,¹ all these lands are

20 held Within my father's kingdom, where I dwelt

Noble and favored, and with princely
power.

25 He, whom kings seek, sought then to wed
with me.

Swift, fickle fortune cast me headlong
forth,

And gave me exile. Put thy trust in thrones —

Such trust as thou mayst put in what light chance

Flings here and there at will! Kings have one power,

A matchless honor time can never take:
To help the wretched, and to him who asks

To give a safe retreat. This I have brought

From Colchis, this at least I still can claim:

I saved the flower of Grecian chivalry,
Achaian chiefs, the offspring of the gods;

It is to me they owe their Orpheus Whose singing melted rocks and drew the 40 trees;

Castor and Pollux are my twofold gift;

Boreas' sons,² and Lynceus³ whose sharp
eye

Could pierce beyond the Euxine, are my 50 gift,

¹ The river on the borders of which lived the Amazons.

² Zetes and Calais, members of the expedition of the Argonauts.

³ Another of the Argonauts, famous for his keen sight.

And all the Argonauts. Of one alone,
The chief of chiefs, I do not speak; for
him

Thou owest me naught; those have I saved for thee,

This one is mine. Rehearse, now, all my crime;

Accuse me; I confess; this is my fault —
I saved the Argo! Had I heard the voice
Of maiden modesty or filial love,
Greece and her leaders had regretted it,
And he, thy son-in-law, had fallen first
A victim to the fire-belching bull.

Let fortune trample on me as she will,
My hand has succored princes, I am glad!
Thou hast the recompense for all my crimes.

Condemn me, but give back the cause of crime.

Creon, I own my guilt — guilt known to 20
thee

When first a suppliant I touched thy knees,
And asked with outstretched hands protecting aid.

Again I ask a refuge, some poor spot 25
For misery to hide in; grant a place
Withdrawn, a safe asylum in thy realm,
If I must leave the city.

CREON. I am no prince who rules with cruel sway,

Or tramples on the wretched with proud
foot.

Have I not shown this true by choosing
him

To be my son-in-law who is a man 35
Exiled; without resource, in fear of foes?

One whom Acastus, king of Thessaly,
Seeks to destroy, that so he may avenge
A father weak with age, bowed down with years,

Whose limbs were torn asunder? That foul crime

His pious sisters impiously dared,
Tempted by thee; if thou wilt go away,
Jason can then maintain his innocence; 45
No guiltless blood has stained him, and his hands

Touched not the sword, are yet unstained
by thee.

Foul instigator of all evil deeds,
With woman's wantonness in daring aught,
And man's courageous heart — and void of
shame,

Go, purge our kingdom; take thy deadly herbs,

Free us from fear; dwelling in other lands
Afar, invoke the gods.

5 MEDEA. Thou bidst me go?
Give back the ship and comrade of my
flight.

Why bid me go alone? Not so I came.
If thou fear war, both should go forth, nor choice 10

Be made between two equally at fault:
That old man fell for Jason's sake; im-pute

To Jason flight, rapine, a brother slain,
And a deserted father; not all mine 15
The crimes to which a husband tempted
me;

'Tis true I sinned, but never for myself.
CREON. Thou shouldst be gone, why waste the time with words?

MEDEA. I go, but going make one last request:

Let not a mother's guilt drag down her
sons.

25 CREON. Go, as a father I will succor
them,

And with a father's care.

MEDEA. By future hopes,
By the king's happy marriage, by the
strength 30

Of thrones, which fickle fortune sometimes shakes,

I pray thee grant the exile some delay
That she, perchance about to die, may press 35

A last kiss on her children's lips.

CREON. Thou seekst
Time to commit new crime.

MEDEA. In so brief time
40 What crime were possible?

CREON. No time too short
For him who would do ill.

MEDEA. Dost thou deny
To misery short space for tears?

45 CREON. Deep dread Warns me against thy prayer; yet I will grant

One day in which thou mayst prepare for flight.

50 MEDEA. Too great the favor! Of the time allowed,

Something withdraw. I would depart in
haste.

CREON. Before the coming day is ushered in
By Phœbus, leave the city or thou diest.
The bridal calls me, and I go to pay
My vows to Hymen.

SCENE III

CHORUS. He rashly ventured who was first to make
In his frail boat a pathway through the deep;
Who saw his native land behind him fade
In distance blue; who to the raging winds Trusted his life, his slender keel between The paths of life and death. Our fathers dwelt
In an unspotted age, and on the shore
Where each was born he lived in quiet-
ness,
Grew old upon his father's farm content;
With little rich, he knew no other wealth Than his own land afforded. None knew
yet
The changing constellations, nor could use
As guides the stars that paint the ether;
none
Had learned to shun the rainy Hyades¹;
None had as yet to Goat¹, or Northern Wain¹
That follows slow by old Boötes² driven,
Or Boreas, or Zephyr, given names.
Rash Tiphys was the first to tempt the deep
With spreading canvas; for the winds to write
New laws; to furl the sail; or spread it wide
When sailors longed to fly before the gale,
And the red topsail fluttered in the breeze.
The world so wisely severed by the seas
The pine of Thessaly united, bade
The ocean suffer scourgings at our hands,
And distant waters bring us unknown
fears.
The ill-starred ship paid heavy penalty

When the two cliffs, the gateway of the
sea,
Moved as though smitten by the thunder-
bolt,
5 And the imprisoned waters smote the stars.
Bold Tiphys paled, and from his trembling
hand
Let fall the rudder; Orpheus' music died,
His lyre untouched; The Argo lost her voice.
10 When, belted by her girdle of wild dogs,
The maid of the Sicilian straits³ gave voice
From all her mouths, who feared not at her bark?
15 Who did not tremble at the witching song
With which the Sirens charmed the Ausonian sea?
The Thracian Orpheus' lyre had almost forced 20 Those hinderers of ships to follow him!
What was the journey's prize? The golden fleece,
Medea, fiercer than the raging flood, —
Worthy reward for those first mariners!
The sea forgets its former wrath; submits
To the new laws; and not alone the ship Minerva builded, manned by sons of kings,
30 Finds rowers; other ships may sail the deep.
Old metes are moved, new city walls spring
up
On distant soil, and nothing now remains
As it has been in the much-traveled world.
The cold Araxes' stream the Indian drinks;
The Persian quaffs the Rhine; a time shall
come 40 With the slow years, when ocean shall strike off
The chains from earth, and a great world shall then
Lie opened; Tiphys shall win other lands — 45 Another Tiphys-Thule⁴ cease to be Earth's utmost bound.

² The constellation called the Wagoner.

³ Scylla and Charybdis, according to the myth, were two monsters in the Straits of Messina, between Italy and Sicily. Scylla dwelt in a cave high up on a rock. She barked like a dog and had six heads. She was originally a beautiful maiden. Charybdis lived under a fig tree on a rock on the opposite side, and three times each day swallowed down the waters of the sea.

⁴ An island in the north part of the North Sea, regarded by the ancients as the northernmost point of the earth.

ACT III

SCENE I

MEDEA, NURSE.

NURSE. Stay, foster-child, why fly so swiftly hence?

Restrain thy wrath! curb thy impetuous haste!

As a Bacchante,¹ frantic with the god And filled with rage divine, uncertain walks

The top of snowy Pindus or the peak Of Nysa, so Medea wildly goes Hither and thither; on her face the mark Of frenzied rage, her visage flushed, her breast

Shaken by sobs. She cries aloud, her eyes Are drowned in scalding tears; again she laughs;

All passions surge within her angry heart. Where will she fling the burden of her soul?

She hesitates, she threatens, storms, complains,

Where falls her vengeance? where will break this wave

Of fury? Passion overflows! she plans No easy crime, no ordinary deed.

Herself she will surpass; I mark old signs Of raging; something terrible she plans, Some deed inhuman, devilish, and wild. Ye gods, avert the horrors I foresee!

MEDEA. Wretch, dost thou seek how far to show thy hate?

Imitate love! And must I then endure Without revenge the royal marriage-torch?

Shall this day prove unfruitful, sought and gained

Only by earnest effort? While the earth Hangs free within the heavens; while the vault

Of heaven sweeps round the earth with changeless change;

While the sands lie unnumbered; while the day

Follows the sun, the night brings up the stars,

Arcturus never wet in ocean's wave

Rolls round the pole; while rivers seaward flow,

My hate shall never cease to seek revenge. Did ever fierceness of a ravaging beast;

5 Or Scylla or Charybdis sucking down The waters of the wild Ausonian

And the Sicilian seas; or Ætna fierce, That holds imprisoned great Enceladus²

Breathing forth flame, so glow as I with threats?

10 Not the swift rivers, nor the storm-tossed sea,

Nor wind-blown ocean, nor the force of flame

15 By storm-wind fanned, can imitate my wrath.

I will o'erthrow and bring to naught the world!

Did Jason fear the king? Thessalian war? True love fears naught. Or was he forced to yield,

And gave consent unwillingly? But still He might have sought his wife for one farewell.

25 This too he feared to do. He might have gained

From Creon some delay of banishment. One day is granted for my two sons' sake!

I do not make complaint of too short time, 30 It is enough for much; this day shall see

What none shall ever hide. I will attack The very gods, and shake the universe!

NURSE. Lady, thy spirit so disturbed by ills

35 Restrain, and let thy storm-tossed soul find rest.

MEDEA. Rest I can never find until I see

All dragged with me to ruin; all shall fall When I do; — so to share one's woe is joy.

NURSE. Think what thou hast to fear if thou persist;

No one can safely fight with princely power.

SCENE II

The Nurse withdraws; enter JASON.

50 JASON. The lot is ever hard; bitter is fate,

¹ A female celebrant of the festival of Bacchus, a festival that was characterized by religious frenzy.

² A giant who made war upon the gods. Zeus buried him under Mount Ætna.

Equally bitter if it slay or spare;
God gives us remedies worse than our ills.
Would I keep faith with her I deem my wife

I must expect to die; would I shun death
I must forswear myself. Not fear of death
Has conquered honor, but love full of fear Knowing the father's death involves the sons.

O holy Justice, if thou dwell in heaven, 10
I call on thee to witness that the sons Vanquish their father! Say the mother's love

Is fierce and spurns the yoke, she still will deem

Her children of more worth than marriage joys.

I fain would go to her with prayers, and lo,
She starts at sight of me, her look grows
wild,

Hatred she shows and grief.

MEDEA.

Jason, I flee!

I flee, it is not new to change my home,
The cause of banishment alone is new;
I have been exiled hitherto for thee.
I go, as thou compellst me, from thy home,
But whither shall I go? Shall I, perhaps, Seek Phasis, Colchis, and my father's realm

Whose soil is watered by a brother's blood? 30

What land dost thou command me seek?
what sea?

The Euxine's jaws through which I led that band

Of noble princes when I followed thee, 35
Adulterer, through the Symplegades?

Little Iolchos? Tempe? Thessaly?

Whatever way I opened up for thee
I closed against myself. Where shall I go?

Thou drivest into exile, but hast given 40
No place of banishment. I will go hence.

The king, Creusa's father, bids me go,

And I will do his bidding. Heap on me

Most dreadful punishment, it is my due.

With cruel penalties let the king's wrath 45

Pursue thy mistress, load my hands with chains,

And in a dungeon of eternal night

Imprison me — 'tis less than I deserve!

Ungrateful one, recall the fiery bull; 50

The earth-born soldiers, who at my command

Slew one another; and the longed-for spoils

Of Phrixus' ram,¹ whose watchful guardian,

5 The sleepless dragon, at my bidding slept;
The brother slain; the many, many crimes
In one crime gathered. Think how, led by
me,

By me deceived, that old man's daughters dared

To slay their aged father, dead for aye!

By thy hearth's safety, by thy children's weal,

By the slain dragon, by these blood-stained
15 hands

I never spared from doing aught for thee,
By thy past fears, and by the sea and sky

Witnesses of our marriage, pity me!

Happy thyself, make me some recompense!

20 Of all the ravished gold the Scythians
brought

From far, as far as India's burning plains, Wealth our wide palace hardly could contain,

25 So that we hung our groves with gold, I took

Nothing. My brother only bore I thence,

And him for thee I sacrificed. I left

My country, father, brother, maiden

shame: 30

This was my marriage portion; give her
own

To her who goes an exile.

JASON. When angry Creon thought to have thee slain, 35

Urged by my prayers, he gave thee banishment.

MEDEA. I looked for a reward; the gift I see

40 Is exile.

JASON. While thou mayst fly, fly in
haste!

The wrath of kings is ever hard to bear.

MEDEA. Thou giv'st me such advice because thou lov'st

Creusa; wouldst divorce a hated wife!

JASON. And does Medea taunt me with my loves?

MEDEA. More — treacheries and murders. 50

JASON. Canst thou charge
Such sins to me?

- MEDEA. All I have ever done.
 JASON. It only needs that I should share the guilt
 Of these thy crimes!
- MEDEA. Thine are they, thine alone; He is the criminal who reaps the fruit.
 Though all should brand thy wife with infamy,
 Thou shouldst defend and call her innocent:
 She who has sinned for thee, toward thee hold pure.
- JASON. To me my life is an unwelcome gift
 Of which I am ashamed.
- MEDEA. Who is ashamed
 To owe his life to me can lay it down.
- JASON. For thy sons' sake control thy fiery heart.
- MEDEA. I will have none of them, I cast them off, Abjure them; shall Creusa to my sons
 Give brothers?
- JASON. To an exile's wretched sons
 A mighty queen will give them.
- MEDEA. Never come
 That evil day that mingles a great race
 With race unworthy, — Phœbus' glorious sons
 With sons of Sisyphus.¹
- JASON. What, cruel one,
 Wouldst thou drag both to banishment?
 Away!
- MEDEA. Creon has heard my prayer.
- JASON. What can I do?
- MEDEA. For me? Some crime perhaps.
- JASON. Two wrathful kings
 I fear.
- MEDEA. Medea's wrath is still more fierce!
 Let us essay our power, the victor's prize
 Be Jason.
- JASON. Passion-weary, I submit;
 Thou too shouldst fear a lot so often tried.
- MEDEA. Fortune has ever served me faithfully.
- JASON. Acastus comes.
- MEDEA. Creon's a nearer foe,
 Flee thou from both. Medea does not ask
- That thou shouldst arm thyself against the king,
 Or soil thy hands with murder of thy kin;
 Flee with me innocent.
- JASON. Who will oppose
 If double war ensue, and the two kings
 Join forces?
- MEDEA. Add to them the Colchian troops
 And King Æëtes, Scythian hosts and Greeks, Medea conquers all!
- JASON. I greatly fear
 A scepter's power.
- MEDEA. Do not covet it.
- JASON. We must cut short our converse, lest it breed Suspicion.
- MEDEA. Now from high Olympus send Thy thunder, Jupiter; stretch forth thy hand,
 Prepare thy lightning, from the riven clouds
 Make the world tremble, nor with careful hand
 Spare him or me; whichever of us dies
 Dies guilty; thy avenging thunderbolt Cannot mistake the victim.
- JASON. Try to speak
 More sanely; calm thyself. If aught can aid Thy flight from Creon's house, thou needst but ask.
- MEDEA. My soul is strong enough, and wont to scorn
 The wealth of kings; this boon alone I crave,
 To take my children with me when I go;
 Into their bosoms I would shed my tears,
 New sons are thine.
- JASON. Would I might grant thy prayer;
 Paternal love forbids me, Creon's self
 Could not compel me to it. They alone
 Lighten the sorrow of a grief-parched soul.
- For them I live, I sooner would resign Breath, members, light.
- MEDEA. (aside) 'Tis well! He loves his sons,
 Flee then, the place where he may feel a wound!

¹ A king of Corinth, who was punished in the lower world, where he had to roll up hill a huge stone, which as soon as it reached the top always rolled down again.

(To JASON) Before I go, thou wilt, at least, permit

That I should give my sons a last farewell,
A last embrace? But one thing more I
ask:

If in my grief I've poured forth threatening
words,

Retain them not in mind; let memory hold
Only my softer speech, my words of wrath Obliterate.

JASON. I have erased them all
From my remembrance. I would counsel
thee

Be calm, act gently; calmness quiets pain.

(Exit JASON.)

SCENE III

MEDEA, NURSE.

MEDEA. He's gone! And can it be he leaves me so,

Forgetting me and all my guilt? Forgot?
Nay, never shall Medea be forgot!

Up! Act! Call all thy power to aid thee
now;

This fruit of crime is thine, to shun no
crime!

Deceit is useless, so they fear my guile.
Strike where they do not dream thou canst be feared.

Medea, haste, be bold to undertake
The possible — yea, that which is not so!
Thou, faithful nurse, companion of my griefs

And varying fortunes, aid my wretched plans.

I have a robe, gift of the heavenly powers,
An ornament of a king's palace, given
By Phoebus to my father as a pledge Of sonship; and a necklace of wrought
gold;

And a bright diadem, inlaid with gems,
With which they used to bind my hair.

These gifts,

Endued with poison by my magic arts,
My sons shall carry for me to the bride.
Pay vows to Hecate, bring the sacrifice,
Set up the altars. Let the mounting flame
Envelop all the house.

SCENE IV

CHORUS. Fear not the power of flame,
nor swelling gale,

5 Nor hurtling dart, nor cloudy wind that brings

The winter storms; fear not when Danube sweeps

10 Unchecked between his widely severed shores,

Nor when the Rhone hastes seaward, and the sun

Has broken up the snow upon the hills,
And Hæmus¹ flows in rivers.

15 A wife deserted, loving while she hates,
Fear greatly; blindly burns her anger's
flame,

She cares not to be ruled, nor bears the curb,

20 Nor fears to die; she courts the hostile
swords.

Ye gods, we ask your grace divine for him
Who safely crossed the seas; the ocean's
lord

25 Is angry for his conquered kingdom's sake;
Spare Jason, we entreat!

Th' impetuous youth² who dared to drive the car

Of Phœbus, keeping not the wonted course,
30 Died in the heavenly fires himself had lit.

Few are the evils of the well-known way;
Seek the old paths your fathers safely trod,
The sacred federations of the world
Keep still inviolate.

35 The men who dipped the oars of that brave
ship;

Who plundered of their shade the sacred groves

Of Pelion; passed between the unstable cliffs;

Endured so many hardships on the deep;
And cast their anchor on a savage coast,

Passing again with ravished foreign gold,
Atoned with fearful death for dire wrong

45 To Ocean's sacred laws.

The angry deep demanded punishment:

To an unskilful pilot Tiphys gave

The rudder. On a foreign coast he fell,

Far from his father's kingdom, and he lies

² Phaëton, son of Phœbus. He was granted by his father the privilege of driving the chariot of the Sun for one day. Unable to control the horses, he swooped too near the earth and caused great destruction.

With nameless shades, under a lowly tomb.
 Becalmed in her still harbor Aulis held
 Th' impatient ships, remembering in wrath
 The king that she lost thence.
 Sweet voiced Camena's son,¹ who touched 5 his lyre
 So sweetly that the floods stood still, the
 winds
 Were silent, and the birds forgot to sing,
 And forests followed him, on Thracian 10
 fields
 Lies dead, his head borne down by Hebrus' stream.²
 He touched again the Styx³ and Tartarus,
 But not again returns.
 Alcides⁴ overthrew the north wind's sons;
 He slew that son⁵ of Neptune who could
 take Unnumbered forms; but after he had
 made
 Peace over the land and sea, and opened wide
 The realm of Dis,⁶ lying on Æta's top⁷
 He gave his body to the cruel fire, Destroyed by his wife's gift — the fatal 25 robe
 Poisoned with Centaur's blood.
 Ancæus⁸ fell a victim to the boar
 Of Calydonia; Meleager⁹ slew
 His mother's brother, perished by the hand 30
 Of his own mother. They have merited Their lot, but what the crime that he atoned
 Whom great Alcides sought so long in
 vain,

The tender Hylas¹⁰ drawn beneath safe
 waves?
 Go now, brave soldiers, boldly plow the
 main,
 But fear the gentle streams.
 Idmon¹¹ the serpents buried in the sands
 Of Libya, though he knew the future well.
 Mopsus,¹² to others true, false to himself,
 Fell far from Thebes; and, if the seer spoke
 true, Peleus¹³ must wander exiled from his
 realm;
 And Nauplius,¹⁴ seeking injury to the Greeks
 15 By his deceitful beacon fires, shall fall
 Into the ocean; Palamides, too,
 Shall suffer, dying for his father's sin.
 Oileus,¹⁵ smitten by the thunderbolt,
 Shall perish on the sea; Admetus' wife¹⁶
 20 To save her husband's life shall give her
 own.
 He who commanded that the golden spoil
 Be carried in the ships had traveled far,
 But, plunged in seething cauldron, Pelias died
 In narrow limits. 'Tis enough, ye gods;
 Ye have avenged the sea!

ACT IV

SCENE I

NURSE. I shrink with horror! Ruin threatens us!

35 How terribly her wrath inflames itself!

¹ Orpheus.

² The stream into which were cast the lyre and head of Orpheus.

³ The river in Hades by which even the gods feared to swear.

⁴ Hercules.

⁵ Hades; Dis was the Roman name of Pluto.

⁶ Hercules ascended his funeral pile on top of Mt. Æta, which is between Thessaly and Actolia.

⁷ One of the Argonauts, who was killed in an attempt to free the land of Calydon from the ravages of a monstrous boar.

⁹ A beautiful youth, who accompanied Hercules on the expedition of the Argonauts. He went on shore at Mysia to get water, and was drawn down into the sea by the naiads because of his beauty.

¹⁰ An Argonaut who joined the expedition knowing that he would meet his death.

¹¹ Another of the Argonauts and one of the Calydonian hunters.

¹² Probably most famous as the father of Achilles. He was a hero on his own account, however, and a member of the Argonautic expedition. The exile referred to was his punishment for the murder of his step-brother, Phocus.

¹³ A king of Euboea, who, in revenge for the death of his son Palamides, lured the returning Greeks upon the rocks by false signal fires.

¹⁴ Father of Ajax.

¹⁵ Alcestis, who was made the heroine of a play by Euripides.

Her former force awakes, thus I have seen
Medea raging and attacking God, Compelling heaven. Greater crime than
then

She now prepares. No sooner had she sought

Wildly her fatal shrine than she put forth
Her every power, and what before she feared

She does; lets loose all ills, mysterious arts. 10
With her left hand the dismal sacrifice
Preparing, she invokes whatever ills
The Libyan sands with their fierce heat create,

Or frost-bound Taurus¹ with perpetual 15
snow

Encompasses. Drawn by her magic spell,
Come from their desert holes a scaly host.
The serpent drags his heavy length along,
Darts his forked tongue, and seeks his des- 20
tined prey.

Hearing her incantation, he draws back
And knots his swelling body coiling it. —
'They are but feeble poisons earth brings
forth,

And harmless darts,' she says, 'heaven's ills I seek.

Now is the time for deeper sorcery.

The dragon like a torrent shall descend,

Whose mighty folds the Great and Lesser 30
Bear

Know well (the Great Bear o'er the Phryg-ians shines,

The Less o'er Tyre); Ophiuchus² shall loose

His grasp, and poison flow. Come at my call,

Python,³ who dared to fight twin dei-ties.

The Hydra⁴ once cut off by Hercules, 40 Accustomed from its wounds to gain fresh
strength,

Shall come. Thou ever watchful Colchian
one,⁵

Be present with the rest — thou, who first 45
slept

Lulled by my incantations.' When the brood

Of serpents has been called she blends the juice

Of poisonous herbs; all Eryx⁶ pathless heights

5 Bear, or the snow-capped top of Caucasus Wet with Prometheus' blood,⁷ where winter reigns;

All that the rich Arabians use to tip
Their poisoned shafts, or the light Parthians,

Or warlike Medes; all Suebian witches cull
In the Hyrcanian forests in the north;

All poisons that the earth brings forth in
spring

When birds are nesting; or when winter cold

Has torn away the beauty of the groves

And bound the world in icy manacles.

Whatever herb gives flower the cause of
death,

Or juice of twisted root, her hands have culled.

These on Thessalian Athos grew, and those
On mighty Pindus; on Pangæus' height

25 She cut the tender leaves with bloody scythe.

These Tigris nurtured with its eddies deep,
The Danube those; Hydaspes rich in gems

30 Flowing with current warm through levels
dry,

Bætis that gives its name to neighboring lands

And meets the western ocean languidly,

35 Have nurtured these. The knife cut those at dawn;

These other herbs at dead of night were reaped;

And these were plucked with the enchanted nail.

Death-dealing plants she chooses, wrings
the blood

Of serpents, and she takes ill-omened birds,
The sad owl's heart, the quivering entails cut

From the horned owl living; — sorts all these.

In some the eager force of flame is found,

² A constellation, supposed to represent a man with a serpent in his hands.

³ The serpent who was produced from the mud left on the earth after the deluge of Deucalion.

⁴ A nine-headed serpent slain by Hercules.

⁵ The dragon who guarded the Golden Fleece.

⁶ A mountain especially dear to Venus.

⁷ See the play by Æschylus, Prometheus Bound, p. 66.

In some the bitter cold of sluggish ice;
To these she adds the venom of her words
As greatly to be feared. But lo, I hear
The sound of her mad footstep and her
song.
Earth trembles when she hears.

SCENE II

MEDEA, before the altar of Hecate.

MEDEA. Lo, I invoke you, all ye silent shades,
Infernal gods, blind Chaos,¹ sunless home
Of shadowy Dis, and squalid caves of
Death
Bound by the banks of Tartarus. Lost
souls,
For this new bridal leave your wonted toil.
Stand still, thou whirling wheel; Ixion² 20
touch
Again firm ground; come, Tantalus,³ and drink
Unchecked the wave of the Pirenian fount.
Let heavier punishment on Creon wait: —
Thou stone of Sisyphus, worn smooth, roll
back;
And ye Danaïdes⁴ who strive in vain
To fill your leaking jars, I need your aid.
Come at my invocation, star of night, 30 Endued with form most horrible, nor threat
With single face, thou three-formed deity!
For thee, according to my country's use,
With hair unfiled and naked feet
I've trod the lonely groves; called forth the rain
From cloudless skies; have driven back
the sea;

And forced the ocean to withdraw its
waves.

Earth sees heaven's laws confused, the sun and stars

5 Shining together, and the two Bears wet
In the forbidden ocean. I have changed
The circle of the seasons: — at my word Earth flourishes with summer; Ceres sees

10 A winter harvest; Phasis' rushing stream Flows to its source; and Danube that divides

Into so many mouths restrains its flood
Of waters — hardly moving past its shores.

15 The winds are silent; but the waters speak,
The wild seas roar; the home of ancient groves

Loses its leafy shade; and day returns
At my command; the sun stands still in heaven. 20

My incantations move the Hyades.⁵

It is thy hour, Dian.

For thee my bloody hands have wrought
this crown

25 Nine times by serpents girt; those knotted snakes

Rebellious Typhon⁶ bore, who made revolt

Against Jove's kingdom; Nessus⁷ gave this blood 30

When dying; Cæta's funeral pyre provides These ashes which have drunk the poisoned blood

Of dying Hercules; and here thou seest
35 Althea's⁸ vengeful brand, she sacrificed
A mother's to a sister's love. These quills
The Harpies⁹ left within some trackless
cave,

Their refuge when they fled from Zetes'
40 wrath;

¹ A yawning abyss wherein brooded Night and Mist and Fiery Air. Out of this Heaven and Earth were born.

² King of the Lapithæ, who, for offenses against Zeus, was chained to a wheel that rolled perpetually in the air.

³ Son of Zeus, who was punished for revealing the secret counsels of Olympus. He was tortured with thirst and placed in a lake, the waters of which always receded when he tried to drink of them.

⁴ The fifty daughters of Danaus, king of Argos, who were punished in Hades by being compelled to try to fill with water a jar with a hole in it.

⁵ Daughters of Atlas.

⁶ A giant who rebelled against Zeus and was buried in Tartarus under Mt. Ætna.

⁷ A centaur killed by Hercules.

⁸ Mother of Meleager, who caused her son's death in revenge for his killing of her brother. See page 128, note 9.

⁹ Birds with the heads of maidens. They were sent by the gods to torment Phineus, but were driven away by Calais and Zetes, sons of Boreas.

And these were dropped by the Stymphalian birds¹

That felt the wound of arrows dipped in blood

Of the Lernæan Hydra.

The altars find a voice, the tripod moves,
Stirred by the favoring goddess. Her swift car

I see approach — not the full-orbed that rolls

All night through heaven; but as, with darkened light,

Her orb contracted, with wan face she moves

Through night's dark skies, vexed by Thessalian charms.

So, pale one, from thy torch shed murky light,

Affright the nations that they clash for thee

Corinthian cymbals. Here I pay to thee,
On altars made of turf and red with blood,
These solemn rites; have stolen from the tomb

This torch that gives its baleful funeral light;

To thee with bowed head I have made my prayer;

And, in accordance with funereal use,
Have filleted my loosened hair, have plucked

This branch that grows beside the Stygian wave;

Like a wild Mænad,² laying bare my breast,

With sacred knife I cut for thee my arm;
My blood is on the altars! Hand, learn well

To use the knife and shed blood dear to thee.

See, from the wound, the sacred stream flows forth.

Daughter of Perseus,³ have I asked too oft Thine aid? Recall no more my former prayers.

To-day as always I invoke thine aid
For Jason only! Ah, endue this robe

With such a baleful power that the bride
May feel at its first touch consuming fire
Of serpent's poison in her inmost veins;
For fire flames hid in the bright gold, a gift

Prometheus gave and taught me how to store —

He now atones his daring theft from heaven
With tortured vitals. Mulciber⁴ has given

This flame, and I in sulphur nurtured it;
I brought a spark from the destroying fire
Of Phæthon; I have the flame breathed forth

By the Chimæra,⁵ and the fire I snatched
From Colchis' savage bull; and mixed with these Medusa's⁶ venom. I have bade all keep Their poison unrevealed; now, Hecate, add

The sting to poison, keep the seeds of flame
Hid in my gift; let them deceive the sight
Nor burn the touch; but let them penetrate

Her very heart and veins, melt all her limbs,

Consume her bones in smoke. Her burning hair

Shall glow more brightly than the nuptial torch!

My vows are heard, and Hecate thrice has barked,

And shaken fire from her gleaming brand.
'Tis finished! Call my sons. My royal gifts,

Ye shall be borne by them to the new bride.

Go, go, my sons, a hapless mother's brood,
Placate with gifts and prayers your father's wife!

But come again with speed, that I may know

A last embrace!

SCENE III

CHORUS. Where hastes the blood-stained Mænad, headlong driven

¹ A flock of birds with brazen claws, wings, and beaks, expelled from a lake near Stymphalus in Arcadia by Hercules. Their feathers were arrows.

² A Bacchanté, see page 121, note 3.

³ Another name for Vulcan.

⁴ A fire-breathing monster killed by Bellerophon. It was a combination of lion, dragon, and goat.

⁵ A monster whose hairs were hissing snakes. No one could look at her without being turned to stone.

⁶ Hecate.

By angry love? What mischief plots her
rage?

With wrath her face grows rigid; her proud head

She fiercely shakes, and dares defiantly
Threaten the king.

Who would believe her exiled from the realm?

Her cheeks glow crimson, pallor puts to flight

The red, no color lingers on her face;

Her steps are driven to and fro as when

A tigress rages, of her young bereft,

Beside the Ganges in the gloomy woods.

Medea knows not now to curb her love

Or hate. Now love and hate together rage.

When will she leave the fair Pelasgian
fields,

The wicked Colchian one, and free from
fear

Our king and kingdom? Drive with not slow rein

Thy car, Diana; let the sweet night hide

The sunlight. Hesperus, end the dreaded day.

ACT V

SCENE I

MESSINGER, CHORUS.

MESSINGER. (Enters in haste.) All are destroyed, the royal empire falls,

Father and child lie in one funeral pyre.

CHORUS. Destroyed by what deceit?

MESSINGER. That which is wont
To ruin princes — gifts.

CHORUS. Could these work harm?

MESSINGER. I myself wonder, and can hardly deem

The wrong accomplished, though I know it done.

CHORUS. How did it happen?

MESSINGER. A destructive fire Spreads everywhere as at command; even
now

The city is in fear, the palace burned.

CHORUS. Let water quench the flames.

MESSINGER. It will not these,
As by a miracle floods feed the fire.

The more we fight it so much more it glows.

SCENE II

MEDEA, NURSE.

5 NURSE. Up! up! Medea! Swiftly flee
the land

Of Pelops; seek in haste a distant shore.

MEDEA. Shall I fly? I? Were I already gone

10 I would return for this, that I might see These new betrothals. Dost thou pause,
my soul,

And shrink to follow up thy first success?
This joy's but the beginning of revenge.

15 Thou still dost love if thou art satisfied
To widow Jason. For this work prepare:
Honor begone, and maiden modesty, —
It were a light revenge pure hands could yield.

20 Strengthen thy drooping spirit, stir up
wrath,

Drain from thy heart its all of ancient
force,

25 Thy deeds till now call love; awake, and act,

That they may see how light, how little
worth,

All former crime — the prelude of revenge!
What was there great my novice hands

30 could dare?

What was the madness of my girlhood days?

I am Medea now, through crime made strong.

35 Rejoice, because through thee thy brother
died;

Rejoice, because through thee his limbs were torn;

Through thee thy father lost the golden
fleece;

That, armed by thee, his daughters Pelias
slew.

Find thou a way, revenge. No novice
hand

45 Thou bring'st to crime; what wilt thou do;
what dart

Let fly against thy treacherous enemy?
I know not what of crime my madness plots,

50 Nor yet dare I confess it to myself!
In folly I made haste — would that my
foe

Had children by this other! Mine are his,

We'll say Creusa bore them! 'Tis enough;
 Through them my heart at last finds just revenge;
 My soul must be prepared for this last
 crime.
 Ye who were once my children, mine no
 more,
 Pay ye the forfeit for your father's crimes.
 Awe strikes my spirit and benumbs my
 hand;
 My heart beats wildly; vanished is my
 rage,
 And mother love, returning, now drives
 out
 The hatred of the wife. I shed their blood? 15
 My children's blood? Give better counsel,
 rage!
 Be far from thee this crime! What guilt is theirs?
 Is Jason not their father? — guilt enough! 20
 And, greater guilt, Medea calls them sons.
 They are not sons of mine, so let them
 die!
 Nay, rather let them perish since they are!
 But they are innocent! — my brother was! 25 Waverest thou? Do tears make wet thy cheek?
 Do wrath and love like adverse tides impel
 Now here, now there? As when the winds wage war
 And the wild waves against each other smite,
 And warring tides run high, and ocean
 raves,
 My heart is beaten, and love drives out 35
 wrath,
 As wrath drives love. My anger dies in
 love.
 Dear sons, sole solace of a storm-tossed
 house,
 Come hither, lock your arms about my neck;
 You may be safe for him, if safe for me!
 But I am driven into exile, flight;
 Torn from my bosom weeping, soon they'll 45
 go
 Lamenting for my kisses — let them die
 For father and for mother! Once again Rage swells, hate burns; again the fury seeks

Th' unwilling hand — I follow where wrath leads.
 Would that the children that made proud
 the heart
 5 Of Niobe ¹ were mine, that I had borne Twice seven sons! In bearing only two
 I have been cursed! And yet it is enough
 For father, brother, that I have borne
 two. — 10 Where does that horde of furies haste?
 whom seek?
 For whom prepare their fires? or for whom Brandish the infernal band the bloody torch?
 The huge snake hisses writhing, as they lash
 Their serpent scourges; with her hostile brand
 Whom does Megæra ² seek? What dim-seen shade
 Is that which hither brings its scattered limbs?
 It is my brother, and he seeks revenge;
 25 I grant it, thrust the torches in my eyes; Kill, burn; the furies have me in their
 power!
 Brother, command the avenging goddesses
 30 To leave me, and the shades to seek their place
 In the infernal regions without fear;
 Here leave me to myself, and use this
 hand
 35 That held the sword — your soul has found revenge.
 (Kills one of her sons.)
 What means this sudden noise? They come in arms
 40 And seek to slay me. Having thus begun
 My murders, I will go upon the roof, Come, follow thou, I'll take the dead with
 me.
 45 Strike now, my soul, nor longer hide thy
 power,
 But show the world thy strength.
 (*She goes out with the nurse and the living boy, and carries with her the body of her dead
 son.*)
 50

¹ Daughter of Tantalus. She had seven sons and daughters, all of whom were killed by Apollo in punishment of her defiance of Latona.

² One of the Furies.

SCENE III

JASON in the foreground, MEDEA with the children appears upon the roof.

JASON. Ye faithful ones, who share
In the misfortunes of your harassed king,
Hasten to take the author of these deeds.
Come hither, hither, cohorts of brave men;
Bring up your weapons; overthrow the house.

MEDEA. I have recaptured now my crown and throne,
My brother and my father; Colchians
hold
The golden fleece; my kingdom is won
back;
My lost virginity returns to me!
O gods at last appeased! Glad nuptial
day!
Go, finished is the crime. Not yet complete
Is vengeance, finish while thy hand is strong
To smite. Why stay, why hesitate, my 25
soul?

Thou art able! All thine anger falls to nought!

I do repent of that which I have done!
What hast thou done, O miserable one? 30
What, miserable? Though I should repent,
'Tis done, great joy fills my unwilling
heart,

And, lo, the joy increases. But one thing
Before was lacking — Jason did not see! 35
All that he has not seen I count as lost.

JASON. She threatens from the roof;
let fire be brought,
That she may perish burned with her own
flame.

MEDEA. Pile high the funeral pyre of thy sons,
And rear their tomb. To Creon and thy
wife

I have already paid the honors due.
This son is dead, and this one too shall die,

And thou shall see him perish.

JASON. By the gods,
By our sad flight together, and the bond
I have not willingly forsaken, spare
5 Our son! If there is any crime, 'tis mine;
Put me to death, strike down the guilty
one.

MEDEA. There where thou askest mercy, and canst feel 10 The sting, I thrust the sword. Go, Jason, seek

Thy virgin bride, desert a mother's bed.

JASON. Let one suffice for vengeance.

MEDEA. Had it been 15 That one could satisfy my hands with
blood,

I had slain none. Although I should slay
two,

The number is too small for my revenge.

20 JASON. Then go, fill up the measure of thy crime,

I ask for nothing but that thou should'st
make

A speedy end.

MEDEA. Now, grief, take slow revenge;
It is my day; haste not, let me enjoy.

(Kills the other child.)

JASON. Slay me, mine enemy!

MEDEA. Dost thou implore
30 My pity? It is well! I am avenged.

O vengeance, no more offerings can I give,
Nothing is left to immolate to thee!

Look up, ungrateful Jason, recognize

Thy wife; so I am wont to flee. The way 35 Lies open through the skies; two dragons bend

Their necks, submissive to the yoke. I go In my swift car through heaven. Take thy sons!

40 (She casts down to him the bodies of her children, and is borne away in a chariot drawn by dragons.)

JASON. Go through the skies sublime, and in thy flight

45 Prove that there are no gods where'er thou goest.

PLAUTUS

(254?-184 B.C.)

T. Maccius Plautus was born in a small village of Umbria. He came to Rome early in life and took service about the theaters. He saved a little money and set up in business, but failed quickly. He then went to work turning a handmill for a baker. When he was about thirty years of age, he finally managed to get a theatrical producer interested in some plays he had written during his leisure hours, and was enabled to leave his degrading occupation and turn his whole attention to literature. He continued writing plays until his death at about seventy years of age. He was a prolific writer and is supposed to have written some 130 plays. Of these only twenty survive. The most famous are the Captivi (The Captives), the Miles Gloriosus (The Boastful Soldier), the Menæchmi (The Twin Brothers), and the Aulularia (The Pot of Gold).

Roman comedy, of which the play here given is an example, was based directly upon the later comedies of the Greeks. Between the time of Aristophanes and the time of Plautus, Greek comedy had suffered many changes. The elaborate settings and costumes and the expensive chorus had departed with the declining prosperity of the Greek city state. The later comedy was simple in setting and required few characters. It dealt with domestic rather than political life, and leaned strongly toward what is now known as the "comedy of manners." Very few examples of the New Greek Comedy have come down to us. The largest body of fragments now accessible is attributed to Menander. The close correspondence in spirit and material between Menander's plays and the Roman comedy shows clearly that the Latin is merely an adaptation of the Greek. But, although Greek comedy forms the basis, a strong Roman flavor is perceptible throughout. The result is a curious anachronistic mixture of Greek and Roman life. Since the material is drawn largely from domestic life, the scenes consist largely of family tangles. Dinners, dowries, bequests, intrigues, and lost children furnish the necessary complications. The characters are worried heads of families, domineering wives, profligate sons, slave-dealers, professional diners-out, and scheming servants. The plots are complicated, and the action lively. The play is kept moving by the conventional devices of mistaken identity, specious argument, abusive dialogue, and intrigue. The clever slave is often the arch-plotter who, by his schemes, keeps the affairs of the people of the play in a state of confusion. The humor is of a rapid, mercurial sort, which depends largely upon misunderstandings, pantomime, and virtuosity in playing on words; hence much of its effect is lost in translation. Plautus's racy slang should be translated into the current idiom at least every two years. Most of our translations are in learned slang and have little savor for the palate of the modern reader. Yet it is better to know Plautus in translation than not to know him at all, for his writings form a very important part of our literary heritage.

The Roman comedy, for all its jocular nature, seems to have survived the Dark Ages. We have no definite record of the performance of the plays, but the writers are often referred to. As early as the tenth century Hrotswitha, a nun of Gandersheim, felt it incumbent upon her to compose a series of plays in imitation of Terence, the successor of Plautus — plays which she thought would furnish better moral instruction for the young than that afforded by the work of the pagan writer himself. How far her example was followed by others, the disappearance of mediæval texts makes it impossible to say. Undoubtedly the revival of the dramatic presentation of Roman comedy or imitations thereof suffered from the popularity of the comic elements in the vernacular ecclesiastical drama. By the sixteenth century, however, the imitators of Roman comedy in the Netherlands, Germany, France, and England had made their productions a standard commodity for school exercises. In England, Ralph Roister Doister (1534-41), the play often referred to as the first English comedy, owes a heavy debt to Plautus. Shakespeare used the Menæchmi of Plautus as one of the models for his Comedy of Errors, and Jonson's comedies are strongly influenced by the Roman comedy. In France, Molière created a new comedy using the Roman comic dramatists as his models. Lessing in Germany was likewise indebted to Plautus for plots and structure.

The play here presented, The Captives (ca. 200 B.C.), is in some ways not entirely representative of Roman comedy. First, it narrowly escapes being a tragedy; second, it contains scenes of real nobility. In spite of the fact that the serious note is rarely prominent in Roman comedy, it has been deemed fitting to include The Captives for the reason that it is usually ranked the best of Roman comedies. Lessing, in fact, calls it the finest play ever staged. The theme, friendship, has been widely used in literature.

Every reader knows the classic list of famous friends: David and Jonathan, Damon and Pythias, Cicero and Scipio, Roland and Oliver, Antonio and Bassanio, etc. To this list of famous friends the reader may wish, after reading the play, to add the names of Tyndarus and Philocrates. Nearly all the conventional elements of Roman comedy are present in the play, but in reading it one has the feeling that in this instance Plautus was breaking with the established tradition and striving for something finer and nobler. The father is intelligent and reasonable, the young man is earnest and moral, the slave is a nobleman in disguise. The only character that seems to retain its typical Roman comedy characteristics is the parasite, the professional diner-out. Even such a popular writer as Plautus would hardly have dared to deprive a Roman audience of its parasite.

THE PROLOGUE

These two captives (pointing to PHILOCRATES and TYNDARUS), whom you see standing here, are standing here because — they are both standing, and are not sitting. That I am saying this truly, you are my witnesses. The old man, who lives here (pointing to HEGIO'S house), is Hegio — his father (pointing to TYNDARUS). But under what circumstances he is the slave of his own father, that I will here explain to you, if you give attention. This old man had two sons; a slave stole one child when four years old, and, flying hence, he sold him in Elis, to the father of this captive (pointing to PHILOCRATES). Now, do you understand this? Very good. I' faith, that man at a distance there (pointing) says, no. Come nearer then.¹ If there isn't room for you to sit down, there is for you to walk; since you'd be compelling an actor to bawl like a beggar. I'm not going to burst myself for your sake, so don't you be mistaken. You who are enabled by your means to pay your taxes, listen to the rest²; I care not to be in debt to another. This runaway slave, as I said before, sold his young master, whom, when he fled, he had carried off, to this one's father. He, after he bought him, gave him as his own private slave to this son of his, because they were of about the same age. He is now the slave at home of his own father, nor does his father know it. (Verily, the Gods do treat us men just like footballs.) You hear the manner now how he lost one son. Afterwards, the Ætolians³ are waging war with the people of Elis, and, as happens in warfare, the other son is taken prisoner. The physician Menarchus buys him there in Elis.⁴ On this, this He-

¹ Some commentators think this was a device of the Prologue to get the attention of the audience focused on the stage. Their eyes would follow the man who had been pointed out as he walked down to the front.

² Here he addresses the people in the better seats, pretending to give up his attempt to quiet the turbulent poor in the rear of the theater.

³ The inhabitants of Ætolia, a province in middle Greece.

gio begins to traffic in Elean captives, if perchance, he may be able to find one to change for that captive son of his. He knows not that this one who is in his house is his own son. And as he heard yesterday that an Elean knight of very high rank and very high family was taken prisoner, he has spared no expense to rescue his son. In order that he may more easily bring him back home, he buys both of these of 10 the Quæstors¹ out of the spoil.

Now they, between themselves, have contrived this plan, that, by means of it, the servant may send away hence his master home. And therefore among them- 15 selves they change their garments and their names. He, there (pointing), is called Philocrates; this one (pointing), Tyndarus; he this day assumes the character of this one, this one of him. And 20 this one to-day will cleverly carry out this play and cause his master to gain his liberty; and by the same means he will save his own brother, and, without knowing it, will cause him to return back a free 25 man to his own country to his father, just as often now, on many occasions, a person has done more good unknowingly than knowingly. But unconsciously, by their devices, they have so planned and 30 devised their plot, and have so contrived it by their design, that this one is living in servitude with his own father. And thus now, in ignorance, he is the slave of his own father. What poor creatures are men, 35 when I reflect upon it! This plot will be performed by us — a play for your entertainment. But there is, besides, a thing which, in a few words, I would wish to inform you of. Really, it will be worth your 40 while to give your attention to this play. 'Tis not composed in the hackneyed style, nor yet like other plays, nor are there in it any ribald lines unfit for utterance: here is neither the perjured procurer, nor the 45 artful courtesan, nor yet the braggart captain. Don't you be afraid because I've said there's war between the Ætolians and the Eleans. There (pointing), at a distance, beyond the scenes, the battles will be fought. For this were almost impossible for a Comic establishment, that we should 5 at a moment attempt to be acting Tragedy. If, therefore, any one is looking for a battle, let him commence the quarrel; if he shall find an adversary more powerful, I'll cause him to be the spectator of a battle that isn't pleasant to him, so that hereafter he shall hate to be a spectator of them all. I now retire. Fare ye well, at home, most upright judges, and in warfare most valiant combatants.

ACT I

SCENE I

Enter ERGASILUS.

ERG. The young men have given me the name of "the mistress," for this reason, because invoked² I am wont to attend at the banquet. I know that buffoons say 5 that this is absurdly said, but I affirm that it is rightly said. For at the banquet the lover, when he throws the dice, invokes his mistress. Is she then invoked, or is she not? She is, most clearly. But, i' faith, 10 we Parasites with better reason are so called, whom no person ever either invites or invokes, and who, like mice, are always eating the victuals of another person. When business is laid aside,³ when people 15 repair to the country, at that same moment is business laid aside for our teeth. Just as, when it is hot weather, snails lie hidden in secret, and live upon their own juices, if the dew doesn't fall; so, when 20 business is laid aside, do Parasites lie hidden in retirement, and miserably live upon their own juices, while in the country the persons are rustivating whom they sponge upon. When business is laid aside, we 25 Parasites are greyhounds; when business recommences, like mastiffs, we are annoying-like and very troublesome-like.⁴ And here, indeed, unless, i' faith, any Parasite is able to endure cuffs with the fist, and pots to be broken about his head, why he may e'en go with his wallet outside the Trigemian Gate. That this may prove my lot, there is some danger. For since my patron has fallen into the hands of the enemy — (such warfare are the Ætoliens now waging with the Eleans; for this is Ætolia; this Philopolemus has been made captive in Elis, the son of this old man Hegio who lives here (pointing to the house) — a house which to me is a house of woe, and which so oft as I look upon, I weep). Now, for the sake of his son, has he commenced this dishonourable traffic, very much against his own inclination. He buys up men that have been made captives, if perchance he may be able to find some one for whom to gain his son in exchange. An object which I really do much desire that he may gain, for, unless he finds him, there's nowhere for me to find myself. I have no hopes in the young men; they are all too fond of themselves. He, in fine, is a youth with the old-fashioned manners, whose countenance I never rendered cheerful without a return. His father is worthily matched, as endowed with like manners. Now I'll go to him; — but his door is opening, the door from which full oft I've sallied forth drunk with excess of cheer. (He stands aside.)

¹ The Quæstors had the selling of the spoils after a war.

² This is rather a poor pun on the Latin word invocatus, which means "invoked" as a god would be, and "unasked."

SCENE II

Enter, from his house, HEGIO and a SLAVE.

HEG. Now, give attention you, if you please. Those two captives whom I purchased yesterday of the Quæstors out of the spoil, put upon them chains of light weight; take off those greater ones with which they are bound. Permit them to walk, if they wish, out of doors, or if indoors, but so that they are watched with the greatest care. A captive at liberty is like a bird that's wild; if opportunity is once given for escaping, 'tis enough; after that, you can never catch him.

SLAVE. Doubtless we all are free men more willingly than we live the life of slaves.

HEG. You, indeed, don't seem to think so.¹

5 SLAVE. If I have nothing to give, should you like me to give myself to flight?²

HEG. If you do so give yourself, I shall at once have something to be giving to you.

SLAVE. I'll make myself just like the wild bird you were telling of.

HEG. 'Tis just as you say; for if you do so, I'll be giving you to the cage. But enough of prating; take you care of what I've ordered, and be off. (The SLAVE goes into the house.) I'll away to my brother's, to my other captives; I'll go see whether they've been making any disturbance last night. From there I shall forthwith betake myself home again.

ERG. (apart). It grieves me that this unhappy old man is following the trade of a slave-dealer, by reason of the misfortune of his son. But, if by any means he can be brought back here, I could even endure for him to become an executioner, HEG. (overhearing him). Who is it that's speaking?

ERG. 'Tis I, who am pining at your affliction, growing thin, waxing old, and shockingly wasting away. Wretched man that I am, I'm but skin and bone through leanness; nor does anything ever do me good that I eat at home; even that ever so little which I taste out of doors, the same 35 refreshes me.

HEG. Ergasilus, save you!

ERG. (crying). May the Gods kindly bless you, Hegio!

HEG. Don't weep.

ERG. Must I not weep for him? Must I not weep for such a young man?

HEG. I've always known you to be a friend to my son, and I have understood him to be so to you.

ERG. Then at last do we men know our blessings, when we have lost those things which we once had in our power. I, since your son fell into the power of the enemy, knowing by experience of what value he was, now feel his loss.

¹ Slaves were often given their liberty for unusually faithful service. Hegio thinks this slave shows no disposition to earn his freedom.

² The slave pretends that Hegio expects him to buy his freedom.

HEG. Since you, who are no relation, bear his misfortune so much amiss, what is it likely that I, a father, should do, whose only son he is?

ERG. I, no relation to him? He, no relation to me? Oh, Hegio! never do say that, nor come to such a belief. To you he is an only child, but to me he is even more only than an only one.

HEG. I commend you, in that you consider the affliction of your friend your own affliction. Now be of good heart.

ERG. (crying). Oh, dear!

HEG. (half-aside). 'Tis this afflicts him, that the army for guttling is now disbanded. Meanwhile, have you found no one to command for you the army that you mentioned as disbanded?

ERG. What do you think? All to whom it used to fall are in the habit of declining that province since your son Philopolemus was taken prisoner.

HEG. I' faith, 'tisin't to be wondered at, that they are in the habit of declining that province. You have necessity for numerous troops, and those of numerous kinds. Well, first you have need of the Bakerians. Of these Bakerians there are several kinds. You have need of Roll-makerians, you have need too of Confectionerians, you have need of Poultere-rians, you have need of Beccaficorians¹; besides, all the maritime forces are necessary for you.

ERG. How the greatest geniuses do frequently lie concealed! How great a general now is this private individual!

HEG. Only have good courage; for I trust that in a few days I shall bring him back home. For see now; there's a captive here, a young man of Elis, born of a very high family, and of very great wealth; I trust that it will come to pass that I shall get my son in exchange for him.

ERG. May the Gods and Goddesses grant it so!

HEG. But are you invited out anywhere to dinner?

ERG. Nowhere that I know of. But, pray, why do you ask me?

HEG. Because this is my birthday;

for that reason I'd like you to be invited to dinner at my house.

ERG. 'Tis kindly said.

HEG. But if you can be content to eat a very little —

ERG. Ay, even ever so little; for on such fare as that do I enjoy myself every day at home.

HEG. Come, then, please, set yourself up for sale.

ERG. I'll put myself up for purchase, just like a landed estate, unless any one shall privately make a better offer that pleases myself and my friends more, and to my own conditions will I bind myself.

HEG. You are surely selling me a bottomless pit, and not a landed estate. But if you are coming, do so in time.

ERG. Why, for that matter, I'm at leisure even now.

HEG. Go then, and hunt for a hare; at present, in me you have but a ferret, for my fare is in the way of frequenting a rugged road.

ERG. You'll never repulse me by that, Hegio, so don't attempt it. I'll come, in spite of it, with teeth well shod.

HEG. Really, my viands are but of a rough sort.

ERG. Are you in the habit of eating brambles?

HEG. Mine is an earthy dinner.

ERG. A pig is an earthy animal.

HEG. Earthy from its plenty of vegetable.

ERG. Treat your sick people at home with that fare? Do you wish anything else?

HEG. Come in good time.

ERG. You are putting in mind one who remembers quite well. (Exit.)

HEG. I'll go in-doors, and in the house I'll make the calculation how little money I have at my banker's; afterwards I'll go to my brother's, whither I was saying I would go. (Goes into his house.)

ACT II

SCENE I

Enter, from the house, PHILOCRADES, TYNDARUS, and SLAVES and CAPTIVES of HEGIO.

SLAVE. If the immortal Gods have so

¹ Beccafico is the name belonging to a kind of bird.

willed it that you should undergo this affliction, it becomes you to endure it with equanimity; if you do so, your trouble will be lighter. At home you were free men, I suppose; now if slavery has befallen you, 'tis a becoming way for you to put up with it, and by your dispositions to render it light, under a master's rule. Unworthy actions which a master does must be deemed worthy ones.

PHIL. and TYND. Alas! alas! alas!

SLAVE. There's no need for wailing; you cause much injury to your eyes. In adversity, if you use fortitude of mind, it is of service.

PHIL. and TYND. But we are ashamed, because we are in bonds.

SLAVE. But in the result it might cause vexation to our master, if he were to release you from chains, or allow you to be loose, whom he has purchased with his money.

PHIL. and TYND. What does he fear from us? We know our duty, what it is, if he allows us to be loose.

SLAVE. Why, you are meditating escape. I know what it is you are devising.

PHIL. and TYND. We, make our escape? Whither should we escape?

SLAVE. To your own country.

PHIL. and TYND. Out upon you; it would ill befit us to be following the example of runaways.

SLAVE. Why, faith, should there be an opportunity, I don't advise you not.

PHIL. and TYND. Do you allow us to make one request.

SLAVE. What is it, pray?

PHIL. and TYND. That you will give us an opportunity of conversing, without these and yourselves for overlookers.

SLAVE. Be it so; go you away from here, you people. Let's step here, on one side. (To the other CAPTIVES and SLAVES.) But commence upon a short conversation only.

PHIL. Oh, yes, it was my intention so to do. Step aside this way (to TYNDARUS).

SLAVE (to the other CAPTIVES). Stand apart from them.

TYND. (to the SLAVE). We are both greatly obliged to you, by reason of your doing so, since you allow us to obtain what we are desirous of.

PHIL. Step here then, at a distance now, if you think fit, that no listeners may be enabled to overhear our discourse, and that this plan of ours mayn't be divulged before them; for a stratagem is no stratagem, if you don't plan it with art, but it is a very great misfortune if it becomes disclosed. For if you are my master, and I represent myself as your servant, still there's need of foresight, and need of caution, that this may be carried out discreetly and without overlookers, with carefulness and with cautious prudence and diligence. So great is the matter that has been commenced upon; this must not be carried out in any drowsy fashion.

TYND. Just as you shall desire me to be, I will be.

PHIL. I trust so.

TYND. For now you see that for your precious life I'm setting at stake my own, as dear to me.

PHIL. I know it.

TYND. But remember to know it when you shall be enjoying that which you wish for; for mostly, the greatest part of mankind follow this fashion; until they obtain what they wish for, they are rightminded; but when they have now got it in their power, from being rightminded they become most deceitful, and most dishonest; now I do consider that you are towards me as I wish. What I advise you, I would advise my own father.

PHIL. I' faith, if I could venture I, would call you father; for next to my own father, you are my nearest father.

TYND. I understand.

PHIL. And therefore I remind you the more frequently that you may remember it. I am not your master, but your servant; now this one thing I do beseech you. Inasmuch as the immortal Gods have disclosed to us their wishes, that they desire me to have once been your master, and now to be your fellow-captive; what formerly of my right I used to command you, now with entreaties do I beg of you, by our uncertain fortunes, and by the kindness of my father towards you, and by our common captivity, which has befallen us by the hand of the enemy, don't you pay me any greater respect than I did you when you were my slave; and don't you forget to remember who you were, and who you now are.

TYND. I know, indeed, that I now am you, and that you are I.

PHIL. Well, if you are able carefully to remember that, I have some hope in this scheme of ours.

SCENE II

Enter HEGIO, from his house, speaking to those within.

HEG. I shall return in-doors just now, when I shall have discovered from these people what I want to know. (To the SLAVES.) Where are those persons whom I ordered to be brought out of doors here, before the house?

PHIL. By my faith, I find that you have taken due precaution that we shouldn't be missed by you, so walled in are we with chains and keepers.

HEG. He that takes precaution that he mayn't be deceived is hardly on his guard, even while he's taking precaution; even when he has supposed that he has taken every precaution, full often is this wary man outwitted. Was there not good reason, indeed, for me to watch you carefully, whom I purchased with so large a sum of ready money?

PHIL. Troth, it isn't fair for us to hold you to blame, because you watch us closely; nor yet for you us, if we go away hence, should there be an opportunity.

HEG. As you are here, so is my son a captive there among your people.

PHIL. He, a captive?

HEG. Even so.

PHIL. We, then, have not proved the only cowards.¹

HEG. (to PHILOCRATES, supposing him to be the SERVANT of the other.) Step you aside this way, for there are some things that I wish to enquire of you in private, on which subjects I would have you not to be untruthful to me. (They step aside.)

PHIL. I will not be, as to that which I shall know; if I shall not know anything, that which I don't know I'll tell you of.

TYND. (aside). Now is the old fellow in the barber's shop; now, at this very instant, is Philocrates wielding the razor. He hasn't cared, indeed, to put on the barber's cloth, so as not to soil his dress. But whether to say that he's going to shave him close, or trim him through the comb, I don't know; but if he's wise, he'll scrape him right well to the very quick.

HEG. (to PHILOCRATES). Which would 15 you? Would you prefer to be a slave, or a free man? — Tell me.

PHIL. That which is the nearest to good, and the furthest off from evil, do I prefer; although my servitude hasn't proved very grievous to me, nor has it been otherwise to me than if I had been a son in the family.

TYND. (aside). Capital! I wouldn't purchase, at a talent's price even, Thales the Milesian²; for compared with this man's wisdom, he was a very twaddler. How cleverly has he suited his language to the slave's condition.

HEG. Of what family is this Philocrates born?

PHIL. The Polyplusian³; which family is especially powerful there, and held in highest esteem.

HEG. What is he himself? In what esteem is he held there?

PHIL. In the highest, and that by the very highest men.

HEG. Since, then, he is held in such great respect among the Eleans, as you 40 tell of, what substance has he? — Of large amount?

PHIL. Enough for him, even, when an old man, to be melting out the tallow.

HEG. What is his father? Is he living?

PHIL. When we departed thence, we left him alive; whether he's living now or not, Orcus, forsooth, must know that.

TYND. (aside). The matter's all right; he's not only lying, but he's even philosophizing now.

¹ Persons who allow themselves to be captured instead of fighting to the last.

² One of the seven wise men of Greece.

³ A name coined for the occasion, meaning "very wealthy."

HEG. What's his name?

PHIL. Thesaurochrysonicocroesides.¹

HEG. That name has been given, I suppose, by reason of his wealth, as it were.

PHIL. Troth, not so, but rather by reason of his avarice and grasping disposition; for, indeed, he was Theodoromedes originally by name.

HEG. How say you? Is his father 10 covetous?

PHIL. Ay, by my faith, he is covetous. Why, that you may even understand it the better, — when he's sacrificing at any time to his own Genius, the vessels that 15 are needed for the sacrifice he uses of Samian ware, lest the Genius himself should steal them; from this, consider how much he would trust other people.

HEG. (addressing TYNDARUS as though 20 PHILOCRATES). Do you then follow me this way. (Aside.) The things that I desire to know, I'll enquire of him. (Addressing TYNDARUS.) Philocrates, this person has done as it becomes an honest man to do. For from him I've learnt of what family you are sprung; he has confessed it to me. If you are willing to own these same things (which, however, understand that I already know from him), 30 you will be doing it for your own advantage.

TYND. He did his duty when he confessed the truth to you, although, Hegio, I wished carefully to conceal both my 35 rank and my wealth; now, inasmuch as I've lost my country and my liberty, I don't think it right for him to be dreading me rather than you. The might of warfare has made my fortunes on a level with 40 himself. I remember the time when he didn't dare to do it in word; now, in deed, he is at liberty to offend me. But don't you see? Human fortune moulds and fashions just as she wills. Myself, who 45 was a free man she has made a slave, from the very highest the very lowest. I, who was accustomed to command, now obey the mandates of another. And indeed, if I meet with a master just such as I proved 50 the ruler in my own household, I shall not fear that he will rule me harshly or severely. With this, Hegio, I wished you to be acquainted, unless perchance you yourself wish it not.

5 HEG. Speak boldly out.

TYND. As free a man was I till lately as your son.² As much did a hostile hand deprive me of my liberty as him of his. As much is he a slave among my people, as I am now a slave here with yourself. There is undoubtedly a God, who both hears and sees the things which we do. Just as you shall treat me here, in the same degree will he have a care for him. To the well-deserving will he show favour, to the ill-deserving will he give a like return. As much as you lament your son, so much does my father lament me.

HEG. That I am aware of. But do you admit the same that he has disclosed to me?

TYND. I confess that my father has very great wealth at home, and that I am born of a very noble family; but I entreat 25 you, Hegio, let not my riches make your mind too prone to avarice, lest it should seem to my father, although I am his only son, more suitable that I should be a slave in your house, bountifully supplied at your expense and with your clothing, rather than be living the life of a beggar where 'twould be far from honourable.

HEG. By the favour of the Gods and of my forefathers, I am rich enough. I don't quite believe that every kind of gain is serviceable to mankind. I know that gain has already made many a man famous; and yet there are occasions when it is undoubtedly better to incur loss than to make gain. Gold I detest: many a one has it persuaded to many an evil course. Now give your attention to this, that you may know as well what my wishes are. My son, taken prisoner, is in servitude at 45 Elis there among your people; if you restore him to me, don't you give me a single coin besides; both you and him, your servant, I'll send back from here; on no other terms can you depart hence.

TYND. You ask what's very right and very just, and you are the very kindest

¹ Another fictitious name, meaning "a son of Croesus abounding in golden treasure."

² Notice the dramatic irony in this speech. Tyndarus, of course, is speaking to his own father.

person of all mankind. But whether is he in servitude to a private person or to the public?

HEG. In private servitude to Menarchus, a physician.

PHIL. By my faith, that person's surely his father's dependant. Why really, that's down as pat for you, as the shower is when it rains.

HEG. Do you then cause this person, 10 my son, to be redeemed.

TYND. I'll do so: but this I beg of you, Hegio —

HEG. Whatever you wish, so that you request nothing against my interest, I'll do. 15

TYND. Listen then, and you'll know. I don't ask for myself to be released, until he has returned. But I beg of you to give me him (pointing to PHILOCRATES) with a price set upon him, that I may send him 20 to my father, that this person, your son, may be redeemed there.

HEG. Why no; I'd rather send another person hence, when there shall be a truce, to confer with your father there, and to 25 carry your injunctions which you shall entrust him with, just as you wish.

TYND. But it's of no use to send to him one that he doesn't know; you'd be losing your labour. Send this person; he'll 30 have it all completed, if he gets there. And you cannot send any person to him more faithful, nor one in whom he places more confidence, nor who is more a servant after his own mind; nor, in fact, one to 35 whom he would more readily entrust your son. Have no fears; at my own peril I'll make proof of his fidelity, relying upon his disposition; because he is sensible that I'm kindly disposed towards him.

HEG. Well then, I'll send him with a price set upon him, on the surety of your promise, if you wish it.

TYND. I do wish it; so soon as ever it can, I want this matter to be brought to 45 completion.

HEG. What reason is there, then, that if he doesn't return, you should not pay me twenty minæ¹ for him?

TYND. Yes — very good.

HEG. (to the SLAVES, who obey). Release him now forthwith; and, indeed, both of them. (On being released, PHILOCRATES goes into the house.)

TYND. May all the Gods grant you all your desires, since you have deigned me 5 honour so great, and since you release me from my chains. Really, this is not so irksome now, since my neck is free from the collar-chain.

HEG. The kindnesses that are done to the good, thanks for the same are pregnant with blessings. Now, if you are about to send him thither, direct, instruct him, give him the orders which you wish to be carried to your father. Should you like me 15 to call him to you?

TYND. Do call him. (HEGIO goes to the door, and calls PHILOCRATES.)

SCENE III

Enter PHILOCRATES, from the house.

HEG. May this affair turn out happily for myself and for my son, and for yourselves. (To PHILOCRATES.) Your new master wishes you to pay faithful obedience to your former owner in what he wishes. For I have presented you to him, with the price of twenty minæ set upon you: and he says that he is desirous to send you away hence to his father, that he may there redeem my son, and that an exchange may be made between me and him for our respective sons.

PHIL. My disposition takes its course straight in either direction, both to yourself and to him; as a wheel you may make use of me; either this way or that can I be turned, whichever way you shall command me.

40 HEG. You yourself profit the most from your own disposition, when you endure slavery just as it ought to be endured. Follow me. (To TYNDARUS.) See here's your man.

TYND. I return you thanks, since you give me this opportunity and permission to send this messenger to my parents, who may relate all the matter in its order to my father, what I'm doing here, and 50 what I wish to be done. (To PHILOCRATES.) Now, Tyndarus, thus is it arranged between myself and him, that I'm to send you, valued at a fixed price, to my father in Elis; so that, if you don't return hither, I'm to give twenty minæ for you.

PHIL. I think that you've come to a right understanding. For your father expects either myself or some messenger to come here to him.

TYND. I wish you, then, to mind what message it is I want you to carry hence to my country to my father.

PHIL. Philocrates, as up to this moment I have done, I will take all due care to endeavour that which may especially conduce to your interest, and to pursue the same with heart and soul, and with my ears.

TYND. You act just as you ought to act; now I wish you to give attention. In the first place of all, carry my respects to my mother and my father, and to my relations, and to any one else you see well-disposed towards me: say that I am in health here, and that I am a slave, in servitude to this most worthy man, who has ever honored me more and more with his respect, and does so still.

PHIL. Don't you be instructing me as to that; I can still easily bear that in mind.

TYND. For, indeed, except that I have a keeper, I deem myself to be a free man. Tell my father on what terms I have agreed with this party about his son.

PHIL. What I remember, it is sheer delay to be putting me in mind of.

TYND. To redeem him, and to send him back here in exchange for both of us.

PHIL. I'll remember it.

HEG. But as soon as he can, that is especially to the interest of us both.

PHIL. You are not more anxious to see your son, than he is to see his.

HEG. My son is dear to myself, and his own to every man.

PHIL. (to TYNDARUS). Do you wish any other message to be carried to your father?

TYND. Say that I am well here; and do you boldly tell him, Tyndarus, that we have been of dispositions for uninterrupted harmony between ourselves, and that you have neither been deserving of censure, nor that I have proved your enemy; and that still, amid miseries so great, you have shown implicit obedience to your master, and that you have never abandoned me, either in deed or in fidelity, amid my waver-

ing, unprosperous fortunes. When my father shall know this, Tyndarus, how well-disposed you have proved towards his son and himself, he will never be so avaricious but that he'll give you your liberty for nothing. And by my own endeavours, if I return hence, I'll make him do so the more readily. For by your aid and kindness, and good disposition and prudence, you have caused me to be allowed to return to my parents once again, inasmuch as to Hegio you have confessed both my rank and my wealth; by means of which, through your wisdom, you have liberated your master from his chains.

PHIL. The things which you mention I have done, and I am pleased that you remember this. Deservedly have they been done for you by me; for now, Philocrates, if I, too, were to mention the things that you have kindly done for me, the night would cut short the day. For, had you been my slave even, no otherwise were you always obliging to me.

HEG. Ye Gods, by our trust in you! behold the kindly disposition of these persons! How they draw the very tears from me! See how cordially they love each other, and with what praises the servant has commended his master.

PHIL. I' troth, he hasn't commended me the one hundredth part of what he himself deserves to be commended in my praises.

HEG. (to PHILOCRAATES). Since, then, you have acted most becomingly, now there's an opportunity to add to your good deeds in managing this matter with fidelity towards him.

PHIL. I am not able more to wish it done, than by my endeavours to try to bring it about. That you may know this, Hegio, with praises do I call supreme Jove to witness that I will not prove unfaithful to Philocrates.

HEG. You are a worthy fellow.

PHIL. And that I will never in anything act otherwise towards him than towards my own self.

TYND. I wish you to put these speeches to the test, both by your deeds and your actions; and inasmuch as I have said the less about you than I had wished, I wish you the more to give me your attention, and take you care not to be angry with me by reason of these words. But, I beseech you, reflect that you are sent hence home with a price set upon you at my risk, and that my life is here left as a pledge for you. Do not you forget me the very moment that you have left my presence, since you will have left me here behind a captive in captivity for yourself, and don't consider yourself as free, and forsake your pledge, and not use your endeavours for you to bring his son home again, in return for me. Understand that you are sent hence valued at twenty minæ. Take care to prove scrupulously faithful; take care that you show not a wavering fidelity. For my father, I am sure, will do everything that he ought to do. Preserve me as a constant friend to you, and find out this person so lately discovered. These things, by your right hand, 25 holding you with my own right hand, do I beg of you; do not prove less true to me than I have proved to you. This matter do you attend to; you are now my master, you my patron, you my father; to you do I commend my hopes and my fortunes.

PHIL. You have given injunctions enough. Are you satisfied if I bring back accomplished what you have enjoined?

TYND. Satisfied.

PHIL. (to HEGIO). According to your wishes, and (to TYNDARUS) according to yours, will I return hither provided. Is there anything else?

TYND. For you to return back as soon as ever you can.

PHIL. The business itself reminds me of that.

HEG. (to PHILOCRAATES). Follow me, that I may give you your expenses for the journey at my banker's; on the same occasion I'll get a passport from the Prætor.

TYND. What passport?

HEG. For him to take with him hence to the army, that he may be allowed to go home from here. (To TYNDARUS.) You go in-doors.

TYND. Speed you well.

PHIL. Right heartily, farewell. (TYNDARUS goes into the house.)

HEG. (aside). I' faith, I compassed my design, when I purchased these men of the 5 Quæstors out of the spoil. I have released my son from slavery, if so it pleases the Gods, and yet I hesitated a long time whether I should purchase or should not purchase these persons. Watch that man in-doors, if you please, you servants, that he may nowhere move a foot without a guard. I shall soon make my appearance at home; now I'm going to my brother's, to see my other captives; at the same time I'll enquire whether any one knows this young man. (To PHILOCRAATES.) Do you follow, that I may despatch you. I wish attention first to be paid to that matter. (Exeunt.)

ACT III

SCENE I

Enter ERGASILUS.

ERG. Wretched is that man who is in search of something to eat, and finds that with difficulty; but more wretched is he who both seeks with difficulty, and finds nothing at all; most wretched is he, who, when he desires to eat, has not that which he may eat. But, by my faith, if I only could, I'd willingly tear out the eyes of this 35 day; — with such enmity has it filled all people towards me. One more starved out I never did see, nor one more filled with hunger, nor one who prospers less in whatever he begins to do. So much do my stomach and my throat take rest on these fasting holidays. Away with the profession of a Parasite to very utter and extreme perdition! so much in these days do the young men drive away from them the needy drolls. They care nothing now-a-days for these Laconian men of the lowest benches — these whipping-posts, who have their clever sayings without provision and without money. They now-a-days seek those who, when they've eaten at their pleasure, may give them a return at their own houses. They go themselves to market, which formerly was the province of the Parasites. They go themselves from the Forum to the procurers with face as exposed as the magistrates in court, with face exposed, condemn those who are found guilty; nor do they now value buffoons at one farthing; all are so much in love with themselves. For, when, just now, I went away from here, I came to some young men in the Forum: "Good morrow," said I; "whither are we going together to breakfast?" On this, they were silent. "Who says, 'here, at my house,' or who makes an offer?" said I. Just like dumb men, they were silent, and didn't smile at me. "Where do we dine?" said I. On this they declined. I said one funny saying out of my best bon mots, by which I formerly used to get feasting for a month; not an individual smiled; at once I knew that the matter was arranged by concert. Not even one was willing to imitate a dog when provoked; if they didn't laugh, they might, at least, have grinned with their teeth. From them I went away, after I saw that I was thus made sport of. I went to some others; then to some others I came; then to some others — the same result. All treat the matter in confederacy, just like the oil-merchants in the Velabrum.¹ Now, I've returned thence, since I see myself made sport of there. In like manner do other Parasites walk to and fro, to no purpose, in the Forum. Now, after the foreign fashion, I'm determined to enforce all my rights. Those who have entered into a confederacy, by which to deprive us of food and life, — for them I'll name a day. I'll demand, as the damages, that they shall give me ten dinners at my own option, when provisions are dear: thus will I do. Now I'll go hence to the harbour. There is my only hope of a dinner; if that shall fail me, I'll return here to the old gentleman, to his unsavoury dinner.

SCENE II

Enter HEGIO and ARISTOPHONTES.

HEG. (to himself). What is there more delightful than to manage one's own interests well for the public good, just as I did yesterday, when I purchased these men. Every person, as they see me, comes to meet me, and congratulates me on this matter. By thus stopping and detaining unlucky me, they've made me quite tired. With much ado have I survived from being congratulated, to my misfortune. At last, to the Prætor did I get. There, scarcely did I rest myself. I asked for a passport; it was given me: at once I delivered it to Tyndarus. He started for home. Thence, straightway, after that was done, I passed by my house; and I went at once to my brother's, where my other captives are. I asked about Philocrates from Elis, whether any one of them all knew the person. This man (pointing to ARISTOPHONTES) called out that he had been his intimate friend; I told him that he was at my house. At once he besought and entreated me that I would permit him to see him. Forthwith I ordered him to be released from chains. Thence have I come. (To ARISTOPHONTES.) Now, do you follow me, that you may obtain what you have besought of me, the opportunity of meeting with this person. (They go into the house.)

SCENE III

Enter TYNDARUS, from the house.

TYND. Now stands the matter so, that I would much rather that I had once existed, than that I still exist; now do my hopes, my resources, and my succour, desert me and spurn themselves. This is that day, when, for my life, no safety can be hoped; nor yet is death my end; nor hope is there, in fact, to dispel this fear for me; nor cloak have I anywhere for my deceitful stratagems; nor for my devices or my subterfuges is there anywhere a screen presented to me. No deprecating is there for my perfidy; no means of flight for my offences. No refuge is there anywhere for my trusting; and no escape for my cunning schemes. What was concealed is now exposed; my plans are now divulged. The whole matter is now laid open; nor is there any ado about this matter, but that I must perish outright, and meet with destruction, both on behalf of my master and myself. This Aristophontes has proved my ruin, who has just now come into the house. He knows me. He is the intimate friend and kinsman of Philocrates. Not Salvation herself can save me now, even if she wishes; nor have I any means of escape, unless, perchance, I devise some artifice in my mind. (He meditates.) Plague on it! — how? What can I contrive? — what can I think of? Some very great folly and trifling I shall have to begin with. I'm quite at a loss. (He retires aside.)

SCENE IV

Enter HEGIO, ARISTOPHONTES, and SLAVES, from the house.

HEG. Whither am I to say, now, that this man has betaken himself from the house out of doors?

TYND. (apart). Now, for a very certainty, I'm done for; the enemies are coming to you, Tyndarus! What shall I say? — what shall I talk of? What shall I deny, or what confess? All matters are reduced to uncertainty. How shall I place confidence in my resources? I wish the Gods had destroyed you, before you were lost to your own country, Aristophontes, who, from a plot well concerted, are making it disconcerted. This plan is ruined outright, unless I find out for myself some extremely bold device.

HEG. (to ARISTOPHONTES). Follow me. See, there is the man; go to him and address him.

TYND. (aside, and turning away). What mortal among mortals is there more wretched than myself?

ARIST. (coming up to him). Why's this, that I'm to say that you are avoiding my gaze, Tyndarus? And why that you are slighting me as a stranger, as though you had never known me? Why, I'm as much a slave as yourself; although at home I was a free man, you, even from your childhood, have always served in slavery in Elis.

HEG. I' faith, I'm very little surprised, if either he does avoid your gaze, or if he does shun you, who are calling him Tyndarus, instead of Philocrates.

TYND. Hegio, this person was accounted a madman in Elis. Don't you give ear to what he prates about; for at home he has pursued his father and mother with spears, and that malady sometimes comes upon him which is spit out.¹ Do you this instant stand away at a distance from him.

HEG. (to the SLAVES). Away with him further off from me.

ARIST. Do you say, you whipp'd knave, that I am mad, and do you declare that I have followed my own father with spears? And that I have that malady, that it's necessary for me to be spit upon?

HEG. Don't be dismayed; that malady afflicts many a person to whom it has proved wholesome to be spit upon, and has been of service to them.

ARIST. Why, what do you say? Do you, too, credit him?

HEG. Credit him in what?

ARIST. That I am mad?

TYND. Do you see him, with what a furious aspect he's looking at you? 'Twere best to retire, Hegio; it is as I said, his frenzy grows apace; have a care for yourself.

HEG. I thought that he was mad, the moment that he called you Tyndarus.

TYND. Why, he's sometimes ignorant of his own name, and doesn't know what it is.

HEG. But he even said that you were his intimate friend.

TYND. So far from that, I never saw him. Why, really, Alcmaeon,² and Orestes,² and Lycurgus² besides, are my friends on the same principle that he is.

ARIST. Villain, and do you dare speak ill of me, as well? Do I not know you?

HEG. I' faith, it really is very clear that you don't know him, who are calling him Tyndarus, instead of Philocrates. Him whom you see, you don't know; you are addressing him as the person whom you don't see.

ARIST. On the contrary this fellow's saying that he is the person who he is not;

¹ The disease referred to is probably epilepsy.

² Famous frenzied characters from ancient Greek tradition.

and he says that he is not the person who he really is.

TYND. You've been found, of course, to excel Philocrates in truthfulness.

ARIST. By my troth, as I understand the matter, you've been found to brazen out the truth by lying. But i' faith, prithee, come then, look at me.

TYND. (looking at him). Well!

ARIST. Say, now; do you deny that 10 you are Tyndarus?

TYND. I do deny it, I say.

ARIST. Do you say that you are Philocrates?

TYND. I do say so, I say.

ARIST. (to HEGIO). And do you believe him?

HEG. More, indeed, than either you or myself. For he, in fact, who you say that he is (pointing to TYNDARUS), has set out 20 hence to-day for Elis, to this person's father.

ARIST. What father, when he's a slave.

TYND. And so are you a slave, and yet 25 you were a free man; and I trust that so I shall be, if I restore his son here to liberty.

ARIST. How say you, villain? Do you say that you were born a free man [liber]? 30

TYND. I really do not say that I am Liber, but that I am Philocrates.

ARIST. How's this? How this scoundrel, Hegio, is making sport of you now. For he's a slave himself, and never, except 35 his own self, had he a slave.

TYND. Because you yourself are destitute in your own country, and haven't whereon to live at home, you wish all to be found like to yourself; you don't do 40 anything surprising. 'Tis the nature of the distressed to be ill-disposed, and to envy the fortunate.

ARIST. Hegio, take you care, please, that you don't persist in rashly placing 45 confidence in this man; for so far as I see, he is certainly now putting some device in execution, in saying that he is redeeming your son from captivity; that is by no means satisfactory to me.

TYND. I know that you don't wish that to be done; still I shall effect it, if the Gods assist me. I shall bring him back here, and he will restore me to my father, in Elis. For that purpose have I sent Tyndarus hence to my father.

ARIST. Why, you yourself are he; nor 5 is there any slave in Elis of that name, except yourself.

TYND. Do you persist in reproaching me with being a slave — a thing that has befallen me through the fortune of war?

ARIST. Really, now, I cannot contain myself.

TYND. (to HEGIO). Ha! don't you hear him? Why don't you take to flight? He'll be pelting us just now with stones 15 there, unless you order him to be seized.

ARIST. I'm distracted.

TYND. His eyes strike fire; there's need of a rope, Hegio. Don't you see how his body is spotted all over with 20 livid spots? Black bile is disordering the man.

ARIST. And, by my faith, if this old gentleman is wise, black pitch will be disordering you with the executioner, and giving a light to your head.

TYND. He's now talking in his fit of delirium; sprites are in possession of the man.

HEG. By my troth, suppose I order him to be seized?

TYND. You would be acting more wisely.

ARIST. I'm vexed that I haven't a stone, to knock out the brains of that whip-scoundrel, who's driving me to madness by his taunts.

TYND. Don't you hear that he's looking for a stone?

ARIST. I wish to speak with you alone, separately, Hegio.

HEG. Speak from where you are, if you want anything; though at a distance, I shall hear you.

TYND. Yes, for, by my faith, if you approach nearer, he'll be taking your nose off with his teeth.

ARIST. By heavens, Hegio, don't you believe that I am mad, or that I ever was so, or that I have the malady which 50 that fellow avers. But if you fear anything from me, order me to be bound; I wish it, so long as that fellow is bound as well.

TYND. Why really, Hegio, rather let him be bound that wishes it.

ARIST. Now hold your tongue! I'll make you, you false Philocrates, to be found out this day to be a real Tyndarus. Why are you making signs at me?

TYND. I, making signs at you? (To HEGIO.) What would he do, if you were at a greater distance off?

HEG. What do you say? What if I 10 approach this madman?

TYND. Nonsense; you'll be made a fool of; he'll be prating stuff, to you, neither the feet nor the head of which will ever be visible. The dress only is wanting; 15 in seeing this man, you behold Ajax¹ himself.

HEG. I don't care; still I'll approach him. (Advances to ARISTOPHONTES.)

TYND. (aside.) Now am I utterly un- 20 done; now between the sacrifice and the stone do I stand, nor know I what to do.

HEG. I lend you my attention, Aristophontes, if there is anything that you would wish with me.

ARIST. From me you shall hear that truth, which now you think to be false, Hegio. But I wish, in the first place, to clear myself from this with you — that madness does not possess me, and that I 30 have no malady, except that I am in captivity; and, so may the King of Gods and of men make me to regain my native land, that fellow there is no more Philocrates than either I or you.

HEG. Come, then, tell me who he is?

ARIST. He whom I've told you all along from the beginning. If you shall find him any other than that person, I show no cause why I shouldn't suffer the 40 loss with you both of my parents and of my liberty for ever.

HEG. (to TYNDARUS.) What say you to this?

TYND. That I am your slave, and you 45 my master.

HEG. I didn't ask that — were you a free man?

TYND. I was.

ARIST. But he really wasn't; he is 50 will be meeting their end upon my back. deceiving you.

TYND. How do you know? Were upon.

you, perchance, the midwife of my mother, since you dare to affirm this so boldly?

ARIST. When a boy, I saw yourself, a boy.

TYND. But, grown up, I now see you grown up; so, there's for you, in return. If you did right, you wouldn't be troubling yourself about my concerns; do I trouble myself about yours?

HEG. Was his father called Thesau- rochrysonicocroesides?

ARIST. He was not; and I never heard that name before this day. Theodorom- edes was the father of Philocrates.

TYND. (aside.) I'm downright undone. Why don't you be quiet, heart of mine? Go and be stretched, and hang yourself; you are throbbing so, that unfortunate I can hardly stand up for my fear.

HEG. Is a full assurance given me that this was a slave in Elis, and that he is not Philocrates?

ARIST. So fully, that you will never find this to be otherwise; but where is he now?

HEG. Where I the least, and he the 25 most could wish himself. In consequence, then, I'm cut asunder, disjointed, to my sorrow, by the devices of this scoundrel, who has bamboozled me by his tricks just as he has thought fit. But do, please, have a care that you are right.

ARIST. Why, I assure you of this, as an ascertained and established fact.

HEG. For certain?

ARIST. Why, nothing, I say, will you 35 find more certain than this certainty. Philocrates, from a boy, has been my friend.

HEG. But of what appearance is your friend Philocrates?

ARIST. I'll tell you: with a thin face, sharp nose, light hair, dark eyes, somewhat ruddy, with hair rather crisp and curling.

HEG. The description is like.

TYND. (aside.) Ay, so much so, indeed, that I've this day, much to my sorrow, got into the midst of this, i' faith. Woe to those unfortunate rods which this day will be meeting their end upon my back.

HEG. I see that I've been imposed

TYND. (aside). Why, fetters, do you delay to run towards me and to embrace my legs, that I may have you in custody?

HEG. And have these two rascally captives really deceived me this day with their tricks? The other one pretended that he was the servant, and this one that he himself was the master. I've lost the kernel; for a security, I've left the shell. To such a degree have they imposed upon me, both on this side and that, with their trickeries. Still, this fellow shall never have the laugh against me. Colaphus, Cordalio, Corax (to the SLAVES), go you away and bring out the thongs.

SLAVE. Are we to be sent to gather faggots? (The SLAVES go and bring the thongs from the house.)

SCENE V

HEGIO, TYNDARUS, ARISTOPHONTES, and SLAVES.

HEG. (to the SLAVES). Put the manacles on this whipp'd villain.

TYND. (whilst the SLAVES are fastening him). What's the matter? What have I done wrong?

HEG. Do you ask the question? You weeder and sower of villainies, and in especial their reaper.

TYND. Ought you not to have ventured to say the harrower first? For countrymen always harrow before they weed.

HEG. Why, with what assurance he stands before me.

TYND. It's proper for a servant, innocent and guiltless, to be full of confidence, most especially before his master.

HEG. (to the SLAVES). Bind this fellow's hands tightly, will you.

TYND. I am your own — do you command them to be cut off even. But what is the matter on account of which you blame me?

HEG. Because me and my fortunes, so far as in you singly lay, by your rascally and knavish stratagems you have rent in pieces, and have distracted my affairs and spoiled all my resources and my plans, in that you've thus robbed me of Philocrates by your devices. I thought that he was the slave, you the free man. So did you say yourselves, and in this way did you change names between you.

TYND. I confess that all was done so, as you say, and that by a stratagem he has got away from you, through my aid and cleverness; and prithee, now, do you blame me for that, i' faith?

HEG. Why, it has been done with your extreme torture for the consequence.

TYND. So I don't die by reason of my misdeeds, I care but little. If I do die here, then he returns not, as he said he would; but when I'm dead, this act will be remembered to my honour, that I caused my captive master to return from slavery and the foe, a free man, to his father in his native land; and that I preferred rather to expose my own life to peril, than that he should be undone.

HEG. Take care, then, to enjoy that fame at Acheron.¹

TYND. He who dies for virtue's sake, still does not perish.

HEG. When I've tortured you in the most severe manner, and for your schemes put you to death, let them say either that you have perished or that you have died; so long as you do die, I don't think it matters if they say you live.

TYND. I' faith, if you do do so, you'll do it not without retribution, if he shall return here, as I trust that he will return.

ARIST. (aside). O ye immortal Gods! I understand it now; now I know what the case really is. My friend Philocrates is at liberty with his father, in his native land. 'Tis well; nor have I any person to whom I could so readily wish well. But this thing grieves me, that I've done this person a bad turn, who now on account of me and my talking is in chains.

HEG. (to TYNDARUS). Did I not forbid you this day to utter anything false to me?

TYND. You did forbid me.

HEG. Why did you dare to tell me lies?

TYND. Because the truth would have prejudiced him whom I was serving; now falsehood has advantaged him.

HEG. But it will prejudice yourself.

TYND. 'Tis very good. Still, I have saved my master, whom I rejoice at being saved, to whom my elder master has assigned me as a protector. But do you think that this was wrongly done?

HEG. Most wrongfully.

TYND. But I, who disagree with you, say, rightly. For consider, if any slave of yours had done this for your son, what thanks you would have given him. Would you have given that slave his freedom or not? Would not that slave have been in highest esteem with you? Answer me that.

HEG. I think so.

TYND. Why, then, are you angry with me?

HEG. Because you have proved more faithful to him than to myself.

TYND. How now? Did you expect, in a single night and day, for yourself to teach me — a person just made captive, a recent slave, and in his novitiate — that I should rather consult your interest than his, with whom from childhood I have passed my life?

HEG. Seek, then, thanks from him for that. (To the SLAVES.) Take him where he may receive weighty and thick fetters, thence, after that, you shall go to the quarries for cutting stone. There, while the others are digging out eight stones, unless you daily do half as much work again, you shall have the name of the six-hundred-stripe man.

ARIST. By Gods and men, I do entreat you, Hegio, not to destroy this man.

HEG. He shall be taken all care of. For at night, fastened with chains, he shall be watched; in the daytime, beneath the ground, he shall be getting out stone. For many a day will I torture him; I'll not respite him for a single day.

ARIST. Is that settled by you?

HEG. Not more settled that I shall die. (To the SLAVES.) Take him away this instant to Hippolytus, the blacksmith; bid thick fetters to be rivetted on him. From there let him be led outside the gate to my freedman, Cordalus, at the stone-quarries. And tell him that I desire this man so to be treated, that he mayn't be in any respect worse off than he who is the most severely treated.

TYND. Why, since you are unwilling, do I desire myself to survive? At your own hazard is the risk of my life. After death, no evil have I to apprehend in death. Though I should live even to extreme age, still, short is the space for enduring what you threaten me with. Farewell and prosper; although you are deserving for me to say otherwise. You, Aristophontes, as you have deserved of me, so fare you; for on your account has this befallen me.

HEG. (to the SLAVES.) Carry him off.

TYND. But this one thing I beg, that, if Philocrates should come back here, you will give me an opportunity of meeting him.

HEG. (to the SLAVES.) At your peril, if you don't this instant remove him from my sight. (The SLAVES lay hold of TYNDARUS, and push him along.)

TYND. I' troth, this really is violence, to be both dragged and pushed at the same time. (He is borne off by the SLAVES.)

SCENE VI

HEGIO and ARISTOPHONTES.

HEG. He has been led off straight to prison, as he deserves. Let no one presume to attempt such an enterprise. Had it not been for you who discovered this to me, still would they have been leading me by the bridle with their tricks. Now am I resolved henceforth never to trust any person in anything. This once I have been deceived enough; I did hope, to my sorrow, that I had rescued my son from slavery. That hope has forsaken me. I lost one son, whom, a child in his fourth year, a slave stole from me; and, indeed, never since have I found either slave or son; the elder one has fallen in the hands of the enemy. What guilt is this of mine? As though I had become the father of children for the purpose of being childless. (To ARISTOPHONTES.) Follow this way. I'll conduct you back where you were. I'm determined to have pity upon no one, since no one has pity upon me.

ARIST. Forth from my chains with evil omen did I come; now I perceive that with like ill omen to my bonds I must return. (Exeunt.)

ACT IV

SCENE I

Enter ERGASILUS.

ERG. Supreme Jove! thou dost preserve me, and dost augment my means. Plenty, extreme and sumptuous, dost thou present to me; celebrity, profit, enjoyment, mirth, festivity, holidays, sights, provisions, carousings, abundance, joyousness. And to no man have I now determined with myself to go a-begging; for I'm able either to profit my friend or to destroy my enemy, to such extent has this delightful day heaped delights upon me in its delightfulness. I have lighted upon a most rich inheritance without incumbrances. Now will I wend my way to this old gentleman Hegio, to whom I am carrying blessings as great as he himself prays for from the Gods, and even greater. Now, this is my determination, in the same fashion that the slaves of Comedy are wont, so will I throw my cloak around my neck, that from me, the first of all, he may learn this matter. And I trust that I, by reason of this news, shall find provision up to the end.

SCENE II

Enter HEGIO, at a distance.

HEG. (to himself). The more that I involve this matter in my breast, the more is my uneasiness of mind increased. That I should have been duped in this fashion to-day! and that I wasn't able to see through it! When this shall be known, then I shall be laughed at all over the city. The very moment that I shall have reached the Forum, all will be saying, "This is that clever old gentleman, who had the trick played him." But is this Ergasilus, that I see coming at a distance? Surely he has got his cloak gathered up; what, I wonder, is he going to do?

ERG. (advancing, and talking to himself). Throw aside from you all tardiness, Ergasilus, and speed on this business. I threaten, and I strictly charge no person to stand in my way, unless any one shall be of opinion that he has lived long enough. For whoever does come in my way, shall stop me upon his face. (He runs along, flourishing his arms about.)

HEG. (to himself). This fellow's beginning to box.

ERG. (to himself). I'm determined to do it; so that every one may pursue his own path, let no one be bringing any of his business in this street; for my fist is a balista,¹ my arm is my catapulta, my shoulder a battering-ram; then against whomsoever I dart my knee, I shall bring him to the ground. I'll make all persons to be picking up their teeth, whomsoever I shall meet with.

HEG. (to himself). What threatening is this? For I cannot wonder enough.

ERG. I'll make him always to remember this day and place, and myself as well. Whoever stops me upon my road, I'll make him put a stop to his own existence.

HEG. (to himself). What great thing is this fellow preparing to do, with such mighty threats?

ERG. I first give notice, that no one, by reason of his own fault, may be caught — keep yourselves in-doors at home, and guard yourselves from my attack.

HEG. (to himself). By my faith, 'tis strange if he hasn't got this boldness by means of his stomach. Woe to that wretched man, through whose cheer this fellow has become quite swaggering.

ERG. Then the bakers, that feed swine, that fatten their pigs upon refuse bran, through the stench of which no one can pass by a baker's shop; if I see the pig of any one of them in the public way, I'll beat the bran out of the masters themselves with my fists.

HEG. (to himself). Royal and imperial edicts does he give out. The fellow is full; he certainly has his boldness from his stomach.

ERG. Then the fishmongers, who supply stinking fish to the public — who are carried about on a gelding, with his galloping galling pace — the stench of whom, drives all the loungers in the Basilica¹ into the Forum. I'll bang their heads with their bulrush fish-baskets, that they may understand what annoyance they cause to the noses of other people. And then the butchers, as well, who render the sheep destitute of their young — who agree with you about killing lamb, and then offer you lamb at double the price — who give the name of wether mutton to a ram — if I should only see that ram in the public way, I'll make both ram and owner most miserable beings.

¹ An ancient cannon-like machine, for war; and a large engine of war for throwing lances, stones etc.

HEG. (to himself). Well done! He really does give out edicts fit for an Ædile,² and 'tis indeed a surprising thing if the Ætolians haven't made him inspector of markets.

ERG. No Parasite now am I, but a right royal king of kings; so large a stock of provision for my stomach is there at hand in the harbour. But why delay to overwhelm this old gentleman Hegio with gladness? With him, not a person among mankind exists equally fortunate.

HEG. (apart). What joy is this, that he, thus joyous, is going to impart to me?

ERG. (knocking at HEGIO'S door). Hallo, hallo! — where are you? Is any one coming to open this door?

HEG. (apart). This fellow's betaking himself to my house to dine.

ERG. Open you both these doors, before I shall with knocking cause the destruction, piecemeal, of the doors.

HEG. (apart). I'd like much to address the fellow. (Aloud.) Ergasilus!

ERG. Who's calling Ergasilus?

HEG. Turn round, and look at me.

ERG. (not seeing who it is). A thing that Fortune does not do for you, nor ever will do, you bid me to do. But who is it?

HEG. Look round at me. 'Tis Hegio.

ERG. (turning round). O me! Best of the very best of men, as many as exist, you have arrived opportunely.

HEG. You've met with some one at the harbour to dine with; through that you are elevated.

ERG. Give me your hand.

HEG. My hand?

ERG. Give me your hand, I say, this instant.

HEG. Take it. (Giving him his hand.)

ERG. Rejoice.

HEG. Why should I rejoice?

ERG. Because I bid you; come now, rejoice.

HEG. I' faith, my sorrows exceed my rejoicings.

ERG. 'Tis not so, as you shall find; I'll at once drive away every spot of sorrow from your body. Rejoice without restraint.

HEG. I do rejoice, although I don't at all know why I should rejoice.

ERG. You do rightly; now order —

HEG. Order what?

ERG. A large fire to be made.

HEG. A large fire?

ERG. So I say, that a huge one it must be.

HEG. What, you vulture, do you suppose that for your sake I'm going to set my house on fire?

ERG. Don't be angry. Will you order, or will you not order, the pots to be put on, and the saucepans to be washed out, the bacon and the dainties to be made warm in the heated cooking-stoves, another one, too, to go purchase the fish?

HEG. This fellow's dreaming while awake.

ERG. Another to buy pork, and lamb, and pullets.

HEG. You understand how to feed well, if you had the means.

ERG. Gammons of bacon, too, and lampreys, spring pickled tunny-fish, mackerel, and sting-ray; large fish, too, and soft cheese.

HEG. You will have more opportunity, Ergasilus, here at my house, of talking about these things than of eating them.

ERG. Do you suppose that I'm saying this on my own account?

HEG. You will neither be eating nothing here to-day, nor yet much more than usual, so don't you be mistaken. Do you then bring an appetite to my house for 50 your every-day fare.

ERG. Why, I'll so manage it, that you

¹ A public building in the Forum, used as an exchange.

² A magistrate in charge of buildings, streets, markets, etc.

yourself shall wish to be profuse, though I myself should desire you not.

HEG. What, I?

ERG. Yes, you.

HEG. Then you are my master.

ERG. Yes, and a kindly disposed one. Do you wish me to make you happy?

HEG. Certainly I would, rather than miserable.

ERG. Give me your hand.

HEG. (extending his hand). Here is my hand.

ERG. All the Gods are blessing you.

HEG. I don't feel it so.

ERG. Why, you are not in a quickset hedge, therefore you don't feel it; but order the vessels, in a clean state, to be got for you forthwith in readiness for the sacrifice, and one lamb to be brought here with all haste, a fat one.

HEG. Why?

ERG. That you may offer sacrifice.

HEG. To which one of the Gods?

ERG. To myself, I' faith, for now am I your supreme Jupiter. I likewise am your salvation, your fortune, your life, your delight, your joy. Do you at once, then, make this Divinity propitious to you by cramming him.

HEG. You seem to me to be hungry.

ERG. For myself am I hungry, and not for you.

HEG. I readily allow of it at your own good will.

ERG. I believe you; from a boy you were in the habit —

HEG. May Jupiter and the Gods confound you.

ERG. I' troth, 'tis fair that for my news you should return me thanks; such great happiness do I now bring you from the harbour.

HEG. Now you are flattering me. Begone, you simpleton; you have arrived behind time, too late.

ERG. If I had come sooner, then for that reason you might rather have said that. Now, receive this joyous news of me which I bring you; for at the harbour I just now saw your son Philopolemus in the common fly-boat, alive, safe and sound, and likewise there that other young man together with him, and Stalagmus your slave, who fled from your house, who stole from you your little son, the child of four years old.

5 HEG. Away with you to utter perdition! You are trifling with me.

ERG. So may holy Gluttony love me, Hegio, and so may she ever dignify me with her name, I did see —

10 HEG. My son?

ERG. Your son, and my good Genius.

HEG. That Elean captive, too?

ERG. Yes, by Apollo.

HEG. The slave, too? My slave Stalagmus, he that stole my son —?

ERG. Yes, by Cora.

HEG. So long a time ago?

ERG. Yes, by Præneste!

HEG. Is he arrived?

20 ERG. Yes, by Signia!

HEG. For sure?

ERG. Yes, by Phrysinone!

HEG. Have care, if you please.

ERG. Yes, by Alatrium!

HEG. Why are you swearing by foreign cities?

ERG. Why, because they are just as disagreeable as you were declaring your fare to be.

30 HEG. Woe be to you!

ERG. Because that you don't believe me at all in what I say in sober earnestness. But of what country was Stalagmus, at the time when he departed hence?

HEG. A Sicilian.

ERG. But now he is not a Sicilian — he is a Boian¹; he has got a Boian woman. A wife, I suppose, has been given to him for the sake of obtaining children.

HEG. Tell me, have you said these words to me in good earnest?

ERG. In good earnest.

HEG. Immortal Gods, I seem to be 45 born again, if you are telling the truth.

ERG. Do you say so? Will you still entertain doubts, when I have solemnly sworn to you? In fine, Hegio, if you have little confidence in my oath, go yourself to the harbour and see.

HEG. I'm determined to do so. Do you arrange in-doors what's requisite. Use,

ask for, take from my larder what you like; I appoint you cellarman.

ERG. Now, by my troth, if I have not prophesied truly to you, do you comb me out with a cudgel.

HEG. I'll find you in victuals to the end, if you are telling me the truth.

ERG. Whence shall it be?

HEG. From myself and from my son.

ERG. Do you promise that?

HEG. I do promise it.

ERG. But I, in return, promise you that your son has arrived.

HEG. Manage as well as ever you can.

ERG. A happy walk there to you, and a happy walk back. (Exit HEGIO.)

ERGASILUS, alone.

ERG. He has gone away from here, and has entrusted to me the most important concern of catering. Immortal Gods, how I shall now be slicing necks off of sides; how vast a downfall will befall the gammon; how vast a belabouring the bacon! How great a using-up of udders, how vast a bewailing for the brawn! How great a bestirring for the butchers, how great a preparation for the porksellers! But if I were to enumerate the rest of the things which minister to the supply of the stomach, 'twould be sheer delay. Now will I go off to my government, to give laws to the bacon, and, those gammons that are hanging uncondemned, to give aid to them. (Goes into the house.)

ACT V

SCENE I

Enter a LAD, a servant of HEGIO.

LAD. May Jupiter and the Deities condemn you, Ergasilus, and your stomach, and all Parasites, and every one who henceforth shall give a dinner to Parasites. Destruction and devastation and ruin have just now entered our house. I was afraid that he would be making an attack on me, as though he had been an hungry wolf. And very dreadfully, upon my faith, was I frightened at him; he made such a gnashing with his teeth. On his arrival, the whole larder, with the meat, he turned upside down. He seized a knife, and first cut off the kernels of the neck from three sides. All the pots and cups he broke, except those that held a couple of gallons; of the cook he made enquiry whether the salting pans could be set on the fire to be made hot. All the cellars in the house he has broken into, and has laid the store-closet open. (At the door.) Watch him, servants, if you please; I'll go to meet the old gentleman. I'll tell him to get ready some provisions for his own self, if, indeed, he wishes himself to make use of any. For in this place, as this man, indeed, is managing, either there's nothing already, or very soon there will be nothing. (Exit.)

20

SCENE II

Enter HEGIO, PHILOPOLEMUS, PHILOCRATES, and, behind them, STALAGMUS.

HEG. To Jove and to the Deities I return with reason hearty thanks, inasmuch as they have restored you to your father, and inasmuch as they have delivered me from very many afflictions, which, while I was obliged to be here without you, I was enduring, and inasmuch as I see that that fellow (pointing to STALAGMUS) is in my power, and inasmuch as his word (pointing to PHILOCRATES) has been found true to me.

PHILOP. Enough now have I grieved from my very soul, and enough with care and tears have I disquieted myself. Enough now have I heard of your woes, which at the harbour you told me of. Let us now to this business.

PHIL. What now, since I've kept my word with you, and have caused him to be restored back again to freedom?

HEG. Philocrates, you have acted so that I can never return you thanks enough, in the degree that you merit from myself and my son.

PHILOP. Nay, but you can, father, and you will be able, and I shall be able; and the Divinities will give the means for you to return the kindness he merits to one who deserves so highly of us; as, my father, you are able to do to this person who so especially deserves it.

45

HEG. What need is there of words? I have no tongue with which to deny whatever you may ask of me.

PHIL. I ask of you to restore to me that servant whom I left here as a surety for myself; who has always proved more faithful to me than to himself; in order that for his services I may be enabled to give him 10 a reward.

HEG. Because you have acted thus kindly, the favour shall be returned, the thing that you ask; both that and anything else that you shall ask of me, you shall obtain. And I would not have you blame me, because in my anger I have treated him harshly.

PHIL. What have you done?

HEG. I confined him in fetters at the 20 stone-quarries, when I found out that I had been imposed upon.

PHIL. Ah wretched me! That for my safety misfortunes should have happened to that best of men.

HEG. Now, on this account, you need not give me even one groat of silver for him. Receive him of me without cost that he may be free.

PHIL. On my word, Hegio, you act with 30 kindness; but I entreat that you will order this man to be sent for.

HEG. Certainly. (To the attendants, who immediately obey.) Where are you? Go this instant, and bring Tyndarus here. 35 (To PHILOPOLEMUS and PHILOCRAATES.) Do you go in-doors; in the meantime, I wish to enquire of this statue for whipping, what was done with my younger son. Do you go bathe in the meantime.

PHILOP. Philocrates, follow me this way in-doors.

PHIL. I follow you. (They go into the house.)

SCENE III

HEGIO and STALAGMUS.

HEG. Come you, step this way, you worst fellow, my fine slave.

STAL. What is fitting for me to do, when you, such a man as you are, are speaking false? I was never a handsome, or a fine, or a good person, or an honest one, nor shall I ever be; assuredly, don't you be forming any hopes that I shall be honest.

5 HEG. You easily understand pretty well in what situation your fortunes are. If you shall prove truth-telling, you'll make your lot from bad somewhat better. Speak out, then, correctly and truthfully; but never yet truthfully or correctly have you acted.

STAL. Do you think that I'm ashamed to own it, when you affirm it?

HEG. But I'll make you to be ashamed; 15 for I'll cause you to be blushes all over.

STAL. Heyday — you're threatening stripes, I suppose, to me, quite unaccustomed to them! Away with them, I beg. Tell me what you bring, that you may carry off hence what you are in want of.

HEG. Very fluent indeed. But now I wish this prating to be cut short.

25 STAL. As you desire, so be it done.

HEG. (to the AUDIENCE). As a boy he was very obedient; now that suits him not. Let's to this business; now give your attention, and inform me upon what I ask. If you tell the truth, you'll make your fortunes somewhat better.

STAL. That's mere trifling. Don't you think that I know what I'm deserving of?

HEG. Still, it is in your power to escape 35 a small portion of it, if not the whole.

STAL. A small portion I shall escape, I know; but much will befall me, and with my deserving it, because I both ran away, 40 and stole your son and sold him.

HEG. To what person?

STAL. To Theodoromedes the Polyplusian, in Elis, for six minæ.

HEG. O ye immortal Gods! He surely 45 is the father of this person, Philocrates.

STAL. Why, I know him better than yourself, and have seen him more times.

HEG. Supreme Jove, preserve both 50 myself and my son for me. (He goes to the door, and calls aloud.) Philocrates, by your good Genius, I do entreat you, come out, I want you.

SCENE IV

Enter PHILOCRATES, from the house.

PHIL. Hegio, here am I; if you want anything of me, command me.

HEG. He (pointing to STALAGMUS) declares that he sold my son to your father, in Elis, for six minæ.

PHIL. (to STALAGMUS). How long since did that happen?

STAL. This is the twentieth year, commencing from it.

PHIL. He is speaking falsely.

STAL. Either I or you do. Why, your father gave you the little child, of four years old, to be your own slave.

PHIL. What was his name? If you are speaking the truth, tell me that, then.

STAL. Pægnium, he used to be called; afterwards, you gave him the name of Tyndarus.

PHIL. Why don't I recollect you?

STAL. Because it's the fashion for persons to forget, and not to know him whose favour is esteemed as worth nothing.

PHIL. Tell me, was he the person whom you sold to my father, who was given me for my private service?

STAL. It was his son (pointing to HEGIO).

HEG. Is this person now living?

STAL. I received the money. I cared nothing about the rest.

HEG. (to PHILOCRATES). What do you say?

PHIL. Why, this very Tyndarus is your son, according, indeed, to the proofs that he mentions. For, a boy himself together with me from boyhood was he brought up, virtuously and modestly, even to manhood.

HEG. I am both unhappy and happy, if you are telling the truth. Unhappy for this reason, because, if he is my son, I have badly treated him. Alas! why have I done both more and less than was his due. That I have ill treated him I am grieved; would that it only could be undone. But see, he's coming here, in a guise not according to his deserts.

SCENE V

Enter TYNDARUS, in chains, led in by the SERVANTS.

TYND. (to himself). I have seen many of the torments which take place at Acheron often represented in paintings; but most certainly there is no Acheron equal to where I have been in the stone-quarries. There, in fine, is the place where real lassitude must be undergone by the body in laboriousness. For when I came there, just as either jackdaws, or ducks, or quails, are given to Patrician children, for them to play with, so in like fashion, when I arrived, a crow was given me with which to amuse myself. But see, my master's before the door; and lo! my other master has returned from Elis.

HEG. Hail to you, my much wished-for son.

TYND. Ha! how — my son? Ay, ay, I know why you pretend yourself to be the father, and me to be the son; it is because, just as parents do, you give me the means of seeing the light.

PHIL. Ha! to you, Tyndarus.

TYND. And to you, for whose sake I am enduring these miseries.

PHIL. But now I'll make you in freedom come to wealth. For (pointing to HEGIO) this is your father; (pointing to STALAGMUS) that is the slave who stole you away from here when four years old, and sold you to my father for six minæ. He gave you, when a little child, to me a little child for my own service. He (pointing to STALAGMUS) has made a confession, for we have brought him back from Elis.

TYND. How, where's Hegio's son?

PHIL. Look now; in-doors is your own brother.

TYND. How do you say? Have you brought that captive son of his?

PHIL. Why, he's in-doors, I say.

TYND. By my faith, you've done both well and happily.

PHIL. (pointing to HEGIO). Now this is your own father; (pointing to STALAGMUS) this is the thief who stole you when a little child.

TYND. But now, grown up, I shall give him grown up to the executioner for his thieving.

PHIL. He deserves it.

TYND. I' faith, I'll deservedly give him the reward that he deserves. (To HEGIO.) But tell me, I pray you, are you my father?

HEG. I am he, my son.

TYND. Now, at length, I bring it to my recollection, when I reconsider with myself: troth, I do now at last recall to memory that I had heard, as though through a mist, that my father was called Hegio.

HEG. I am he.

PHIL. I pray that your son may be lightened of these fetters, and this slave be loaded with them.

HEG. I'm resolved that that shall be the first thing attended to. Let's go in-doors, that the blacksmith may be sent for, in order that I may remove those fetters from you, and give them to him. (They go into the house.)

STAL. To one who has no savings of his own, you'll be rightly doing so.

The COMPANY of PLAYERS coming forward.

Spectators, this play is founded on chaste manners. No wenching is there in this, and no intriguing, no exposure of a child, no cheating out of money; and no young man in love here makes his mistress free without his father's knowledge. The Poets find but few Comedies of this kind, where good men might become better. Now, if it pleases you, and if we have pleased you, and have not been tedious, do you give this sign of it: you who wish that chaste manners should have their reward, give us your applause.

PHILOSOPHY

HEBREW

THE BOOK OF JOB

The Book of Job is a symposium in which are set forth various representative opinions concerning the justice of God. The discussion is set in motion by the widely known story of a just and patient man tried by adversity. Job, after being subjected to a series of almost unbearable misfortunes, at length speaks forth his doubt of God's justice. He is answered by his friends in a series of speeches. The conclusion, which is probably of later composition than the rest of the book, gives the final solution of the problem in a powerful and stirring nature poem which describes the vastness and inscrutability of God's ways.

CHAPTER I

1 There was a man in the land of Uz,¹ whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil.

2 And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters.

3 His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, 10 and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

4 And his sons went and feasted in their 15 houses, every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters to eat and to drink with them.

5 And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent 20 and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. 25 Thus did Job continually.

6 ¶ Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD,² and Satan came also among them.

7 And the LORD said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

8 And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there 5 is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?

9 Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought?

10 Hast not thou made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land.

11 But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.

12 And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.

13 ¶ And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking 25 wine in their eldest brother's house:

14 And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were ploughing, and the asses feeding beside them:

15 And the Sabeans³ fell upon them, 30 and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

16 While he was yet speaking, there

² Three great literary works open in Heaven: the Odyssey, Faust, and Job.

³ A nomadic tribe prowling over the districts to the north of Arabia.

came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

17 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans¹ made out three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

18 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house:

19 And, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

20 Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped,

21 And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither; the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD.

22 In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

CHAPTER II

1 Again there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the LORD.

2 And the LORD said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

3 And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause.

4 And Satan answered the LORD, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life.

5 But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face.

6 And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.

7 ¶ So went Satan forth from the presence of the LORD, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown.

8 And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes.

9 ¶ Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God, and die.

10 But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

11 ¶ Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him, and to comfort him.

12 And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice, and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven.

13 So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

CHAPTER III

1 After this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day.

2 And Job spake, and said,

3 Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived.

4 Let that day be darkness; let not God regard it from above, neither let the light shine upon it.

¹ An ancient tribe dwelling between the Tigris and the Euphrates.

5 Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it; let a cloud dwell upon it; let the blackness of the day terrify it.

6 As for that night, let darkness seize upon it; let it not be joined unto the days of the year; let it not come into the number of the months.

7 Lo, let that night be solitary; let no joyful voice come therein.

8 Let them curse it that curse the day, 10 who are ready to raise up their mourning.

9 Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark; let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day:

10 Because it shut not up the doors of my mother's womb, nor hid sorrow from mine eyes.

11 Why died I not from the womb? why did I not give up the ghost when I 20 came out of the belly?

12 Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breasts that I should suck?

13 For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept: then had 25 I been at rest,

14 With kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves;

15 Or with princes that had gold, who 30 filled their houses with silver:

16 Or as a hidden untimely birth I had not been; as infants which never saw light.

17 There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest. 35

18 There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor.

19 The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master.

20 Wherefore is light given to him 40 that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul;

21 Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures;

22 Which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave?

23 Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in?

24 For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters.

25 For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me.

26 I was not in safety, neither had I 5 rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came.

CHAPTER IV

1 Then Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

2 If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? but who can withhold himself from speaking?

15 3 Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands.

4 Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees.

5 But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled.

6 Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways?

7 Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off?

8 Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

1 Then the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said,

2 Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?

3 Gird up now thy loins like a man; 5 for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.

4 Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding.

45 5 Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it?

6 Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner 50 stone thereof;

7 When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?

8 Or who shut up the sea with doors, when it brake forth, as if it had issued out of the womb?

9 When I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddling band for it,

10 And brake up for it my decreed place, and set bars and doors,

11 And said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed?

12 Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days; and caused the dayspring to know his place;

13 That it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it?

14 It is turned as clay to the seal; and they stand as a garment.

15 And from the wicked their light is withholden, and the high arm shall be broken.

16 Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea? or hast thou walked in the search of the depth?

17 Have the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?

18 Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth? declare if thou knowest it all.

19 Where is the way where light dwelleth? and as for darkness, where is the place thereof,

20 That thou shouldest take it to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldest know the paths to the house thereof?

21 Knowest thou it, because thou wast then born? or because the number of thy days is great?

22 Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow? or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail,

23 Which I have reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war?

24 By what way is the light parted, which scattereth the east wind upon the earth?

25 Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of waters, or a way for the lightning of thunder;

26 To cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is; on the wilderness, wherein there is no man;

27 To satisfy the desolate and waste ground; and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth?

28 Hath the rain a father? or who hath begotten the drops of dew?

29 Out of whose womb came the ice? and the hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?

30 The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the deep is frozen.

31 Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades,¹ or loose the bands of Orion?²

32 Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth³ in his season? or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?

33 Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth?

34 Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee?

35 Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?

36 Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart?

37 Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven,

38 When the dust groweth into hardness, and the clods cleave fast together?

39 Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? or fill the appetite of the young lions,

40 When they couch in their dens, and abide in the covert to lie in wait?

41 Who provideth for the raven his food? when his young ones cry unto God, they wander for lack of meat.

CHAPTER XXXIX

1 Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?

² By "bands of Orion" are probably meant the cords by which the constellation is, as it were, drawn.

³ A constellation, perhaps Jupiter or Venus.

2 Canst thou number the months that they fulfil? or knowest thou the time when they bring forth?

3 They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows.

4 Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them.

5 Who hath sent out the wild ass free? 10 or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?

6 Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings.

7 He scorneth the multitude of the city, 15 neither regardeth he the crying of the driver.

8 The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing.

9 Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib?

10 Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee?

11 Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great? or wilt thou leave thy labour to him?

12 Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy 30 barn?

13 Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?

14 Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, 35 and warmeth them in the dust,

15 And forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them.

16 She is hardened against her young 40 ones, as though they were not hers: her labour is in vain without fear;

17 Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding.

18 What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider.

19 Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?

20 Canst thou make him afraid as a 50 grasshopper? the glory of his nostrils is terrible.

21 He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men.

22 He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the 5 sword.

23 The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield.

24 He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage: neither believeth he 10 that it is the sound of the trumpet.

25 He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

26 Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, 15 and stretch her wings toward the south?

27 Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high?

28 She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the 20 strong place.

29 From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off.

30 Her young ones also suck up blood: and where the slain are, there is she.

CHAPTER XL

1 Moreover the LORD answered Job, and said,

2 Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? he that reproveth God, let him answer it.

3 ¶ Then Job answered the LORD, and said,

4 Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth.

5 Once have I spoken; but I will not answer: yea, twice; but I will proceed no 5 further.

6 ¶ Then answered the LORD unto Job out of the whirlwind, and said,

7 Gird up thy loins now like a man: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto 45 me.

8 Wilt thou also disannul my judgment? wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?

9 Hast thou an arm like God? or canst thou thunder with a voice like him?

10 Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency; and array thyself with glory and beauty.

11 Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath: and behold every one that is proud, and abase him.

12 Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low; and tread down the wicked in their place.

13 Hide them in the dust together; and bind their faces in secret.

14 Then will I also confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee. 10 of him?

15 ¶ Behold now behemoth,¹ which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox.

16 Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly.

17 He moveth his tail like a cedar: the 15 sinews of his stones are wrapped together.

18 His bones are as strong pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron.

19 He is the chief of the ways of God: he that made him can make his sword to 20 approach unto him.

20 Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play.

21 He lieth under the shady trees, in 25 the covert of the reed, and fens.

22 The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about.

23 Behold, he drinketh up a river, and 30 hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth.

24 He taketh it with his eyes: his nose pierceth through snares.

CHAPTER XLI

1 Canst thou draw out leviathan ² with a hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down?

2 Canst thou put a hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn?

3 Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee?

4 Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever?

5 Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?

6 Shall the companions make a banquet of him? shall they part him among the merchants?

7 Canst thou fill his skin with barbed 5 irons? or his head with fish spears?

8 Lay thine hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more.

9 Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight 10 of him?

10 None is so fierce that dare stir him up: who then is able to stand before me?

11 Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine.

12 I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion.

13 Who can discover the face of his garment? or who can come to him with his double bridle?

14 Who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about.

15 His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal.

16 One is so near to another, that no air can come between them.

17 They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered.

18 By his neesings ³ a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning.

19 Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out.

35 20 Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or caldron.

21 His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth.

40 22 In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him.

23 The flakes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved.

45 24 His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether mill-stone.

25 When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid: by reason of breakings they purify themselves.

50 26 The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold: the spear, the dart, nor the habergeon.

27 He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood.

28 The arrow cannot make him flee: sling stones are turned with him into stubble.

29 Darts are counted as stubble: he laugheth at the shaking of a spear.

30 Sharp stones are under him: he spreadeth sharp pointed things upon the mire.

31 He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.

32 He maketh a path to shine after him; one would think the deep to be hoary.

33 Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear.

34 He beholdeth all high things: he is a king over all the children of pride.

CHAPTER XLII

1 Then Job answered the LORD, and said,

2 I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought can be withholden from thee.

3 Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.

4 Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

5 I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee:

6 Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

7 ¶ And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.

8 Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

9 So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the LORD commanded them: the LORD also accepted Job.

10 And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before.

11 Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold.

12 So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses.

13 He had also seven sons and three daughters.

14 And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Kerenhappuch.

15 And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren.

16 After this lived Job a hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations.

17 So Job died, being old and full of days.

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES

This collection, written about 250 B.C., and ascribed to a writer who called himself Koheleth (Preacher ¹), contains little if any distinctly religious material. It sets forth in pleasing language a gently cynical philosophy somewhat like that of the Persian Omar (see p. 453). Successive generations of commentators and editors have striven to endow the utterances of Koheleth with a definite religious significance; but their essentially non-religious character has kept them from figuring largely in devotional literature. This book remains in the minds of most readers a somewhat whimsically sad dissertation on the vanity of life by an urbane and polished writer who loves life but does not allow it to deceive him. The author's reference to himself as the son of David is believed to be merely a literary device.

CHAPTER I

1 The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem.

2 Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity.

3 What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?

4 One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever.

5 The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose.

6 The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits.

7 All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full: unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again.

8 All things are full of labour; man cannot utter it: the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing.

9 The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun.

10 Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us.

11 There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after.

12 ¶ I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem.

13 And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man to be exercised therewith.

14 I have seen all the works, that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

15 That which is crooked cannot be made straight: and that which is wanting cannot be numbered.

16 I communed with mine own heart, saying, Lo, I am come to great estate, and have gotten more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem: yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge.

17 And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit.

18 For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

CHAPTER II

1 I said in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth; therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold, this also is vanity.

2 I said of laughter, It is mad: and of mirth, What doeth it?

3 I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine, yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom; and to lay hold on folly, till I might see what was that good for the sons of men, which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life.

4 I made me great works; I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards:

5 I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits:

6 I made me pools of water, to water

¹ The general sense of the Hebrew name is "debater" or "speaker in the assembly," not "preacher."

therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees:

7 I got me servants and maidens, and had servants born in my house; also I had great possessions of great and small cattle above all that were in Jerusalem before me:

8 I gathered me also silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces: I gat me men singers and women singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts.

9 So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem: also my wisdom remained with me.

10 And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labour: and this was my portion of all my labour.

11 Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun.

12 ¶ And I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness, and folly: for what can the man do that cometh after the king? even that which hath been already done.

13 Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness.

14 The wise man's eyes are in his head; but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that one event happeneth to them all.

15 Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity.

16 For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool.

17 Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

18 ¶ Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me.

19 And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity.

20 Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun.

21 For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil.

22 For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun?

23 For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity.

24 ¶ There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God.

25 For who can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?

26 For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

CHAPTER III

1 To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven:

2 A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted;

3 A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down, and a time to build up;

4 A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance;

5 A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing;

6 A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away;

7 A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak;

8 A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace.

CHAPTER IV

9 What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboureth?

10 I have seen the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it.

11 He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end.

12 I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life.

13 And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God.

14 I know that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it: and God doeth it, that men should fear before him.

15 That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been; and God requireth that which is past.

16 ¶ And moreover I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there.

17 I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work.

18 I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts.

19 For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preëminence above a beast: for all is vanity.

20 All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again.

21 Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?

22 Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?

1 So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter.

2 Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living which are yet alive.

3 Yea, better is he than both they, which hath not yet been, who hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun.

4 ¶ Again, I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. This is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

5 The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh.

6 Better is a handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit.

7 ¶ Then I returned, and I saw vanity under the sun.

8 There is one alone, and there is not a second; yea, he hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of all his labour; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good? This is also vanity, yea, it is a sore travail.

9 ¶ Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour.

10 For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up.

11 Again, if two lie together, then they have heat: but how can one be warm alone?

12 And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken.

13 ¶ Better is a poor and a wise child, than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished.

14 For out of prison he cometh to reign; whereas also he that is born in his kingdom becometh poor.

15 I considered all the living which walk under the sun, with the second child that shall stand up in his stead.

16 There is no end of all the people, even of all that have been before them: they also that come after shall not rejoice in him. Surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

CHAPTER V

1 Keep thy foot, when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear, than to give the sacrifice of fools: for they consider not that they do evil.

2 Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God: for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few.

3 For a dream cometh through the multitude of business; and a fool's voice is known by multitude of words.

4 When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed.

5 Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay.

6 Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel, that it was an error: wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thine hands?

7 For in the multitude of dreams and many words there are also divers vanities: but fear thou God.

8 ¶ If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they.

9 ¶ Moreover the profit of the earth is for all: the king himself is served by the field.

10 He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity.

11 When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes?

12 The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep.

13 There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt.

14 But those riches perish by evil travail: and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand.

15 As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand.

16 And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came, so shall he go: and what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind?

17 All his days also he eateth in darkness, and he hath much sorrow and wrath with his sickness.

18 ¶ Behold that which I have seen: it is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion.

19 Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God.

20 For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart.

CHAPTER VI

1 There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men:

2 A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease.

3 ¶ If a man beget a hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he.

4 For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness.

5 Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other.

6 ¶ Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place?

7 All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled.

8 For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to 10 walk before the living?

9 ¶ Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire: this is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

10 That which hath been is named 15 already, and it is known that it is man: neither may he contend with him that is mightier than he.

11 ¶ Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better?

12 For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?

CHAPTER VII

1 A good name is better than precious ointment; and the day of death than the 30 day of one's birth.

2 ¶ It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to his heart.

3 Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better.

4 The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in 40 the house of mirth.

5 It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools.

6 For as the crackling of thorns under 45 a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity.

7 ¶ Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad; and a gift destroyeth the heart.

8 Better is the end of a thing than the 50 beginning thereof: and the patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit.

9 Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry: for anger resteth in the bosom of fools.

10 Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this.

11 ¶ Wisdom is good with an inheritance: and by it there is profit to them that see the sun.

12 For wisdom is a defence, and money is a defence: but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life to them that have it.

13 Consider the work of God: for who 15 can make that straight, which he hath made crooked?

14 In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him.

15 All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there 25 is a wicked man that longeth his life in his wickedness.

16 Be not righteous over much, neither make thyself over wise: why shouldest thou destroy thyself?

17 Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldest thou die before thy time?

18 It is good that thou shouldest take hold of this; yea, also from this withdraw 35 not thine hand: for he that feareth God shall come forth of them all.

19 Wisdom strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city.

20 For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not.

21 Also take no heed unto all words that are spoken; lest thou hear thy servant curse thee:

22 For oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise hast cursed others.

23 ¶ All this have I proved by wisdom: I said, I will be wise; but it was far from 50 me.

24 That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out?

25 I applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness:

26 And I find more bitter than death the woman, whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her.

27 Behold, this have I found, saith the Preacher, counting one by one, to find out the account;

28 Which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found.

29 Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.¹

CHAPTER VIII

1 Who is as the wise man? and who knoweth the interpretation of a thing? a man's wisdom maketh his face to shine, and the boldness of his face shall be changed.

2 I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment, and that in regard of the oath of God.

3 Be not hasty to go out of his sight: stand not in an evil thing; for he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him.

4 Where the word of a king is, there is power: and who may say unto him, What doest thou?

5 Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing: and a wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment.

6 ¶ Because to every purpose there is time and judgment, therefore the misery of man is great upon him.

7 For he knoweth not that which shall be: for who can tell him when it shall be?

8 There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death: and there is no discharge in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

9 All this have I seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: there is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt.

10 And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity.

11 Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.

12 ¶ Though a sinner do evil a hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him:

13 But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God.

14 There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous: I said that this also is vanity.

15 Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun.

16 ¶ When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes:)

17 Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it.

CHAPTER IX

1 For all this I considered in my heart even to declare all this, that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God: no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them.

2 All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath.

3 This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.

4 ¶ For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion.

5 For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten.

6 Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun.

7 ¶ Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works.

8 Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment.

9 Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun.

10 Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

11 ¶ I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all.

12 For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

13 ¶ This wisdom have I seen also under the sun, and it seemed great unto me:

14 There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it.

15 Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man.

16 Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard.

17 The words of wise men are heard in quiet more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools.

18 Wisdom is better than weapons of war: but one sinner destroyeth much good.

CHAPTER X

1 Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.

2 A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart at his left.

3 Yea also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way, his wisdom faileth him, and he saith to every one that he is a fool.

4 If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, leave not thy place; for yielding pacifieth great offences.

5 There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as an error which proceedeth from the ruler:

6 Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low place.

7 I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth.

8 He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whoso breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him.

9 Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby.

10 If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength: but wisdom is profitable to direct.

11 Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment; and a babbler is no better.

12 The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious; but the lips of a fool will swallow up himself.

13 The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness: and the end of his talk is mischievous madness.

14 A fool also is full of words: a man cannot tell what shall be; and what shall be after him, who can tell him?

15 The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them, because he knoweth not how to go to the city.

16 ¶ Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning!

17 Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles, and thy princes eat in due season, for strength, and not for drunkenness!

18 ¶ By much slothfulness the building decayeth; and through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through.

19 ¶ A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry: but money answereth all things.

20 ¶ Curse not the king, no not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bedchamber: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

CHAPTER XI

1 Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.

2 Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.

3 If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be.

4 He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap.

5 As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child:

even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all.

6 In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.

7 ¶ Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun:

8 But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity.

9 ¶ Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

10 Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh: for childhood and youth are vanity.

CHAPTER XII

1 Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them;

2 While the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, nor the clouds return after the rain:

3 In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows be darkened,

4 And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird, and all the daughters of music shall be brought low;

5 Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail: because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets:

6 Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.

7 Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

8 ¶ Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity.

9 And moreover, because the Preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he gave good heed, and sought out, and set in order many proverbs.

10 The Preacher sought to find out acceptable words: and that which was written was upright, even words of truth.

11 The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd.¹

5 12 And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh.

13 ¶ Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man.

14 For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether 15 it be good, or whether it be evil.

PLATO

(427-347 B.C.)

Next to Aristotle, Plato was the greatest of Greek philosophers. He was born of noble parents in Athens. He was fully instructed in all the important philosophies of his time; but the most important influence in moulding his ideas was the teaching of Socrates, with whom he was associated for about eight years. The ideas of Socrates, possibly reinforced by the disastrous outcome of the Peloponnesian Wars, impelled him to consider reforms that would alter the whole character of Athenian civilization. Upon the death of Socrates he went to Megara to study under Euclid. Later he traveled widely for the purpose of enlarging his knowledge of the world and his view of life. He then returned to Athens to undertake his life work. He began by attacking the educational ideas of the Sophists, and the corruption of public life by vain oratorical show. He gathered about him a group of followers and withdrew from public life to acquire knowledge. His pursuit of knowledge took him, in 390 B.C., to Italy, where he went to study the doctrines of Pythagoras. He also visited the court of the tyrant Dionysius of Syracuse, who received him with great enthusiasm, but found it impossible to put up with Plato's candor, and sold him as a slave to some Spartan emissaries. He was later ransomed, and returned to Athens, where he founded the celebrated "Academy" in 387 B.C. Here he hoped to provide the proper education for those who by reason of their natural gifts and social position were destined to fill positions of power. His plans for direct reform in Athens were abandoned and he retired from all public activity. The death of the tyrant of Syracuse, however, renewed his hopes of accomplishing some practical results, even though not in Athens. He accordingly journeyed to Syracuse to enlist the interest of the new ruler. Although he was courteously received, so that he had reason to hope for some practical co-operation, the final outcome of the project was a failure, which served to emphasize in Plato's mind the folly of depending upon princes. He returned to his work and busied himself with study and writing until the day of his death.

We have Plato's work almost entire. Yet in the remains that have come down to us there seems to be much that is not Plato's. The date and provenience of the separate works, moreover, are still uncertain. The philosophical discourses are arranged in the form of dialogues in which Socrates is the chief speaker. The general tendency in all but the earlier dialogues, however, is away from the philosophical ideas of Socrates. Plato's philosophical ideas have exerted a profound influence on the thought of every generation since his time. Not every age read Plato in the original, but every age felt the impress of his utterances, either directly or indirectly. Among the most influential of Plato's teachings is that involved in his "doctrine of ideas," according to which such abstract conceptions as truth, virtue, and goodness correspond to ideas that exist in the mind of a Supreme Being. Christianity made great use of this doctrine in re-interpreting Platonism to the modern world. The theory that truth, goodness, and other moral virtues are attributes of God himself profoundly influenced preachers, philosophers, and poets of later times.

Plato's theories of statecraft, which grew out of his ideas of education, are revealed chiefly in The Republic. All through the ages man has been drawn to expend his ingenuity upon the conception of the ideal state. A subject so complicated, so fraught with possibilities for human joy or suffering could hardly fail to rouse the enthusiasm of any great creative mind. To realize fully the thought that has been lavished upon it, one needs only to recall Plutarch's Lycurgus, where the ideal state is found in ancient Sparta, Bacon's The New Atlantis, where it lies on a far-away fabled island, Morris's News from Nowhere, in which it is projected into the future, and many other works, including Campanella's City of the Sun, Rousseau's Social Contract, Lytton's The Coming Race, Bellamy's Looking Backward, and Mercier's The Year 2440. Strange as it may seem to the modern mind, Plato's treatment, although one of the earliest, is still regarded as a model for clarity of vision and closeness of analysis.

The Republic (ca. 375 B.C.) is written in dialogue form, the participants being Socrates and his friends Polemarchus, Adeimantus, Niceratus, and Thrasymachus. The part here given is from Book II and deals with the constitution of a city. The purpose of the disputants is to trace the growth of a city, so that they may also see the growth of its justice and injustice.

This selection is from The Republic of Plato, translated by John L. Davies and David J. Vaughan, London, Macmillan and Co., 1914.

THE REPUBLIC

Well then, I proceeded, the formation of a city is due, as I imagine, to this fact, that we are not individually independent, but have many wants. Or would you assign any other cause for the founding of cities?

No, I agree with you, he replied.

Thus it is, then, that owing to our many wants, and because each seeks the aid of others to supply his various requirements, we gather many associates and helpers into one dwelling-place, and give to this joint dwelling the name of city. Is it so?

Undoubtedly.

And every one who gives or takes in exchange, whatever it be that he exchanges, does so from a belief that he is consulting his own interest.

Certainly.

Now then, let us construct our imaginary city from the beginning. It will owe its construction, it appears, to our natural wants.

Unquestionably.

Well, but the first and most pressing of all wants is that of sustenance to enable us to exist as living creatures.

Most decidedly.

Our second want would be that of a house, and our third that of clothing and the like.

True.

Then let us know what will render our city adequate to the supply of so many things. Must we not begin with a husbandman for one, and a house-builder, and besides these a weaver? Will these suffice, or shall we add to them a shoemaker, and perhaps one or two more of the class of people who minister to our bodily wants?

By all means.

Then the smallest possible city will consist of four or five men.

So we see.

To proceed then: ought each of these to place his own work at the disposal of the community, so that the single husbandman, for example, shall provide food for four, spending four times the amount of time and labour upon the preparation of food, and sharing it with others; or must he be regardless of them, and produce for his own consumption alone the fourth part of this quantity of food, in a fourth part of the time, spending the other three parts, one in making his house, another in procuring himself clothes, and the third in providing himself with shoes, saving himself the trouble of sharing with others, and doing his own business by himself, and for himself?

To this Adeimantus replied, Well, Socrates, perhaps the former plan is the easier of the two.

Really, I said, it is not improbable; for I recollect, myself, after your answer, that, in the first place, no two persons are born exactly alike, but each differs from each in natural endowments, one being 10 suited for one occupation, and another for another. Do you not think so?

I do.

Well; when is a man likely to succeed best? When he divides his exertions 15 among many trades, or when he devotes himself exclusively to one?

When he devotes himself to one.

Again, it is also clear, I imagine, that if a person lets the right moment for any 20 work go by, it never returns.

It is quite clear.

For the thing to be done does not choose, I imagine, to tarry the leisure of the doer, but the doer must be at the beck of the 25 thing to be done, and not treat it as a secondary affair.

He must.

From these considerations it follows that all things will be produced in superior 30 quantity and quality, and with greater ease, when each man works at a single occupation, in accordance with his natural gifts, and at the right moment, without meddling with anything else.

Unquestionably.

More than four citizens, then, Adeimantus, are needed to provide the requisites which we named. For the husbandman, it appears, will not make his own plough, 40 if it is to be a good one, nor his mattock, nor any of the other tools employed in agriculture. No more will the builder make the numerous tools which he also requires: and so of the weaver and the 45 shoemaker.

True.

Then we shall have carpenters and smiths, and many other artisans of the kind, who will become members of our 50 little state, and create a population.

Certainly.

Still it will not yet be very large, supposing we add to them neatherds and shepherds, and the rest of that class, in order that the husbandmen may have oxen for ploughing, and the house-build- 5 ers, as well as the husbandmen, beasts of burden for draught, and the weavers and shoemakers wool and leather.

It will not be a small state, either, if it contains all these.

Moreover, it is scarcely possible to plant the actual city in a place where it will have no need of imports.

No, it is impossible.

Then it will further require a new class 15 of persons to bring from other cities all that it requires.

It will.

Well, but if the agent goes empty-handed, carrying with him none of the commodities in demand among those people from whom our state is to procure what it requires, he will also come empty-handed away: will he not?

I think so.

Then it must produce at home not only enough for itself, but also articles of the right kind and quantity to accommodate those whose services it needs.

It must.

Then our city requires larger numbers both of husbandmen and other crafts- men.

Yes, it does.

And among the rest it will need more of 35 those agents also, who are to export and import the several commodities: and these are merchants, are they not?

Yes.

Then we shall require merchants also.

Certainly.

And if the traffic is carried on by sea, there will be a further demand for a considerable number of other persons, who are skilled in the practice of navigation.

A considerable number, undoubtedly.

But now tell me: in the city itself how are they to exchange their several productions? For it was to promote this exchange, you know, that we formed the 50 community, and so founded our state.

Manifestly, by buying and selling.

Then this will give rise to a market and a currency, for the sake of exchange.

Undoubtedly.

Suppose then that the husbandman, or one of the other craftsmen, should come with some of his produce into the market, at a time when none of those who wish to make an exchange with him are there, is he to leave his occupation and sit idle in the market-place?

By no means: there are persons who, with an eye to this contingency, undertake the service required; and these in well-regulated states are, generally speaking, persons of excessive physical weakness, who are of no use in other kinds of labour. Their business is to remain on the spot in the market, and give money for goods to those who want to sell, and goods for money to those who want to buy.

This demand, then, causes a class of retail dealers to spring up in our city. For do we not give the name of retail dealers to those who station themselves in the market, to minister to buying and selling, applying the term merchants to those who go about from city to city?

Exactly so.

In addition to these, I imagine, there is also another class of operatives, consisting of those whose mental qualifications do not recommend them as associates, but whose bodily strength is equal to hard labour: these, selling the use of their strength and calling the price of it hire, are thence named, I believe, hired labourers. Is it not so?

Precisely.

Then hired labourers also form, as it seems, a complementary portion of a state.

I think so.

Shall we say then, Adeimantus, that our city has at length grown to its full stature?

Perhaps so.

Where then, I wonder, shall we find justice and injustice in it? With which of these elements that we have contemplated, has it simultaneously made its entrance?

I have no notion, Socrates, unless perhaps it be discoverable somewhere in the mutual relations of these same persons.

Well, perhaps you are right. We must investigate the matter, and not flinch from the task.

Let us consider then, in the first place, what kind of life will be led by persons thus provided. I presume they will produce corn and wine, and clothes and shoes, and build themselves houses; and in summer, no doubt, they will generally work without their coats and shoes, while in winter they will be suitably clothed and shod. And they will live, I suppose, on barley and wheat, baking cakes of the meal, and kneading loaves of the flour. And spreading these excellent cakes and loaves upon mats of straw or on clean leaves, and themselves reclining on rude beds of yew or myrtle-boughs, they will make merry, themselves and their children, drinking their wine, wearing garlands, and singing the praises of the gods, enjoying one another's society, and not begetting children beyond their means, through a prudent fear of poverty or war.

Glaucon here interrupted me, remarking, Apparently you describe your men as feasting without anything to relish their bread.

True, I said, I had forgotten:—of course they will have something to relish their food; salt, no doubt, and olives and cheese, together with the country fare of boiled onions and cabbage. We shall also set before them a dessert, I imagine, of figs and pease and beans; and they may roast myrtle-berries and beech-nuts at the fire, taking wine with their fruit in moderation. And thus passing their days in tranquillity and sound health, they will, in all probability, live to an advanced age, and dying, bequeath to their children a life in which their own will be reproduced.

Upon this Glaucon exclaimed, Why Socrates, if you were founding a community of swine, this is just the style in which you would feed them up!

How then, said I, would you have them live, Glaucon?

In a civilized manner, he replied. They ought to recline on couches, I should think, if they are not to have a hard life of it, and dine off tables, and have the usual dishes and dessert of a modern dinner.

Very good; I understand. Apparently we are considering the growth not of a city merely, but of a luxurious city. I dare say it is not a bad plan: for by this extension of our inquiry we shall perhaps discover how it is that justice and injustice take root in cities. Now it appears to me that the city which we have described is the genuine and, so to speak, healthy city. But if you wish us also to contemplate a city that is suffering from inflammation, there is nothing to hinder us. Some people will not be satisfied, it seems, with the fare or the mode of life which we have described, but must have, in addition, couches and tables and every other article of furniture, as well as viands, and fragrant oils, and perfumes, and courtesans, and confectionery; and all these in plentiful variety. Moreover, we must not limit ourselves now to essentials in those articles which we specified at first, I mean houses and clothes and shoes, but we must set painting and embroidery to work, and acquire gold and ivory, and all similar valuables: must we not?

Yes.

Then we shall also have to enlarge our city, for our first or healthy city will not now be of sufficient size, but requires to be increased in bulk, and filled out with a multitude of callings, which do not exist in cities to satisfy any natural want; for example, the whole class of hunters, and all who practise imitative arts, including many who use forms and colours, and many who use music, poets also, with those of whom the poet makes use, rhapsodists, actors, dancers, contractors; lastly, the manufacturers of all sorts of articles, and among others those which form part of a woman's dress. We shall similarly require more personal servants, shall we not? that is to say, tutors, wet-nurses, dry-nurses, tire-women, barbers, and cooks moreover and confectioners? Swineherds again are among the additions we shall require, — a class of persons not to be found, because not wanted, in our former city, but needed among the rest in this. We shall also need great quantities of all kinds of cattle, for those who may wish to eat them; shall we not?

Of course we shall.

Then shall we not experience the need of medical men also, to a much greater extent under this than under the former regime?

Yes, indeed.

The country too, I presume, which was formerly adequate to the support of its then inhabitants will be now too small, and adequate no longer. Shall we say so? Certainly.

Then must we not cut ourselves a slice of our neighbour's territory, if we are to have land enough both for pasture and tillage, while they will do the same to ours, if they, like us, permit themselves to overstep the limit of necessities, and plunge into the unbounded acquisition of wealth?

It must inevitably be so, Socrates.

Will our next step be to go to war, Glaucon, or how will it be?

As you say.

At this stage of our inquiry let us avoid asserting either that war does good or that it does harm, confining ourselves to this statement, that we have further traced the origin of war to causes which are the most fruitful sources of whatever evils befall a state, either in its corporate capacity, or in its individual members.

Exactly so.

Once more then, my friend, our state must receive an accession of no trifling extent, I mean that of a whole army, which must go forth and do battle with all invaders in defence of its entire property, and of the persons whom we were just now describing.

How? he asked; are not those persons sufficient of themselves?

They are not, if you and all the rest of us were right in the admissions which we made, when we were modelling our state. We admitted, I think, if you remember, that it was impossible for one man to work well at many professions.

True.

Well then, is not the business of war looked upon as a profession in itself?

Undoubtedly.

And have we not as much reason to concern ourselves about the trade of war as about the trade of shoemaking?

Quite as much.

But we cautioned the shoemaker, you know, against attempting to be an agriculturist or a weaver or a builder besides, with a view to our shoemaking work being well done; and to every other artisan we assigned in like manner one occupation, namely, that for which he was naturally fitted, and in which, if he let other things alone, and wrought at it all his time without neglecting his opportunities, he was likely to prove a successful workman. Now is it not of the greatest moment that the work of war should be well done? Or is it so easy, that any one can succeed in it and be at the same time a husbandman or a shoemaker or a labourer at any other trade whatever, although there is no one in the world who could become a good draught-player or dice-player by merely taking up the game at unoccupied moments, instead of pursuing it as his especial study from his childhood? And will it be enough for a man merely to handle a shield or any other of the arms and implements of war, to be straightway competent to play his part well that very day in an engagement of heavy troops or in any other military service, although the mere handling of any other instrument will never make any one a true craftsman or athlete, nor will such instrument be even useful to one who has neither learnt its capabilities nor exercised himself sufficiently in its practical applications.

If it were so, these implements of war would be very valuable.

In proportion, then, to the importance of the work which these guardians have to do, will it require peculiar freedom from other engagements, as well as extraordinary skill and attention.

I quite think so.

Will it not also require natural endowments suited to this particular occupation?

Undoubtedly.

Then, apparently, it will belong to us to choose out, if we can, that especial order of natural endowments which qualifies its possessors for the guardianship of a state.

Certainly; it belongs to us.

Then, I assure you, we have taken upon ourselves no trifling task; nevertheless,

there must be no flinching, so long as our strength holds out.

No, there must not.

Do you think then, I asked, that there is any difference, in the qualities required for keeping guard, between a well-bred dog and a gallant young man?

I do not quite understand you.

Why, I suppose, for instance, they ought both of them to be quick to discover an enemy, and swift to overtake him when discovered, and strong also, in case they have to fight when they have come up with him.

Certainly, all these qualities are required.

Moreover, they must be brave if they are to fight well.

Undoubtedly.

But will either a horse, or a dog, or any other animal, be likely to be brave if it is not spirited? or have you failed to observe what an irresistible and unconquerable thing spirit is, so that under its influence every creature will be fearless and unconquerable in the face of any danger?

I have observed it.

We know then what bodily qualities are required in our guardian.

We do.

And also what qualities of the mind, namely, that he must be spirited.

Yes.

How then, Glaucon, if such be their natural disposition, are they to be kept from behaving fiercely to one another, and to the rest of the citizens?

Really it will be difficult to obviate that.

Nevertheless, they certainly ought to be gentle to their friends, and dangerous only to their enemies: else they will not wait for others to destroy them, but will be the first to do it for themselves.

True.

What then shall we do? Where shall we find a character at once gentle and high-spirited? For I suppose a gentle nature is the opposite of a spirited one?

Apparently it is.

Nevertheless a man who is devoid of either gentleness or spirit cannot possibly make a good guardian. And as they seem to be incompatible, the result is, that a good guardian is an impossibility.

It looks like it, he said.

Here then I was perplexed, but having reconsidered our conversation I said, We deserve, my friend, to be puzzled; for we have deserted the illustration which we set before us.

How so?

It never struck us, that after all there are natures, though we fancied there were none, which combine these opposite qualities.

Pray where is such a combination to be found?

You may see it in several animals, but particularly in the one which we ourselves compared to our guardian. For I suppose you know that it is the natural disposition of well-bred dogs to be perfectly gentle to their friends and acquaintance, but the reverse to strangers.

Certainly I do.

Therefore the thing is possible; and we are not contradicting nature in our endeavour to give such a character to our guardian.

So it would seem.

Then is it your opinion, that in one who is to make a good guardian it is further required that his character should be philosophical as well as high-spirited?

How so? I do not understand you.

You will notice in dogs this other trait, which is really marvellous in the creature.

What is that?

Whenever they see a stranger they are irritated before they have been provoked by any ill-usage; but when they see an acquaintance they welcome him, though they may never have experienced any kindness at his hands. Has this never excited your wonder?

I never paid any attention to it hitherto; but no doubt they do behave so.

Well, but this instinct is a very clever thing in the dog, and a genuine philosophic symptom.

How so, pray?

Why, because the only mark by which he distinguishes between the appearance of a friend and that of an enemy is, that he knows the former and is ignorant of the latter. How, I ask, can the creature be other than fond of learning when it makes knowledge and ignorance the criteria of the familiar and the strange?

Beyond a question, it must be fond of learning.

Well, is not the love of learning identical with a philosophical disposition?

It is.

Shall we not then assert with confidence in the case of a man also, that if he is to shew a gentle disposition towards his relatives and acquaintances, he must have a turn for learning and philosophy?

Be it so.

Then in our judgment the man whose natural gifts promise to make him a perfect guardian of the state will be philosophical, high-spirited, swift-footed, and

strong.

Undoubtedly he will.

XENOPHON

(ca. 430-357 B.C.)

Xenophon was an Athenian and a pupil of Socrates. At about thirty years of age he left Athens and went to Sardis to join the Greek contingent raised by Cyrus of Persia against Artaxerxes. He accompanied Cyrus into Upper Asia on a very disastrous expedition. After a series of misfortunes including the death of Cyrus, the dispersal of the barbarian troops, and the assassination of most of the Greek generals, the Greeks found themselves practically abandoned on the plain between the Tigris and the Euphrates. At this point Xenophon came forward and played an important part in leading them out of danger. Later he and his army joined forces with the Spartans in a general pillaging expedition through Asia. It was during this period that he became acquainted with the famous Spartan general Agesilaus. He definitely threw in his lot with the Spartans and remained in their service even when they carried on war against Athens. Since returning to Athens was out of the question under the circumstances, he finally settled at Scillus in Elis, not far from Olympia. Although he was under sentence of banishment from Athens, the punishment had no effect upon him until 471, when upon the downfall of Spartan supremacy he was expelled from Scillus by the Eleans. By this time the sentence of banishment from Athens had been repealed, but there is no evidence that he ever returned to his native state. It seems rather that he retired to Corinth and there ended his days. He was the author of various political, historical, and philosophical works. Probably the most famous of his writings is the Anabasis, which is an account of the retreat of Xenophon and the ten thousand Greeks after the downfall of Cyrus.

Xenophon wrote the Memorabilia of Socrates (ca. 375 B.C.) to vindicate the memory of his teacher against the charge of failing to pay due reverence to the gods and of corrupting the youth of Athens. He develops through a series of dialogues the morals and opinions of Socrates. Xenophon was a practical man, very intelligent, but not particularly prone to philosophical subtleties; hence these dialogues do not present the methods of Socrates in as complicated form as the dialogues of Plato. His main purpose is justificatory; he is interested chiefly in clearing Socrates of the charges made against him rather than in giving a complete exposition of his philosophy. He takes up the charges in due order and disposes of them, and then proceeds to introduce material showing Socrates's mode of life. The part here presented is that which deals with Socrates's ideas of friendship, a theme which seems to have attracted some of the best minds in almost every period of the world's history.

This selection is taken from Xenophon's Anabasis or Expedition of Cyrus and the Memorabilia of Socrates, translated by Rev. J. S. Watson, London, George Bell and Sons, 1907.

THE MEMORABILIA OF SOCRATES

CHAPTER IV

On the value of friendship. Many are more desirous to acquire property than friends, sect. 1 4. But no species of property is more valuable, lasting, and useful than a good friend: his qualities enumerated, 5-7.

1. I heard him, also, on one occasion, 10 holding a discourse concerning friends, by which, as it seems to me, a person might be greatly benefited, both as to the acquisition and use of friends; for he said that he had heard many people observe that a true and honest friend was the most valuable of all possessions, but that he saw the greater part of mankind attending to anything rather than securing friends. 2. He observed them, he added, indus- 20 triously endeavouring to procure houses and lands, slaves, cattle, and furniture; but as for a friend, whom they called the greatest of blessings, he saw the majority considering neither how to procure one, 25 nor how those whom they had might be retained. 3. Even when friends and slaves were sick, he said that he noticed people calling in physicians to their slaves, and carefully providing other means for 30 their recovery, but paying no attention to their friends; and that, if both died, they grieved for their slaves, and thought that they had suffered a loss, but considered that they lost nothing in losing friends. Of their other possessions they left nothing untended or unheeded, but, when their friends required attention, they utterly 5 neglected them.

4. In addition to these remarks, he observed that he saw the greater part of mankind acquainted with the number of their other possessions, although they might be very numerous, but of their friends, though but few, they were not only ignorant of the number, but even when they attempted to reckon it to such as asked them, they set aside again some 15 that they had previously counted among their friends; so little did they allow their friends to occupy their thoughts. 5. Yet in comparison with what possession, of all others, would not a good friend appear far more valuable? What sort of horse, or yoke of oxen, is so useful as a truly good friend? What slave is so well-disposed or so attached, or what other acquisition so beneficial? 6. For a good friend is ready 25 to supply whatever is wanting on the part of his friend, whether in his private affairs, or for the public interests; if he is required to do a service to any one, he assists him with the means; if any apprehension 30 alarms him, he lends him his aid, sometimes sharing expenditure with him, sometimes co-operating with him, sometimes joining with him to persuade others, sometimes using force towards others;

frequently cheering him when he is successful, and frequently supporting him when he is in danger of falling. 7. What the hands do, what the eyes foresee, what the ears hear, what the feet accomplish, for each individual, his friend, of all such services, fails to perform no one; and oftentimes, what a person has not effected for himself, or has not seen, or has not heard, or has not accomplished, a friend has succeeded in executing for his friend; and yet, while people try to foster trees for the sake of their fruit, the greater portion of mankind are heedless and neglectful of that most productive possession which is called a friend.

CHAPTER V

On the different estimation in which different friends are to be held. We ought to examine ourselves, and ascertain at what value we may expect our friends to hold us.

1. I heard one day another dissertation of his, which seemed to me to exhort the hearer to examine himself, and ascertain of how much value he was to his friends. Finding that one of his followers was neglectful of a friend who was oppressed with poverty, he asked Antisthenes,¹ in the presence of the man that neglected his friend, and of several others, saying, "Are there certain settled values for friends, Antisthenes, as there are for slaves? 2. For, of slaves, one, perhaps, is worth two minæ, another not even half a mina, another five minæ, another ten. Nicias, the son of Niceratus, is said to have bought an overseer for his silver mines at the price of a whole talent. I am therefore considering whether, as there are certain values for slaves, there are also certain values for friends." 3. "There are, undoubtedly," replied Antisthenes; "at least I, for my part, should wish one man to be my friend rather than have two minæ; another I should not value even at half a mina; another I should prefer to ten minæ; and another I would buy for my friend at the sacrifice of all the money and revenues in the world." 4. "If such be the case, therefore," said Socrates, "it would be well for each of us to examine himself, to consider of what value he is in the estimation of his friends; and to try to be of as much value to them as possible, in order that his friends may be less likely to desert him; for I often hear one man saying that his friend has abandoned him, and another, that a person whom he thought to be his friend has preferred a mina to him. 5. I am considering, accordingly, whether, as one sells a bad slave, and parts with him for whatever he will fetch, so it may be advisable to give up a worthless friend, when there is an opportunity of receiving more than he is worth. Good slaves I do not often see sold at all, or good friends abandoned."

CHAPTER VI

What sort of persons we should choose for our friends, sect. 1-5. How we may ascertain the characters of men, before we form a friendship with them, 6, 7. How we may attach men to us as friends, 8-13. Friendship can exist only between the good and honourable, 14-19; between whom it will continue to subsist in spite of differences of opinion, 19-28. Deductions from the preceding remarks, 29-39.

1. He appeared to me, also, to make his followers wise in examining what sort of persons it was right to attach to themselves as friends, by such conversations as the following. "Tell me, Critobulus," said he, "if we were in need of a good friend, how should we proceed to look for one? Should we not, in the first place, seek for a person who can govern his appetite, his inclination to wine or sensuality, and abstain from immoderate sleep and idleness? for one who is overcome by such propensities would be unable to do his duty either to himself or his friend." "Assuredly he would not," said Critobulus. "It appears then to you that we must avoid one who is at the mercy of such inclinations?" "Undoubtedly," replied Critobulus. 2. "Besides," continued Socrates, "does not a man who is extravagant and yet unable to support himself, but is always in want of assistance from his neighbour, a man who, when he borrows, cannot pay, and when he cannot borrow, hates him who will not lend, appear to you to be a dangerous friend?" "Assuredly," replied Critobulus. "We must therefore avoid such a character?" "We must indeed." 3. "Again: what sort of friend would he be who has the means of getting money, and covets great wealth, and who, on this account, is a driver of hard bargains, and delights to receive, but is unwilling to pay?" "Such a person appears to me," said Critobulus, "to be a still worse character than the former." 4. "What then do you think of him, who, from love of getting money, allows himself no time for thinking of anything else but whence he may obtain it?" "We must avoid him, as it seems to me; for he would be useless to any one that should make an associate of him." "And what do you think of him who is quarrelsome, and likely to raise up many enemies against his friends?" "We must avoid him also, by Jupiter." "But if a man have none of these bad qualities, but is content to receive obligations, taking no thought of returning them?" "He also would be useless as a friend. But what sort of person, then, Socrates, should we endeavour to make our friend?" 5. "A person, I think, who, being the reverse of all this, is proof against the seductions of bodily pleasures, is upright and fair in his dealings, and emulous not to be outdone in serving those who serve him, so that he is of advantage to those who associate with him." 6. "How then shall we find proof of these qualities in him, Socrates, before we associate with him?" "We make proof of statuaries," rejoined Socrates, "not by forming opinions from their words, but, whomsoever we observe to have executed his previous statues skillfully, we trust that he will execute others well." 7. "You mean, then, that the man who is known to have served his former friends will doubtless be likely to serve such as may be his friends hereafter?" "Yes; for whomsoever I know to have previously managed horses with skill, I expect to manage other horses also with skill."

8. "Be it so," said Critobulus; "but by what means must we make a friend of him who appears to us worthy of our friendship?" "In the first place," answered Socrates, "we must consult the gods, whether they recommend us to make him our friend." "Can you tell me, then," said Critobulus, "how he, who appears eligible to us, and whom the gods do not disapprove, is to be secured?" 9. "Assuredly," returned Socrates, "he is not to be caught by tracking him like the hare, or by wiles, like birds, or by making him prisoner by force, like enemies; for it would be an arduous task to make a man your friend against his will, or to hold him fast if you were to bind him like a slave; for those who suffer such treatment are rendered enemies rather than friends." 10. "How then are men made friends?" inquired Critobulus. "They say that there are certain incantations, which those who know them chant to whomsoever they please, and thus make them their friends; and that there are also love-potions, which those who know them administer to whomsoever they will, and are in consequence beloved by them." 11. "And how can we discover these charms?" "You have heard from Homer the song which the Sirens¹ sung to Ulysses, the commencement of which runs thus:

'Come hither, much-extolled Ulysses, great glory of the Greeks.'

"Did the Sirens then, by singing this same song to other men also, detain them so that they were charmed and could not depart from them?" "No; but they sang thus to those who were desirous of being honoured for virtue." 12. "You seem to mean that we ought to apply as charms to any person such commendations as, when he hears them, he will not suspect that his eulogist utters to ridicule him; for, if he conceived such a suspicion, he would rather be rendered an enemy, and would repel men from him; as, for instance, if a person were to praise as beautiful, and tall, and strong, one who is conscious that he is short, and deformed, and weak."

"But," added Critobulus, "do you know any other charms?" 13. "No," said

¹ Sea-nymphs who enticed mariners to destruction by their sweet singing.

Socrates, "but I have heard that Pericles¹ knew many, which he used to chant to the city, and make it love him." "And how did Themistocles² make the city love him?" "Not, by Jupiter, by uttering charms to it, but by conferring on it some advantage." 14. "You appear to me to mean, Socrates, that, if we would attach to us any good person as a friend, we ourselves should be good both in speaking and acting." "And did you think it possible," said Socrates, "for a bad person to attach to himself good men as his friends?" 15. "I have seen," rejoined Critobulus, "bad orators become friends to good orators, and men bad at commanding an army become friends to men eminently good in the military art." 16. "Do you, then," said Socrates, "regarding the subject of which we are speaking, know any persons, who, being themselves useless, can make useful persons their friends?" "No, by Jupiter," replied Critobulus; "but if it is impossible for a worthless person to attach to himself good and honourable friends, it becomes now an object of consideration with me, whether it is possible for one who is himself honourable and good, to become, with ease, a friend to the honourable and good." 17. "What perplexes you, Critobulus, is, that you often see men who are honourable in their conduct, and who refrain from everything disgraceful, involved, instead of being friends, in dissensions with one another, and showing more severity towards each other than the worthless part of mankind." 18. "Nor is it only private persons," rejoined Critobulus, "that act in this manner, but even whole communities, which have the greatest regard for what is honourable, and are least inclined to anything disgraceful, are often hostilely disposed towards one another." 19. "When I reflect on the differences," continued Critobulus, "I am quite in despair about the acquisition of friends; for I see that the bad cannot be friends with one another; for how can the ungrateful, or careless, or avaricious, or faithless, or intemperate, be friends to each other? indeed the bad appear to me to be altogether disposed by nature to be mutual enemies rather than friends. 20. Again, the bad, as you observe, can never harmonize in friendship with the good; for how can those who commit bad actions be friends with those who abhor such actions? And yet, if those also who practise virtue fall into dissensions with one another about pre-eminence in their respective communities, and even hate each other through envy, who will ever be friends, or among what class of mankind shall affection and attachment be found?" 21. "But these affections act in various ways," rejoined Socrates, "for men have by nature inclinations to attachment, since they stand in need of each other, and feel compassion for each other, and co-operate for mutual benefit, and, being conscious that such is the case, have a sense of gratitude towards one another; but they have also propensities to enmity, for such as think the same objects honourable and desirable, engage in contention for them, and, divided in feelings, become enemies. Disputation and anger lead to war; the desire of aggrandizement excites ill-will; and envy is followed by hatred. 22. But, nevertheless, friendship, insinuating itself through all these hindrances, unites together the honourable and good; for such characters, through affection for virtue, prefer the enjoyment of a moderate competency without strife, to the attainment of unlimited power by means of war; they can endure hunger and thirst without discontent, and take only a fair share of meat and drink, and, though delighted with the attractions of youthful beauty, they can control themselves, so as to forbear from offending those whom they ought not to offend. 23. By laying aside all avaricious feelings too, they can not only be satisfied with their lawful share of the common property, but can even assist one another. They can settle their differences, not only without mutual offence, but even to their mutual benefit. They can prevent their anger from going so far as to cause them repentance; and envy they entirely banish, by sharing their own property with their friends, and considering that of their friends as their own.

24. "How, then, can it be otherwise than natural, that the honourable and good should be sharers in political distinctions, not only without detriment, but even with advantage, to each other? Those indeed who covet honour and power in states, merely that they may be able to embezzle 10 money, to do violence to others, and to live a life of luxury, must be regarded as unprincipled and abandoned characters, and incapable of harmonious union with other men. 25. But when a person wishes 15 to attain honours in a community, in order, not merely that he may not suffer wrong himself, but that he may assist his friends as far as is lawful, and may endeavour, in his term of office, to do some 20 service to his country, why should he not, being of such a character, form a close union with another of similar character? Will he be less able to benefit his friends if he unite himself with the honourable and 25 good, or will he be less able to serve his country if he have the honourable and good for his colleagues? 26. In the public games, indeed, it is plain, that, if the strongest were allowed to unite and attack 30 the weaker, they would conquer in all the contests, and carry off all the prizes; and accordingly people do not permit them, in those competitions, to act in such a manner; but since, in political affairs, in which 35 honourable and good men rule, no one hinders another from serving his country in concert with whomsoever he pleases, how can it be otherwise than profitable for him to conduct affairs with the best men 40 as his friends, having these as colleagues and co-operators, rather than antagonists, in his proceedings? 27. It is evident, too, that if one man commences hostilities against another, he will need allies, and will need a great number of them, if he oppose the honourable and good; and those who consent to be his allies must be well treated by him, that they may be zealous in his interests; and it is much better for 50 him to serve the best characters, who are the fewer, than the inferior, who are more numerous; for the bad require far more favours than the good. 28. But strive 5 with good courage, Critobulus," he continued, "to be good yourself, and, having become so, endeavour to gain the friendship of men of honour and virtue. Perhaps I myself also may be able to assist you in this pursuit of the honourable and virtuous, from being naturally disposed to love, for, for whatever persons I conceive a liking, I devote myself with ardour, and with my whole mind, to love them, and be 10 loved in return by them, regretting their absence to have mine regretted by them, and longing for their society while they on the other hand long for mine. 29. I know that you also must cultivate such feelings, whenever you desire to form a friendship 20 with any person. Do not conceal from my knowledge, therefore, the persons to whom you may wish to become a friend; for, from my carefulness to please those who please me, I do not think that I am unskilled in the art of gaining men's affections."

30. "Indeed, Socrates," replied Critobulus, "I have long desired to receive such instructions as yours, especially if the same knowledge will have effect at once on those who are amiable in mind, and handsome in person." 31. "But, Critobulus," replied Socrates, "there is nothing in the knowledge that I communicate to make 35 those who are handsome in person endure him who lays hands upon them; for I am persuaded that men shrunk from Scylla¹ because she offered to put her hands on them; while every one, they say, was ready to listen to the Sirens, and were 40 enchanted as they listened, because they laid hands on no one, but sang to all men from a distance." 32. "On the understanding, then, that I shall lay my hands on no one," said Critobulus, "tell me if you know any effectual means for securing friends." "But will you never," asked Socrates, "apply your lips to theirs?" "Be of good courage, Socrates," said Critobulus, "for I will never apply my lips to 50 those of any person, unless that person be beautiful." "You have now said," rejoined Socrates, "the exact contrary to what will promote your object; for the beautiful will not allow such liberties, though the deformed receive them with pleasure, thinking that they are accounted beautiful for their mental qualities."

33. "As I shall caress the beautiful, then," said Critobulus, "and caress the good with the utmost ardour, teach me, with confidence, the art of attaching my friends to me." "When, therefore, Critobulus," said Socrates, "you wish to become a friend to any one, will you permit me to say to him concerning you, that you admire him, and desire to be his friend?" "You may say so," answered Critobulus, "for I have never known any one dislike those who praised him."

34. "But if I say of you, in addition, that, because you admire him, you feel kindly disposed towards him, will you not think that false information is given of you by me?" "No: for a kind feeling springs up in myself also towards those whom I regard as kindly disposed towards me."

35. "Such information, then," continued Socrates, "I may communicate regarding you to such as you may wish to make your friends; but if you enable me also to say concerning you, that you are attentive to your friends; that you delight in nothing so much as in the possession of good friends; that you pride yourself on the honourable conduct of your friends not less than on your own; that you rejoice at the good fortune of your friends not less than at your own; that you are never weary of contriving means by which good fortune may come to your friends; and that you think it the great virtue of a man to surpass his friends in doing them good and his enemies in doing them harm, I think that I shall be a very useful assistant to you in gaining the affections of worthy friends."

36. "But why" said Critobulus, "do you say this to me, as if you were not at liberty to say of me anything you please?" "No, by Jupiter," replied Socrates; "I have no such liberty, according to a remark that I once heard from Aspasia¹; for she said that skilful match-makers, by reporting with truth good points of character, had great influence in leading people to form unions, but that those who said what was false did no good by their praises, for that such as were deceived hated each other and the match-maker alike; and, as I am persuaded that this opinion is correct, I think that I ought not to say, when I praise you, anything that I cannot utter with truth."

37. "You are, therefore," returned Critobulus, "a friend of such a kind to me, Socrates, as to assist me, if I have myself any qualities adapted to gain friends; but if not, you would not be willing to invent anything to serve me." "And whether, Critobulus," said Socrates,

"should I appear to serve you more by extolling you with false praises, or by persuading you to endeavour to become a truly deserving man? 38. If this point is not clear to you, consider it with the following illustrations: If, wishing to make the owner of a ship your friend, I should praise you falsely to him, pronouncing you a skilful pilot, and he, believing me, should intrust his ship to you to steer when you are incapable of steering it, would you have any expectation that you would not destroy both yourself and the ship? Or if, by false representations, I should persuade the state, publicly, to intrust itself to you as a man skilled in military tactics, in judicial proceedings, or in political affairs, what do you think that yourself and the state would suffer at your hands? Of if, in private intercourse, I should induce any of the citizens, by unfounded statements, to commit their property to your care, as being a good and diligent manager, would you not, when you came to give proof of your abilities, be convicted of dishonesty, and make yourself appear ridiculous?"

39. But the shortest, and safest, and best way, Critobulus, is, to strive to be really good in that in which you wish to be thought good. Whatever are called virtues among mankind, you will find, on consideration, capable of being increased by study and exercise. I am of opinion, that it is in accordance with these sentiments, that we ought to endeavour to acquire friends; if you know any other way, make me acquainted with it." "I should be indeed ashamed," replied

Critobulus, "to say anything in opposition to such an opinion; for I should say what was neither honourable nor true."

ARISTOTLE

(384-322 B.C.)

Aristotle was born in the Macedonian city of Stagira. His father, Nicomachus, was chief physician to King Amyntas of Macedonia. After the early death of his father, Aristotle went to Atarneus in Asia Minor; then, in his eighteenth year, to Athens, where he remained for twenty years. In Athens he developed his philosophical independence under the guidance of Plato. In spite of his respect for his teacher he abandoned Plato's teachings early in life and devoted a good part of his writing to arguments against the Platonic system. Upon the death of Plato in 347 B.C. he betook himself with the poet Xenocrates to Hermias, lord of Atarneus. In 343 he was called to the court of Philip of Macedon to take charge of the education of the young prince Alexander. Here he remained for nine years, highly honored and respected. He then returned to Athens, where he set up his school of philosophy. This school was known as the peripatetic school, either because part of the instruction was given while walking to and fro (Greek peripalein) or because the place where the school was held was inclosed by shaded walks (peripatoi). After the rise of Athens upon the death of Alexander, Aristotle, as a friend of the former conqueror, found it inadvisable to remain there. He accordingly put his school into the hands of Theophrastus and departed for Chalcis in Eubœa, expecting, no doubt, to return after the storm had subsided. He died, however, in 322 without having returned. His character emerges from his writings sincere and noble, although according to subsequent tradition he was not free from tradition. Through his all-inclusive erudition, his broad experience, and his powers of organization he has remained a prominent figure in the field of thought for over 2000 years. His numerous writings include almost the whole field of knowledge of his time. This knowledge he essayed to systematize and reduce to some sort of philosophical unity. He wrote works on politics, physics, metaphysics, poetics, natural history, rhetoric, meteorology, and other subjects. Much of what he said has not since been superseded.

This is especially true of Aristotle's Poetics (ca. 350 B.C.), which is probably the most important piece of literary criticism ever written. It has influenced countless plays and dramatic essays in all European countries and in nearly every generation. Its distinction is shared somewhat by Horace's Art of Poetry; in fact, in the late Middle Ages Horace was better known. With the Revival of Learning, however, Aristotle leaped into the foreground. He is referred to directly by Daniello (1536) and interpreted by Minturno (1563). The most influential early treatment of Aristotle's ideas on tragedy was that of Julius Cæsar Scaliger (1561), an Italian living in France. Scaliger's interpretation was tortured and erroneous, but it brought Aristotle before the public as a critic. Castelvetro's misinterpretation of Aristotle (1570) provided the Renaissance with the three unities of action, time, and place, which were accepted by many later writers as genuine, in spite of the fact that Aristotle mentions only two of them. The direct influence of Aristotle in France began about 1548 with Sebillet, and was developed by Jean de la Taille (1570) and his contemporaries. The false unities of Aristotle, as well as his genuine principles, constituted the basic law in all dramatic disputes in France during the so-called classical period of the seventeenth century. The rules of Aristotle were followed with more or less freedom by Corneille, Racine, and Boileau. In England, despite the overpowering victory of the romantic drama in the hands of Shakespeare and Marlowe, the classicists held their own in the critical field. The principles of Aristotle supply the basis for much that was written by Sidney and Ben Jonson. With Dryden, the drama on Aristotelian models achieved success on the stage as it had previously done in France. In the eighteenth century, although Aristotle and all things classical were highly respected, critical ideas began to exhibit more independence. Addison and Johnson, although very conservative, were not slavish followers of Aristotle. Lessing, in Germany, favored the Aristotelian laws, but approached his conclusions through a consideration of the actual problems of the stage. With the growth of the romantic spirit, Aristotelianism waned. Aristotle was, however, still widely read and highly respected as a wise man who had discovered certain fundamental things about the drama, but his day as a dictator in the realm of dramatic composition was over.

The translation of this selection was made by Ingram Bywater for The Works of Aristotle, under the editorship of W. D. Ross, Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1924, Vol. XI.

✓THE POETICS

It is clear that the general origin of poetry was due to two causes, each of them part of human nature. Imitation is natural to man from childhood, one of his advantages over the lower animals being this, that he is the most imitative creature in the world, and learns at first by imitation. And it is also natural for all to delight in works of imitation. The truth of this second point is shown by experience: though the objects themselves may be painful to see, we delight to view the most realistic representations of them in art, the forms for example of the lowest animals and of dead bodies. The explanation is to be found in a further fact: to be learning something is the greatest of pleasures not only to the philosopher but also to the rest of mankind, however small their capacity for it; the reason of the delight in seeing the picture is that one is at the same time learning — gathering the meaning of things, e.g. that the man there is so-and-so; for if one has not seen the thing before, one's pleasure will not be in the picture as an imitation of it, but will be due to the execution or colouring or some similar cause. Imitation, then, being natural to us — as also the sense of harmony and rhythm, the metres being obviously species of rhythms — it was through their original aptitude, and by a series of improvements for the most part gradual on their first efforts, that they created poetry out of their improvisations.

Poetry, however, soon broke up into two kinds according to the differences of character in the individual poets; for the graver among them would represent noble actions, and those of noble personages; and the meaner sort, the actions of the ignoble. The latter class produced invectives at first, just as others did hymns and panegyrics. We know of no such poem by any of the pre-Homeric poets, though there were probably many such writers among them; instances, however, may be found from Homer downwards, e.g. his Margites,¹ and the similar poems of others. In this poetry of invective its natural fitness brought an iambic metre into use; hence our present term 'iambic,' because it was the metre of their 'iambs' or invectives against one another. The result was that the old poets became some of them writers of heroic and others of iambic verse. Homer's position, however, is peculiar: just as he was in the serious style the poet of poets, standing alone not only through the literary excellence, but also through the dramatic character of his imitations, so too he was the first to outline for us the general forms of Comedy by producing not a dramatic invective, but a dramatic picture of the Ridiculous; his Margites in fact stands in the same relation to our comedies as the Iliad and Odyssey to our tragedies. As soon, however, as Tragedy and Comedy appeared in the field, those naturally drawn to the one line of poetry became writers of comedies instead of iambs, and those naturally drawn to the other, writers of tragedies instead of epics, because these new modes of art were grander and of more esteem than the old.

If it be asked whether Tragedy is now all that it need be in its formative elements, to consider that, and decide it theoretically and in relation to the theatres, is a matter for another inquiry.

It certainly began in improvisations — as did also Comedy; the one originating with the authors of the Dithyramb,² the other with those of the phallic songs, which still survive as institutions in many of our cities. And its advance after that was little by little, through their improving on whatever they had before them at each stage. It was in fact only after a long series of changes that the movement of Tragedy stopped on its attaining to its natural form. (1) The number of actors was first increased to two by Æschylus, who curtailed the business of the Chorus, and made the dialogue, or spoken portion, take the leading part in the play. (2) A third actor and scenery were due to Sophocles.¹ (3) Tragedy acquired also its magnitude. Discarding short stories and a ludicrous diction, through its passing out of its satyric stage,² it assumed, though only at a late point in its progress, a tone of dignity; and its metre changed then from trochaic to iambic. The reason for their original use of the trochaic tetrameter was that their poetry was satyric and more connected with dancing than it now is. As soon, however, as a spoken part came in, nature herself found the appropriate metre. The iambic, we know, is the most speakable of metres, as is shown by the fact that we very often fall into it in conversation, whereas we rarely talk hexameters, and only when we depart from the speaking tone of voice. (4) Another change was a plurality of episodes or acts. As for the remaining matters, the superadded embellishments and the account of their introduction, these must be taken as said, as it would probably be a long piece of work to go through the details.

•As for Comedy, it is (as has been observed) an imitation of men worse than the average; worse, however, not as regards any and every sort of fault, but only as regards one particular kind, the Ridiculous, which is a species of the Ugly. The Ridiculous may be defined as a mistake or deformity not productive of pain or harm to others; the mask, for instance, that excites laughter, is something ugly and distorted without causing pain.

Though the successive changes in Tragedy and their authors are not unknown, we cannot say the same of Comedy; its early stages passed unnoticed, because it was not as yet taken up in a serious way. It was only at a late point in its progress that a chorus of comedians was officially granted by the archon³; they used to be mere volunteers. It had also already certain definite forms at the time when the record of those termed comic poets begins. Who it was who supplied it with masks, or prologues, or a plurality of actors and the like, has remained unknown. The invented Fable, or Plot, however, originated in Sicily, with Epicharmus⁴ and Phormis⁵; of Athenian poets Crates⁶ was the first to drop the Comedy of invective and frame stories of a general and non-personal nature, in other words, Fables or Plots.

Epic poetry, then, has been seen to agree with Tragedy to this extent, that of being an imitation of serious subjects in a grand kind of verse. It differs from it, however, (1) in that it is in one kind of verse and in narrative form; and (2) in its length — which is due to its action having no fixed limit of time, whereas Tragedy endeavours to keep as far as possible within a single circuit of the sun, or something near that. This, I say, is another point of difference between them, though at first the practice in this respect was just the same in tragedies as in epic poems. They differ also (3) in their constituents, some being common to both and others peculiar to Tragedy — hence a judge of good and bad in Tragedy is a judge of that in epic poetry also. All the parts of an epic are included in Tragedy; but those of Tragedy are not all of them to be found in the Epic.

Reserving hexameter poetry and Comedy for consideration hereafter, let us proceed now to the discussion of Tragedy; before doing so, however, we must gather up the definition resulting from what has been said. •A tragedy, then, is the imitation of an action that is serious and also, as having magnitude, complete in itself; in language with pleasurable accessories,

² The stage in which a large part of the action was provided by satyrs, whose frolics and licentious jests enlivened the performance.

each kind brought in separately in the parts of the work; in a dramatic, not in a narrative form; with incidents arousing pity and fear, wherewith to accomplish its catharsis¹ of such emotions. Here by 'language with pleasurable accessories' I mean that with rhythm and harmony or song superadded; and by 'the kinds separately' I mean that some portions are worked out with verse only, and others in turn with song.

I. As they act the stories, it follows that in the first place the Spectacle (or stage-appearance of the actors) must be some part of the whole; and in the second Melody and Diction, these two being the means of their imitation. Here by 'Diction' I mean merely this, the composition of the verses; and by 'Melody,' what is too completely understood to require explanation. But further: the subject represented also is an action; and the action involves agents, who must necessarily have their distinctive qualities both of character and thought, since it is from these that we ascribe certain qualities to their actions. There are in the natural order of things, therefore, two causes, Thought and Character, of their actions, and consequently of their success or failure in their lives. Now the action (that which was done) is represented in the play by the Fable or Plot. The Fable, in our present sense of the term, is simply this, the combination of the incidents, or things done in the story; whereas Character is what makes us ascribe certain moral qualities to the agents; and Thought is shown in all they say when proving a particular point or, it may be, enunciating a general truth. There are six parts consequently of every tragedy, as a whole (that is) of such or such quality, viz. a Fable or Plot, Characters, Diction, Thought, Spectacle, and Melody; two of them arising from the means, one from the manner, and three from the objects of the dramatic imitation; and there is nothing else besides these six. Of these, its formative elements, then, not a few of the dramatists have made due use, as every play, one may say, admits of Spectacle, Character, Fable, Diction, Melody, and Thought.

II. The most important of the six is the combination of the incidents of the story. Tragedy is essentially an imitation not of persons but of action and life, of happiness and misery. • All human happiness or misery takes the form of action; the end for which we live is a certain kind of activity, not a quality. Character gives us qualities, but it is in our actions — what we do — that we are happy or the reverse. In a play accordingly they do not act in order to portray the Characters; they include the Characters for the sake of the action. So that it is the action in it, i.e. its Fable or Plot, that is the end and purpose of the tragedy; and the end is everywhere the chief thing. Besides this, a tragedy is impossible without action, but there may be one without Character. The tragedies of most of the moderns are characterless — a defect common among poets of all kinds, and with its counterpart in painting in Zeuxis² as compared with Polygnotus³; for whereas the latter is strong in character, the work of Zeuxis is devoid of it. And again: one may string together a series of characteristic speeches of the utmost finish as regards Diction and Thought, and yet fail to produce the true tragic effect; but one will have much better success with a tragedy which, however inferior in these respects, has a Plot, a combination of incidents, in it. And again: the most powerful elements of attraction in Tragedy, the Peripeties⁴ and Discoveries, are parts of the Plot. A further proof is in the fact that beginners succeed earlier with the Diction and Characters than with the construction of a story; and the same may be said of nearly all the early dramatists. • We maintain, therefore, that the first essential, the life and soul, so to speak, of Tragedy is the Plot; and that the Characters come second — compare the parallel in painting,

⁴ Peripeties, a change of condition. This term is explained more fully in the course of the essay.

where the most beautiful colours laid on without order will not give one the same pleasure as a simple black-and-white sketch of a portrait. We maintain that Tragedy is primarily an imitation of action, and that it is mainly for the sake of the action that it imitates the personal agents. Third comes the element of Thought, i.e. the power of saying whatever can be said, or what is appropriate to the occasion. This is what, in the speeches in Tragedy, falls under the arts of Politics and Rhetoric; for the older poets make their personages discourse like statesmen, and the moderns like rhetoricians. One must not confuse it with Character. Character in a play is that which reveals the moral purpose of the agents, i.e. the sort of thing they seek or avoid, where that is not obvious — hence there is no room for Character in a speech on a purely indifferent subject. Thought, on the other hand, is shown in all they say when proving or disproving some particular point, or enunciating some universal proposition. Fourth among the literary elements is the Diction of the personages, i.e., as before explained, the expression of their thoughts in words, which is practically the same thing with verse as with prose. As for the two remaining parts, the Melody is the greatest of the pleasurable accessories of Tragedy. The Spectacle, though an attraction, is the least artistic of all the parts, and has least to do with the art of poetry. The tragic effect is quite possible without a public performance and actors; and besides, the getting-up of the Spectacle is more a matter for the costumier than the poet.

Having thus distinguished the parts, let us now consider the proper construction of the Fable or Plot, as that is at once the first and the most important thing in Tragedy. We have laid it down that a tragedy is an imitation of an action that is complete in itself, as a whole of some magnitude; for a whole may be of no magnitude to speak of. Now a whole is that which has beginning, middle, and end. A beginning is that which is not itself necessarily after anything else, and which has naturally something else after it; an end is that which is naturally after something itself, either as its necessary or usual consequent, and with nothing else after it; and a middle, that which is by nature after one thing and has also another after it. A well-constructed Plot, therefore, cannot either begin or end at any point one likes; beginning and end in it must be of the forms just described. *Again: to be beautiful, a living creature, and every whole made up of parts, must not only present a certain order in its arrangements of parts, but also be of a certain definite magnitude. Beauty is a matter of size and order, and therefore impossible either (1) in a very minute creature, since our perception becomes indistinct as it approaches instantaneity; or (2) in a creature of vast size — one, say, 1,000 miles long — as in that case, instead of the object being seen all at once, the unity and wholeness of it is lost to the beholder. Just in the same way, then, as a beautiful whole made up of parts, or a beautiful living creature, must be of some size, but a size to be taken in by the eye, so a story or Plot must be of some length, but of a length to be taken in by the memory. As for the limit of its length, so far as that is relative to public performances and spectators, it does not fall within the theory of poetry. If they had to perform a hundred tragedies, they would be timed by water-clocks, as they are said to have been at one period. The limit, however, set by the actual nature of the thing is this: the longer the story, consistently with its being comprehensible as a whole, the finer it is by reason of its magnitude. As a rough general formula, 'a length which allows of the hero passing by a series of probable or necessary stages from misfortune to happiness, or from happiness to misfortune,' may suffice as a limit for the magnitude of the story.

The Unity of a Plot does not consist, as some suppose, in its having one man as its subject. An infinity of things befall that one man, some of which it is impossible to reduce to unity; and in like manner there are many actions of one man which cannot be made to form one action. One sees.

therefore, the mistake of all the poets who have written a Heracleid,¹ a Theseid,¹ or similar poems; they suppose that, because Heracles was one man, the story also of Heracles must be one story. Homer, however, evidently understood this point quite well, whether by art or instinct, just in the same way as he excels the rest in every other respect. In writing an Odyssey, he did not make the poem cover all that ever befell his hero — it befell him, for instance, to get wounded on Parnassus and also to feign madness at the time of the call to arms, but the two incidents had no necessary or probable connexion with one another — instead of doing that, he took as the subject of the Odyssey, as also of the Iliad, an action with a Unity of the kind we are describing. The truth is that, just as in the other imitative arts one imitation is always of one thing, so in poetry the story, as an imitation of action, must represent one action, a complete whole, with its several incidents so closely connected that the transposal or withdrawal of any one of them will disjoin and dislocate the whole. For that which makes no perceptible difference by its presence or absence is no real part of the whole.

From what we have said it will be seen that the poet's function is to describe, not the thing that has happened, but a kind of thing that might happen, i.e. what is possible as being probable or necessary. The distinction between historian and poet is not in the one writing prose and the other verse — you might put the work of Herodotus² into verse, and it would still be a species of history; it consists really in this, that the one describes the thing that has been, and the other a kind of thing that might be. Hence poetry is something more philosophic and of graver import than history, since its statements are of the nature rather of universals, whereas those of history are singulars. By a universal statement I mean one as to what such or such a kind of man will probably or necessarily say or do — which is the aim of poetry, though it affixes proper names to the characters; by a singular statement, one as to what, say, Alcibiades³ did or had done to him. In Comedy this has become clear by this time; it is only when their plot is already made up of probable incidents that they give it a basis of proper names, choosing for the purpose any names that may occur to them, instead of writing like the old iambic poets about particular persons. In Tragedy, however, they still adhere to the historic names; and for this reason: what convinces is the possible; now whereas we are not yet sure as to the possibility of that which has not happened, that which has happened is manifestly possible, else it would not have come to pass. Nevertheless even in Tragedy there are some plays with but one or two known names in them, the rest being inventions; and there are some without a single known name, e.g. Agathon's Antheus,⁴ in which both incidents and names are of the poet's invention; and it is no less delightful on that account. So that one must not aim at a rigid adherence to the traditional stories on which tragedies are based. It would be absurd, in fact, to do so, as even the known stories are only known to a few, though they are a delight none the less to all.

It is evident from the above that the poet must be more the poet of his stories or Plots than of his verses, inasmuch as he is a poet by virtue of the imitative element in his work, and it is actions that he imitates. And if he should come to take a subject from actual history, he is none the less a poet for that; since some historic occurrences may very well be in the probable and possible order of things; and it is in that aspect of them that he is their poet.

Of simple Plots and actions the episodic are the worst. I call a Plot episodic when there is neither probability nor necessity in the sequence of its episodes. Actions of this sort bad poets construct through their own fault, and good ones on account of the players. His work being for public performance, a good poet often stretches out a Plot beyond its capabilities, and is thus obliged to twist the sequence of incident.

Tragedy, however, is an imitation not only of a complete action, but also of incidents arousing pity and fear. Such incidents have the very greatest effect on the mind when they occur unexpectedly and at the same time in consequence of one another; there is more of the marvellous in them than if they happened of themselves or by mere chance. Even matters of chance seem most marvellous if there is an appearance of design as it were in them; as for instance the statue of Mityz at Argos killed the author of Mityz' death by falling down on him when a looker-on at a public spectacle; for incidents like that we think to be not without a meaning. A Plot, therefore, of this sort is necessarily finer than others.

Plots are either simple or complex, since the actions they represent are naturally of this twofold description. The action, proceeding in the way defined, as one continuous whole, I call simple, when the change in the hero's fortunes takes place without Peripety or Discovery; and complex, when it involves one or the other, or both. These should each of them arise out of the structure of the Plot itself, so as to be the consequence, necessary or probable, of the antecedents. There is a great difference between a thing happening propter hoc and post hoc.¹

A Peripety is the change of the kind described from one state of things within the play to its opposite, and that too in the way we are saying, in the probable or necessary sequence of events; as it is for instance in *Œdipus*²: here the opposite state of things is produced by the Messenger, who, coming to gladden Œdipus and to remove his fears as to his mother, reveals the secret of his birth. And in *Lynceus*³: just as he is being led off for execution, with Danaus at his side to put him to death, the incidents preceding this bring it about that he is saved and Danaus put to death. A Discovery is, as the very word implies, a change from ignorance to knowledge, and thus to either love or hate, in the personages marked for good or evil fortune. The finest form of Discovery is one attended by Peripeties, like that which goes with the Discovery in Œdipus. There are no doubt other forms of it; what we have said may happen in a way in reference to inanimate things, even things of a very casual kind; and it is also possible to discover whether some one has done or not done something. But the form most directly connected with the Plot and the action of the piece is the first-mentioned. This, with a Peripety, will arouse either pity or fear — actions of that nature being what Tragedy is assumed to represent; and it will also serve to bring about the happy or unhappy ending. The Discovery, then, being of persons, it may be that of one party only to the other, the latter being already known; or both the parties may have to discover themselves. Iphigenia,⁴ for instance, was discovered to Orestes by sending the letter; and another Discovery was required to reveal him to Iphigenia.

¹ Because of something and after something.

² A play by Sophocles. Œdipus, son of Laius and Jocasta, was born subject to a curse to the effect that he would kill his father and marry his mother. The young infant was exposed on a mountain side but was rescued by shepherds and taken to the king of Corinth, by whom he was reared and educated. Later he met his father and, without recognizing him, killed him in a dispute. He then took over the kingdom of Thebes and married the queen Jocasta, whom he did not recognize as his mother. The play of Sophocles deals with Œdipus's discovery of the fact that the curse had been carried out.

³ A drama by Theodectes, who flourished at the time the art of drama in Greece was declining.

⁴ Heroine of two plays by Euripides, Iphigenia at Aulis and Iphigenia in Tauris. In the former play her father, Agamemnon, wishes to sacrifice her on the altar of Artemis in order to procure a good wind to take the Greek army to Troy. In the latter, after she has been rescued and has taken refuge among the Taurians, among whom she serves as priestess of Artemis, her brother Orestes is brought to the altar as a sacrifice. Iphigenia recognizes him and they flee together.

Two parts of the Plot, then, Peripety and Discovery, are on matters of this sort. A third part is Suffering; which we may define as an action of a destructive or painful nature, such as murders on the stage, tortures, woundings, and the like. The other two have been already explained.

The parts of Tragedy to be treated as formative elements in the whole were mentioned in a previous Chapter. From the point of view, however, of its quantity, i.e. the separate sections into which it is divided, a tragedy has the following parts: Prologue, Episode, Exode, and a choral portion, distinguished into Parode and Stasimon; these two are common to all tragedies, whereas songs from the stage and Commoe are only found in some. The Prologue is all that precedes the Parode of the chorus; an Episode all that comes in between two whole choral songs; the Exode all that follows after the last choral song. In the choral portion the Parode is the whole first statement of the chorus; a Stasimon, a song of the chorus without anapaests or trochees; a Commoe, a lamentation sung by chorus and actor in concert. The parts of Tragedy to be used as formative elements in the whole we have already mentioned; the above are its parts from the point of view of its quantity, or the separate sections into which it is divided.

The next points after what we have said above will be these: (1) What is the poet to aim at, and what is he to avoid, in constructing his Plots? and (2) What are the conditions on which the tragic effect depends?

We assume that, for the finest form of Tragedy, the Plot must be not simple but complex; and further, that it must imitate actions arousing fear and pity, since that is the distinctive function of this kind of imitation. It follows, therefore, that there are three forms of Plot to be avoided.

(1) A good man must not be seen passing from happiness to misery, or (2) a bad man from misery to happiness. The first situation is not fear-inspiring or piteous, but simply odious to us. The second is the most untragic that can be; it has no one of the requisites of Tragedy; it does not appeal either to the human feeling in us, or to our pity, or to our fears. Nor, on the other hand, should (3) an extremely bad man be seen falling from happiness into misery. Such a story may arouse the human feeling in us, but it will not move us to either pity or fear; pity is occasioned by undeserved misfortune, and fear by that of one like ourselves; so that there will be nothing either piteous or fear-inspiring in the situation. There remains, then, the intermediate kind of personage, a man not pre-eminently virtuous and just, whose misfortune, however, is brought upon him not by vice and depravity but by some error of judgement, of the number of those in the enjoyment of great reputation and prosperity; e.g. Oedipus, Thyestes,¹ and the men of note of similar families. *The perfect Plot, accordingly, must have a single, and not (as some tell us) a double issue; the change in the hero's fortunes must be not from misery to happiness, but on the contrary from happiness to misery; and the cause of it must lie not in any depravity, but in some great error on his part; the man himself being either such as we have described, or better, not worse, than that. Fact also confirms our theory. Though the poets began by accepting any tragic story that came to hand, in these days the finest tragedies are always on the story of some few houses, on that of Alcmeon,² Oedipus, Orestes, Meleager,³ Thyestes, Telephus,⁴ or any others that may have been involved, as either agents or sufferers, in some deed of horror. The theoretically best tragedy, then, has a Plot of this description. The critics, therefore, are wrong who blame Euripides⁵ for taking this line in his tragedies, and giving many of them an unhappy ending. It is, as we have said, the right line to take. The best proof is this: on the stage, and in the public performances, such plays, properly worked out, are seen to be the most truly tragic; and Euripides, even if his execution be faulty in every other point, is seen to be nevertheless the most tragic certainly of the dramatists. After this comes the construction of Plot which some rank first, one with a double story (like the Odyssey) and an opposite issue for the good and the bad personages. It is ranked as first only through the weakness of the audiences; the poets merely follow their public, writing as its wishes dictate. But the pleasure here is not that of Tragedy. It belongs rather to Comedy, where the bitterest enemies in the piece (e.g. Orestes and Ægisthus¹) walk off good friends at the end, with no slaying of any one by any one.

² Like Orestes, Alcmeon killed his mother, Eriphyle, to avenge his father, and experienced the same punishment.

The tragic fear and pity may be aroused by the Spectacle; but they may also be aroused by the very structure and incidents of the play — which is the better way and shows the better poet. The Plot in fact should be so framed that, even without seeing the things take place, he who simply hears the account of them shall be filled with horror and pity at the incidents; which is just the effect that the mere recital of the story in Ædipus would have on one. To produce this same effect by means of the Spectacle is less artistic, and requires extraneous aid. Those, however, who make use of the Spectacle to put before us that which is merely monstrous and not productive of fear, are wholly out of touch with Tragedy; not every kind of pleasure should be required of a tragedy, but only its own proper pleasure.

•The tragic pleasure is that of pity and fear, and the poet has to produce it by a work of imitation; it is clear, therefore, that the causes should be included in the incidents of his story. Let us see, then,

what kinds of incident strike one as horrible, or rather as piteous. In a deed of this description the parties must necessarily be either friends, or enemies, or indifferent to one another. Now when enemy does it on enemy, there is nothing to move us to pity either in his doing or in his meditating the deed, except so far as the actual pain of the sufferer is concerned; and the same is true when the parties are indifferent to one another. Whenever the tragic deed, however, is done within the family — when murder or the like is done or meditated by brother on brother, by son on father, by mother on son, or son on mother — these are the situations the poet should seek after. The traditional stories, accordingly, must be kept as they are, e.g. the murder of Clytæmnestra by Orestes² and of Eriphyle by Alcmeon. At the same time even with these there is something left to the poet himself; it is for him to devise the right way of treating them. Let us explain more clearly what we mean by 'the right way.' The deed of horror may be done by the doer knowingly and consciously, as in the old poets, and in Medea's murder of her children in Euripides.³ Or he may do it, but in ignorance of his relationship, and discover that afterwards, as does the Ædipus in Sophocles. Here the deed is outside the play; but it may be within it, like the act of the Alcmeon in Astydamos,⁴ or that of the Telegonus in Ulysses Wounded.⁵ A third possibility is for one meditating some deadly injury to another, in ignorance of his relationship, to make the discovery in time to draw back. These exhaust the possibilities, since the deed must necessarily be either done or not done, and either knowingly or unknowingly.

•The worst situation is when the personage is with full knowledge on the point of doing the deed, and leaves it undone. It is odious and also (through the absence of suffering) untragic; hence it is that no one is made to act thus except in some few instances, e.g. Hæmon and Creon in Antigone.¹ Next after this comes the actual perpetration of the deed meditated. A better situation than that, however, is for the deed to be done in ignorance, and the relationship discovered afterwards, since there is nothing odious in it, and the Discovery will serve to astound us. But the best of all is the last; what we have in Cresphontes,² for example, where Merope, on the point of slaying her son, recognizes him in time; in Iphigenia, where sister and brother are in a like position; and in Helle,³ where the son recognizes his mother, when on the point of giving her up to her enemy.

This will explain why our tragedies are restricted (as we said just now) to such a small number of families. It was accident rather than art that led the poets in quest of subjects to embody this kind of incident in their Plots. They are still obliged, accordingly, to have recourse to the families in which such horrors have occurred.

On the construction of the Plot, and the kind of Plot required for Tragedy, enough has now been said.

• In the Characters there are four points to aim at. First and foremost, that they shall be good. There will be an element of character in the play, if (as has been observed) what a personage says or does reveals a certain moral purpose; and a good element of character, if the purpose so revealed is good. Such goodness is possible in every type of personage, even in a woman or a slave, though the one is perhaps an inferior, and the other a wholly worthless being. The second point is to make them appropriate. The Character before us may be, say, manly; but it is not appropriate in a female Character to be manly, or clever. The third is to make them like the reality, which is not the same as their being good and appropriate, in our sense of the term. The fourth is to make them consistent and the same throughout; even if inconsistency be part of the man before one for imitation as presenting that form of character, he should still be consistently inconsistent. We have an instance of baseness of character, not required for the story, in the Menelaus in Orestes; of the incongruous and unbefitting in the lamentation of Ulysses in Scylla,⁴ and in the (clever) speech of Melanippe; and of inconsistency in Iphigenia at Aulis, where Iphigenia the suppliant is utterly unlike the later Iphigenia. • The right thing, however, is in the Characters just as in the incidents of the play to endeavour always after the necessary or the probable; so that whenever such-and-such a personage says or does such-and-such a thing, it shall be the necessary or probable outcome of his character; and whenever this incident follows on that, it shall be either the necessary or the probable consequence of it. From this one sees (to digress for a moment) that the Dénouement also should arise out of the plot itself, and not depend on a stage-artifice,⁵ as in Medea, or in the story of the (arrested) departure of the Greeks⁶ in the Iliad. The artifice must be reserved for matters outside the play — for past events beyond human knowledge, or events yet to come, which require to be foretold or announced; since it is the privilege of the Gods to know everything. There should be nothing improbable among the actual incidents. If it be unavoidable, however, it should be outside the tragedy, like the improbability in the Ædipus of Sophocles. But to return to the Characters. As Tragedy is an imitation of personages better than the ordinary man, we in our way should follow the example of good portrait-painters, who reproduce the distinctive features of a man, and at the same time, without losing the likeness, make him handsomer than he is. The poet in like manner, in portraying men quick or slow to anger, or with similar infirmities of character, must know how to represent them as such, and at the same time as good men, as Agathon and Homer have represented Achilles.

All these rules one must keep in mind throughout, and, further, those also for such points of stage-effect as directly depend on the art of the poet, since in these too one may often make mistakes. Enough, however, has been said on the subject in one of our published writings.

Discovery in general has been explained already. As for the species of Discovery, the first to be noted is (1) the least artistic form of it, of which the poets make most use through mere lack of invention, Discovery by signs or marks. Of these signs some are congenital, like the 'lance-head which the Earth-born have on them,'¹ or 'stars,' such as Carcinus² brings in his Thyestes; others acquired after birth — these latter being either marks on the body, e.g. scars, or external tokens, like necklaces, or (to take another sort of instance) the ark in the Discovery in Tyro.³ Even these, however, admit of two uses, a better and a worse; the scar of Ulysses is an instance; the Discovery of him through it is made in one way by the nurse⁴ and in another by the swineherds.⁵ A Discovery using signs as a means of assurance is less artistic, as indeed are all such as imply reflection; whereas one bringing them in all of a sudden, as in the Bath-story,⁶ is of a better order. Next after these are (2) Discoveries made directly by the poet; which are inartistic for that very reason; e.g. Orestes' Discovery of himself in Iphigenia: whereas his sister reveals who she is by the letter, Orestes is made to say himself what the poet rather than the story demands. This, therefore, is not far removed from the first-mentioned fault, since he might have presented certain tokens as well. Another instance is the 'shuttle's voice' in the *Tereus*⁷ of Sophocles. (3) A third species is Discovery through memory, from a man's consciousness being awakened by something seen. Thus in The Cyprine of Dicaeogenes,⁸ the sight of the picture makes the man burst into tears; and in the Tale of Alcinous,⁹ hearing the harper Ulysses is reminded of the past and weeps; the Discovery of them being the result. (4) A fourth kind is Discovery through reasoning; e.g. in *The Choephoroe*¹⁰; 'One like me is here; there is no one like me but Orestes; he, therefore, must be here.' Or that which Polyidus the Sophist suggested for Iphigenia; since it was natural for Orestes to reflect: 'My sister was sacrificed and I am to be sacrificed like her.' Or that in the Tydeus of Theodectes: 'I came to find a son, and am to die myself.' Or that in *The Phinida*¹¹; on seeing the place the women inferred their fate, that they were to die there, since they had also been exposed there. (5) There is, too, a composite Discovery arising from bad reasoning on the side of the other party. An instance of it is in *Ulysses the False Messenger*¹²: he said he should know the bow — which he had not seen; but to suppose from that that he would know it again (as though he had once seen it) was bad reasoning. (6) The best of all Discoveries, however, is that arising from the incidents themselves, when the great surprise comes about through a probable incident, like that in the Œdipus of Sophocles¹; and also in Iphigenia; for it was not improbable that she should wish to have a letter taken home. These last are the only Discoveries independent of the artifice of signs and necklaces. Next after them come Discoveries through reasoning.

At the time when he is constructing his Plots, and engaged on the Diction in which they are worked out, the poet should remember (1) to put the actual scenes as far as possible before his eyes. In this way, seeing everything with the vividness of an eye-witness as it were, he will devise what is appropriate, and be least likely to overlook incongruities. This is shown by what was censured in Carcinus, the return of Amphiaraus from the sanctuary; it would have passed unnoticed, if it had not been actually seen by the audience; but on the stage his play failed, the incongruity of the incident offending the spectators. (2) As far as may be, too, the poet should even act his story with the very gestures of his personages. Given the same natural qualifications, he who feels the emotions to be described will be the most convincing; distress and anger, for instance, are portrayed most truthfully by one who is feeling them at the moment. • Hence it is that poetry demands a man with a special gift for it, or else one with a touch of madness in him; the former can easily assume the required mood, and the latter may be actually beside himself with emotion. (3) His story, again, whether already made or of his own making, he should first simplify and reduce to a universal form, before proceeding to lengthen it out by the insertion of episodes. The following will show how the universal element in Iphigenia, for instance, may be viewed: A certain maiden having been offered in sacrifice, and spirited away from her sacrificers into another land, where the custom was to sacrifice all strangers to the Goddess, she was made there the priestess of this rite. Long after that the brother of the priestess happened to come; the fact, however, of the oracle having for a certain reason bidden him go thither, and his object in going, are outside the Plot of the play. On his coming he was arrested, and about to be sacrificed, when he revealed who he was — either as Euripides puts it, or (as suggested by Polyidus) by the not improbable exclamation, 'So I too am doomed to be sacrificed, as my sister was'; and the disclosure led to his salvation. This done, the next thing, after the proper names have been fixed as a basis for the story, is to work in episodes or accessory incidents. One must mind, however, that the episodes are appropriate, like the fit of madness² in Orestes, which led to his arrest, and the purifying,² which brought about his salvation. In plays, then, the episodes are short; in epic poetry they serve to lengthen out the poem. The argument of the Odyssey is not a long one. A certain man has been abroad many years; Poseidon is ever on the watch for him, and he is all alone. Matters at home too have come to this, that his substance is being wasted and his son's death plotted by suitors to his wife. Then he arrives there himself after his grievous sufferings; reveals himself, and falls on his enemies; and the end is his salvation and their death. This being all that is proper to the Odyssey, everything else in it is episode.

(4) There is a further point to be borne in mind. Every tragedy is in part Complication and in part Dénouement; the incidents before the opening scene, and often certain also of those within the play, forming the Complication; and the rest the Dénouement. By Complication I mean all from the beginning of the story to the point just before the change in the hero's fortunes; by Dénouement, all from the beginning of the change to the end. In the Lynceus of Theodectes, for instance, the Complication includes, together with the presupposed incidents, the seizure of the child and that in turn of the parents; and the Dénouement all from the indictment for the murder to the end. Now it is right, when one speaks of a tragedy as the same or not the same as another, to do so on the ground before all else of their Plot, i.e. as having the same or not the same Complication and Dénouement. Yet there are many dramatists who, after a good Complication, fail in the Dénouement. But it is necessary for both points of construction to be always duly mastered. (5) There are four distinct species of Tragedy — that being the number of the constituents also that have been mentioned: first, the complex Tragedy, which is all Peripety and Discovery; second, the Tragedy of suffering, e.g. the Ajaxes and Ixions,¹ third, the Tragedy of character, e.g. The Phthiotides and Peleus.² The fourth constituent is that of 'Spectacle,' exemplified in The Phorcydes,³ in Prometheus,³ and in all plays with the scene laid in the nether world. • The poet's aim, then, should be to combine every element of interest, if possible, or else the more important and the major part of them. This is now especially necessary owing to the unfair criticism to which the poet is subjected in these days. Just because there have been poets before him strong in the several species of tragedy, the critics now expect the one man to surpass that which was the strong point of each one of his predecessors. (6) One should also remember what has been said more than once, and not write a tragedy on an epic body of incident (i.e. one with a plurality of stories in it), by attempting to dramatize, for instance, the entire story of the Iliad. In the epic owing to its scale every part is treated at proper length; with a drama, however, on the same story the result is very disappointing. This is shown by the fact that all who have dramatized the fall of Ilium in its entirety, and not part by part, like Euripides, or the whole of the Niobe story,⁴ instead of a portion, like Æschylus, either fail utterly or have but ill success on the stage; for that and that alone was enough to ruin even a play by Agathon. Yet in their Peripeties, as also in their simple plots, the poets I mean show wonderful skill in aiming at the kind of effect they desire — a tragic situation that arouses the human feeling in one, like the clever villain (e.g. Sisyphus)⁵ deceived, or the brave wrongdoer worsted. This is probable, however, only in Agathon's sense, when he speaks of the probability of even improbabilities coming to pass. (7) The Chorus too should be regarded as one of the actors; it should be an integral part of the whole, and take a share in the action — that which it has in Sophocles, rather than in Euripides. With the later poets, however, the songs in a play of theirs have no more to do with the Plot of that than of any other tragedy. Hence it is that they are now singing intercalary pieces, a practice first introduced by Agathon. And yet what real difference is there between singing such intercalary pieces, and attempting to fit in a speech, or even a whole act, from one play into another?

¹ Œdipus, after becoming king of Thebes and marrying his own mother, tries to find out who killed the former king. He institutes a thorough investigation, the result of which is the revelation of his own identity.

² Both episodes mentioned in Iphigenia in Tauris. Orestes, after killing his mother, was driven mad by the Furies.

The Plot and Characters having been discussed, it remains to consider the Diction and Thought. As for the Thought, we may assume what is said of it in our Art of Rhetoric, as it belongs more properly to that department of inquiry. The Thought of the personages is shown in everything to be effected by their language — in every effort to prove or dis-prove, to arouse emotion (pity, fear, anger, and the like), or to maximize or minimize things. It is clear, also, that their mental procedure must be on the same lines in their actions likewise, whenever they wish them to arouse pity or horror, or to have a look of importance or probability. The only difference is that with the act the impression has to be made without explanation; whereas with the spoken word it has to be produced by the speaker, and result from his language. What, indeed, would be the good of the speaker, if things appeared in the required light even apart from anything he says?

As regards the Diction, one subject for inquiry under this head is the turns given to the language when spoken; e.g. the difference between command and prayer, simple statement and threat, question and answer, and so forth. The theory of such matters, however, belongs to Elocution and the professors of that art. Whether the poet knows these things or not, his art as a poet is never seriously criticized on that account. What fault can one see in Homer's 'Sing of the wrath, Goddess'?¹ which Protagoras² has criticized as being a command where a prayer was meant, since to bid one do or not do, he tells us, is a command. Let us pass over this, then, as appertaining to another art, and not to that of poetry.

LONGINUS

(213-273 A.D.)

The Treatise Concerning Sublimity is usually ascribed to a Longinus, who was minister to Zenobia, queen of Palmyra in the third century after Christ. The probability is, however, that it was written much earlier — possibly as early as the first century of the Christian era. There has been much difficulty in deciding what is the best English equivalent of the Greek term which Longinus uses to indicate the subject of his discourse. On Genius, On the Grand Style, On the Sublime, and various other translations of the title have been suggested. Perhaps it is best not to trouble ourselves much over the title, but to form an impression of the author's main idea by reading his work. Longinus was one of the first critics to penetrate beyond the mere outward machinery of style and seize upon the spirit that makes great literature. He does not abandon the idea of following rules and precepts, but he sets forth as the primary consideration the necessity of "stirring the hearer." Mere structural perfection is not enough; literature must have the divine fire. His critical ideas mark a distinct departure from the fixed and formal imitative practice of his own period. The translation of the treatise into French by the poet and critic Boileau (1674) gave it widespread recognition. From that time forward it held its place as a fundamental document in the field of criticism. Longinus was the first on the ground, and very little has been said since on the subject of sublimity that is not essentially repetition.

The selection here given is taken from the earlier part of the treatise, Longinus on the Sublime, translated by A. O. Prickard, Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1906.

A TREATISE CONCERNING SUBLIMITY

CHAPTER II

We, however, must at once raise this further question: is there any art of sublimity or of its opposite? For some go so far as to think all who would bring such terms under technical rules to be entirely mistaken. 'Genius,' says one, 'is inbred, not taught; there is one art for the things of genius, to be born with them.' All natural effects are spoilt, they think, by technical rules, and become miserable skeletons. I assert that the reverse will prove true on examination, if we consider that Nature, a law to herself as she mostly is in all that is passionate and lofty, yet is no creature of random impulse delighting in mere absence of method; that she is indeed herself the first and originating principle which underlies all things, yet rules of degree, of fitting occasion, of unerring practice, and of application can be determined by method and are its contribution; in a sense all greatness is exposed to a danger of its own, if left to itself without science to control, 'unsteadied, unballasted,' abandoned to mere velocity and un instructed venture; greatness needs the spur often, it also needs the bit. What Demosthenes ¹ shows to be true of the common life of men — that of all good things the greatest is good fortune, but a second, not inferior to the first, is good counsel, and that where the latter is wanting the former is at once cancelled — we may properly apply to literature; here Nature fills the place of good fortune, Art of good counsel. Also, and this is most important, it is only from Art that we can learn the very fact that certain effects in literature rest on Nature and on her alone. If, as I said, the critic who finds fault with earnest students would take all these things into his account, he would in my opinion no longer deem inquiry upon the subjects before us to be unnecessary or unfruitful.

(Here the equivalent of about six pages of this version has been lost.)

CHAPTER III

Stay they the furnace! quench the far-flung blaze!

For if I spy one crouching habitant,
I'll twist a lock, one lock of storm-borne flame,
And fire the roof, and char the halls to ash:
Not yet, not now my noble strain is raised.

All this is tragic no longer, but burlesque of tragic; 'locks,' 'to vomit up to heaven,' 'Boreas turned flute player,' and the rest. It is turbid in expression, and confused in imagery, not forcible; and if you examine each detail in clear light, you see a gradual sinking from the terrible to the contemptible. Now when in tragedy, which by its nature is pompous and admits bombast, tasteless rant is found to be unpardonable,

I should be slow to allow that it could be in place in true history. Thus we laugh at Gorgias ² of Leontini for writing 'Xerxes the Zeus of the Persians' and 'vultures, those living tombs,' and at some passages in Callisthenes ³ as being stilted, not sublime, and even more at some in Cleitarchus ⁴; he is a mere fantastic, he 'puffs,' to apply the words of Sophocles, 'on puny pipes, but with no mellowing gag.' So with Amphicrates, Hegesias, and Matris ⁵; they often appear to themselves to be possessed, really they are no inspired revellers but children at play. We may take it that turpidity is of all faults perhaps the most difficult to avoid. It is a fact of Nature that all men who aim at grandeur, in avoiding the reproach of being weak and dry, are, we know not how, borne off into turpidity, caught by the adage: — 'To lapse from greatness were a generous fault.' As in bodies, so in writings, all swellings which are hollow and unreal are bad, and very possibly work round to the opposite condition, for 'nothing,' they say, 'so dry as a man with dropsy.'

While tumidity thus tends to overshoot the sublime, puerility is the direct opposite of all that is great; it is in every sense low and small spirited, and essentially a most ignoble fault. What then is puerility? Clearly it is a pedantic conceit, which overdoes itself and becomes frigid at the last. Authors glide into this when they make for what is unusual, artificial, above all, agreeable, and so run on the reefs of nonsense and affectation. By the side of these is a third kind of vice, found in passages of strong feeling, and called by Theodorus ⁶ 'Parenthyrsus.' This is passion out of place and unmeaning, where there is no call for passion, or unrestrained where restraint is needed. Men are carried aside, as if under strong drink, into expressions of feeling which have nothing to do with the subject, but are personal to themselves and academic: then they play clumsy antics before an audience which has never been moved; it cannot be otherwise, when the speakers are in an ecstasy, and the hearers are not. But we reserve room to speak of the passions elsewhere.

CHAPTER IV

Of the second fault which we mentioned, frigidity, Timæus¹ is full; an able author in other respects, and not always wanting in greatness of style; learned, acute, but extremely critical of the faults of others, while insensible to his own; often sinking into mere childishness from an incessant desire to start new notions. I will set down one or two instances only from this author, since Cæcilius² has been before me with most of them. Praising Alexander the Great, he writes: 'who annexed all Asia in fewer years than Isocrates³ took to write his Panegyricus in support of war against the Persians.' Truly a wonderful comparison between the Macedonian and the Sophist: yes, Timæus, clearly the Lacedæmonians were far out-matched by Isocrates in valour, for they took Messene in thirty years, he composed his Panegyricus in ten! Then how he turns upon the Athenians captured in Sicily: 'Because they committed impiety against Hermes, and defaced his images, they suffered punishment for it, largely on account of one man, a descendant, on the father's side, of the injured god, Hermocrates,⁴ son of Hermon.' This makes me wonder, dear Terentianus, that he does not also write of the tyrant Dionysius⁵: 'He had shown impiety towards Zeus and Heracles; therefore he was deprived of his kingdom by Dion and Heraclides.'⁶ What need to speak of Timæus, when those heroes Xenophon and Plato, although they were of Socrates' own school, sometimes forgot themselves in such paltry attempts to please. Thus Xenophon writes in the Constitution of the Lacedæmonians: 'I mean to say that you can no more hear their voices than if they were made of stone, no more draw their eyes aside than if they were made of brass; you might think them more modest than the maiden-pupils in their eyes.' It was worthy of Amphicrates,⁷ not of Xenophon, to call the pupils in our eyes 'modest maidens': but what a notion, to believe that the eyes of a whole row were modest, whereas they say that immodesty in particular persons is expressed by nothing so much as by the eyes. Addressing a forward person, 'Wine laden, dog-eyed!' says Homer. Timæus, however, as if clutching at stolen goods, has not left to Xenophon even this point of frigidity. He says, speaking of Agathocles,⁸ that he even carried off his cousin, who had been given in marriage to another man, from the solemnity of Unveiling; 'Now who would have done this, who had maidens, not harlots, in his eyes?' Nay, Plato, the divine, as at other times he is, wishing to mention tablets, says: 'they will write and store in the temples memorials of cypress wood,' and again 'concerning walls, O Megillus, I would take the Spartan view, to allow our walls to sleep on the ground where they lie, and not be raised again.' And Herodotus is hardly clear of this fault, when he calls beautiful women 'pains to the eyes'; though he has some excuse, for the speakers in Herodotus are barbarians and in drink: still, not even through the mouths of such characters is it well, out of sheer pettiness, to cut a clumsy figure before all time.

CHAPTER V

All these undignified faults spring up in literature from a single cause, the craving for intellectual novelties, on which, above all else, our own generation goes wild. It would almost be true to say that the sources of all the good in us are also the sources of all the bad. Thus beauties of expression, and all which is sublime, I will add, all which is agreeable, contribute to success in our writing; and yet every one of these becomes a principle and a foundation, as of success, so of its opposite. Much the same is to be said of changes of construction, hyperboles, plurals for singulars; we will show in the sequel the danger which seems to attend each. Therefore it is necessary at once to raise the question directly, and to show how it is possible for us to escape the vices thus intimately mingled with the sublime.

CHAPTER VI

It is possible, my friend, to do this, if we could first of all arrive at a clear and discriminating knowledge of what true sublimity is. Yet this is hard to grasp: judgement of style is the last and ripest fruit of much experience. Still, if I am to speak in the language of precept, it is perhaps not impossible, from some such remarks as follow, to attain to a right decision upon the matter.

CHAPTER VII

We must, dear friend, know this truth. As in our ordinary life nothing is great which it is a mark of greatness to despise; as fortunes, offices, honours, kingdoms, and such like, things which are praised so pompously from without, could never appear, at least to a sensible man, to be surpassingly good, since actual contempt for them is a good of no mean kind (certainly men admire, more than those who have them, those who might have them, but in greatness of soul let them pass); even so it is with all that is elevated in poetry and prose writings; we have to ask whether it may be that they have that image of greatness to which so much careless praise is attached, but on a close scrutiny would be found vain and hollow, things which it is nobler to despise than to admire. For it is a fact of Nature that the soul is raised by true sublimity, it gains a proud step upwards, it is filled with joy and exultation, as though itself had produced what it hears. Whenever therefore anything is heard frequently by a man of sense and literary experience, but does not dispose his mind to high thoughts, nor leave in it material for fresh reflection, beyond what is actually said; while it sinks, if you look carefully at the whole context, and dwindles away, this can never be true sublimity, being preserved so long only as it is heard. That is really great, which gives much food for fresh reflection; which it is hard, nay impossible, to resist; of which the memory is strong and indelible. You may take it that those are beautiful and genuine effects of sublimity which please always, and please all. For when men of different habits, lives, ambitions, ages, all take one and the same view about the same writings, the verdict and pronouncement of such dissimilar individuals give a powerful assurance, beyond all gainsaying, in favour of that which they admire.

CHAPTER VIII

Now there are five different sources, so to call them, of lofty style, which are the most productive; power of expression being presupposed as a foundation common to all five types, and inseparable from any. First and most potent is the faculty of grasping great conceptions, as I have defined it in my work on Xenophon. Second comes passion, strong and impetuous. These two constituents of sublimity are in most cases native-born, those which now follow come through art: the proper handling of figures, which again seem to fall under two heads, figures of thought, and figures of diction; then noble phraseology, with its subdivisions, choice of words, and use of tropes and of elaboration; and fifthly, that cause of greatness which includes in itself all that preceded it, dignified and spirited composition. Let us now look together at what is included under each of these heads, premising that Cæcilius has passed over some of the five, for instance, passion. If he did so under the idea that sublimity and feeling are one and the same thing, coexistent and of common origin, he is entirely wrong.

For some passions may be found which are distinct from sublimity and are humble, as those of pity, grief, fear; and again, in many cases, there is sublimity without passion; take, besides countless other instances, the poet's own venture—some lines on the Alodæ:

Upon Olympus Ossa, leafy Pelion

On Ossa would they pile, a stair to heaven¹;

and the yet grander words which follow: 10

Now had they worked their will.

In the Orators, again, speeches of panegyric, pomp, display, exhibit on every hand majesty and the sublime, but commonly lack passion: hence Orators of much passion succeed least in panegyric, and again the panegyrists are not strong in passion. Or if, on the other hand, Cæcilius did not think that passion ever contributes to sublimity, and, therefore, 20 held it undeserving of mention, he is quite in error. I should feel confidence in maintaining that nothing reaches great eloquence so surely as genuine passion in the right place; it breathes the vehemence 25 of frenzy and divine possession, and makes the very words inspired.

CHAPTER IX

After all, however, the first element, 30 great natural genius, covers far more ground than the others: therefore, as to this also, even if it be a gift rather than a thing acquired, yet so far as is possible we must nurture our souls to all that is great, 35 and make them, as it were, teem with noble endowment. How? you will ask. I have myself written in another place to this effect: — 'Sublimity is the note which rings from a great mind.' Thus it is that, 40 without any utterance, a notion, unclothed and unsupported, often moves our wonder, because the very thought is great: the silence of Ajax in the book of the Lower

World is great, and more sublime than any words. First, then, it is quite necessary to presuppose the principle from which this springs: the true Orator must have no low ungenerous spirit, for it is not possible that they who think small thoughts, fit for slaves, and practise them in all their daily life, should put out anything to deserve wonder and immortality. Great words issue, and it cannot be otherwise, from those whose thoughts are weighty. So it is on the lips of men of the highest spirit that words of rare greatness are found. Take the answer of Alexander to Parmenio,² who had said 'I were content . . .'

(Here about eighteen pages have been lost.)

. . . the distance from earth to heaven,

a measure one may call it of the stature as well of Homer as of Strife.³ Unlike this is the passage of Hesiod⁴ about Gloom (if The Shield is really to be assigned to Hesiod), 'From out her nostrils rheum in streams was poured': he has made the picture hateful, not terrible. But how does Homer make great all that belongs to gods?

Far as the region of blank air in sight
Of one who sitting on some beacon height
Views the long wine-dark barrens of the deep
Such space the horses of the realm of light Urged by the gods, as on they strain and sweep,
While their hoofs thunder aloft, bound over at one leap.

He measures their leap by the interval of the boundaries of the world. Who might not justly exclaim, when he marked this extravagance in greatness, that, if the horses of the gods make two leaps, leap after leap, they will no longer find room within the world. Passing great too are the appearances in the Battle of the Gods: —

Heaven sent its clarion forth: Olympus too:

¹ The gigantic Alodæ (Otus and Ephialtes) attempted, by piling Mount Ossa upon Olympus and Mount Pelion on top of all, to scale the skies and dethrone the immortals. Jupiter slew them with his lightning.

² The story is that one of Alexander's most trusted commanders, Parmenio, said to his master that, if he were Alexander, he would be content to end the war on those terms, and run no further risks. Alexander answered that he, too, if he were Parmenio, would do the same.

³ This personage is described by Homer as follows:

"small of stature, a low head
At first she rears, but soon with loftier claim,
Her forehead in the sky, the earth doth tread."

⁴ Greek poet who flourished about 776 B.C.

Trembled too Hades in his gloomy reign,
And leapt up with a scream, lest o'er his head
Poseidon cleave the solid earth in twain,
And open the pale kingdom of the dead
Horrible, foul with blight, which e'en Immortals
dread.

You see, comrade, how, when earth is torn up from its foundations, and Tartarus¹ itself laid bare, and the Universe suffers overthrow and dissolution, all things at once, heaven and hell, things mortal and immortal, mingle in the war and the peril of that fight. Yet all this is terrible indeed, though, unless taken as allegory, thoroughly impious and out of proportion. For when Homer presents to us woundings of the gods, their factions, revenges, tears, bonds, sufferings, all massed together, it seems to me that, as he has done his uttermost to make the men of the Trojan war gods, so he has made the gods men. Only for us, when we are miserable, a harbour from our ills is reserved in death; the gods, as he draws them,
are everlasting, not in their nature, but in their unhappiness. Far better than the 'Battle of the Gods' are the passages which show us divinity as something unde-filed and truly great, with no admixture;
for instance, to take a passage which has been worked out by many before us, the lines on Poseidon:

Tall mountains and wild woods, from height to
height,
The city and the vessels by the main . . .
Rocked to the immortal feet that, hurrying,
bare
Poseidon in his wrath . . .
. . . the light wheels along the sea-plain rolled;
From cave and lair the creatures of the deep Flocked to sport round him, and the crystal heap
Of waters in wild joy disparting know
Their lord, and as the fleet pair onward sweep . . .

Thus too the lawgiver of the Jews, no common man, when he had duly conceived the power of the Deity, showed it forth as duly. At the very beginning of his Laws,⁴⁵
'God said,' he writes — What? 'Let there be light, and there was light, let there be earth, and there was earth.' Perhaps I shall not seem wearisome, comrade, if I quote to you one other passage from the poet, this time on a human theme, that you may learn how he accustoms his readers to enter with him into majesties which are more than human. Gloom and impenetrable night suddenly cover the battle of the Greeks before him; then Ajax, in his helplessness, says: —

Zeus, sire, do thou the veil of darkness rend,
And make clear daylight, that our eyes may see:
Then in the light e'en slay us —.

Here is the very truth of the passion of Ajax: he does not pray to live — such a petition were too humble for the hero — but when in impracticable darkness he could dispose his valour to no good purpose, chafing that he stands idle for the battle, he prays for light at the speediest, sure of finding therein at the worst a burial worthy of his valour, even if Zeus be arrayed against him. Truly the spirit of Homer goes along with every struggle, in full and carrying gale; he feels the very thing himself, he 'rages; —

Not fire in densest mountain glade,
Nor spear-armed Ares² e'er raging dreadfuller:
Foam started from his lips, . . .

Yet he shows throughout the Odyssey (for there are many reasons why we must look closely into passages from that poem also),
that, when a great genius begins to decline, the love of story-telling is a mark of its old age. It is clear from many other indications that this work was the second;
but more particularly from the fact that he introduces throughout the Odyssey
remnants of the sufferings before Ilium, as so many additional episodes of the Trojan war; ay, and renders to its heroes fresh lamentations and words of pity, as though awarded in some far distant time.
Yes, the Odyssey is nothing but an epilogue of the Iliad: —

There the brave Aias³ and Achilles lie; Patroclus there, whose wisdom matched the gods on high;
There too Antilochus⁴ my son. . . .

¹ Hades.

² Mars.

³ Son of Telamon, one of the claimants to Achilles's arms after the latter's death. The arms were given to Ulysses.

⁴ Son of Nestor.

From the same cause, I think, writing the Iliad in the heyday of his spirit, he made the whole structure dramatic and combative; that of the Odyssey is in the main narrative, which is the special mark of age. So it is that in the Odyssey one might liken Homer to a setting sun; the intensity is gone, but there remains the greatness. Here the tone of those great lays of Ilium is no longer maintained — the passages on one level of sublimity with no sinking anywhere, the same stream of passion poured upon passion, the readiness of turn, the closeness to life, the throng of images all drawn from the truth: as when Ocean¹ retires into himself, and is left lonely around his proper bounds, only the ebbings of his greatness are left to our view, and a wandering among the shallows of the fabulous and the incredible. While I say²⁰ this, I have not forgotten the storms in the Odyssey, nor the story of the Cyclops, nor certain other passages; I am describing an old age, but the old age of Homer. Still in all these, as they follow one another, fable prevails over action. I entered upon this digression, as I said, in order to show how very easily great genius, when the prime is passed, is turned aside to trifling: there are the stories of the wine-skin, of the companions turned by Circe to swine (whom Zoilus² called 'porkers in tears'), of Zeus fed by doves like a young bird, of Ulysses ten days without food on the wreck, there are the incredible details of the slaying of the Suitors. What can we call these but in very truth 'dreams of Zeus'? A second reason why the incidents of the Odyssey also should be discussed is this; that you may recognize how the decline of passion in great writers and poets passes away into character drawing: the sketches of life in the household of Ulysses much resemble a comedy of character.

LUCRETIVS

(95?-51? B.C.)

The life of Lucretius, one of the greatest of Roman poets and thinkers, is unfortunately obscure. About all that is known is that he belonged to the famous Lucretian family and that he lived during the most troublous times of the Roman Republic. It may be that the cruelty and bloodshed which were constantly before him were responsible for the vein of sadness that runs through his great poem On the Nature of Things.

It is usually supposed that he went to Greece and studied philosophy under Zeno, the famous disciple of Epicurus. The tradition that Lucretius went insane and that his poem On the Nature of Things (ca. 55 B.C.) was completed during his lucid intervals is, in all likelihood, false. It is apparently true, however, that he killed himself shortly after he passed his fortieth year, some say on the very day that Vergil came of age.

Lucretius is more admired in modern times than he was in his own day, or in the periods immediately following. He is mentioned with appreciation by some of the Latin writers, but there is little to show that he was properly valued, either as a poet or a philosopher. Whatever praise has been given to him in subsequent years, down almost to the present day, is nearly all in appreciation of his philosophy rather than of his poetry. Today we recognize him not only as a great thinker but as a master of poetic expression and as one of the foremost interpreters of Nature. The arguments with which he defends the principles of Epicurus have been quoted by the rationalists almost as often as Plato's by the spiritualists, and his arguments against the existence of the pagan gods of Rome have often been taken over and applied, with little change, to the Christian God by skeptical philosophers of several centuries.

This selection is taken from T. Lucretius Carus, Of the Nature of Things, a metrical translation by W. E. Leonard, London, Dent, 1921.

OF THE NATURE OF THINGS

BOOK I

Proem

Mother of Rome, delight of Gods and men,
 Dear Venus ¹ that beneath the gliding stars
 Makest to teem the many-voyaged main
 And fruitful lands — for all of living things
 Through thee alone are evermore conceived,
 Through thee are risen to visit the great sun —
 Before thee, Goddess, and thy coming on,
 Flee stormy wind and massy cloud away,
 For thee the dædal Earth bears scented flowers,
 For thee the waters of the unvexed deep
 Smile, and the hollows of the sérene sky
 Glow with diffuséd radiance for thee!
 For soon as comes the springtime face of
 day,
 And procreant gales blow from the West
 unbarred,
 First fowls of air, smit to the heart by thee,
 Foretoken thy approach, O thou Divine,
 And leap the wild herds round the happy
 fields
 Or swim the bounding torrents. Thus
 amain,
 Seized with the spell, all creatures follow
 thee
 Whithersoever thou walkest forth to lead,
 And thence through seas and mountains
 and swift streams,
 Through leafy homes of birds and greening
 plains,
 Kindling the lure of love in every breast,
 Thou bringest the eternal generations
 forth,
 Kind after kind. And since 'tis thou alone Guidest the Cosmos, and without thee naught
 Is risen to reach the shining shores of light,
 Nor aught of joyful or of lovely born,

Thee do I crave co-partner in that verse
 Which I presume on Nature to compose For Memmius ² mine, whom thou hast willed to be 5 Peerless in every grace at every hour — Wherefore indeed, Divine one, give my
 words
 Immortal charm. Lull to a timely rest
 O'er sea and land the savage works of war,
 10 For thou alone hast power with public
 peace
 To aid mortality; since he who rules
 The savage works of battle, puissant Mars,
 How often to thy bosom flings his strength O'ermastered by the eternal wound of
 love —
 And there, with eyes and throat full backward thrown,
 Gazing, my Goddess, open-mouthed at
 thee,
 Pastures on love his greedy sight, his
 breath
 Hanging upon thy lips. Him thus reclined
 Fill with thy holy body, round, above!
 25 Pour from those lips soft syllables to win
 Peace for the Romans, glorious lady,
 peace!
 For in a season troublous to the state
 Neither may I attend this task of mine 30 With thought untroubled, nor mid such events

 Neglect the civic cause.
 Whilst human kind Throughout the lands lay miserably crushed
 Before all eyes beneath Religion ⁴ — who Would show her head along the region
 skies,
 Glowering on mortals with her hideous
 face —
 A Greek ⁵ it was who first opposing dared
 Raise mortal eyes that terror to withstand,

¹ Lucretius, actually a disbeliever in supernatural agency, addresses Venus of course fancifully. The Romans traced their origin to Æneas, who was the son of Venus by Anchises.

² Pupil and beloved friend of Lucretius, and one of an illustrious group occupied with the brilliant revival of the Epicurean school.

³ Sensible of the high claims of the public upon Memmius' time, Lucretius asks of him only the moments Rome can spare.

⁴ Religion was for Lucretius synonymous with superstition, and hence was false.

⁵ Epicurus.

Nor threatening thunder of the ominous
sky

Abashed; but rather chafed to angry zest
His dauntless heart to be the first to rend
The crossbars at the gates of Nature old.
And this his will and hardy wisdom won;
And forward thus he fared afar, beyond
The flaming ramparts of the world, until
He wandered the immeasurable All.
When he to us, a conqueror, reports
What things can rise to being, what cannot,
And by what law to each its scope prescribed,

Its boundary stone that clings so deep in
Time.

Wherefore Religion now is under foot,
And us his victory now exalts to heaven.

I know how hard it is in Latin verse
To tell the dark discoveries of the Greeks, Chiefly because our pauper-speech must find

Strange terms to fit the strangeness of the
thing;

Yet worth of thine and the expected joy
Of thy sweet friendship do persuade me on To bear all toil and wake the clear nights
through,

Seeking with what of words and what of
song

I may at last most gloriously uncloud
For thee the light beyond, wherewith to
view

The core of being at the centre hid.
And for the rest, summon to judgments
true,

Unbusied ears and singleness of mind
Withdrawn from cares; lest these my gifts, arranged

For thee with eager service, thou disdain
Before thou comprehendest: since for thee
I prove the supreme law of Gods and sky,
And the primordial germs of things unfold, Whence Nature all¹ creates, and multi-
plies

And fosters all, and whither she resolves
Each in the end when each is overthrown.
This ultimate stock we have devised to
name

Procreant atoms, matter, seeds of things,
Or primal bodies, as primal as the world.

I fear perhaps thou deemest that we fare
An impious road to realms of thought profane;

But 'tis that same religion oftener far
Hath bred the foul impieties of men:
As once at Aulis, the elected chiefs,
Foremost of heroes, Danaan counsellors,
Defiled Diana's altar, virgin queen,
With Agamemnon's daughter,² foully slain.
She felt the chaplet round her maiden locks

And fillets, fluttering down on either cheek,
And at the altar marked her grieving sire,
The priests beside him who concealed the knife,

And all the folk in tears at sight of her.
With a dumb terror and a sinking knee
She dropped; nor might avail her now that first

'Twas she that gave the king a father's
name.

They raised her up, they bore the trembling girl

On to the altar — hither led not now
With solemn rites and hymeneal choir,
But sinless woman, sinfully foredone,
A parent felled her on her bridal day,
Making his child a sacrificial beast

To give the ships auspicious winds for Troy:

Such are the crimes to which religion leads.
For there shall come a time when even
thou,

Forced by the soothsayer's terror-tales, shalt seek

To break from us. Ah, many a dream even now

Can they concoct to rout thy plans of life,
And trouble all thy fortunes with base
fears.

I own with reason: for, if man but knew
Some fixed end to ills, they would be strong By some device unconquered to withstand

Religions and the menacings of seers.
But now no skill nor instrument is theirs,

¹ Epicurus and Lucretius distinguish between the all and what they call mundus, the world. The all is the universe, infinite, eternal, unbeginning, and incapable of increase or decrease; the world is only a part of it, finite, has a beginning and is likely to have an end.

² Lucretius, apprehensive that his pupil may charge him with the design to delude his understanding, instances the cruel sacrifice of Iphigenia.

Since men must dread eternal pains in death.

For what the soul may be they do not know,

Whether 'tis born, or enter in at birth,
And whether, snatched by death, it die with us,

Or visit the shadows and the vasty caves
Of Orcus,¹ or by some divine decree
Enter the brute herds, as our Ennius sang,
Who first from lovely Helicon brought down

A laurel wreath of bright perennial leaves,
Renowned forever among the Italian clans.
Yet Ennius² too in everlasting verse
Proclaims those vaults of Acheron to be,
Though thence, he said, nor souls nor bodies fare,

But only phantom figures, strangely wan,
And tells how once from out those regions²⁰
rose

Old Homer's ghost to him and shed salt tears

And with his words unfolded Nature's source.

Then be it ours with steady mind to clasp
The purport of the skies — the law behind
The wandering courses of the sun and moon;

To scan the powers that speed all life be-³⁰
low;

But most to see with reasonable eyes
Of what the mind, of what the soul is made,

And what it is so terrible that breaks
On us asleep, or waking in disease,
Until we seem to mark or hear at hand
Dead men whose bones earth bosomed long ago.

Substance is Eternal

This terror, then, this darkness of the mind,

Not sunrise with its flaring spokes of light,
Nor glittering arrows of morning can dis-⁴⁵
perse,

But only Nature's aspect³ and her law,
Which, teaching us, hath this exordium:

Nothing from nothing ever yet was born.

Fear holds dominion over mortality
Only because, seeing in land and sky
So much the cause whereof no wise they
5 know,

Men think Divinities are working there.
Meantime, when once we know from nothing still

Nothing can be create, we shall divine
10 More clearly what we seek: those elements
From which alone all things created are,
And how accomplished by no tool of Gods.
Suppose all sprang from all things: any
kind

15 Might take its origin from anything,
No fixed seed required. Men from the sea Might rise, and from the land the scaly breed,

And fowl full fledged come bursting from
the sky;

The hornéd cattle, the herds and all the wild

Would haunt with varying offspring tilth
and waste;

25 Nor would the same fruits keep their olden
trees,

But each might grow from any stock or limb

By chance and change. Indeed, and were there not

For each its procreant atoms, could things have

Each its unalterable mother old?

But, since produced from fixed seeds are
35 all,

Each birth goes forth upon the shores of
light

From its own stuff, from its own primal bodies.

40 And all from all cannot become, because
In each resides a secret power its own.

Again, why see we lavished o'er the lands
At spring the rose, at summer heat the corn,

5 The vines that mellow when the autumn
lures,

If not because the fixed seed of things

At their own season must together stream,

² A Latin poet who lived about a hundred years before Lucretius and who was the first after Homer to write an epic and heroic poem. He held the Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration of souls, and affirmed that the soul of Homer was in his body.

³ "Only Nature's aspect" means "reason alone."

And new creations only be revealed
When the due time arrives and pregnant
earth

Safely may give unto the shores of light
Her tender progenies? But if from naught Were their becoming, they would spring abroad

Suddenly, unforeseen, in alien months,
With no primordial germs, to be preserved

From procreant unions at an adverse
hour.

Nor on the mingling of the living seeds
Would space be needed for the growth of
things

Were life an increment of nothing: then The tiny babe forthwith would walk a
man,

And from the turf would spring a branching tree —

Wonders unheard of; for, by Nature, each Slowly increases from its lawful seed,
And through that increase shall conserve its kind.

Whence take the proof that things enlarge and feed

From out their proper matter. Thus it comes

That earth, without her seasons of fixed rains,

Could bear no produce such as makes us
glad,

And whatsoever lives, if shut from food,
Prolongs its kind and guards its life no
more.

Thus easier 'tis to hold that many things
Have primal bodies in common (as we see
The single letters common to many words)
Than aught exists without its origins.

Moreover, why should Nature not prepare Men of a bulk to ford the seas afoot
Or rend the mighty mountains with their
hands,

Or conquer time with length of days, if not Because for all begotten things abides
The changeless stuff, and what from that may spring

Is fixed forevermore? Lastly we see How far the tilled surpass the fields un-
tilled

And to the labour of our hands return

Their more abounding crops; there are indeed

Within the earth primordial germs of
things,

5 Which, as the ploughshare turns the fruitful clods

And kneads the mould, we quicken into birth.

Else would ye make, without all toil of ours,
10 Spontaneous generations, fairer forms.

Confess then, naught from nothing can be-
come,

Since all must have their seeds, wherefrom
to grow,

15 Wherefrom they reach the gentle fields of air.

Hence too it comes that Nature all dissolves

Into their primal bodies again, and naught
20 Perishes ever to annihilation.

For were aught mortal in its every part,
Before our eyes it might be snatched away Unto destruction; since no force were needed

25 To sunder its members and undo its bands.
Whereas, of truth, because all things exist,

With seed imperishable, Nature allows Destruction or collapse of aught, until
Some outward force may shatter by a blow,

30 Or inward craft, entering its hollow cells, Dissolve it down. And more than this, if
Time,

That wastes with eld the works along the world,

35 Destroy entire, consuming matter all, Whence may then Venus back to light of
life

Restore the generations kind by kind?
Or how, when thus restored, may dædal

Earth

Foster and plenish with her ancient food,
Which, kind by kind, she offers unto each?

Whence may the water-springs, beneath
the sea,

45 Or inland rivers, far and wide away,
Keep the unfathomable ocean full?

And out of what does Ether feed the stars? ¹

For lapsed years and infinite age must 50 else

Have eat all shapes of mortal stock away:

¹ The opinion that the starry fires were necessarily fed and sustained by exhalations from the earth and its oceans was not peculiar to the Epicureans.

But be it the Long Ago contained these germs,

By which this sum of things recruited lives,
Those same infallibly can never die,
Nor nothing to nothing evermore return.
And, too, the selfsame power might end alike

All things, were they not still together held By matter eternal, shackled through its parts,

Now more, now less. A touch might be enough

To cause destruction. For the slightest
force

Would loose the web¹ of things wherein no part

Were of imperishable stock. But now Because the fastenings of the primordial
parts

Are put together diversely and stuff
Is everlasting, things abide the same Unhurt and sure, until some power comes
on

Strong to destroy the warp and woof of
each:

Nothing returns to naught; but all return

At their collapse to primal forms of stuff.
Lo, the rains perish which the Ether-father
throws

Down to the bosom of the Earth-mother;
but then

Upsprings the shining grain, and boughs are green

Amid the trees, and trees themselves wax big

And lade themselves with fruits; and hence in turn

The race of man and all the wild are fed;
Hence joyful cities thrive with boys and girls;

And leafy woodlands echo with new birds;
Hence cattle, fat and drowsy, lay their bulk

Along the joyous pastures whilst the drops
Of white ooze trickle from distended bags;

Hence the young scamper on their weakling joints

Along the tender herbs, fresh hearts afisk With warm new milk. Thus naught of what so seems

Perishes utterly, since Nature ever Upbuilds one thing from other, suffering
naught

To come to birth but through some other's death.

BOOK II

Proem

'Tis sweet, when, down the mighty main,
the winds

Roll up its waste of waters, from the land
To watch another's labouring anguish far,
Not that we joyously delight that man

Should thus be smitten, but because 'tis sweet

To mark what evils we ourselves be spared;

'Tis sweet, again,² to view the mighty strife

Of armies embattled yonder o'er the plains, Ourselves no sharers in the peril; but
naught

There is more goodly than to hold the high Serene plateaus,³ well fortified by the wise,

Whence thou may'st look below on other
men

And see them ev'rywhere wand'ring, all dispersed

In their lone seeking for the road of life;
Rivals in genius, or emulous in rank,

Pressing through days and nights with hugest toil

For summits of power and mastery of the world.⁴

O wretched minds of men! O blinded
hearts!

In how great perils, in what darks of life
Are spent the human years, however brief! —

¹ A web or a woven thing.

² In this excellent metaphor the poet teaches that the life of a wise man is placed in tranquillity of mind and indolence of body. This was the doctrine of Epicurus.

³ The emphasis through the following sixty lines upon moderated desire and philosophical pleasure indicates a mind not only gifted above others but devoted to the ardent pursuit of knowledge and the diligent cultivation of morals.

⁴ For an Epicurean no state of life could be more unhappy than that of being the chief in a government.

O not to see that Nature for herself Barks after nothing, save that pain keep off,¹

Disjoined from the body, and that mind
enjoy

Delightsome feeling, far from care and fear!
Therefore we see that our corporeal life
Needs little, altogether, and only such
As takes the pain away, and can besides Strew underneath some number of delights. 10
More grateful 'tis at times (for nature craves

No artifice or luxury), if forsooth
There be no golden images of boys²
Along the halls, with right hands holding 15
out

The lamps ablaze, the lights for evening feasts,

And if the house doth glitter not with gold
Nor gleam with silver, and to the lyre re- 20
sound

No fretted and gilded ceilings overhead,
Yet still to lounge with friends in the soft grass

Beside a river of water, underneath
A big tree's boughs, and merrily to refresh
Our frames, with no vast outlay — most of
all

If the weather is laughing and the times of year

Besprinkle the green of the grass around with flowers.

Nor yet the quicker will hot fevers go,
If on a pictured tapestry thou toss,
Or purple robe, than if 'tis thine to lie 35 Upon the poor man's bedding. Wherefore, since

Treasure, nor rank, nor glory of a reign
Avail us naught for this our body, thus Reckon with them likewise nothing for 40
the mind:

Save then perchance, when thou beholdest
forth

Thy legions swarming round the Field of Mars,

Rousing a mimic warfare — either side Strengthened with large auxiliaries and
horse,

Alike equipped with arms, alike inspired;
5 Or save when also thou beholdest forth Thy fleets to swarm, deploying down the
sea:

For then, by such bright circumstance
abashed,

Religion pales and flees thy mind; oh then
The fears of death leave heart so free of care.

But if we note how all this pomp at last
Is but a drollery and a mocking sport,
And of a truth man's dread, with cares at heels,

Dreads not these sounds of arms, these savage swords,

But among kings and lords of all the world
Mingles undaunted, nor is overawed
By gleam of gold nor by the splendour bright

Of purple robe, canst thou then doubt that
this

25 Is aught, but power of thinking? — when,
besides,

The whole of life but labours in the dark.
For just as children tremble and fear all
In the viewless dark,³ so even we at times

30 Dread in the light so many things that be No whit more fearsome than what children
feign,

Shuddering, will be upon them in the dark.
This terror, then, this darkness of the mind, 35

Not sunrise with its flaring spokes of light,
Nor glittering arrows of morning can disperse,

But only nature's aspect and her law.

Atomic Motions

Now come: I will untangle for thy steps
Now by what motions the begetting bodies
Of the world-stuff beget the varied world,
45 And then forever resolve it when begot,⁴

¹ The Epicureans did not chiefly follow the pleasures that affect the senses with delight but held the greatest of all pleasures to consist in an exemption from grief and pain.

² Golden statues formerly used in the houses of the rich during times of celebration.

³ As children in the dark dread everything and imagine ridiculous dangers, so all men are terrified with the supernatural beliefs which, according to Epicurus, are but the daydreams of a crazy mind.

⁴ The reason things grow is that some particles of matter fly off and adhere to them; the reason they diminish is that some minute particles having lost their hold retire and fly away from them. It would be absurd to say that these particles either come or go without motion.

And by what force they are constrained to
this,

And what the speed appointed unto them
Wherewith to travel down the vast inane:
Do thou remember to yield thee to my
words.

For truly matter coheres not, crowds not tight,

Since we behold each thing to wane away,
And we observe how all flows on and off,
As 'twere, with age-old time, and from our eyes

How eld withdraws each object at the end,
Albeit the sum is seen to bide the same,
Unharm'd, because these notes that leave each thing

Diminish what they part from, but endow
With increase those to which in turn they
come,

Constraining these to wither in old age,
And those to flower at the prime (and yet Biding not long time among them). Thus the sum

Forever is replenished, and we live
As mortals by eternal give and take.
The nations wax, the nations wane away;
In a brief space the generations pass,
And like to runners hand the lamp of life¹
One unto other.

But if thou believe

That the primordial germs of things can stop,

And in their stopping give new motions
birth,

Afar thou wanderest from the road of truth.

For since they wander through the void
inane,

All the primordial germs of things must needs

Be borne along, either by weight their own,
Or haply by another's blow without.

For, when, in their incessancy so oft
They meet and clash, it comes to pass
amain

They leap asunder, face to face: not strange —

Being most hard, and solid in their weights,
And naught opposing motion, from behind.

And that more clearly thou perceive how
all

These mites of matter are darted round
about,

Recall to mind how nowhere in the sum
Of All exists a bottom, — nowhere is

5 A realm of rest for primal bodies; since (As amply shown and proved by reason sure)

Space has no bound nor measure, and extends

10 Unmetered forth in all directions round.
Since this stands out certain, thus 'tis out of doubt

No rest is rendered to the primal bodies
Along the unfathomable inane; but rather,

15 Inveterately plied by motions mixed,
Some, at their jamming, bound aback and leave

Huge gaps between, and some from off the blow

20 Are hurried about with spaces small between.

And all which, brought together with slight gaps,

In more condens'd union bound aback,
25 Linked by their own all inter-tangled shapes, —

These form the irrefragable roots of rocks
And the brute bulks of iron, and what else
Is of their kind. . . .

30 The rest leap far asunder, far recoil, Leaving huge gaps between: and these supply

For us thin air and splendour-lights of the sun.

35 And many besides wander the mighty void —

Cast back from unions of existing things,
Nowhere accepted in the universe,

And nowise linked in motions with the 40 rest.

And of this fact (as I record it here)

An image, a type goes on before our eyes Present each moment; for behold whenever

45 The sun's light and the rays, let in, pour
down

Across dark halls of houses: thou wilt see
The many mites in many a manner mixed

Amid a void in the very light of the rays,
50 And battling on, as in eternal strife,
And in battalions contending without halt,

¹ He alludes to the torch races at Athens.

In meetings, partings, harried up and
 down.
 From this thou mayest conjecture of what sort
 The ceaseless tossing of primordial seeds
 Amid the mightier void — at least so far
 As small affairs can for a vaster serve,
 And by example put thee on the spoor
 Of knowledge. For this reason too 'tis fit
 Thou turn thy mind the more unto these bodies
 Which here are witnessed tumbling in the light:
 Namely, because such tumblings are a sign
 That motions also of the primal stuff
 Secret and viewless lurk beneath, behind.
 For thou wilt mark here many a speck, impelled
 By viewless blows, to change its little
 course,
 And beaten backwards to return again,
 Hither and thither in all directions round.
 Lo, all their shifting movement is of old,
 From the primeval atoms; for the same Primordial seeds of things first move of
 self,
 And then those bodies built of unions small
 And nearest, as it were, unto the powers
 Of the primeval atoms, are stirred up
 By impulse of those atoms' unseen blows,
 And these thereafter goad the next in size:
 Thus motion ascends from the primevals
 on,
 And stage by stage emerges to our sense,
 Until those objects also move which we Can mark in sunbeams, though it not appears
 What blows do urge them.
 Herein wonder not How 'tis that, while the seeds of things are
 all Moving forever, the sum yet seems to stand
 Supremely still, except in cases where
 A thing shows motion of its frame as whole.
 For far beneath the ken of senses lies
 The nature of those ultimates of the world;
 And so, since those themselves thou canst
 not see,
 Their motion must they also veil from
 men —

For mark indeed, how things we can see,
 oft
 Yet hide their motions, when afar from us
 Along the distant landscape. Often thus,
 5 Upon the hillside will the woolly flocks
 Be cropping their goodly food and creeping
 about Whither the summons of the grass, begemmed
 10 With the fresh dew, is calling, and the lambs
 Well filled, are frisking, locking horns in sport:
 Yet all for us seem blurred and blent afar —
 15 A glint of white at rest on a green hill.
 Again when mighty legions, marching
 round,
 Fill all the quarters of the plains below,
 Rousing a mimic warfare, there the sheen Shoots up the sky, and all the fields about Glitter with brass, and from beneath, a sound
 Goes forth from feet of stalwart soldiery,
 And mountain walls, smote by the shout-25 ing, send
 The voices onward to the stars of heaven,
 And hither and thither darts the cavalry,
 And of a sudden down the midmost fields
 Charges with onset stout enough to rock 30 The solid earth: and yet some post there
 is
 Up the high mountains, viewed from which they seem
 To stand — a gleam at rest along the 35 plains.
 Now what the speed to matter's atoms given Thou mayest in few, my Memmius, learn from this:
 40 When first the dawn is sprinkling with new light
 The lands, and all the breed of birds
 abroad
 Flit round the trackless forests, with 45 liquid notes
 Filling the regions along the mellow air,
 We see 'tis forthwith manifest to man
 How suddenly the risen sun is wont
 At such an hour to overspread and clothe 50 The whole with its own splendour; but the sun's
 Warm exhalations and this serene light
 Travel not down an empty void; and thus

They are compelled more slowly to advance,	By aught outside them there, and they, each one
Whilst, as it were, they cleave the waves of air;	Being one unit from nature of its parts,
Nor one by one travel these particles	Are borne to that one place on which they
Of the warm exhalations, but are all	5 strive
Entangled and enmassed, whereby at once	Still to lay hold, must then, beyond a doubt,
Each is restrained by each, and from without	Outstrip in speed, and be more swiftly borne
Checked, till compelled more slowly to advance.	10 Than light of sun, and over regions rush,
But the primordial atoms with their old	Of space much vaster, in the self-same time
Simple solidity, when forth they travel	The sun's effulgence widens round the
Along the empty void, all undelayed	sky.

CICERO

(106-43 B.C.)

Marcus Tullius Cicero, Roman statesman, philosopher, and orator, was born near Arpinum in 106 B.C. His education was the most complete possible in his day. He received instruction from the best teachers, who had been attracted to Rome by the growth of the great Republic, and from the scholars of Athens and Asia Minor. He began his public career some time before he arrived at the age of twenty-five, and by the time he was thirty he had gained considerable distinction. Beginning in 75 with the office of quæstor, he held in succession the various positions leading up to the consulship, which he attained in 66. He had confidence in the ability of Pompey and supported him consistently in the hope that he would be able to save the country from the revolutionary party. He took a strong stand against the revolutionary plans of Catiline and was hailed gratefully as the "father of his country" for his efficient work in putting down the famous Catilinian conspiracy. In the meantime he had the misfortune to incur the resentment of Clodius. Clodius got himself elected tribune and had a law made which was aimed directly at Cicero. Knowing that there was little chance of avoiding the results of this legislation, Cicero retired to voluntary exile in Greece. He was, however, recalled the next year through the intervention of his friends. Somewhat intimidated by the power of his enemies, he was forced for a time to conceal his own sentiments, and to conform, at least outwardly, to the opinions of the party in power. He was withdrawn temporarily from the storm and stress of Roman affairs by his appointment as governor of Cilicia, but returned to Rome in 49, just as the war broke out between Cæsar and Pompey. Consistently with his earlier sentiments, he took the side of Pompey, and went with him to Greece as he fled from the victorious Cæsar. After Pompey's disastrous defeat at Pharsalia, Cicero returned to Brundisium in fear of Cæsar's revenge. Cæsar, however, treated him with great consideration. For the next three or four years Cicero remained in retirement and devoted himself to philosophy. He was much distressed over the possibility of the establishment of a despotic government, and it is probable that he was not at all displeased at the assassination of Cæsar. He also feared that Antony and his friends, after the defeat of Brutus, would perpetuate Cæsar's tyranny. He returned to public life with a series of bitter attacks against them. Here again he was unfortunate in his choice of party. When Octavian and Antony finally patched up an agreement, an order went out that Cicero must die. He was now sixty-four years old and in declining health. He made a pitiful effort to escape, but was overtaken by Antony's soldiers and put to death.

As a literary figure Cicero is probably best known for his orations. He is equally distinguished, however, in the field of philosophy and rhetoric. The purity of his language and the excellence of his style have made his works models for imitation down through the ages. During the earlier Middle Ages, Cicero was little known or understood. He was, however, recognized to some extent as an authority on rhetoric. His rhetorical writings were used by the great English scholar Alcuin, and a collection of his famous sayings was made by the Venerable Bede. Some familiarity with his writings is shown by Einhard, the biographer of Charlemagne, and there are occasional references to him in the work of other notable writers. In general, however, the impression of him was so vague that Tullius and Cicero were regarded as different persons. Toward the end of the Middle Ages his reputation increased somewhat, and he was read and admired by John of Salisbury, Roger Bacon, and Dante. When the Revival of Learning in Italy came, the young Petrarch, charmed by the sound of Cicero's language, although he then understood but little of it, became a Cicero enthusiast. As he grew older he set himself to imitate the style of Cicero and to discover and preserve his works entire. It is to Petrarch and his contemporary Poggio that we owe not only the preservation of some of Cicero's best pieces but also the recrudescence of Ciceronian classical Latin.

¹ The Epicureans believed that light consists of small particles that flow out of the sun, which is the fountain of all light. These particles consist of seeds agitated by various motions, which are hindered in their flight by meeting with particles of the air. Atoms are simple bodies not obstructed by the motions of their own parts, and are moved through the free and unmolested void.

The attempt to revive classical Latin produced a rather large bulk of Latin literature during the Renaissance. The fact that most of it is forgotten cannot be ascribed to its inferior quality; the spectacular rise of the vernacular all over Western Europe simply eclipsed it. It may be worth remembering, however, that Petrarch wrote his epic Africa in Latin and that Dante at one time intended to use Latin in his great epic. The impetus given by the earlier writers to the cultivation of Ciceronian Latin resulted by 1500 in a crop of writers who composed in classical Latin with practically no errors. It is due very largely to the study of Cicero's style that the scholars of the sixteenth century began to produce grammars and dictionaries of Latin. The study of Cicero, which earlier in its career had been opposed by the Church on the score that Cicero was a pagan, now began to enlist the support of prominent churchmen. From now on Ciceronianism, if not the dominant factor in the formation of prose style, was at least a power to be reckoned with in every discussion. Of course the extreme emphasis placed by the Ciceronians on the perfection of Cicero naturally aroused opposition. The great Dutch humanist, Erasmus, although a profound admirer of Cicero, engaged in a prolonged controversy with Scaliger and other Ciceronians over what he considered their too slavish following of Ciceronian models. In any case, whether the Ciceronians were right or wrong, Cicero, through the impression of his style upon the writers of the Renaissance, preserved the Latin language to modern times.

The ideas and opinions of Cicero also exerted a marked influence on subsequent generations. Roger Ascham and his pupil Queen Elizabeth were both diligent students of Cicero, as also was Sir Philip Sidney. The most important single effect of Cicero's ideas in England was his influence upon the eighteenth-century "deists," Locke, Shaftesbury, Hume, and others who based certain of their theories on statements made by Cicero in his book On the Nature of the Gods (ca. 43 B.C.). Voltaire was also a great admirer of Cicero and wrote a series of letters in imitation of him. As an orator Cicero has exerted an influence that is immeasurable. At the moment when trial by jury and free parliamentary debate were instituted in England, the advantage of a knowledge of Cicero's methods became immediately obvious. To mention only a few outstanding names, Chatham, Pitt, Shaftesbury, and Burke were all students of Cicero. In France his methods were followed by Mirabeau and Robespierre, and in America by Webster, Clay, Sumner, Wendell Phillips, and Rufus Choate.

This selection is taken from M. Tullius Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, etc., translated by C. D. Yonge, London, G. Bell & Sons, 1907.

ON THE NATURE OF THE GODS

Is it possible for any man to behold these things (the wonders of nature), and yet imagine that certain solid and individual bodies move by their natural force and gravitation, and that a world so beautifully adorned was made by their fortuitous concourse? He who believes this may as well believe that if a great quantity of the one-and-twenty letters, composed either of gold, or any other matter, were thrown upon the ground, they would fall into such order as legibly to form the Annals of Ennius.¹ I doubt whether fortune could make a single verse of them. How therefore can these people assert that the world was made by the fortuitous concourse of atoms, which have no colour, no quality, which the Greeks call poiotes, no sense? or that there are innumerable worlds, some rising and some perishing, in every moment of time? But if a concourse of atoms can make a world, why not a porch, a temple, a house, a city, which are works of less labour and difficulty.

Certainly those men talk so idly and inconsiderately concerning this lower world, that they appear to me never to have contemplated the wonderful magnificence of the heavens; which is the next topic for our consideration.

Well, then, did Aristotle observe: "If there were men whose habitations had been always under ground, in great and commodious houses, adorned with statues and pictures, furnished with everything which they who are reputed to be happy abound with; and if, without stirring from thence, they should be informed of a certain divine power and majesty, and, after some time, the earth should open, and they should quit their dark abode to come to us; where they should immediately behold the earth, the seas, the heavens; should consider the vast extent of the clouds and force of the winds; should see the sun, and observe his grandeur and beauty, and also his generative power, inasmuch as day is occasioned by the diffusion of his light through the sky: and when night has obscured the earth, they should contemplate the heavens bespangled and adorned with stars; the surprising variety of the moon, in her increase and wane; the rising and setting of all the stars, and the inviolable regularity of their courses; when," says he, "they should see these things, they would undoubtedly conclude that there are Gods, and that these are their mighty works."

Thus far Aristotle. Let us imagine also as great darkness was formerly occasioned by the irruption of the fires of Mount Ætna, which are said to have obscured the adjacent countries for two days to such a degree that no man could recognise his fellow; but on the third, when the sun appeared, they seemed to be raised from the dead. Now, if we should be suddenly brought from a state of eternal darkness to see the light, how beautiful would the heavens seem! But our minds have become used to it from the daily practice and habituation of our eyes, nor do we take the trouble to search into the principles of what is always in view; as if the novelty, rather than the importance of things, ought to excite us to investigate their causes.

Is he worthy to be called a man, who attributes to a chance, not to an intelligent cause, the constant motion of the heavens, the regular courses of the stars, the agreeable proportion and connection of all things, conducted with so much reason, that our intellect itself is unable to estimate it rightly? When we see machines move artificially, as a sphere, a clock, or the like, do we doubt whether they are the productions of reason? And when we behold the heavens moving with a prodigious celerity, and causing an annual succession of the different seasons of the year, which vivify and preserve all things, can we doubt that this world is directed, I will not say only by reason, but by reason most excellent and divine? For without troubling ourselves with too refined a subtlety of discussion, we may use our eyes to contemplate the beauty of those things, which we assert have been arranged by divine providence.

First, let us examine the earth, whose situation is in the middle of the universe, solid, round, and conglobular by its natural tendency; clothed with flowers, herbs, and trees, and fruits; the whole in multitudes incredible, and with a variety suitable to every taste: Let us consider the ever cool and running springs, the clear waters of the rivers, the verdure of their banks, the hollow depths of caves, the cragginess of rocks, the heights of impending mountains, and the boundless extent of plains, the hidden veins of gold and silver, and the infinite quarries of marble.

What and how various are the kinds of animals, tame or wild? The flights and notes of birds? How do the beasts live in the fields, and in the forests? What shall

I say of men, who being appointed, as we say, to cultivate the earth, do not suffer its fertility to be choked with weeds, nor the ferocity of beasts to make it desolate; who, by the houses and cities which they build, adorn the fields, the isles, and the shores? If we could view these objects with the naked eye, as we can by the contemplation of the mind, nobody, at such a sight, would doubt there was a divine intelligence.

But how beautiful is the sea! How pleasant to see the extent of it! What a multitude and variety of islands! How delightful are the coasts! What numbers and what diversity of inhabitants does it contain; some within the bosom of it, some floating on the surface, and others by their shells clinging to the rocks! While the sea itself, approaching to the land, sports so closely to its shores, that those two elements appear to be but one.

Next above the sea is the air, diversified by day and night; when rarefied, it possesses the higher region; when condensed, it turns into clouds, and with the waters which it gathers enriches the earth by the rain. Its agitation produces the winds. It causes heat and cold according to the different seasons. It sustains birds in their flight; and, being inhaled, nourishes and preserves all animated beings.

Add to these, which alone remaineth to be mentioned, the firmament of heaven; a region the farthest from our abodes, which surrounds and contains all things. It is likewise called æther or sky, the extreme bounds and limits of the universe, in which the stars perform their appointed courses in a most wonderful manner. Amongst which, the sun, whose magnitude far surpasses the earth, makes his revolution round it; and, by his rising and setting, causes day and night; sometimes coming near towards the earth, and sometimes going from it, he every year makes two contrary reversions from the extreme point of its course. In his retreat the earth seems locked up in sadness; in his return it appears exhilarated with the heavens. The moon, which, as mathematicians demonstrate, is bigger than half the earth, makes her revolutions through the same spaces as the sun, but, at one time approaching and at another receding from the sun, she diffuses the light which she has borrowed from him over the whole earth, and has herself also many various changes in her appearance. When she is found under the sun, and opposite to it, the brightness of her rays is lost; but when the earth directly interposes between the moon and sun, the moon is totally eclipsed.

The other wandering stars have their courses around the earth in the same spaces, and rise and set in the same manner; their motions are sometimes quick, sometimes slow, and often they stand still. There is nothing more wonderful, nothing more beautiful. There is a vast number of fixed stars, distinguished by the names of certain figures, to which we find they have some resemblance.

But our admiration is not limited to the objects here described. What is more wonderful is, that the world is so durable, and so perfectly made for lasting that it is not to be impaired by time; for all its parts tend equally to the centre, and are bound together by a sort of chain, which surrounds the elements; this chain is nature, which being diffused through the universe, and performing all things with judgment and reason, attracts the extremities to the centre.

If, then, the world is round, and if on that account all its parts, being of equal dimensions and relative proportions, mutually support and are supported by one another, it must follow that as all the parts incline toward the centre (for that is the lowest part of the globe) there is nothing whatever that can put a stop to that propensity, in the case of such great weights. For the same reason, though the sea is higher than the earth, yet because it has the like tendency, it is collected everywhere, equally concentrates, and never overflows, and is never wasted.

The air, which is contiguous, ascends by its lightness, but diffuses itself through the whole; therefore it is by nature joined and united to the sea, and at the same time borne by the same power towards the heaven, by the thinness and the heat of which it is so tempered as to be made proper to supply life, and wholesome air for the support of animated beings. This is encompassed by the highest region of the heavens which is called the sky, which is joined to the extremity of the air, but retains its own heat pure and unmixed.

The stars have their revolutions in the sky, and are continued by the tendency of all parts toward the centre; their duration is perpetuated by their form and figure, for they are round; which form, as I think has been before observed, is the least liable to injury; and, as they are composed of fire, they are fed by the vapours which are exhaled¹ by the sun from the earth, the sea, and other waters; but when these vapours have nourished and refreshed the stars, and the whole sky, they are sent back to be exhaled again; so that very little is lost or consumed by the fire of the stars and the flames of the sky. Hence we Stoics² conclude, which Panætius³ is said to have doubted of, that the whole world at last would be consumed by a general conflagration; when all moisture being exhausted, neither the earth could have any nourishment, nor the air return again, since water of which it is formed would then be all consumed; so that only fire would subsist; and from this fire, which is an animating power and a Deity, a new world would arise and be re-established in the same beauty.

I should be sorry to appear to you to dwell too long upon this subject of the stars, and more especially that of the planets; whose motions, though different, make a very just agreement. Saturn, the highest, chills; Mars, placed in the middle, burns; while Jupiter, interposing, moderates their excess, both of light and heat. The two planets beneath Mars obey the sun. The sun himself fills the whole universe with his own genial light; and the moon, illuminated by him, influences conception, birth, and maturity. And who is there that is not moved by this union of things, and by this concurrence of nature agreeing together as it were for the safety of the world, and yet I feel sure that none of these reflections have ever been made by these men.

Let us proceed from celestial to terrestrial things. What is there in them which does not prove the principle of an intelligent nature? First, as to vegetables; they have roots to sustain their stems, and to draw from the earth a nourishing moisture to support the vital principle which those roots contain. They are clothed with a rind or bark, to secure them more thoroughly from heat and cold. The vines, we see, take hold on props with their tendrils, as if with hands, and raise themselves as if they were animated; it is even said, that they shun cabbages and coleworts, as noxious and pestilential to them, and, if planted by them, will not touch any part.

But what a vast variety is there of animals? and how wonderfully is every kind adapted to preserve itself! Some are covered with hides, some clothed with fleeces, and some guarded with bristles; some are sheltered with feathers, some with scales; some are armed with horns, and some are furnished with wings to escape from danger. Nature hath also liberally and plentifully provided for all animals their proper food; I could expatiate on the judicious and curious formation and disposition of their bodies for the reception and digestion of it, for all their interior parts are so framed and disposed, that there is nothing superfluous, nothing that is not necessary for the preservation of life. Besides, nature has also given these beasts appetite and sense; in order that by the one they may be excited to procure sufficient sustenance, and by the other may distinguish what is noxious from what is salutary. Some animals seek their food walking, some creeping, some flying, and some swimming; some take it with their mouth and teeth; some seize it with their claws, and some with their beaks; some suck, some graze, some bolt it whole, and some chew it. Some are so low that they can with ease take such food as is to be found on the ground; but the taller, as geese, swans, cranes, and camels, are assisted by a length of neck. To the elephant is given a hand, without which, from his unwieldiness of body, he would scarce have any means of attaining food.

But to those beasts which live by preying on others, nature has given either strength or swiftness. On some animals she has even bestowed artifice and cunning; as on spiders, some of which weave a sort of net to entrap and destroy whatever falls into it, others sit on the watch unobserved to fall on their prey and devour it. The naker, by the Greeks called Pinna,¹ has a kind of confederacy with the prawn for procuring food. It has two large shells open, into which when the little fishes swim, the naker, having notice given by the bite of the prawn, closes them immediately. Thus, these little animals, though of different kinds, seek their food in common; in which it is a matter of wonder whether they associate by any agreement, or are naturally joined together from their beginning.

There is some cause to admire also the provision of nature in the case of those aquatic animals which are generated on land, such as crocodiles, river tortoises, and a certain kind of serpents, which seek the water as soon as they are able to drag themselves along. We frequently put duck-eggs under hens, by which, as by their true mothers, the ducklings are at first hatched and nourished; but when they see the water, they forsake them and run to it, as to their natural abode, so strong is the impression of nature in animals for their own preservation.

I have read that there is a bird called Platalea,² the Shoveler, that lives by watching those fowls which dive into the sea for their prey, and, when they return with it, he squeezes their heads with his beak, till they drop it, and then seizes on it himself; it is said likewise that he is in the habit of filling his stomach with shell-fish, and when they are digested by the heat which exists in the stomach, he casts them up, and then picks out what is proper nourishment. The sea-frogs, they say, are wont to cover themselves with sand, and, moving near the water, the fishes strike at them, as at a bait, and are themselves taken and devoured by the frogs. Between the kite and the crow there is a kind of natural war, and wherever one finds the eggs of the other he breaks them.

But who is there who can avoid being struck with wonder at that which has been noticed by Aristotle, who has enriched us with so many valuable remarks. When the cranes pass the sea in search of warmer climes, they fly in the form of a triangle. By the first angle they repel the resisting air; on each side their wings serve as oars to facilitate their flight; and the basis of their triangle is assisted by the wind at their stern. Those which are behind rest their necks and heads upon those which precede; and as the leader has not the same relief, because he has none to lean upon, he at length flies behind that he may also rest, while one of those who have been eased succeeds him; and through the whole flight each regularly takes his turn.

I could produce many instances of this kind, but these may suffice. Let us now proceed to things more familiar to us. The care of the beasts for their own preservation, their circumspection while feeding, and their manner of taking rest in their lairs, are generally known, but still they are greatly to be admired.

But how beautiful is nature, that has provided us such an abundance of various and delicious food; and this varying with the different seasons, so that we may be constantly pleased with change, and satisfied with abundance! How seasonable and useful to man, to beasts, and even to vegetables, are the Etesian³ winds she has bestowed, which moderate intemperate heat, and render navigation more sure and speedy! Many things must be omitted on a subject so copious; and still a great deal must be said; for it is impossible to relate the great utility of rivers, the flux and reflux of the sea, the mountains clothed with grass and trees, the salt-pits remote from the sea-coasts, the earth replete with salutary medicines, or, in short, the innumerable designs of nature necessary for sustenance and the enjoyment of life. We must not forget the vicissitudes of day and night, ordained for the health of animated beings, giving them a time to labour and a time to rest. Thus, if we every 10 way examine the universe, it is apparent, from the greatest reason, that the whole is admirably governed by a divine providence, for the safety and preservation of all beings.

If it should be asked for whose sake this mighty fabric was raised, shall we say for trees and other vegetables, which, though destitute of sense, are supported by nature? That would be absurd. Is it for beasts? 20 Nothing can be less probable than that the Gods should have taken such pains for beings void of speech and understanding. For whom, then, will any one presume to say that the world was made? Undoubt- 25 edly for reasonable beings; these are the Gods and men, who are certainly the most perfect of all beings, as nothing is equal to reason; it is therefore credible that the universe, and all things in it, were made 30 for the Gods and for men.

But we may yet more easily comprehend that the Gods have taken great care of the interest and welfare of men, if we examine thoroughly the structure of the body, and 35 the form and perfection of human nature. There are three things absolutely necessary for the support of life; to eat, to drink, and to breathe; for these operations the mouth is most aptly framed, which, 40 by the assistance of the nostrils, draws in the air.

The teeth are there placed to divide and grind the food. The fore-teeth, being sharp and opposite to each other, cut it 45 asunder, and the hind-teeth (called the grinders) chew it; in which office the tongue seems to assist. At the root of the tongue is the gullet, which receives whatever is swallowed; it touches the tonsils 50 on each side, and terminates at the interior extremity of the palate. When by the motions of the tongue the food is forced into this passage, called by physicians the rough artery, which reaches to the lungs, for the entrance and return of the air we breathe; and as its orifice is joined to the roots of the tongue a little above the part to which the gullet is annexed, it is furnished with a sort of coverlid, lest, by the accidental falling of any food into it, the respiration should be stopped.

As the stomach, which is beneath the gullet, receives the meat and drink, so the lungs and the heart draw in the air from without. The stomach is wonderfully composed, consisting almost entirely of 15 nerves; it abounds with membranes and fibres, and detains what it receives, whether solid or liquid, till it is altered and digested by its force of heat, and by the animal spirits is distributed into the other parts of 20 the body.

To this skill of nature and this care of providence, so diligent and so ingenious, many reflections may be added, which 25 show what valuable things the Deity has bestowed on man. He has made us of a stature tall and upright, in order that we may behold the heavens, and so arrive at a knowledge of the Gods; for men are not simply to dwell here as inhabitants of the earth, but to be, as it were, spectators of the heavens and the stars, which is a 35 privilege not granted to any other kind of animated beings. The senses, which are the interpreters and messengers of things, are placed in the head, as in a tower, and wonderfully situated for their proper uses; for the eyes, being in the highest part, have the office of sentinels, in discovering to us 40 objects; and the ears are conveniently placed in a high part of the person, being appointed to receive sound, which naturally ascends. The nostrils have the like situation, because all scent likewise 45 ascends; and they have, with great reason, a near vicinity to the mouth, because they assist us in judging of meat and drink. The taste, which is to distinguish the quality of what we take, is in that part of 50 the mouth where nature has laid open a passage for what we eat and drink; but the touch is equally diffused through the whole body, that we may not receive any blows, or the too rigid attacks of cold and heat, without feeling them.

What artificer but nature, whose direction is incomparable, could have exhibited so much ingenuity in the formation of the senses? In the first place, she has covered and invested the eyes with the finest membranes, which she hath made transparent, that we may see through them, and firm in their texture, to preserve the eyes. 10 She has made them slippery and movable, that they might avoid what would offend them, and easily direct the sight wherever they will. The actual organ of sight, which is called the pupil, is so small 15 that it can easily shun whatever might be hurtful to it. The eyelids, which are their coverings, are soft and smooth, that they may not injure the eyes; and are made to shut at the apprehension of 20 any accident, or to open at pleasure; and these movements nature has ordained to be made in an instant: they are fortified with a sort of palisade of hairs, to keep off what may be noxious to them when open, 25 and to be a fence to their repose when sleep closes on them, and allow them to rest as if they were wrapped in a case. Besides, they are commodiously hidden and defended by eminences on every side; 30 for on the upper side the eyebrows turn aside the perspiration that falls from head and forehead; the cheeks beneath rise a little, so as to protect them on the lower side; and the nose is placed between them 35 as a wall of separation.

The hearing is always open, for that is a sense of which we are in need even while we are sleeping; and, the moment that any sound is admitted by it, we are awakened 40 even from sleep. It has a winding passage, lest anything should slip into it, as it might if it were straight and simple. Nature also hath taken the same precaution in making there a viscous humour, 45 that, if any little creatures should endeavour to creep in, they might stick in it as in birdlime. The ears (by which we mean the outer part) are made prominent, to cover and preserve the hearing, lest the 50 sound should be dissipated and escape before the sense is affected. Their entrances are hard and horny, and their form winding, because bodies of this sort better return and increase the sound. This appears in the harp, lute, or horn; and from all 5 tortuous and enclosed places sounds are returned stronger.

The nostrils, in like manner, are ever open, because we have a continual use for them; and their entrances also are rather narrow, lest anything noxious should enter them; and they have always an humidity necessary for the repelling dust, and many other extraneous bodies. The taste, having the mouth as an enclosure, is admirably 15 situated, both in regard to the use we make of it and to its security.

Besides, every human sense is more exquisite than those of brutes; for our eyes, in those arts which come under our judgment, distinguish with great nicety; as in painting, sculpture, engraving, and in the gesture and motion of bodies. They understand the beauty, proportion, and, as I may so term it, the becomingness of colours 20 and figures: they distinguish things of greater importance, even virtues and vices: they know whether a man is angry or calm, cheerful or sad, courageous or cowardly, bold or timorous.

The judgment of the ears is not less admirably and scientifically contrived with regard to vocal and instrumental music. They distinguish the variety of sounds, the different sorts of voices, the treble 25 and the bass, the soft and the harsh, the sharp and the flat, of which only human ears are capable to judge. There is likewise great judgment in the smell, the taste, and the touch; to indulge and gratify 30 which senses more arts have been invented than I could wish: it is apparent to what excess we have arrived in the composition of our perfumes, the preparation of our food, and the enjoyment of corporeal 35 pleasure.

Again, he who does not perceive the soul and mind of man, his reason, prudence, and discernment, to be the work of a divine providence, seems himself to be 40 destitute of those faculties. While I am on this subject, Cotta,¹ I wish I had your eloquence: how would you illustrate so fine a subject! you would show the great extent of the understanding; how we collect our ideas and join those which follow to those which precede, establish principles, draw consequences, define things separately, and comprehend them with accuracy; from whence you demonstrate how great is the power of intelligence and knowledge, which is such that even God himself has no qualities more admirable. How valuable (though you Academics¹ despise and even deny that we have it) is our knowledge of exterior objects, from the perception of the senses, joined to the application of the mind; by which we see in what relation one thing stands to another, and by the aid of which we have invented those arts which are necessary for the support and pleasure of life. How charming is eloquence! How divine that mistress of the universe, as you call it! It teaches us what we are ignorant of, and makes us capable of teaching what we have learned. By this we exhort others; by this we persuade them; by this we comfort the afflicted; by this we deliver the affrighted from their fear; by this we moderate excessive joy; by this we assuage the passions of lust and anger. This it is which bound men by the chains of right and law, formed the bonds of civil society, and made us quit a wild and savage life.

And it will appear incredible, unless you carefully observe the facts, how complete the work of nature is in giving us the use of speech; for, first of all, there is an artery from the lungs to the bottom of the mouth, through which the voice, having its original principle in the mind, is transmitted. Then the tongue is placed in the mouth, bounded by the teeth. It softens and modulates the voice, which would otherwise be confusedly uttered; and, by pushing it to the teeth and other parts of the mouth, makes the sound distinct and articulate. We Stoics, therefore, compare the tongue to the bow of an instrument, the teeth to the strings, and the nostrils to the sounding-board.

But how commodious are the hands which nature has given to man, and how beautifully do they minister to many arts! For such is the flexibility of the joints, that our fingers are opened and closed without difficulty. With their help, the hand is formed for painting, carving, and engraving; for playing on stringed instruments, and on the pipe. These are matters of pleasure; there are also works of necessity, such as tilling the ground, building houses, making cloth and habits, and working in brass and iron. It is the business of the mind to invent, the senses to perceive, and the hands to execute; so that if we have buildings, if we are clothed, if we live in safety, if we have cities, walls, habitations, and temples, it is to the hands we owe them.

By our labour, that is, by our hands, variety and plenty of food are provided; for, without culture, many fruits, which serve either for present or future consumption, would not be produced; besides, we feed on flesh, fish, and fowl, catching some, and bringing up others. We subdue four-footed beasts for our carriage, whose speed and strength supply our slowness and inability. On some we put burdens, on others yokes. We convert the sagacity of the elephant and the quick scent of the dog to our own advantage. Out of the caverns of the earth we dig iron, a thing entirely necessary for the cultivation of the ground. We discover the hidden veins of copper, silver, and gold, advantageous for our use, and beautiful as ornaments. We cut down trees, and use every kind of wild and cultivated timber, not only to make fire to warm us and dress our meat, but also for building, that we may have houses to defend us from the heat and cold. With timber likewise we build ships, which bring us from all parts every commodity of life. We are the only animals who, from our knowledge of navigation, can manage, what nature has made the most violent, the sea and the winds. Thus we obtain from the ocean great numbers of profitable things. We are absolute masters of what the earth produces. We enjoy the mountains and the plains. The rivers and the lakes are ours. We sow the seed, and plant the trees. We fertilize the earth by overflowing it. We stop, direct, and turn the rivers: in short by our hands we endeavour, by our various operations in this world, to make it as it were another nature.

But what shall I say of human reason? Has it not even entered the heavens? Man alone of all animals has observed the courses of the stars, their risings and settings. By man the day, the month, the year is determined. He foresees the eclipses of the sun and moon, and foretells them to futurity, marking their greatness, duration, and precise time. From the contemplation of these things, the mind extracts the knowledge of the gods — a knowledge which produces piety, with which is connected justice, and all the other virtues; from which arises a life of felicity, inferior to that of the gods in no single particular, except in immortality, which is not absolutely necessary to happy living. In explaining these things, I think I have sufficiently demonstrated the superiority of men to other animated beings, from whence we should infer, that neither the form and position of his limbs, nor that strength of mind and understanding, could possibly be the effect of chance.

I am now to prove, by way of conclusion, that every thing in this world, of use to us, was made designedly for us.

First of all, the universe was made for the gods and men, and all things therein were prepared and provided for our service. For the world is the common habitation or city of the gods and men; for they are the only reasonable beings: they alone live by justice and law. As, therefore, it must be presumed the cities of Athens and Lacedæmon were built for the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, and as everything there is said to belong to those people, so everything in the universe may with propriety be said to belong to the gods and men, and to them alone.

In the next place, though the revolutions of the sun, moon, and all the stars are necessary for the cohesion of the universe, yet they may be considered also as objects designed for the view and contemplation of man. There is no sight less apt to satiate the eye, none more beautiful, or more worthy to employ our reason and penetration. By measuring their courses we find the different seasons, their durations and vicissitudes, which, if they are known to men alone, we must believe were made only for their sake.

Does the earth bring forth fruit and grain, in such excessive abundance and variety, for men, or for brutes? The plentiful and exhilarating fruit of the vine and the olive tree are entirely useless to beasts. They know not the time for sowing, tilling, or for reaping in season and gathering in the fruits of the earth, or for laying up and preserving their stores; man alone has the care and advantage of these things.

Thus, as the lute and the pipe were made for those, and those only, who are capable of playing on them, so it must be allowed that the produce of the earth was designed for those only who make use of them; and though some beasts may rob us of a small part, it does not follow that the earth produced it also for them. Men do not store up corn for mice and ants, but for their wives, their children, and their families; beasts, therefore, as I said before, possess it by stealth, but their masters openly and freely; it is for us therefore that nature hath provided this abundance. Can there be any doubt that this plenty and variety of fruit, which delight not only the taste, but the smell and sight, was by nature intended for men only? Beasts are so far from being partakers of this design, that we see that even they themselves were made for men; for of what utility would sheep be, unless for their wool, which, when dressed and woven, serves us for clothing? for they are not capable of anything, not even of procuring their own food, without the care and assistance of man. The fidelity of the dog, his affectionate fawning upon his master, his aversion to strangers, his sagacity in finding game, and his vivacity in pursuit of it, what do these qualities denote, but that he was created for our use? Why need I mention oxen? We perceive that their backs were not formed for carrying burdens, but their necks were naturally made for the yoke, and their strong broad shoulders to draw the plough. In the Golden Age,¹ which poets speak of, they were so greatly beneficial to the husbandman in tilling the fallow ground, that no violence was ever offered to them, and it was even thought a crime to eat them: —

The Iron Age began the fatal trade
Of blood, and hammer'd the destructive blade;
Then men began to make the ox to bleed,
And on the tame and docile beast to feed.

It would take a long time to relate the advantages we receive from mules and asses, which undoubtedly were destined for our use. What is the swine good for but to eat? whose life, as Chrysippus² says, was given it but as salt to keep it from putrefying; and, as it is proper food for man, nature hath made no animal more fruitful. What a multitude of birds and fishes are taken by the art and contrivance of man only, and which are so delicious to our taste, that one would be tempted sometimes to believe that this Providence which watched over us was an Epicurean! Though we think there are some birds, the Alites and the Oscines,³ as our augurs call them, which were made merely to foretell events.

The large savage beasts we take by hunting, partly for food, partly to exercise ourselves in imitation of martial discipline, and to use those we can tame and instruct, as elephants, or to extract remedies for our diseases and wounds, as we do from certain roots and herbs, the virtues of which are known by long use and experience. Represent to yourself the whole earth and seas as if before your eyes; you will see the vast and fertile plains, the thick, shady mountains, the immense pasturage for cattle, and ships sailing over the deep with incredible celerity; nor are our discoveries only on the face of the earth, but in its secret recesses there are many useful things, which, being made for man, by man alone are discovered.

Another, and, in my opinion, the strongest proof, that the providence of the gods takes care of us, is divination, which both of you, perhaps, will attack; you, Cotta, because Carneades⁴ took pleasure in inveighing against the Stoics; and you, Vellius, because there is nothing Epicurus ridicules so much as the prediction of events: yet the truth of divination appears in many places, on many occasions, often in private, but particularly in public concerns. We receive many intimations from the foresight and presages of augurs and auspices; from oracles, prophecies, dreams, and prodigies; and it often happens, that by these means events have proved happy to men, and imminent dangers have been avoided. This knowledge, therefore, call it a kind of transport, or an art, or a natural faculty, is certainly found only in men, and is a gift from the immortal gods. If these proofs, when taken separately, should make no impression upon your mind, yet, when collected together, they must certainly affect you.

Besides, the gods not only provide for mankind universally, but for particular men. You may bring this universality gradually to a smaller number, and again you may reduce that smaller number to individuals.

For if the reasons which I have given prove to all of us that the gods take care of all men, in every country, in every part of the world separate from our continent, they take care of those who dwell on the same land with us, from east to west; and if they regard those who inhabit this kind of great island, which we call the globe of the earth, they have the like regard for those who possess the parts of this island, as Europe, Asia, and Africa; and therefore they favor the parts of these parts, as Rome, Athens, Sparta, and Rhodes; and the particular men of these cities, separate from the whole; as Curius, Fabricius, Coruncanius, in the war with Pyrrhus; in the first Punic war, Calatinus, Duillius, Metellus, Lutatius; in the second, Maximus, Marcellus, Africanus; after these, Paullus, Gracchus, Cato; and in our fathers' times, Scipio, Lælius. Rome also and Greece have produced many illustrious men, who we cannot believe were so without the assistance of the Deity; which is the reason that the poets, Homer, in particular, joined their chief heroes, Ulysses, Agamemnon, Diomedes, Achilles, to certain Deities, as companions in their adventures and dangers. Besides, the frequent appearances of the gods, as I have before mentioned, demonstrate their regard for cities and particular men; this is also apparent indeed from the foreknowledge of events, which we receive either sleeping or waking. We are likewise forewarned of many things by the entrails of victims, by presages, and many other means, which have been long observed with such exactness, as to produce an art of divination.

There never, therefore, was a great man without divine inspiration. If a storm should damage the corn or vineyard of a person, or any accident should deprive him of some conveniences of life, we should not judge from thence that the Deity hates or neglects him. The gods take care of great things, and disregard the small. But to truly great men all things ever happen prosperously; as has been sufficiently asserted and proved by us Stoics, as well as by Socrates, the prince of philosophers, in his discourse on the infinite advantages arising from virtue.

This is almost the whole that hath occurred to my mind on the nature of the gods, and what I thought proper to advance. Do you, Cotta, if I may advise, defend the same cause. Remember that in Rome you keep the first rank; remember that you are Pontifex¹; and as your school is at liberty to argue on which side you please, do you rather take mine, and reason on it with that eloquence which you acquired by your rhetorical exercises, and which the Academy improved; for it is a pernicious and impious custom to argue against the gods, whether it be done seriously, or only in pretence.

POETRY: LYRIC

HEBREW

PSALMS

The psalms are the religious poetry of the ancient Hebrews. The term religious poetry, of course, implies a somewhat wider scope among the ancient Hebrew people than among the people of modern times. This collection includes poems of decidedly martial character, laments over unsatisfactory political conditions, imprecations against national foes, as well as lyrics of the most exalted religious fervor. The ascription of a certain portion of these poems to King David seems to be based on reliable authority; the collection as a whole, however, includes the work of various authors who lived in various periods of Jewish history. The ideas, the words, and the phrases have become so deeply imbedded in our consciousness that it is difficult not to think of them as part of our own literature.

The genius of early Hebraic poetry was primarily subjective in quality, and hence adapted rather to lyric and gnomic than to dramatic and epic purposes. In style it was rhythmic but not metrical in the modern sense. The lines were of approximately the same length, and each one was either a complete thought in itself or coincided with some definite division of a complete thought. They were combined in groups of two, three, or four, the group of two being the predominant arrangement. In many cases the second line of the couplet repeats, reinforces, or denies the first. Additional symmetry of form was secured through the use of various kinds of parallelism: synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic. The use of these devices gave to the poetry an effect of dignity, balance, and power.

PSALM XV

1 LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?

2 He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart.

3 He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour.

4 In whose eyes a vile person is condemned; but he honoureth them that fear the LORD. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.

5 He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

• PSALM XIX

1 The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork.

2 Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.

3 There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard.

4 Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,

5 Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.

6 His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.

7 The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple.

8 The statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes.

9 The fear of the LORD is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the LORD are true and righteous altogether.

10 More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.

11 Moreover by them is thy servant

warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward.

12 Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faulls.

13 Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

14 Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O LORD, my strength, and my redeemer.

PSALM XXIII

1 The LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want.

2 He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.

3 He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.

4 Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear 25 no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

5 Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup run- 30 neth over.

6 Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever.

PSALM XXIV

1 The earth is the LORD'S, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

2 For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods.

3 Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD? or who shall stand in his holy place?

4 He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.

5 He shall receive the blessing from the LORD, and righteousness from the God 50 of his salvation.

6 This is the generation of them that seek him, that seek thy face, O Jacob. Selah.¹

7 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and 5 the King of glory shall come in.

8 Who is this King of glory? The LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle.

9 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

10 Who is this King of glory? The LORD of hosts, he is the King of glory. Selah.

15

•PSALM XXV

1 Unto thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul.

2 O my God, I trust in thee: let me not 20 be ashamed, let not mine enemies triumph over me.

3 Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed: let them be ashamed which transgress without cause.

4 Shew me thy ways, O LORD; teach me thy paths.

5 Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day.

6 Remember, O LORD, thy tender mercies and thy lovingkindnesses; for they have been ever of old.

7 Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions: according to thy 35 mercy remember thou me for thy goodness' sake, O LORD.

8 Good and upright is the LORD: therefore will he teach sinners in the way.

40 9 The meek will he guide in judgment: and the meek will he teach his way.

10 All the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies.

45 11 For thy name's sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquity; for it is great.

12 What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose.

13 His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth.

14 The secret of the LORD is with them

¹ A word of unknown meaning occurring often in the Psalms, perhaps a musical or liturgical sign.

that fear him; and he will shew them his covenant.

15 Mine eyes are ever toward the LORD; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.

16 Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted.

17 The troubles of my heart are enlarged: O bring thou me out of my distresses.

18 Look upon mine affliction and my pain; and forgive all my sins.

19 Consider mine enemies; for they are many; and they hate me with cruel hatred.

20 O keep my soul, and deliver me: let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in thee.

21 Let integrity and uprightness preserve me; for I wait on thee.

22 Redcem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

• PSALM XLII

1 As the hart panteth after the water 25 brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.

2 My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?

3 My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?

4 When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: for I had gone 35 with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holyday.

5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? 40 and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance.

6 O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee 45 from the land of Jordan,¹ and of the Hermonites,² from the hill Mizar.

7 Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.

8 Yet the LORD will command his lovingkindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.

9 I will say unto God my rock, Why hast thou forgotten me? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?

10 As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me; while they say daily unto me, Where is thy God?

11 Why art thou cast down, O my 10 soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

PSALM XLVI

15

1 God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

2 Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the 20 mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;

3 Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah.

4 There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy 5 place of the tabernacles of the Most High.

5 God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and 30 that right early.

6 The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted.

7 The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

8 Come, behold the works of the LORD, what desolations he hath made in the earth.

9 He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire.

10 Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth.

11 The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

PSALM LXVIII

50

1 Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered: let them also that hate him flee before him.

² People from Mt. Hermon, north of the Sea of Galilee.

2 As smoke is driven away, so drive them away: as wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God.

3 But let the righteous be glad; let them rejoice before God: yea, let them exceedingly rejoice.

4 Sing unto God, sing praises to his name: extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH,¹ and rejoice before him.

5 A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation.

6 God setteth the solitary in families: he bringeth out those which are bound with chains: but the rebellious dwell in a dry land.

7 O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness; Selah:

8 The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God: even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the God of Israel.

9 Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary.

10 Thy congregation hath dwelt therein: thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor.

11 The Lord gave the word: great was the company of those that published it.

12 Kings of armies did flee apace: and she that tarried at home divided the spoil.

13 Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.

14 When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon.

15 The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; a high hill as the hill of Bashan.

16 Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in; yea, the LORD will dwell in it for ever.

17 The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place.

18 Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the LORD God might dwell among them.

19 Blessed be the LORD, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation. Selah.

20 He that is our God is the God of salvation; and unto GOD the Lord belong the issues from death.

21 But God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses.

22 The Lord said, I will bring again from Bashan, I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea:

23 That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same.

24 They have seen thy goings, O God; even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary.

25 The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels.²

26 Bless ye God in the congregations, even the Lord, from the fountain of Israel.

27 There is little Benjamin ³ with their ruler, the princes of Judah and their council, the princes of Zebulun, and the princes of Naphtali.

28 Thy God hath commanded thy strength: strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us.

29 Because of thy temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee.

30 Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit himself with pieces of silver: scatter thou the people that delight in war.

31 Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.

32 Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth; O sing praises unto the Lord; Selah:

² Small hand-drums or tambourines.

³ This and the following are tribes of Israel named for Jacob's sons.

33 To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens, which were of old; lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice.

34 Ascribe ye strength unto God: his excellency is over Israel, and his strength is in the clouds.

35 O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places: the God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power unto his people. 10 Blessed be God.

PSALM XCI

1 He that dwelleth in the secret place 15 of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

2 I will say of the LORD, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust.

3 Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence.

4 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his 25 truth shall be thy shield and buckler.

5 Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day;

6 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in 30 darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.

7 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.

8 Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked.

9 Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation;

10 There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.

11 For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. 45

12 They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.

13 Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt 50 thou trample under feet.

14 Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.

15 He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; 5 I will deliver him, and honour him.

16 With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation.

PSALM CXII

1 Praise ye the LORD. Blessed is the man that feareth the LORD, that delighteth greatly in his commandments.

2 His seed shall be mighty upon earth: the generation of the upright shall be 15 blessed.

3 Wealth and riches shall be in his house: and his righteousness endureth for ever.

4 Unto the upright there ariseth light 20 in the darkness: he is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous.

5 A good man sheweth favour, and lendeth: he will guide his affairs with discretion.

6 Surely he shall not be moved for ever: the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.

7 He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the LORD.

8 His heart is established, he shall not be afraid, until he see his desire upon his enemies.

9 He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness endureth for 35 ever; his horn shall be exalted with honour.

10 The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away: the desire of the wicked shall 40 perish.

PSALM CXXI

1 I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help.

2 My help cometh from the LORD, which made heaven and earth.

3 He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber.

4 Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep.

5 The LORD is thy keeper: the LORD is thy shade upon thy right hand.

6 The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night.

7 The LORD shall preserve thee from all evil: he shall preserve thy soul.

8 The LORD shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore.

• PSALM CXXX

1 Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O LORD.

2 Lord, hear my voice: let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.

3 If thou, LORD, shouldest mark iniquities, O LORD, who shall stand?

4 But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

5 I wait for the LORD, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope.

6 My soul waileth for the LORD more than they that watch for the morning: I say, more than they that watch for the morning.

7 Let Israel hope in the LORD: for with the LORD there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption.

8 And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

GREEK

PINDAR

(522?-443? B.C.)

Pindar, one of the greatest of Greek lyric poets, was born in Thebes. During his youth he was taught by the two women poets Myrtis (possibly his mother) and Corinna. He was an ardent student of poetry and applied himself diligently to acquiring the details of poetic technique.

When he made his public appearance he was received with great favor. Not only was he a popular favorite throughout his career, but he commanded the respect of some of the greatest rulers of the time. He seems to have enjoyed the patronage of Alexander of Macedon, Hiero of Syracuse, and Theron of Agriguntum. Pindar as a man, although not superstitious or credulous, was unusually pious and faithful to his religion. As a poet he was endowed with a high seriousness and had a remarkable gift of spiritual elevation. Beyond all other poets he had the ability to combine fiery and tumultuous impetuosity of spirit with the utmost regard for harmony and beauty of form. His odes were written to celebrate the victors in the Olympian, Nemean, Pythian, and Isthmian games, which were held in honor of certain gods. The Olympian and the Nemean games honored Zeus, the Pythian games, Phœbus, and the Isthmian games, Poseidon. The games consisted of athletic contests and horse-races, in which representatives from all parts of Hellas took part. Like the international Olympic games of the present day, they were assemblies of great brilliance and splendor. Pindar's tributes to the winning contestants are full of admiration and praise, but the praise is always tempered with admonition.

The odes were probably performed by a chorus of about twenty. The chorus was divided, and each half recited or chanted the strophe and the antistrophe respectively. The form of the Pindaric ode exerted great influence on later literary tradition. It was imitated by Ronsard in France, and by Jonson, Cowley, and Dryden in England. Gray's Progress of Poesy is supposed to have been based on Pindar's Olympian I.

The present selection, Olympic Ode I, was written ca. 475 B.C. It is translated by Abraham Moore in The Odes of Pindar, London, George Bell and Sons, 1887.

OLYMPIC ODE I

To Hiero the Syracusan, Winner in the Horse-race.

STROPHE I

Water the first of elements we hold ¹;
 And, as the flaming fire at night
 Glows with its own conspicuous light, Above proud treasure shines transcendent gold:
 But if, my soul, 'tis thy desire
 For the Great Games to strike thy lyre,
 Look not within the range of day 10
 A star more genial to descry
 Than yon warm sun, whose glittering ray
 Dims all the spheres that gild the sky;
 Nor loftier theme to raise thy strain
 Than famed Olympia's crowded plain: 15
 From whence, by gifted minstrels richly wove,
 Th' illustrious hymn, at glory's call,
 Goes forth to Hiero's affluent hall,
 To hail his prosperous throne and sing 20
 Saturnian Jove.

ANTISTROPHE I

Hiero the just, that rules the fertile field,
 Where fair Sicilia's pastures feed 25
 Unnumber'd flocks, and for his meed Culls the sweet flowers that all the virtues yield.
 Nor less renown'd his hand essays
 To wake the Muse's choicest lays, 30
 Such as the social feast ² around Full oft our tuneful band inspire —
 But wherefore sleeps the thrilling sound?
 Pluck from the peg thy Dorian ³ lyre,
 If Pisa's ⁴ palms have charms for thee, 35
 If Pherenicus' ⁵ victory

Hath roused thee to the rapturous cares of
 song;

Tell us how swift the unguided steed
 By Alpheus ⁶ urged his furious speed,
 And bore the distant prize from all the panting throng.

EPODE I

Proud of his stud, the Syracusan king
 Partook the courser's triumph.
 Through the plain
 By Lydian Pelops ⁷ won his praises
 ring —
 Pelops of Neptune loved (whose watery reign Bounds the wide earth, that trembles at his might),
 Pelops, whose form the plastic Fate ⁸
 replaced,
 And from the caldron bright
 Drew forth with ivory shoulder graded.

Life teems with wonders: yet, in Reason's spite,
 O'er the fond fascinating fiction, warm
 From Fancy's pencil, hangs a charm
 That more than Nature's self her painted dreams delight.

STROPHE II

For Taste, whose softening hand hath power to give
 Sweetness and grace to rudest things,
 And trifles to distinction brings,
 Makes us full oft the enchanting tale receive

¹ Water was thought by the ancients to be the parent of the other elements.

² At feasts it was customary to pass around the harp, and each guest was supposed to play upon it.

³ One of the three "moods" of Greek music. The other two were the Lydian and Phrygian. The Dorian was animating and grand, the Lydian, soft and melting, the Phrygian, melancholy or terrific.

⁴ Olympia, a city in Elis where the games were held.

⁵ Hiero's horse.

⁶ A river which rises in Arcadia, and flows by Pisa through the Elean territory into the Ionian Sea.

⁷ Pelops and his father Tantalus waged unsuccessful war against Ilus, king of Troy. They then left their country of Sipylus in Lydia and planted a colony in Greece. The plain referred to is the Elean territory.

⁸ Tantalus gave a feast to the gods at which he served up his son. Ceres unknowingly ate the shoulder of Pelops, and Clotho constructed a shoulder of ivory for him.

In Truth's disguise as Truth. The day
 Yet comes, Time's test, that tears
 away
 The veil each flattering falsehood wears. 5
 Beseems us then (for less the blame)
 Of those that heed us from the spheres
 Becoming marvels to proclaim.
 Great son of Tantalus, thy fate
 Not as the fablers I relate. 10
 Thee with the Gods thy Sire's Siplyian¹ guest,
 When they in turn beneath his bower
 Purest repast partook, the Power
 That wields the Trident² seized, and 15
 ravish'd from the feast.

ANTISTROPHE II

Desire his breast had conquer'd. Up he drove 20
 His trembling prize of mortal mould
 In radiant car with steeds of gold
 To th' highest mansion of all-honour'd
 Jove;
 With whom the Boy,³ from wondering 25
 Ide
 Rapt long before, like place supplied.
 Her Pelops lost, her vanish'd son Soon roused the frantic mother's care; 30
 No tidings came; the search begun
 In mystery ended in despair.
 Forthwith some envious foe was found Whispering th' unseemly slander
 round, 35
 "How all into the bubbling caldron cast
 "Thy mangled limbs were seethed, and shred
 "In fragments on the table spread,
 "While circling Gods looked on and shared 40
 th' abhorrd repast."

EPODE II

Far be from me and mine the thought profane, 45
 That in foul feast celestials could delight!

Blasphemous tale! Detraction finds its bane
 E'en in the wrong it works — If mortal wight
 Heaven e'er hath honour'd, 'twas this Tantalus;
 But soon from ill-digested greatness sprung
 Presumption and abuse:
 Thence from his towering fortunes
 flung (Frightful reverse!) he fell. A ponderous rock
 High o'er his head hung threatening (angry Jove
 So judged him for his crimes above):
 Where day and night he waits, dreading
 th' expected shock.⁴

STROPHE III

Thus doom'd is he life's hopeless load to
 bear, Torment unceasing! Three⁵ be-
 side,
 Delinquents there, like pains abide.
 He from th' Immortals their ambrosial
 fare,
 The nectarous flood that crown'd
 their bowl,
 To feast his earth-born comrades,
 stole;
 Food, that, by their celestial grace,
 Eternal youth to him had given.
 Vain hope, that guilt by time or
 place
 Can 'scape the searching glance of
 heaven!
 For this the blameless Son once more Back to man's short-lived race they
 bore;
 There, when fresh youth its blooming flower had blown,
 And round his chin th' umbrageous
 beard
 Mature its manlier growth had rear'd,
 From Pisa's Prince he sought, his nuptial couch to crown.

² Neptune. Here the poet wished to substitute another legend for the story of Tantalus's feast, pretending, probably for rhetorical reasons, that the gods could not delight in such a feast.

³ Ganymede, who was taken up into Heaven to be cup-bearer to the gods.

⁴ The punishment accorded to Tantalus in Hell for betraying the counsels of the gods.

⁵ The pains of thirsting, fasting, and standing.

ANTISTROPHE III

The famed Hippodamè¹; whose charms
to gain,
The fond and furious father's pride,
At night's dark hour alone he hied
To the rough shore of the loud-bellowing 5
main,
And call'd the Trident-sceptred God,
Whose form forthwith beside him
stood:
"Oh! if th' endearing gifts," said he, 10
"The Cyprian sea-born Queen be-
stows,
"Have still, great Neptune, grace
with thee,
"Propitiate now thy suppliant's 15 vows.
"Arrest Ænomaüs' brazen spear,
"To Elis guide my prompt career,
"And bear me on thy swiftest chariot's wheel 20
"Victorious to the goal; for he,
"Slayer of suitors ten and three,
"Still from his daughter's hope withholds
the bridal seal.

EPODE III

"Majestic Danger calls but for the 25
brave,
"Trusts not the dastard's arm: then
why should man,
"By life's hard lot predestined to the grave, 30
"Waste in the dark th' unprofitable span,
"And crouch in Age's corner unrenown'd,
"Heav'n's noblest gifts untasted? 35
Power divine!
"Grant thou th' event be crown'd,
"This peril shall at least be mine."

STROPHE IV

Ænomaüs' power th' exulting youth
o'erthrows:
The virgin spouse his arms entwine;
From whose soft intercourse, a line
By all the virtues nursed, six warriors
rose.
Now in rich pomp and solemn state
His dust heroic honours wait.
Where Alpheus laves the hallow'd
glade,
His tomb its ample range displays,
And gifts by many a stranger laid
High on his crowded altar blaze;
But most from proud Olympia's dome,
On distant realms, on times to come,
Shines Pelops' fame. There Speed demands his crown,
Toil-mastering Strength the muscle
strains,
And conquerors pass life's proud remains
On Virtue's tranquil couch, the slumber of renown.

ANTISTROPHE IV

Such is the Champion's meed: the constant good,
That lives beyond the transient hour,
Of all that Heaven on man can shower,
Most fires his hope, most wakes his gratitude:
But now 'tis mine, the strain to raise,
And swell th' Equestrian Hero's
praise,
To crown with loud Æolian² song
A Prince, whose peer the spacious
earth
Holds not its noblest chiefs among,
Boasts not in wisdom, power and
worth,
A host more gifted, to display,
Through all the mazes of the lay.
Hiero, some guardian god thy fame sustains,
And makes thee his peculiar care;

If long thy deeds his smiles shall share,
A loftier flight I'll soar, and warble sweeter strains.

EPODE IV

Then high on Cronium's peak ¹ my post
shall be;
There, as a poet's glance informs my
soul,
First in the burning race thy steeds to 10
see,
Thy bounding chariot whirl thee to
the goal.

Then shall the Muse her strongest javelin fling;
'Bove all the ranks of greatness at the top

Shines the consummate king — Beyond that height lift not thy hope.

Be thine in that bright station long to bear Thy upright course; mine, with the conquering band,
To take my honourable stand,
And 'mong the bards of Greece the palm of genius wear.

SAPPHO

Sappho, the greatest woman poet of all time, was a native of the island of Lesbos. As is usual with the great poets of Greek antiquity, very little can be learned of the details of her life. She is thought to have come from a family of some importance, to have been married to a prosperous man some years her senior, and to have been left a widow. Her occupation was the teaching of poetry. During the Roman decadence there arose a tradition that cast aspersions on Sappho's character, a tradition fed by the intensity of the personal emotion in her poetry; but it is now generally held that she was a person of high character. Her love poetry has also led tradition to endow her with a number of lovers, of whom the most famous are Phaon, who ferried a boat between Lesbos and Chios, and the poets Alcæus and Anacreon. While there is no disposition on the part of scholars to deny that she had lovers, the particular stories which have become current are evidently apocryphal.

From the earliest times the poetry of Sappho has been accepted as practically perfect; in fact one may search all the pages of ancient and most modern criticism and find hardly a single adverse comment. The admitted perfection of her work serves only to increase our regret that a mere handful of fragments and only a few complete poems have survived. Every line that remains, one might almost say every phrase, bears the mark of the highest poetic genius. The scattered remnants that outlived the scandalous destructiveness of mediæval bigotry have been treasured by all poets and have been at once the inspiration and the despair of century after century of translators. The technical perfection of Sappho's poetry is all the more remarkable when we consider its feverish intensity. We can see how Pindar in his high moral fervor and Homer in his Olympian detachment could keep out a weather eye for difficulties of symmetry and balance; but how Sappho retained her command of complicated strophic forms and of the exquisite coupling of word to word under the assaults of a devastating personal emotion must ever remain a beautiful enigma to the modern mind. Perhaps it is another one of those puzzles for which the only solution is the extraordinary power of Greek genius.

These selections are from the translation of J. Addington Symonds, in Sappho, Memoir, Text, Selected Renderings, Henry T. Wharton, London, 1907.

ANACREON

Anacreon was born in Teos but left his native home early in life to take up his abode in Samos under the patronage of Polycrates. Later he lived in Athens under the protection of the tyrant Hipparchus. He is famous as the poet of love and wine. His style is light and graceful like that of the English Cavalier poets. The form and spirit of his verse are so charming that we can hardly find it in our hearts to tax him with lack of emotional force. The genuine work of Anacreon survives only in a few fragments, but he was closely imitated even from earliest times in verses known as Anacreontics. The poems here given are among those of doubtful authenticity, but they reflect the spirit of Anacreon closely enough for our purpose. Many find Anacreon's flippant celebration of love and wine unpleasing, but there seems to be little reason for taking it too seriously.

These selections are translated by Francis Fawkes in Chalmers' Poets, XX.

ODES

ODE V

To make the beverage divine,
Mingle sweet roses with the wine;
Delicious will the liquor prove,
For roses are the flowers of love:
And while with wreaths of roses crown'd,
Let laughter and the cup go round.

Hail, lovely rose! to thee I sing,
Thou sweetest daughter of the Spring:
All mortals praise thy beauties bright;
In thee the pow'rs above delight.
Gay Cupid, with the Graces bland,
When lightly bounding hand in hand,
With nimble feet he beats the ground,
Shows his bright locks with roses crown'd.
Here then the flow'ry garland bring;
With numbers sweet I'll wake the string,
And crown'd with roses, heav'nly flowers!
Admitted, Bacchus, to thy bow'rs,
With snowy-bosomed Sappho gay
I'll dance the feather'd hours away.

ODE XVII

Mulciber,¹ this silver take,
And a curious goblet make;
Let thy utmost skill appear
Not in radiant armour there;
Let me there no battles see;
What are arms or wars to me?

Form it with a noble sweep,
Very wide, and very deep.
Carve not there the northern Team,²
Nor Orion's dreadful beam³;
5 Pleiads, Hyads,⁴ Bears displease;
What have I to do with these?
Why should slow Boötes⁵ roll,
Why should horrid monsters prowl,
On the margin of my bowl?
10 Draw me, what I value more,
Vines with purple clusters' store,
Bacchus ever young and fair,
Cupid with the golden hair,
Gay Bathyllus⁶ too be there.
15 See that, beautiful and bold,
All these figures rise in gold;
In the wine-press let them join
Hand in hand to tread the wine.

• ODE XXVII

20 Bacchus, Jove's delightful boy,
Generous god of wine and joy,
Still exhilarates my soul
With the raptures of the bowl;
25 Then with feather'd feet I bound,
Dancing in a festive round;
Then I feel in sparkling wine,
Transports delicate, divine;
Thus the sprightly music warms,
30 Song delights, and beauty charms:

¹ Another name for Vulcan, who presided over metal work. This little poem is a sort of parody on the passage in the Iliad which describes the shield made for Achilles by Vulcan.

² The Great Dipper.

³ An allusion to the connection of the constellation Orion with storms.

⁴ A cluster of stars in the head of the constellation Taurus.

⁵ The Herdsman, the name of a constellation near the Great Bear.

⁶ A Samian youth, favorite of Anacreon.

Debonair, and light, and gay,
Thus I dance the hours away.

ODE XL

Once as Cupid, tir'd with play,
On a bed of roses lay,
A rude bee, that slept unseen,
The sweet-breathing buds between,
Stung his finger, cruel chance!
With its little pointed lance.
Straight he fills the air with cries,
Weeps, and sobs, and runs, and flies;
Till the god to Venus came,

Lovely, laughter-loving dame:
Then he thus began to plain;
"Oh! undone — I die with pain —
Dear mama, a serpent small,
5 Which a bee the ploughmen call,
Imp'd with wings, and arm'd with dart
Oh! — has stung me to the heart."
Venus thus reply'd and smil'd;
"Dry those tears, for shame! my child;
10 If a bee can wound so deep,
Causing Cupid thus to weep,
Think, oh think! what cruel pains
He that's stung by thee sustains."

THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY

The collection known as the Greek Anthology consists of several thousand short poems written by a large number of authors between 700 B.C. and ca. 600 A.D. Graham R. Tomson gives the following account of the collection: "By the word 'anthology' is vaguely understood the collection bequeathed to us by antiquity, of epitomised lyrics, idyls, odes, elegies, epitaphs, that pass under the somewhat widely comprehensive title of Epigrams; although the term 'epigram,' according to the sense in which it has been used in modern times, cannot be applied to these stray blossoms of Greek poetry, with which indeed it has nothing in common but the spontaneity and terse completeness — the peculiarly Greek method of using the best words in the best places. . . . Four Anthologies have existed . . . of which the fourth was put together in the tenth century by a certain Constantine Cephalas, of whom nothing else is known. In the fourteenth century a Byzantine monk, Maximus Planudes, re-arranged, abridged, and expurgated the Anthology of Cephalas, making a distribution into seven books, under different heads, in accordance with the various subjects of the poems. This mutilated collection was the first published, having been saved from the ruins of Constantinople by John Lascaris, who had it printed at Florence in 1494."

The original text of Cephalas was discovered in 1606 by a French scholar, Saumaise (better known as Salmasius, the opponent of Milton). It was not published, however, until after his death. The poems treat of almost every imaginable subject: of death, of love, of the evanescence of all earthly things, of the rewards of a virtuous life, of idyllic shepherd life, of little incidents of everyday occurrence. A good many retain the form in which the epigram had its beginning, a pithy statement suitable for a gravestone. "They are not ambitious in scope or spirit; they are little drops distilled from the life of their times, miniature patterns cut out with exquisite skill and taste. Their neatness and charm have made them a constant stimulus to translation. Among the English men of letters who have turned their hands to these verses are Bacon, Johnson, Dryden, Shelley, Moore, Symonds, and Lang.

MIMNERMUS

Mimnermus was probably a native of Smyrna. He is mentioned in the poems of Solon, who was his contemporary. The poem here given is fairly typical of the mild pessimism which pervaded the lyric poetry of the seventh century before Christ. The Greeks at this time had no organized conception of a system of future rewards or of a future existence, as that term is understood in the modern world. Under these circumstances it was difficult indeed to regard with equanimity the disappearance of youth and the coming of old age. The discussion of old age which Plato includes in the opening chapters of his Republic shows that there were some who escaped the feeling of emptiness as life declined; but most people lacked the delicate casuistry of Plato.

WE AS LEAVES

We are as leaves in jewelled springtime growing That open to the sunlight's quickening rays; So joy we in our span of youth, unknowing 5 If God shall bring us good or evil days. Two fates beside thee stand; the one hath sorrow, Dull age's fruit, that other gives the boon Of death, for youth's fair flower hath no 10 to-morrow, And lives but as a sunlit afternoon.	And when thine hour is spent, and passeth by thee, Surely to die were better than to live, Ere grief or evil fortune come anigh thee, And penury that hath but ill to give. Who longs for children's love, for all his yearning Shall haply pass to death anhungered still; Or pain shall come, his life to anguish turning, Zeus hath for all an endless store of ill.

SIMONIDES

Simonides was an Ionian, born on the island of Ceos. He came of a family of professional poets, and was carefully trained in his craft. After his training had been completed, he spent most of his life at the courts of patrons. His last patron was Hiero of Syracuse, who was also patron of Pindar. His style is pure and beautifully polished. His utterances are tinged with the same melancholy that characterizes the other members of his school. His funeral elegies usually offer the conventional Greek consolation — that death is preferable to the miseries of life. Anacreon, whose death is commemorated in the first selection from Simonides, was a friend of the poet. Selections from Anacreon are printed elsewhere in this volume.

ANACREON

LEONIDAS OF TARENTUM

Of Leonidas, almost nothing is known. He composed about a hundred epigrams included in the Anthology, of which a number are written on the deaths of sailors, shepherds, and other characters from common life. The third selection is a poem based on a pagan custom, still prevalent in some countries, of leaving a propitiatory gift at a well or spring.

UNNUMBERED WERE THE AGES PAST

Unnumbered were the ages past, O man, Before thy day began. Unnumbered, too, the ages yet shall be That Hades hath for thee. What store of life, then, doth to thee remain? Scarce, as it were, a grain! Scanty thy life and short, — nor mayest thou	Even enjoy it now; 10 For it is hateful, and its poisoned breath More dire than loathed death. Then scorn this stormy life of thine, and shun, — As I indeed have done, 15 I, Pheido, son of Crito, — and like me, Seek the still haven of tranquillity, The haven of dark Hades' silent sea.

CLEITAGORAS

Shepherds that on this mountain ridge abide, Tending your goats and fleecy flocks 20 always, A little favour, but most grateful, pay Cleitagoras, nor be the boon denied! For sake of mother earth, and by the bride Of Hades under earth, let sheep, I pray, 25 Bleat near me, and the shepherd softly play From the scarred rock across the pasture wide.	Ah! but in early spring cull meadow- sweet, Neighbor, and weave a garland for my tomb; And with ewe's milk be the stone edge bedewed, When the lambs play about their mother's feet: So shall you honour well the shades, from whom Are thanks, — and from the dead is gratitude.

THE TRAVELLER'S GIFT

The stream leaps down from the cloven rock, and I hail the waters clear,
 And the little figures of rustic nymphs that shepherds have offered here.
 Good hap, ye maids of the waterways, who are mirrored below in the pool!

All hail to the kindly rock above that harboured the fountain cool!
 For I was a thirsty wayfarer, and sweet was the draught I drew;
 So take my gift — 'tis a cup of horn — that I leave by the pool for you.

CALLIMACHUS

Callimachus was probably the most famous of the Alexandrian poets. He was born in Africa and lived at Alexandria during the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes. He was chief librarian of the famous library at Alexandria from 260 to about 240 B.C. Here he instituted a grammatical school and taught a number of distinguished students, among whom were Eratosthenes, Aristophanes of Byzantium, and Apollonius of Rhodes (q.v.). When we speak of the Alexandrian school of writers we mean those who were pupils of Callimachus, and were distinguished for their antiquarian interests, for their devotion to the ancient models, and for their exactness and love of detail.

Although Callimachus is said to have composed some eight hundred books, very little of his work has come down to us. Of the selections printed in the present volume the first is an elegy on the death of a friend, which carries a deeper tone of sincerity than most; the second, a love poem revealing a note of defiance surprisingly similar to that which crept into the English poetry of the Cavalier period; the third, a description of an offering to Venus which exhibits the Alexandrian love of detail; and the fourth, a conventional epigram of more than usual balance and finish.

•THEY TOLD ME, HERACLEITUS

They told me, Heracleitus, they told me you were dead;
 They brought me bitter news to hear and bitter tears to shed.
 I wept as I remembered how often you and I
 Had tired the sun with talking and sent him down the sky.

And now that thou art lying, my dear old Carian guest,
 A handful of grey ashes, long, long ago at rest,
 Still are thy pleasant voices, thy nightingales awake,
 For Death, he taketh all away, but them he cannot take.

 But thou — not e'en a shade. O cruel fair!

MELEAGER

Not only was Meleager the real beginner of the Anthology, but he was an important contributor. It would be difficult indeed to find in Western literature a collection of love lyrics better than his. He lived in a decadent age, when Greece was crumbling, and her whole spirit weakening under the enervating influence of Asiatic culture. It was an age when mortality hung heavy on the mind, when men no longer fought and built, but loved to sit and listen to their own sighs — in short, an age eminently suitable to charmingly sentimental love poetry. It is well to remember, however, that no really good poet is merely a child of his age. Meleager's little spring poem could have been written in any period. In Merivale's translation it shows a marked resemblance to Milton's L'Allegro.

LOVE

Oyez! wild Love is fled!
 Just now this very morning
 He got up from his bed —
 Flew off without a warning.

He's pretty in his tears,
 Quick, shameless, chattering ever;
 Wings in his back he bears,
 Laughs slyly, wears a quiver.

I known not who may be
 His father — none will own him;

Not Air, nor Earth, nor Sea,
 Make any claim upon him.

He's hated in all parts:

SPRING

Stilled is winter's gusty breath,
 Now the spring awakeneth;
 See, she brings the blushing hours
 Gay with laughter, glad with flowers,
 And the sombre earth is seen
 Robed in bravery of green,
 While the teeming branches bear
 Opening buds to deck her hair.
 Nurtured by the dews of morn
 Many a tender bloom is born,
 And the meadows laugh and sing,
 For the rose is opening.
 Blithe of heart the shepherd swain
 Tunes the merry pipe again,
 While upon the mountain steep
 Browse his goats and woolly sheep.
 Gladly doth the mariner
 Feel the gentle zephyr stir;
 Safely now his keel may glide
 O'er the waste of waters wide.
 Dionysus, now to thee
 Mortals sing thine Evox¹;
 Sound we thus the Vine-god's praise,
 Crowned with clustered ivy sprays.

Now the bees in busy train
 Ply their cunning art again;
 15 Ceaseless in the hive they toil,
 Labouring with the new-won spoil,
 Building up the waxen comb
 In their myriad-chambered home.
 Now the tuneful choir of air
 20 Makes us music everywhere.
 On the wave the halcyon,
 By the sedgy stream the swan,
 Round the eaves the swallow,
 Nightingales in every hollow
 25 Tell the coming of the spring;
 Thus rejoices everything.
 If gay raiment deck the earth,
 And the shepherd pipe for mirth,
 While the fleecy flock and herd,
 30 Swarming bee and singing bird,
 So in gladness all agree;
 If the sailor trust the sea,
 And the god of wine and youth
 Lead the dance, in very sooth,
 35 Can the bard from song refrain
 Now the spring has come again?

(Translated by J. A. Pott, Ancient Gems, ed. Grundy.)

AGATHIAS

The principal work for which Agathias is noted is his history of the events from 553 to 558. He contributed a number of epigrams to the Anthology. Most of his life was spent in Constantinople. The second selection sounds a note often heard in the Anthology, a note of warning to a beauty too chary of her favors.

RHODANTHE

Weeping and wakeful all the night I lie,
 And with the dawn the grace of sleep is
 near,
 But swallows flit about me with their cry,
 And banish drowsihead and bring the
 tear.
 Mine eyes must still be weeping, for the dear
 Thought of Rhodanthe stirs in memory;
 Ye chattering foes have done! it was not I

Who silenced Philomel¹: go seek the sheer Clefts of the hills, and wail for Itylus
 Or clamour from the hoopoe's¹ craggy

 But let sweet sleep an hour abide with
 us,
 Perchance a dream may come, and we be
 blest,
 A dream may make Rhodanthe piteous,
 And bring us to that haven of her breast.

• THE FADED BEAUTY

She, who but late in beauty's flower was seen,
 Proud of her auburn curls and noble mien —
 Who froze my hopes and triumph'd in my fears,
 Now sheds her graces in the waste of years.
 Changed to unlovely is that breast of snow,

And dimm'd her eye, and wrinkled is her
 brow;
 And querulous the voice by time repress'd, Whose artless music stole me from my
 rest.
 Age gives redress to love; and silvery hair
 And earlier wrinkles brand the haughty
 fair.

(Translated by Robert Bland, Selections, ed. Tomson.)

JULIAN OF EGYPT

Very little is known of this Julian except that he lived about 500 A.D. and was a prefect of one of the divisions of Egypt. The poems here given are fairly representative of a large class of fragile little epigrams dealing with Cupid. They are artificial and ephemeral, but of their kind they are unsurpassed.

LOVE AMONGST THE ROSES

As a rosy wreath I bound,
 'Mongst the roses Love I found:

PAULUS SILENTARIUS

The contributions of Paulus Silentarius are usually regarded as the best of the Byzantine age. The sense of the second selection is that since the writer, who had escaped the shafts of love in his youth, had succumbed to it in his old age, love had won a greater victory over wisdom than when Venus defeated Juno in the contest of beauty decided by Paris.

• TO HIS LADY

No garland needs the rose, and thou, my fair,	But duller than thine eyes' dark, lustrous sheen;
No jewelled nets or broidered veils dost need;	Thy bearing — honey-sweet, harmonious, tender —
Pearls with thy skin may not compare in- deed,	5 Is as the girdle of the Paphian Queen. ¹ By these I am undone —
Nor gold add radiance to thy flowing hair.	Thine eyes do soothe alone
The Indian hyacinth hath a dusky splen- dour,	And save me from despair, For sweet hope lingers there.

(Translated by Alma Strettell, Selections, ed. Tomson.)

THE OLD LOVE

I that in youth had never been The servant of the Paphian Queen, I that in youth had never felt The shafts of Eros pierce and melt, Cypris! in later age, half grey,	10 I bow the neck to thee to-day. Pallas, that was my lady, thou Dost more triumphant vanquish now, Than when thou gainedst, over seas, The apple of the Hesperides. ²

RUFINUS

Rufinus was an official in the Byzantine court. In his poem "Golden Eyes" we see again the all-pervasive motif of the evanescence of earthly things. This theme was taken over by Horace and the elegiac poets, and by them handed on to the Renaissance, where it emerges in the poetry of the Italian Humanists, the French Pléiade, and the English Elizabethans. Note the striking similarity of spirit between this poem and Herrick's "To Daffodils."

• GOLDEN EYES

Ah, Golden Eyes, to win you yet, I bring mine April coronet, The lovely blossoms of the spring, For you I weave, to you I bring: These roses with the lilies wet, Wilt thou disdain mine offering, Ah, Golden Eyes?	15 Crowned with thy lover's flowers, forget The pride wherein thy heart is set, For thou, like these or anything, Has but thine hour of blossoming, Thy spring, and then — the long regret, 20 Ah, Golden Eyes!

UNKNOWN AUTHORS

The first selection is notable for its reference to the Island of the Blest, a legendary place inhabited by the Greek warriors of the heroic age after their death. The faraway island where all is peace and plenty is a tradition of singular persistence. In the western world it was cultivated chiefly by the Irish, who preserved many tales, both ecclesiastical and secular, concerning voyages in search of it. As late as the time of Columbus the fabled island of Brasil was charted on the maps.

The second is a sympathetic epitaph for a farmer. It is simple, direct, and unaffected, and it sums up the farmer's life through all the ages.

LATIN

HORACE

Quintus Horatius Flaccus was born at Venusia in Apulia. His father was a freedman who, in spite of his humble circumstances, gave his son an education equal to that received by many of the aristocrats. After attending the village school at Venusia, Horace was sent to Rome and later to Athens. In Athens he was trained according to the ideals of the older classical age, and came under the influence of the Epicureans. After the death of Cæsar, Horace joined the army of Brutus and was immediately given the rank of military tribune in command of a legion, an extraordinarily high rank for a man of his experience. He was present in command at the disastrous battle of Philippi. After the downfall of Brutus his position was extremely uncertain. His estate was confiscated, and he had no patrons in influential positions. Finally securing a minor government post, which paid enough to keep body and soul together, he devoted himself to writing. After a time his poetry won him the attention of Varius and Vergil, who introduced him to Mæcenas, a rich patron of letters desirous of interesting literary men in the reforms of Augustus. Horace was sufficiently endowed with personal charm and literary ability to make a permanent place for himself in the charmed circle. Mæcenas became his patron; and he had no need thenceforward to concern himself with financial matters. The most notable gift made to him by Mæcenas was the Sabine farm, which has become proverbial in literature as a symbol of rustic contentment.

As a poet Horace was one of the world's greatest masters of metrical structure and diction. The beauty and polish of his lines defy translation, and for that very reason, apparently, have inspired more attempts than the work of any other Roman poet. Although Horace was educated by the Epicureans, he could hardly be said to subscribe to any organized system of philosophy. He viewed life as a spectator, with detachment and affection and pleasure. His mild skepticism held nothing of bitterness. Human beings did not disappoint him as they did Juvenal; for he expected very little of them in the beginning. Horace the writer was often mildly amused at the actions of Horace the man, who was ardent in his support of the reforms of Augustus. Rarely indeed do we find any finer expressions of patriotism than those of Horace. He was respectful to the established religion, and firm in his sentiments regarding the sanctity of the family; he was the advocate of restraint and moderation in all things, and believed that the only true source of happiness is within. To cultivate a contented mind was to reach beyond the world's unreal and evanescent joys and sorrows.

Horace was not only read but also studied by his contemporaries, and his works formed a prominent part of the school curriculum from the first century on. In the early Middle Ages, he, like Ovid and Catullus, was overshadowed by Vergil, and bore no appreciable influence until the Revival of Learning, when he became an integral part of the intellectual life of Western Europe. Horace's whole influence cannot be accurately measured, for it is chiefly one of temper and spirit. Although his contribution to modern life is not clearly definable, it may be fairly said that an acquaintance with him, no less than with Vergil, has been an indispensable part of the equipment of every educated European since the Age of Elizabeth.

These selections are taken from the Complete Works of Horace, translated by "Various Hands," London, J. M. Dent and Sons (Everyman Series), 1911.

CATULLUS

(87?-54? B.C.)

Caius Valerius Catullus was born near Verona. Of his childhood little is known. After squandering a rather large inheritance which he received from his father, he joined the prætor Memmius in Bithynia, hoping to rehabilitate himself. The venture was unsuccessful, and he returned to Rome, where, except for occasional visits to his country-seats on the promontory of Sirmio and at Tibur, he spent the remainder of his life. He was acquainted with Cicero and other famous men; but his relationships were largely personal, as he appears to have been little interested in politics. He is supposed to have become violently infatuated with Clodia, the beautiful but dissolute sister of Publius Clodius, whom he celebrated in his lyrics as Lesbia. He died young, long before he had time to reach full maturity as a poet. His most famous poems are his lyrics addressed to Lesbia, the marriage hymn for Manlius Torquatus, the Allis, a narrative poem dealing with the rites of a fanatical religious cult, and the Coma Berenices, a paraphrase of a poem by the Alexandrian poet, Callimachus.

Catullus interprets everything in terms of personal feelings. Always either agonizing or exulting, he is the poet of youth — of intense enthusiasm or black despair. In the intensity of personal feeling expressed in his poetry we can think of no one with whom to compare him except Sappho, and possibly Byron. In style his poetry is clear cut, direct, and bright. He has the faculty of condensation, of attractive metaphor and simile, and a feeling for Nature hardly less penetrating than that of Horace. His abundant use of mythology and his interest in archæological detail imply his indebtedness to the Alexandrian school. These traits, however, are mostly limited to his longer poems. We value Catullus chiefly for his countless little pictures and turns of phrase, for his engaging lours de force, and for his amazing quality of sudden repartee.

Though Vergil, Martial, Ovid, and other poets of his own day recognized his genius and even borrowed from him at times, he was neglected, as was Horace, during the Middle Ages. Saved from oblivion by Petrarch in the fourteenth century, he became from that time on one of the immortal sources of poetical inspiration and style. The Italian and French humanists translated and imitated him freely. Imitations and translations sprang up in almost every generation in France and England. Hardly a marriage song or group of love lyrics was composed without betraying something of Catullus' influence, either in form or in spirit. In England, Catullus, although received with less enthusiasm than Horace in the Renaissance, was nevertheless recognized by its prominent poets and critics and increasingly acclaimed by the late Elizabethans and the writers of the seventeenth century. In the eighteenth century the popularity of Catullus was bound to decline; but the nineteenth century, with its reawakening of classical interest, gave enthusiastic welcome to the Roman poet, who has most profoundly affected the love poetry of England.

These selections are taken from the Poems of Catullus, translated by Hugh McNaghten, Cambridge, University Press, 1925.

•ON THE DEATH OF LESBIA'S SPARROW

Mourn Loves and Graces all, and you
Of men the lovelier chosen few.
The sparrow of my love is dead,
The playmate of my love is sped,
Her sparrow, prized beyond her eyes,
So honey-sweet was he, and wise
To know her as a girl her mother.
He would not leave her for another,
Would on her lap be still astir

And chirping still for none but her.
And now he journeys whence they say
No steps retrace the darkling way.
Cursed shades, I curse you, swallowing
5 In Orcus¹ every dainty thing:
The dainty pet ye ravished here!
Fie, fie, for shame! ah, birdie dear!
Flushed, heavy eyelids are the due
My love is paying, all for you.

TO LESBIA

Oh! let us love and have our day,
All that the bitter greybeards say
Appraising at a single mite.
My Lesbia, suns can set and rise:
For us the brief light dawns and dies
Once only, and the rest is night.
A thousand kisses, then five score,

10 A thousand and a hundred more,
Then one for each you gave before.
Then, as the many thousands grow,
We'll wreck the counting lest we know,
Or lest an evil eye prevail
15 Through knowledge of the kisses' tale.

•TO LESBIA

Catullus, hapless one, be sane at last,
Believe your eyes, confess the past is past.
So bright, so white the suns that shone
before!
There where your lady led you followed
fain,

And loved her as none else shall love again.
Ah! then the glad surprises and the play —
You wished it so, nor said your lady 20 nay.
So white, so bright the suns that shine no
more!

¹ Hades.

Now she says nay: ah! weakling, say it too;
 Nor live to grieve, nor one who flies pursue,
 But stubborn stand and bear the purpose through.
 Lady, good-bye! now stands Catullus fast,
 Nor woos against your will nor mourns the past:
 But surely you shall mourn when wooed no more.

Poor culprit! ah, the days for you in store!
 Who will now heed your beauty, take your hand?
 5 Whom will you fondle? who will call you his?
 Whose lips will you devour with kiss on kiss?
 But thou, Catullus, stubborn, steadfast stand.

• TO LESBIA

I hate and love. You question "How?"
 I lack
 An answer, but I feel it on the rack.

TO CÆSAR

Not overmuch I care, Cæsar, your friend to be;
 You may be dark or fair, I never looked to see.

• TO LESBIA¹

Peer of the gods he seems to me,
 Lord of high gods, if that may be,
 Who face to face at whiles on thee
 Can look and hear

15 That I am dumb is evidence That thou art near.

Thy laughter sweet: ah! Lesbia, thence Fails (woe is me) my very sense,

My tongue is crushed: the fever flies
 From limb to limb: sounds tinkling rise
 20 Within my brain: night on both eyes
 Falls swift and sheer.

ON SIRMIO

My pearl of mimic isles and island eyes,
 That in the liquid lakes or wild waste seas
 Neptune upholds, the god of those and these,
 My Sirmio, is it true, the glad surprise?
 And I have left Bithynia's² plains behind,
 And Thynia left, to see you and be safe?
 Joy beyond joy to loose the cares that chafe

And lay aside the burden of the mind!
 Home after toilsome travel; home once more, 25 Snug in the cosy bed we wearied for —
 This makes amends for all the toil we bore.
 Joy, fairy Sirmio, for your master's sake:
 Joy, waters of my own true Lydian lake:
 Home-laughter of the depths awake,
 30 awake!

All the tree close entwined.

You too the fancy-free
Maidens, that soon shall see Dawn a like day, repeat Hymen, Hymen, and greet Hymen to music's beat.

So may he gladly hear,
So at the sound draw near Unto his proper deed,
Fain the true love to lead,
Fain the true hearts to speed.

What god as he can bless Lovers in love's distress?
First of the heavenly throng,
Men's prayers to thee belong,
Hymen, Hymen our song.

Thee to their children's aid
Call failing sires; a maid
Loosens for thee her zone;
Bridegrooms to thee alone
5 All fears and longings own.

Thou the bud torn away
From mother's lap does lay
In the rough hands and bold.
Thy marvels manifold,
10 Hymen, Hymen, be told.

Love without thee is vain,
Lustreless all the gain,
Yet if thou wilt, 'tis fair:
Which of the gods may dare
15 With Hymen to compare?

* * *

Open the gate: 'tis she.
Torches are waving, see,
Tresses of light, yet slow
20 Moves she, and all aglow
Weeps that she needs must go.

* * *

Drop the bride's tender hand,
25 Boy with the purple band:
Let the groom claim her now:
Hymen, to thee we bow,
Hymen, be gracious thou.

30 Wives that are aged and proved True to the lords ye loved,
Lay the sweet girl to rest:
Hymen, thy name be blest,
Hymen, thy praise confessed.

35 Come to her now, for she Waits to be thine, and see
So sweet a blossom this
As the white clematis 40 Or yellow poppy is.

Haste to her husband now,
Comely as she, I vow;
Venus has held you dear:

⁴ Aonia was a part of Boeotia containing Mt. Helicon and the fountain Aganippe, a well of the Muses.

Only delay not here:
Come to her, night is near.

Quickly you come indeed,
Venus befriend your need,
Since what you will you dare,
Heedless of whosoe'er
Looks on a love so fair.

Dust of the Afric plain Reckon we grain by grain,
Count we the stars that shine:
Joys that are thine and thine,
How shall our hearts divine?

Happy be night and morn,
Soon shall a babe be born;
How should an ancient name,
Still to abide the same,
Lack the new heir to fame?

God send a little son

Stretching soft hands anon
From mother's breast, to bring Father a glimmering
Smile of sweet welcoming.

5
God send a son and heir
Mælius' name to bear,
His copy, who shall be Proof for all eyes to see 10 Of wifely chastity.

Mother shall lend him grace,
Sign of his ancient race,
Such as the praise we see 15 Rest on thy son from thee,
Matchless Penelope.

Close ye the doors; away,
Maidens, enough of play;
20 You, that have youth to share,
Cherish a love so fair
Happily, happy pair.

TO HIS BROTHER

'PERVIGILIUM VENERIS

The date and authorship of The Vigil of Venus are unknown. It is generally thought, however, to have been composed some time between the second and the sixth centuries of the Christian era. In spirit and form it belongs mainly to the Silver Age of Latin poetry; on the other hand, the refrain and the suggestion of accentual rhythm look forward to the Middle Ages.

The occasion of the poem is the vigil on the eve of a three-day festival of Venus. The theme of Venus as the life-giving force, fosterer of production and fertility, is perhaps better known in the opening lines of Lucretius' De rerum natura (q.v.).

This translation is from The Vigil of Venus, by Cecil Clementi, Oxford, B. H. Blackwell, 1911.

Spring is new and comes with singing!	In 30 And the wood unbinds her tresses at the
the spring the world takes birth:	wooing of fond showers:
In the spring birds mate: at spring-tide	For tomorrow Love's Queen Regent
all the loves join heart in mirth:	weaves her myrtle-trellis'd bowers,

Plaited green with leafy tendrils, underneath the sylvan shade:

For tomorrow reigns Dione,¹ high-thron'd, royally array'd!

Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow? 5
Thou shalt learn of love tomorrow!

'Tis the eve of that day's nuptials when primal Æther² wed:

For 'twas spring-tide when our Father all 10
the year from rain-clouds bred.

Down he rained upon Earth's bosom,
wooing thus his gentle wife,

Whereby, blent in one great body, gave he
to all seedlings life.

Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow?
Thou shalt love again tomorrow!

Then from blood-froth on his surface, in a ball of lambent foam,

All among his azure squadrons, where his two-foot horses roam,

Ocean fashion'd our Dione from the swelling surf-wave's womb.³

She herself, Creation's Sovereign, in- 25
wardly the mind and veins,

Instinct with her permeant spirit, by her secret strength constrains:

And through sky, through earth and ocean,
where her nether path is strown, 30

Hath she deep in nature's seed-track impress of her passage sown,

And hath bid the ways of child-birth to the whole wide world be known.

Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow? 35
Love will dawn for thee tomorrow!

Hers the hand that paints the season pur-
pling into gems of flower:

Her own impulse swells the bosom, tumid 40
by Favonius' ⁴ power,

Into burgeoning luxuriance. She herself, when airs of night

Have bequeathed to earth their moisture, strews the dew in starry light. 45

Lo! the tears of dew flash trembling with their downward drooping weight:

Yet each drop with tiny orbit checks awhile its headlong fate.

Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow?
Love will weep with thee tomorrow!

Lo! the flow'ry purple-jewels have betray'd their purity:

For that moisture, which the starlight rains from evening's tranquil sky,

Loos'd at dawn their virgin-bosoms from the mantle's humid red:

By Dione's will at dawning dewy virgin-roses wed —

Roses made of Paphia's ⁵ life-blood and the burning kiss of Love,

Made of gems, and made of fire-flames,
and the sun-light from above,

Will tomorrow yield the crimson, hidden by their fiery stole,

20 Unasham'd each to one husband, bound in bridal of the soul.

Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow?
Thine be love's pursuit tomorrow!

Lo! our Queen hath sent her damsels down
the myrtle groves to play:

Love's a-maying with the maidens; but,
if Love make holiday,

Why are arrows in his quiver? Who can trust him when so near? 30

Onward, maids! he yields his weapons!
Love's own holiday is here!

Love must come unarm'd as bidden, nude,
as bidden, must he go,

Lest perchance with bow, or arrow, or with fire he deal you woe.

Yet take heed, unwary maidens! Cupid is a pretty boy:

And when naked best accoutred, full equipp'd for your annoy.

Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow?
Thine be love's reward tomorrow!

With her own shy blushes Venus sendeth unto thee her maids:

One the boon we crave: Oh, hear us, virgin
born in Delos' glades! ⁶

⁶ Diana, goddess of chastity.

- Be the forest's verdure bloodless of the slaughter of the chase!
Let the flowers be fresh, where shadows of the greenwood interlace!
Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow?
Thou shalt meet with love tomorrow!
- Venus would herself entreat thee, could she bend thy chaste intent:
She herself would beg thy presence, could thy virgin soul assent.
Now for full three nights of revel, wand'ring through the sylvan bowers,
All amid the myrtle arbours, all amid the festal flowers,
Sister-throngs, bedeck'd with garlands,
hand-in-hand thou mightest see,
With them Ceres, with them Bacchus, and the God of Poësy.¹
Night must stop his hurrying foot-steps,
songs our vigil while away:
Reign, Dione, in the forest! Dian, abdicate thy sway!
Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow? Thou shalt love yet more tomorrow!
- Stands our Queen's divine tribunal dight with flowers from Hybla's lea!²
She herself will rule the sessions: by her sit the Graces three.³
Hybla, pour afield thy flowers, all the year brings in his train!
Hybla, don a flow'ry vesture, wide as Ætna's broad domain!
Hither hasten nymphs of country, hither
hasten nymphs of hill;
All that haunt the groves and woodland, or the bubbling fountain's rill, Hath wing'd Cupid's mother summon'd
as assessors to her Court, Hath she warn'd that Love, though naked,
sets a maiden's trust at naught.
Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow?
Love will cozen thee tomorrow!
- She herself made Troy's wayfarers and the Latin people one:⁴
She betroth'd the Laurens princess in espousal to her son,
Whence sprang Ramnes and Quirites, whence the ages will acclaim
Her, whom Romulus call'd mother, and his grandchild Cæsar's fame:
She betray'd to Mars the virgin, careless of the Vestal oath:
She herself made Sabine maidens plight
with men of Rome their troth.
Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow? Love will cherish thee tomorrow!
- Fields obey the touch of Venus, fecund
with voluptuous joy:
Ay, amid the fields ('tis rumour'd) Love
was born, Dione's boy:
Him, begotten on the glebeland, Venus
fondled at her breast, Foster'd him with dainty kisses that on roses' lips he press'd.
Know'st thou not love's joy and sorrow?
Thine be love's caress tomorrow!
- Lo! the kine their limbs are stretching 'neath the broom at lazy ease:
Each with each in bond connubial, safe
from rivalry, agrees.
With their mates beneath the shadow, see!
the bleating flocks at play:
And our Queen bids her wing'd warblers
carol still the silver lay.
Now the chatt'ring swans prate hoarsely o'er the waters of the mere,
While 'neath poplar shade the maiden's answer thrills in Tereus' ear,⁵ Such that in sweet music's cadence we might deem she told love's song, Nor could think to her fell husband she bemoan'd a sister's wrong.
Know'st thou well love's joy and sorrow?
Thine be love's revenge tomorrow!

In this same passage Venus is credited with having brought together Rhea Sylvia and the god Mars, parents of Romulus and Remus. Romulus, founder of Rome, was regarded as progenitor of Cæsar.

⁵ Reference is made here to the tale of Philomela, who was changed to a nightingale when she was being pursued by the cruel Tereus, who had grossly deceived her sister.

She is singing: I am silent. Will my So Amyclæ,¹ thro' its silence, found in

POETRY: PASTORAL

GREEK

THEOCRITUS

(3RD CENTURY B.C.)

Theocritus was born in Syracuse, the chief city of the island of Sicily, and was trained for his literary career at Alexandria. After finishing his education he secured the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Alexandria. Later he returned to Syracuse, where he lived and wrote under the protection of Hiero II.

The pastoral idylls (pictures) of Theocritus are, as far as we know, the beginning of bucolic and pastoral poetry. Over half of his little poems are dramatic pictures of country life in Sicily. They portray country life, however, as seen through the eyes of a city dweller and are inspired by a feeling characteristic of city dwellers in all ages, namely, the desire to get "back to nature." The form of Theocritus's idylls varies, but one of the commonest types is the pure literary lyric embedded in a rustic dialogue. Even in these earlier pastorals there is a hint of their later allegorical development.

The pastoral convention has had a long and interesting life. Bion, and especially Moschus, carried on the Theocritan tradition in Greek. After Vergil's Eclogues, with which it began its long career as a purely artificial literary form, it first emerged in the writings of Mantuan, a fifteenth-century Italian, who greatly admired Vergil. At about the same time it appeared in dramatic form in Politian's Favola di Orfeo (1483). The Arcadia, a long pastoral poem by the Italian Sannazaro, appeared in 1504. This poem, although not of high literary quality, set the style for subsequent non-dramatic pastorals. Tasso, in his Aminia (1573), more fully established the dramatic pastoral tradition. Following the influence of the Arcadia, we find the Portuguese Montemayor's Diana, Cervantes' Galatea, Sydney's Arcadia, and Lodge's Rosalind. The last important work in the tradition of the pastoral romance was the Astrée of the French writer d'Urfé (1610). Representative of the dramatic tradition are Guarini's Pastor Fido, Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess (1610), and Ben Jonson's Sad Shepherd (1637).

The lyrical pastorals clung much closer to the original tradition. Spenser, in the Shepherd's Calendar (1579), revived Theocritan simplicity; but his contemporaries seemed unable to shake off the grip of the pastoral romances. Among those writers in whose works the influence of Theocritus is undeniable we find Drayton, Browne, Wither, Davies, William Browne, Phineas Fletcher, Milton, Ambrose Philips, Pope, and Gay. But it would be impossible to attribute to any of them the genuineness and simplicity of the Theocritan pastoral. The eighteenth century warmly welcomed the pastoral as a literary form; but the only writer to approach the simple manner of Theocritus was Allan Ramsay, in his Gentle Shepherd (1725). With the arrival of the Age of Romanticism the urge to write about nature was too genuine and poignant to be entrusted to the frigid form of the pastoral. Shelley's Adonais, Wordsworth's Michael, and Arnold's Thyrsis, it is true, were all avowed pastorals; but even such notable exceptions as these do not alter the fact that the pastoral as a literary form was dead.

These selections are taken from The Idylls of Theocritus and the Eclogues of Virgil, translated by C. S. Calverly, London, G. Bell and Sons, 1913.

THE TRIUMPH OF DAPHNIS

- Daphnis, the gentle herdsman, met once,
as legend tells,
Menalcas making with his flock the circle of the fells.
Both chins were gilt with coming beards: 5
both lads could sing and play:
Menalcas glanced at Daphnis, and thus was heard to say: — “Art thou for singing, Daphnis, lord of the lowing kine? 10
I say my songs are better, by what thou wilt, than thine.”
Then in his turn spoke Daphnis, and thus he made reply:
“O shepherd of the fleecy flock, thou pip- 15
est clear and high;
But come what will, Menalcas, thou ne’er wilt sing as I.”
- MENALCAS
- This art thou fain to ascertain, and risk a bet with me?
- DAPHNIS
- This I full fain would ascertain, and risk a 25 bet with thee.
- MENALCAS
- But what, for champions such as we, would seem a fitting prize?
- DAPHNIS
- I stake a calf; stake thou a lamb, its mother’s self in size.
- MENALCAS
- A lamb I’ll venture never: for aye at close of day
Father and mother count the flock, and passing strict are they.
- DAPHNIS
- Then what shall be the victor’s fee? What wager wilt thou lay?
- MENALCAS
- A pipe discoursing through nine mouths I 45 made, full fair to view.
- The wax is white thereon, the line of this
and that edge true.
I’ll risk it: risk my father’s own is more than I dare do.
- DAPHNIS
- A pipe discoursing through nine mouths,
and fair, hath Daphnis too:
The wax is white thereon, the line of this
and that edge true.
But yesterday I made it: this finger feels the pain
Still, where indeed the rifted reed hath cut it clean in twain.
But who shall be our umpire? who listen to our strain?
- MENALCAS
- Suppose we hail yon goatherd; him at whose horned herd now 20
The dog is barking — yonder dog with white upon his brow.
- Then out they called; the goatherd marked them, and up came he;
Then out they sang; the goatherd their umpire fair would be.
To shrill Menalcas’ lot it fell to start the woodland lay:
30 Then Daphnis took it up. And thus Menalcas led the way.
- MENALCAS
- “Rivers and vales, a glorious birth! Oh, if Menalcas e’er
35 Piped aught of pleasant music in your ears:
Then pasture, nothing loth, his lambs:
and let young Daphnis fare
No worse, should he stray hither with his steers.”
- DAPHNIS
- “Pastures and rills, a bounteous race! If Daphnis sang you e’er
Such songs as ne’er from nightingale have flowed;

Then to his herd your fatness lend; and let Menalcas share
Like boon, should e'er he wend along this road."

MENALCAS

"'Tis spring, 'tis greenness everywhere;
with milk the udders teem,
And all things that are young have life
anew,
Where my sweet maiden wanders: but parched and withered seem,
When she departeth, lawn and shepherd
too."

DAPHNIS

"Fat are the sheep, the goats bear twins,
the hives are thronged with bees,
Rises the oak beyond his natural growth,
Where falls my darling's footstep: but hungeriness shall seize,
When she departeth, herd and herdsman both."

MENALCAS

"Come, ram, with thy blunt-muzzled kids and sleek wives at thy side, Where winds the brook by woodlands myriad-deep:
There is her haunt. Go, Stump-horn, tell her how Proteus¹ plied (A god) the shepherd's trade, with seals for sheep."

DAPHNIS

"I ask not gold, I ask not the broad lands
of a king;
I ask not to be fleeter than the breeze;
But 'neath this steep to watch my sheep,
feeding as one, and fling (Still clasping her) my carol o'er the seas."

MENALCAS

"Storms are the fruit-tree's bane; the brook's, a summer hot and dry;
The stag's a woven net, a gin the
dove's;
Mankind's a soft sweet maiden. Others have pined ere I: Zeus! Father! hadst not thou thy lady-loves?"

Thus far, in alternating strains, the lads
their woes rehearst:

Then each one gave a closing stave. Thus sang Menalcas first: —

5

MENALCAS

"Oh, spare, good wolf, my weanlings! their milky mothers spare!
Harm not the little lad that hath so many in his care!

What, Firefly, is thy sleep so deep? It ill
befits a hound,
Tending a boyish master's flock, to slumber
oversound.

And, wethers, of this tender grass take,
nothing coy, your fill:

So, when it comes, the after-math shall find you feeding still.

So! so! graze on, that ye be full, that not an udder fail:

Part of the milk shall rear the lambs, and part shall fill my pail."

Then Daphnis flung a carol out, as of a nightingale: —

DAPHNIS

"Me from her grot but yesterday a girl of haughty brow

Spied as I passed her with my kine, and said, 'How fair art thou!'

I vow that not one bitter word in answer
did I say,

But, looking ever on the ground, went silently my way.

The heifer's voice, the heifer's breath, are passing sweet to me;

And sweet is sleep by summer-brooks upon
the breezy lea:

As acorns are the green oak's pride, apples
the apple-bough's;

So the cow glorieth in her calf, the cowherd
in his cows."

Thus the two lads; then spoke the third, sitting his goats among:

GOATHERD

"O Daphnis, lovely is thy voice, thy music sweetly sung;

Such song is pleasanter to me than honey on my tongue.

¹ A shape-shifting divinity subsidiary to Poseidon, god of the ocean. His task was to herd the seals.

Accept this pipe, for thou hast won. And should there be some notes
 That thou couldst teach me, as I plod alongside with my goats,
 I'll give thee for thy schooling this ewe, that horns hath none:
 Day after day she'll fill the can, until the milk o'errun."
 Then how the one lad laughed and leaped and clapped his hands for glee!

A kid that bounds to meet its dam might dance as merrily.
 And how the other inly burned, struck down by his disgrace!
 A maid first parting from her home might wear as sad a face.
 Thenceforth was Daphnis champion of all the country side:
 And won, while yet in topmost youth, a Naiad¹ for his bride.

XI²

Methinks all nature hath no cure for Love,
 Plaster or unguent, Nicias, saving one;
 And this is light and pleasant to a man,
 Yet hard withal to compass — minstrelsy.
 As well thou wottest, being thyself a leech,
 And a prime favourite of those Sisters nine.³
 'Twas thus our giant lived a life of ease,
 Old Polyphemus, when, the down scarce seen
 On lip and chin, he wooed his ocean nymph:
 No curlypatèd rose-and-apple wooer,
 But a fell madman, blind to all but love.
 Oft from the green grass foldward fared his sheep
 Unbid: while he upon the windy beach,
 Singing his Galatea,⁴ sat and pined
 From dawn to dusk, an ulcer at his heart:
 Great Aphrodite's shaft had fixed it there.
 Yet found he that one cure: he sate him down
 On the tall cliff, and seaward looked, and sang: —
 "White Galatea, why disdain thy love?
 White as a pressed cheese, delicate as the lamb,
 Wild as the heifer, soft as summer grapes!
 If sweet sleep chain me, here thou walk'st at large;
 If sweet sleep loose me, straightway thou art gone,
 Scared like a sheep that sees a grey wolf near.

I loved thee, maiden, when thou cam'st long since,
 To pluck the hyacinth-blossom on the fell,
 Thou and thy mother, piloted by me.
 I saw thee, see thee still, from that day forth
 For ever; but 'tis naught, ay naught, to thee.
 I know, sweet maiden, why thou art so coy:
 Shaggy and huge, a single eyebrow spans
 From ear to ear my forehead, whence one eye
 Gleams, and an o'erbroad nostril tops my lip.
 Yet I, this monster, feed a thousand sheep
 That yield me sweetest draughts at milking-tide:
 In summer, autumn, or midwinter, still Fails not my cheese; my milkpail aye o'erflows.
 Then I can pipe as ne'er did Giant yet,
 Singing our loves — ours, honey, thine and mine —
 At dead of night: and hinds I rear eleven (Each with her fawn) and bear cubs four, for thee.
 Oh, come to me — thou shalt not rue the day —
 And let the mad seas beat against the shore!
 'Twere sweet to haunt my cave the live-long night:
 Laurel, and cypress tall, and ivy dun,

¹ A sea nymph.² Idyll XI: The Cyclops Polyphemus, about whom this poem is written, calls to mind the adventure of Ulysses in the Odyssey (q.v.).³ The nine Muses.⁴ A sea nymph.

And vines of sumptuous fruitage, all are there:
 And a cold spring that pine-clad Ætna¹ flings
 Down from the white snow's midst, a draught for gods!
 Who would not change for this the ocean-waves?

"But thou mislik'st my hair? Well, oaken logs
 Are here, and embers yet aglow with fire.
 Burn (if thou wilt) my heart out, and mine eye,
 Mine only eye wherein is my delight.
 Oh, why was I not born a finny thing,
 To float unto thy side and kiss thy hand,
 Denied thy lips — and bring thee lilies white
 And crimson-petalled poppies' dainty bloom!
 Nay — summer hath his flowers and autumn his;
 I could not bring all these the selfsame day.
 Lo, should some mariner hither oar his road,
 Sweet, he shall teach me straightway how to swim,
 That haply I may learn what bliss ye find
 In your sea-homes. O Galatea, come Forth from yon waves, and coming forth forget

(As I do, sitting here) to get thee home:
 And feed my flocks and milk them, nothing loth,
 And pour the rennet in to fix my cheese!
 "The blame's my mother's; she is false to me;
 Spake thee ne'er yet one sweet word for my sake,
 Though day by day she sees me pine and pine.
 I'll feign strange throbbings in my head and feet
 To anguish her — as I am anguished now."
 O Cyclops, Cyclops, where are flown thy wits?
 Go plait rush-baskets, lop the olive-boughs
 To feed thy lambkins — 'twere the shrewder part.
 Chase not the recreant, milk the willing ewe:
 The world hath Galateas fairer yet.

25 "— Many a fair damsel bids me sport with her
 The livelong night, and smiles if I give ear.
 On land at least I still am somebody."

Thus did the Giant feed his love on song,
 And gained more ease than can be bought with gold.

MOSCHUS

Moschus lived in Syracuse about 250 B.C. He was a pupil of Bion, whose death he laments here. It is probable that he was living on Italian soil when the following poem was composed. The poem, written ca. 225 B.C., illustrates the early tendency of pastoral writers to depart from the rusticity and simplicity of Theocritus. The poem is marked by greater ornament, by greater artificiality of form, and more extensive use of mythological references. It is, however, very sweet and graceful, and it seems to express a genuine feeling of grief.

This selection was translated by Leigh Hunt, in the Poetical Works of Leigh Hunt, Oxford University Press, 1923.

•ON THE DEATH OF BION

Moan with me, moan, ye woods and Dorian waters,
 And weep, ye rivers, the delightful Bion;
 Ye plants, now stand in tears; murmur, ye
 groves;
 Ye flowers, sigh forth your odours with sad buds;
 Flush deep, ye roses and anemones;
 And more than ever now, O hyacinth,
 show
 Your written sorrows¹: — the sweet singer's dead.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.²
 Ye nightingales, that mourn in the thick
 leaves,
 Tell the Sicilian streams of Arethuse,³ Bion the shepherd's dead; and that with
 him
 Melody's dead, and gone the Dorian song. 20

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
 Weep on the waters, ye Strymonian⁴ swans,
 And utter forth a melancholy song, Tender as his whose voice was like your
 own;
 And say to the Ægrian girls,⁵ and say
 To all the nymphs haunting in Bistony,⁶
 The Doric Orpheus is departed from us.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
 Apollo, Bion, wept thy sudden fate:

The Satyrs⁷ too, and the Priapuses⁸
 Dark-veiled, and for that song of thine the Pans,
 Groaned: and the fountain-nymphs within the woods
 Mourned for thee, melting into tearful waters;

Echo too mourned among the rocks that
 she Must hush, — and imitate thy lips no
 longer;
 The trees and flowers put off their loveli-
 ness;
 Milk flows not as 'twas used; and in the hive
 The honey moulders, — for there is no need,
 Now that thy honey's gone, to look for other.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
 Not so the dolphins mourned by the salt sea,⁹
 Not so the nightingale among the rocks,
 Not so the swallow over the far downs,
 Not so Ceyx calling for his Halcyone,¹⁰
 Not so in eastern valleys Memnon's bird¹¹ Screamed o'er his sepulchre for the Morning's son,
 30 As all have mourned for the departed Bion.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.

¹ According to a Greek legend, Hyacinth was a beautiful youth who was tragically killed. From his blood there sprang up the flower that bears his name and on the leaves were written the syllables ai, ai, an exclamation of pain or distress.

² Any reference to the Sicilian Muse after the time of Theocritus means that the writer intends to compose in the pastoral manner.

³ A fountain on the island of Ortygia near Syracuse, presided over by the nymph Arethusa, Muse of pastoral poetry.

⁴ Pertaining to the river Strymon in Macedonia, hence, Greek.

⁵ Another name for the Muses, derived from the name of Ægrus, father of Orpheus.

⁶ Probably a reference to certain women who engaged in the worship of Dionysus (Bacchus).

⁷ Deities of the woods and fields.

⁸ Priapus was a rustic divinity who presided over the fertility of crops and animals.

⁹ It was thought that dolphins uttered a cry similar to that of a human being in anguish.

¹⁰ See the story of Ceyx and Alcyone as told by Ovid in his Metamorphoses (pp. 274-282).

¹¹ Memnon was the son of Tithonus and Aurora. At his funeral two flocks of birds issued from the funeral pile and fought so fiercely that half of them fell down into the fire and were immolated with him.

Ye nightingales and swallows every one Whom he once charmed and taught to sing at will,
Plain to each other midst the green tree
boughs,
With other birds o'erhead. Mourn too,
ye doves.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
Who now shall play thy pipe, O most desired one?

Who lay his lip against thy reeds? who dare it?

For still they breathe of thee and of thy mouth,

And Echo comes to seek her voices there.
Pan's be they; and even he shall fear perhaps

To sound them, lest he be not first hereafter.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
And Galatea ¹ weeps, who loved to hear
thee,

Sitting beside thee on the calm sea-shore;
For thou did'st play far better than the ²⁵
Cyclops,

And him the fair one shunned: but thee,
but thee,

She used to look at sweetly from the water.
But now, forgetful of the deep, she sits ³⁰
On the lone sands, and feeds thy herd for thee.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
The Muse's gifts all died with thee, O ³⁵
shepherd,

Men's admiration, and sweet women's kisses.

The loves about thy sepulchre weep sadly,
For Venus loved thee, much more than the ⁴⁰
kiss

With which of late she kissed Adonis,² dying.

Thou too, O Meles,³ sweetest-voiced of rivers,

Thou too hast undergone a second grief;
For Homer first,⁴ that sweet mouth of

Was taken from thee; and they say thou mourned'st

For thy great son with many sobbing
streams,

¹⁰ Filling the far-seen ocean with a voice.

And now, again, thou weepest for a son,
Melting away in misery. Both of them
Were favourites of the fountain-nymphs;
one drank

Filled out of Arethuse; the former sang
The bright Tyndarid lass,⁷ and the great
son

Of Thetis,⁸ and Atreides Menelaus⁹;

²⁰ But he, the other, not of wars or tears
Told us, but intermixed the pipe he played With songs of herds, and as he sung he fed
them;

And he made pipes and milked the gentle heifer,

And taught us how to kiss, and cherished
love

Within his bosom, and was worthy of Venus.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
Every renowned city and every town
Mourns for thee, Bion: — Ascrea ¹⁰ weeps thee more

³⁵ Than her own Hesiod; the Boëtian
woods

Ask not for Pindar so; nor patriot Lesbos
For her Alcæus; not th' Ægean isle

Her poet; nor does Paros so wish back

Archilocus; and Mitylene now, Instead of Sappho's verses, rings with thine.

All the sweet pastoral poets, who of late

Carried such happy looks, are sad for thee, —
 Sicelidas the Samian, Lycidas
 With his sweet lip, and frank Theocritus,
 All in their several dialects: and I,
 I too, no stranger to the pastoral song,
 Sing thee a dirge Ausonian,¹ such as thou Taughtest thy scholars, honouring us as all Heirs of the Dorian muse. Thou didst bequeath
 Thy store to others, but to me thy song.

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
 Alas, when mallows in the garden die,
 Green parsley, or the crisp luxuriant dill, 15
 They live again, and flower another year;
 But we, how great soe'er, or strong, or wise,
 When once we die, sleep in the senseless
 earth
 A long, an endless, unawakeable sleep. 20
 Thou too in earth must be laid silently:
 But the nymphs please to let the frog sing
 on;
 Nor envy I, for what he sings is worthless. 25

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
 There came, O Bion, poison to thy mouth,
 Thou did'st feel poison; how could it approach

Those lips of thine, and be not turned to sweet!
 Who could be so delightless as to mix it,
 Or bid be mixed, and turn him from thy
 5 song!

Raise, raise the dirge, Muses of Sicily.
 But justice reaches all; — and thus,
 meanwhile,
 10 I weep thy fate. And would I could descend
 Like Orpheus² to the shades, or like Ulysses,²
 Or Hercules² before him; I would go 15 To Pluto's house, and see if you sang
 there,
 And hark to what you sang. Play to Proserpina³
 Something Sicilian, some delightful pas-20 toral,
 For she once played on the Sicilian shores,
 The shores of Etna, and sung Dorian songs.
 And so thou wouldst be honoured: and 25 as Orpheus,
 For his sweet harping, had his love again,
 She would restore thee to our mountains,
 Bion.
 Oh, had I but the power, I, I would do it.

LATIN

VERGIL

The Eclogues of Vergil are pastorals; that is, the author felt that in writing them he was, to some extent, following the tradition established by Theocritus. It will be observed that in the opening lines of this particular poem (written about 35 B.C.), he actually invokes the muses of pastoral poetry. The form is polished and sophisticated; yet the main theme is sincere. Vergil believed that the time had come for another Golden Age, and that a son who was soon to be born to Octavian was the person destined to carry out the measures that were to reform the world. It may be of interest to note that the wished-for son never arrived; the child turned out to be a girl, and that girl was the infamous Julia. The various details of the Golden Age as given by Vergil are traditional. For further comment on the Golden Age, see the notes on Ovid's Metamorphoses; on the pastoral tradition, see Theocritus, p. 262.

This poem was translated by R. S. Conway in Vergil's Messianic Eclogue, London, John Murray, 1907.

³ Daughter of Demeter, who was snatched away to Hades to be the wife of Pluto.

ECLOGUE IV

Muses to whom Sicilian shepherds sang,
Teach me a loftier strain. The hazel copse And lowly tamarisk will not always
please.

If still the wild free woodland note be
heard,
Our woodland song must suit a consul's
ear.

Lo, the last age of Cumæ's seer¹ has
come!

Again the great millennial æon dawns.
Once more the hallowed Maid appears, 15
once more

Kind Saturn² reigns, and from high heaven descends

The firstborn child of promise. Do but
thou,

Pure Goddess,³ by whose grace on infant
eyes

Daylight first breaks, smile softly on this babe;

The age of iron in his time shall cease
And golden generations fill the world.

E'en now thy brother, Lord of Light and Healing,

Apollo, rules and ends the older day.

Thy office, Pollio,⁴ thine, shall mark the year

Wherein this star begins his glorious
course.

Under thy banner all the stains of ill, 35
That shame us yet, shall melt away and break

The long, long night of universal dread.
For the child's birthright is the life of
gods,

Heroes and gods together he shall know,
And rule a world his sire has blessed with peace.

For thee, fair Child, the lavish 45
Earth shall spread

The earliest playthings, trailing ivy-wreaths

And foxgloves red and cups of water-
lilies,

5 And wild acanthus leaves with sunshine stored.

The goats shall come uncalled, weighed down with milk,

Nor lions' roar affright the labouring kine.
10 Thy very cradle, blossoming for joy,

Shall with soft buds caress thy baby face;
The treacherous snake and deadly herb shall die,

And Syrian spikenard blow on every bank.

But when thy boyish eyes begin to read Rome's ancient prowess and thy sire's great story,

Gaining the power to know what manhood
20 is,

Then, league by league, the plain without a sower

Shall ripen into waves of yellow corn;
On every wild-thorn purple grapes shall 25 cluster,

And stubborn oaks yield honey clear as dew.

But in men's hearts some lingering seed of ill

30 E'en yet shall bid them launch adventurous keels,

And brave the inviolate sea and wall their towns,

And cut earth's face with furrows. Then 35 behold

Another Tiphys⁵ take the helm and steer

Another Argo, manned by chosen souls
Seeking the golden, undiscovered East.

40 New wars shall rise, and Troy renewed shall see

Another great Achilles leap to land.

At last, when stronger years have made thee man,

The voyager will cease to vex the sea

¹ Vergil professes to base his belief in the coming of the Golden Age partly at least upon the utterances of the Cumæan Sybil.

² Ruler of the universe during the first Golden Age. He was deposed by his son, Zeus. See the introductory note of Æschylus's Prometheus Bound.

³ Lucina.

⁴ The person to whom the poem is dedicated. He was consul, and it was to him that Vergil owed the restoration of the lands which had been confiscated and reassigned to military veterans.

⁵ The pilot of the Argo. See the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, p. 40.

Nor ships of pinewood longer serve in traffic,
 For every fruit shall grow in every land.
 The field shall thrive unharrowed, vines unpruned,
 And stalwart ploughmen leave their oxen free.
 Wool shall not learn the dyer's cozening art,
 But in the meadow, on the ram's own back, 10 Nature will give new colours to the fleece,
 Soft blushing glow of crimson, gold of crocus,
 And lambs be clothed in scarlet as they feed.
 "Run, run, ye spindles! ¹ On to this fulfilment Speed the world's fortune, draw the living thread."
 So heaven's unshaken ordinance declaring 20
 The Sister Fates enthroned together sang.
 Come then, dear child of gods, Jove's mighty heir,
 Begin thy high career; the hour is sounding.
 See how it shakes the firmament,
 Earth and the spreading seas and depth of sky!
 See, in the dawning of a new creation
 5 The heart of all things living throbs with joy!
 Oh, if but life would bring me days enough
 And breath not all too scant to sing thy deeds,
 Not Thracian Orpheus ² should outdo the strain,
 Nor Linus, ³ though his mother aid the one,
 His sire the other, sweet Calliope
 And beautiful Apollo, Lord of Song.
 15 Nay, even Pan, ⁴ his own Arcadia judging,
 Should, by Arcadia's judgment, own defeat.
 Come, child, and greet thy mother with a smile!
 Ten weary waiting months her love has known.
 Come little Child! Whoso is born in sorrow
 Jove ne'er hath bidden join the immortal banquet, 25 Nor deathless Hebe ⁵ deigned to be his bride.

¹ This refers to the spinning of the thread of life by the Three Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos. One spins the thread, the second draws it out, and the third clips it.

² A famous mythical bard.

³ Son of Apollo, god of song, and Calliope, Muse of epic poetry. He was originally a person famous for the dirges sung over him. Later he came to be looked upon as a famous singer himself.

⁴ God of flocks and shepherds. He was credited with the invention of the syrinx, or shepherd's flute, and hence came to be regarded as a patron of pastoral song. He was born in Arcadia.

⁵ Goddess of youth, who filled the cups of the gods with nectar.

POETIC NARRATIVE

LATIN

OVID

(43 B.C.-17 or 18 A.D.)

Publius Ovidius Naso was the son of a noble Roman family in moderate circumstances. His early education, which was intended to fit him for a public career, consisted mainly of a careful training in rhetoric, though his natural inclination was more toward poetry. He was sent to Athens for the finishing touches, and here he became proficient in Greek. After a period of travel he returned to Rome. Although he held a few public offices, he was hindered by his naturally indolent disposition from distinguishing himself. He was three times married. Regarding the mistress, Corinna, who is celebrated in his lyrics, there has been much speculation, resulting in the final acceptance, at its face value, of Ovid's own statement that she was an imaginary character. In 1 A.D. Ovid was suddenly banished by imperial edict to Tomi, a remote district on the shores of the Euxine Sea. The usual supposition is that his banishment was a rebuke for his famous tract The Art of Love. Ovid did not bear up particularly well under his punishment. He spent much of his time composing laments upon his unfortunate condition, and letters of complaint to his friends in Rome. His literary performances are said to have delighted the citizens of Tomi. Ovid was never recalled to Rome. After spending eighteen years in exile, he died at the age of sixty.

Ovid's principal writings are: (1) the Amores, (2) the Heroides (ca. 10 B.C.), the imaginary correspondence of famous ladies abandoned by their lovers, (3) The Art of Love, a treatise on love-making, written in a half-jocular imitation of the scientific manner, (4) The Remedy of Love, another tract of a somewhat similar nature, explaining how to get over being in love, (5) the Metamorphoses (ca. 8 A.D.), and (6) the Fasti, a sort of poetical Roman calendar.

The most famous embodiment of Ovid's doctrines during the Middle Ages was the Roman de la Rose, part of which was translated from French into English by Chaucer. In the fourteenth century the story of Pyramus and Thisbe was borrowed from Ovid by Boccaccio and by Chaucer. It stands somewhat to the credit of the discernment of mediæval writers that they saw in Ovid not merely the licentious sybarite, but also the sage and the philosopher. He was frequently cited by Chaucer in his moral Tale of Melibæus; and numerous writers of distinctly ecclesiastical tendency chose to invoke him as an authority on ethical matters. Dante and Chaucer ranked him along with Vergil as one of the world's greatest poets. In fact, many are inclined to see in the Canterbury Tales a collection of serious and mocking narratives put together in much the same spirit as the Metamorphoses. During the Renaissance his fame continued with little abatement. Petrarch, although he censured Ovid severely for The Art of Love, was not too proud to take a hint from the Amores for his Trionfo d'Amore. Boccaccio shows his influence in a half-dozen of his most famous works. The epic writers of the Renaissance, Ariosto, Camoëns, and Spenser, as well as the moralists Erasmus and Montaigne, show a close acquaintance with Ovid. In succeeding periods, although he had to compete with an increasing number of classical writers rescued from the obscurity of the Dark Ages, he continued to be felt. Even such an austere personage as Milton admired him. Dryden translated him, and Congreve, Pope and Addison reflect his spirit unmistakably. With the Age of Romanticism the great popularity of Ovid as a literary model came to an end.

The Metamorphoses, a collection of legends that involve a metamorphosis, or transformation, derives largely from the Greek writers of the Alexandrian Age, and covers the period from the very beginning of things to the time of Julius Cæsar. The poem consists of separate episodes skillfully worked together to form a continuous whole. Many of the stories are distinguished for tenderness, sympathy, and a feeling of appreciation for devotion to moral law. The Meta- morphoses has served many generations of writers as a compendium of classical mythology. A Greek or Roman myth in almost any period from Ovid's time up to 1600 is very likely to have come, at least ultimately, from the Melamorphoses.

THE GOLDEN AGE

The Golden Age was first; when man, yet new, No rule but uncorrupted reason knew; And, with a native bent, did good pursue. Unforced by punishment, unawed by fear, His words were simple, and his soul sincere. Needless was written law, where none opprest; The law of man was written in his breast. No suppliant crowds before the judge appeared; No court erected yet, nor cause was heard; But all was safe, for conscience was their guard. The mountain trees in distant prospect please, Ere yet the pine descended to the seas; Ere sails were spread, new oceans to explore; And happy mortals, unconcerned for more, Confined their wishes to their native shore. No walls were yet, nor fence, nor moat, nor mound;	Nor drum was heard, nor trumpet's angry sound; Nor swords were forged; but, void of care and crime, 5 The soft creation slept away their time. The teeming earth, yet guiltless of the plough, And unprovoked, did fruitful stores allow: Content with food, which nature freely bred, On wildings and on strawberries they fed; Cornels and bramble-berries gave the rest, And falling acorns furnished out a feast. 15 The flowers, unsown, in fields and meadows reigned; And western winds immortal spring maintained. In following years the bearded corn ensued 20 From earth unasked, nor was that earth renewed. From veins of valleys milk and nectar broke, And honey sweating through the pores of oak.

THE SILVER AGE

But when good Saturn, banished from above, Was driven to hell, the world was under Jove. Succeeding times a Silver Age behold, Excelling brass, but more excelled by gold. Then Summer, Autumn, Winter did appear, And Spring was but a season of the year. The sun his annual course obliquely made. Good days contracted, and enlarged the bad.	Then air with sultry heats began to glow, The wings of winds were clogged with ice and snow; And shivering mortals, into houses driven, 30 Sought shelter from the inclemency of heaven. Those houses, then, were caves, or homely sheds, With twining osiers fenced, and moss their beds. 35 Then ploughs for seed the fruitful furrows broke, And oxen laboured first beneath the yoke.
---	---

THE BRAZEN AGE

To this next came in course the Brazen Age:	A warlike offspring prompt to bloody rage, 40 Not impious yet. —
--	--

THE IRON AGE

—Hard Steel succeeded then;
 And stubborn as the metal were the men.
 Truth, modesty, and shame, the world
 forsook;
 Fraud, avarice, and force, their places
 took.
 Then sails were spread to every wind that blew;
 Raw were the sailors, and the depths were
 new:
 Trees, rudely hollowed, did the waves
 sustain,
 Ere ships in triumph ploughed the watery
 plain.
 Then landmarks limited to each his right;
 For all before was common as the light.
 Nor was the ground alone required to
 bear
 Her annual income to the crooked share;
 But greedy mortals, rummaging her
 store,
 Dugged from her entrails first the precious ore;

Which next to hell the prudent gods had
 laid,
 And that alluring ill to sight displayed.
 Thus cursed Steel, and more accursed
 5 Gold,
 Gave mischief birth, and made that mischief bold;
 And double death did wretched man invade,
 10 By steel assaulted, and by gold betrayed.
 Now (brandished weapons glittering in their hands)
 Mankind is broken loose from moral
 bands:
 15 No rights of hospitality remain,
 The guest, by him who harboured him, is
 slain;
 The son-in-law pursues the father's life;
 The wife her husband murders, he the 20 wife;
 The step-dame poison for the son prepares;
 The son inquires into his father's years.
 Faith flies, and Piety in exile mourns:
 And Justice, here oppressed, to heaven
 25 returns.

CEYX AND ALCYONE

Ceyx, the son of Lucifer (the Morning Star), and King of Trachin, in Thessaly, was married to Alcyone, daughter to Æolus, god of the winds.
 Both the husband and the wife loved each other with an entire affection. Dædalion, the elder brother of Ceyx, whom he succeeded, having been turned into a falcon by Apollo, and Chione, Dædalion's daughter, slain by Diana, Ceyx prepares a ship to sail to Claros, there to consult the oracle of Apollo, and (as Ovid seems to in-timiate) to inquire how the anger of the Gods might be atoned.

These prodigies afflict the pious prince;
 But, more perplexed with those that happened since,
 He purposes to seek the Clarian God,
 Avoiding Delphos, his more famed abode;
 Since Phlegian robbers made unsafe the road.
 Yet could not he from her he loved so well,
 The fatal voyage he resolved, conceal;
 But when she saw her lord prepared to part,
 A deadly cold ran shivering to her heart;

Her faded cheeks are changed to waxen hue,
 And in her eyes the tears are ever new;
 She thrice essayed to speak; her accents
 30 hung,
 And, faltering, died unfinished on her
 tongue,
 Or vanished into sighs; with long delay
 Her voice returned; and found the wonted
 35 way.
 "Tell me, my lord," she said, "what fault unknown
 Thy once beloved Alcyone has done?
 Whither, ah whither is thy kindness gone!
 40 Can Ceyx then sustain to leave his wife,
 And unconcerned forsake the sweets of
 life?
 What can thy mind to this long journey
 move,
 45 Or need'st thou absence to renew thy
 love?
 Yet, if thou goest by land, though grief possess

My soul even then, my fears will be the less.
But ah! be warned to shun the watery
way,
The face is frightful of the stormy sea.
For late I saw adrift disjointed planks,
And empty tombs erected on the banks.
Nor let false hopes to trust betray thy
mind,
Because my sire in caves constrains the wind,
Can with a breath their clamorous rage
appease,
They fear his whistle, and forsake the seas:
Not so; for, once indulged, they sweep the
main,
Deaf to the call, or, hearing, hear in vain;
But bent on mischief, bear the waves
before,
And, not content with seas, insult the
shore;
When ocean, air, and earth, at once engage,
And rooted forests fly before their rage;
At once the clashing clouds to battle move,
And lightnings run across the fields above:
I know them well, and marked their rude
comport,
While yet a child, within my father's
court;
In times of tempest they command alone,
And he but sits precarious on the throne;
The more I know, the more my fears aug-
ment,
And fears are oft prophetic of the event.
But if not fears, or reasons will prevail,
If fate has fixed thee obstinate to sail,
Go not without thy wife, but let me bear
My part of danger with an equal share,
And present what I suffer only fear;
Then o'er the bounding billows shall we
fly,
Secure to live together, or to die."
These reasons moved her starlike husband's heart,
But still he held his purpose to depart;
For as he loved her equal to his life,
He would not to the seas expose his wife;
Nor could be wrought his voyage to refrain,
But sought by arguments to soothe her
pain:

Nor these availed; at length he lights on
one,
With which so difficult a cause he won: —
"My love, so short an absence cease to
fear,
For, by my father's holy flame I swear,
Before two moons their orb with light
adorn,
If heaven allow me life, I will return."
This promise of so short a stay prevails;
He soon equips the ship, supplies the sails,
And gives the word to launch; she trembling views
This pomp of death, and parting tears
renews;
Last, with a kiss, she took a long farewell,
Sighed, with a sad presage, and swooning
fell.
While Ceyx seeks delays, the lusty crew,
Raised on their banks, their oars in order
drew
To their broad breasts, — the ship with fury flew.
The queen, recovered, rears her humid
eyes,
And first her husband on the poop espies,
Shaking his hand at distance on the main;
She took the sign, and shook her hand
again.
Still as the ground recedes, retracts her
view
With sharpened sight, till she no longer knew
The much-loved face; that comfort lost, supplies
With less, and with the galley feeds her
eyes;
The galley borne from view by rising
gales,
She followed with her sight the flying sails;
When even the flying sails were seen no
more,
Forsaken of all sight, she left the shore.
Then on her bridal bed her body throws,
And sought in sleep her wearied eyes to close;
Her husband's pillow, and the widowed
part Which once he pressed, renewed the former smart.
And now a breeze from shore began to
blow;

¹ Ceyx was son of Lucifer, the morning star.

The sailors ship their oars, and cease to row;
 Then hoist their yards atrip, and all their sails
 Let fall, to court the wind, and catch the 5
 gales.
 By this the vessel half her course had
 run,
 And as much rested till the rising sun;
 Both shores were lost to sight, when at 10
 the close
 Of day, a stiffer gale at east arose;
 The sea grew white, the rolling waves
 from far,
 Like heralds, first denounce the watery 15
 war.
 This seen, the master soon began to cry,
 "Strike, strike the top-sail; let the main sheet fly,
 And furl your sails." The winds repel the 20
 sound,
 And in the speaker's mouth the speech is drowned.
 Yet of their own accord, as danger taught,
 Each in his way, officiously they wrought; 25
 Some stow their oars, or stop the leaky
 sides;
 Another, bolder yet, the yard bestrides,
 And folds the sails; a fourth, with labour,
 laves 30
 The intruding seas, and waves ejects on waves.
 In this confusion while their work they
 ply,
 The winds augment the winter of the sky, 35
 And wage intestine wars; the suffering
 seas
 Are tossed, and mingled as their tyrants
 please.
 The master would command, but, in de- 40
 spair
 Of safety, stands amazed with stupid care,
 Nor what to bid, or what forbid, he knows,
 The ungoverned tempest to such fury
 grows;
 Vain is his force, and vainer is his skill,
 With such a concourse comes the flood of
 ill;
 The cries of men are mixed with rattling
 shrouds;
 Seas dash on seas, and clouds encounter
 clouds;

At once from east to west, from pole to pole,
 The forky lightnings flash, the roaring thunders roll.
 Now waves on waves ascending scale
 the skies,
 And, in the fires, above the water fries;
 When yellow sands are sifted from below,
 The glittering billows give a golden show;
 And when the fouler bottom spews the black,
 The Stygian dye ¹ the tainted waters take;
 Then frothy white appear the flattened seas,
 And change their colour, changing their disease.
 Like various fits the Trachin vessel finds,
 And now sublime she rides upon the winds;
 As from a lofty summit looks from high,
 And from the clouds beholds the nether
 sky;
 Now from the depth of hell they lift their
 sight,
 And at a distance see superior light;
 The lashing billows make a loud report,
 And beat her sides, as battering rams a fort;
 Or as a lion, bounding in his way,
 With force augmented bears against his
 prey,
 Sidelong to seize; or, unappalled with
 fear, 30
 Springs on the toils, and rushes on the
 spear;
 So seas impelled by winds, with added
 power,
 Assault the sides, and o'er the hatches tower.
 The planks, their pitchy coverings
 washed away,
 Now yield; and now a yawning breach
 display;
 The roaring waters with a hostile tide
 Rush through the ruins of her gaping side.
 Meantime, in sheets of rain the sky descends,
 45 And ocean, swelled with waters, upwards tends,
 One rising, falling one; the heavens and
 sea
 Meet at their confines, in the middle way;
 50 The sails are drunk with showers, and drop with rain,
 Sweet waters mingle with the briny main.

No star appears to lend his friendly light;
 Darkness and tempest make a double
 night;
 But flashing fires disclose the deep by turns,
 And, while the lightnings blaze, the water
 burns.
 Now all the waves their scattered force unite;
 And, as a soldier, foremost in the fight, 10
 Makes way for others, and, an host alone, Still presses on, and, urging, gains the
 town;
 So while the invading billows come abreast,
 The hero tenth,¹ advanced before the rest, 15
 Sweeps all before him with impetuous
 sway,
 And from the walls descends upon the
 prey;
 Part following enter, part remain without, 20
 With envy hear their fellows' conquering shout,
 And mount on others' backs, in hope to share
 The city, thus become the seat of war. 25
 An universal cry resounds aloud,
 The sailors run in heaps, a helpless crowd;
 Art fails, and courage falls, no succour
 near;
 As many waves, as many deaths appear. 30
 One weeps, and yet despairs of late relief;
 One cannot weep, his fears congeal his
 grief;
 But, stupid, with dry eyes expects his fate.
 One with loud shrieks laments his lost 35
 estate,
 And calls those happy whom their funerals wait.
 This wretch with prayers and vows the gods implores,
 And even the skies he cannot see, adores.
 That other on his friends his thoughts
 bestows,
 His careful father, and his faithful spouse.
 The covetous worldling in his anxious 45
 mind
 Thinks only on the wealth he left behind.
 All Ceyx his Alcyone employs,
 For her he grieves, yet in her absence joys;

His wife he wishes, and would still be near,
 Not her with him, but wishes him with her:
 Now with last looks he seeks his native
 shore,
 5 Which fate has destined him to see no
 more;
 He sought, but in the dark tempestuous
 night
 He knew not whither to direct his sight.
 So whirl the seas, such darkness blinds 10
 the sky,
 That the black night receives a deeper dye.
 The giddy ship ran round; the tempest
 tore 15 Her mast, and over-board the rudder
 bore.
 One billow mounts; and with a scornful
 brow,
 Proud of her conquest gained, insults the waves below;
 Nor lighter falls, than if some giant tore Pindus² and Athos,² with the freight they
 bore,
 And tossed on seas; pressed with the ponderous blow,
 Down sinks the ship within the abyss be-
 low;
 Down with the vessel sink into the main
 The many, never more to rise again.
 30 Some few on scattered planks with fruitless
 care
 Lay hold, and swim; but, while they swim,
 despair.
 Even he, who late a sceptre did command,
 Now grasps a floating fragment in his
 hand;
 And while he struggles on the stormy
 main,
 40 Invokes his father, and his wife, in vain:
 But yet his consort is his greatest care;
 Alcyone he names amidst his prayer;
 Names as a charm against the waves and
 wind,
 Most in his mouth, and ever in his mind.
 Tired with his toil, all hopes of safety past,
 From prayers to wishes he descends at last, —
 That his dead body, wafted to the sands,

¹ The Latin word is decumanus, meaning "tenth" of any sort, but so frequently applied to the tenth cohort of a legion that when used alone it came to have a military association. Compare the American use of the word "second" as applied to second baseman.

Might have its burial from her friendly
 hands.
 As oft as he can catch a gulp of air,
 And peep above the seas, he names the
 fair;
 And, even when plunged beneath, on her
 he raves,
 Murmuring Alcyone below the waves:
 At last a falling billow stops his breath,
 Breaks o'er his head, and whelms him 10 underneath.
 Bright Lucifer unlike himself appears That night, his heavenly form obscured
 with tears;
 And since he was forbid to leave the skies, 15
 He muffled with a cloud his mournful eyes.
 Meantime Alcyone (his fate unknown)
 Computes how many nights he had been
 gone;
 Observes the waning moon with hourly 20
 view,
 Numbers her age, and wishes for a new;
 Against the promised time provides with
 care,
 And hastens in the woof the robes he was 25
 to wear;
 And for herself employs another loom,
 New-dressed to meet her lord returning
 home,
 Flattering her heart with joys that never 30
 were to come.
 She fumed the temples with an odorous
 flame,
 And oft before the sacred altars came,
 To pray for him, who was an empty name; 35
 All powers implored, but far above the
 rest,
 To Juno she her pious vows addressed,
 Her much-loved lord from perils to protect,
 And safe o'er seas his voyage to direct; 40
 Then prayed that she might still possess
 his heart,
 And no pretending rival share a part.
 This last petition heard, of all her prayer;
 The rest, dispersed by winds, were lost in 45
 air.
 But she, the goddess of the nuptial bed,
 Tired with her vain devotions for the dead,
 Resolved the tainted hand should be repelled,

Which incense offered, and her altar held:
 Then Iris¹ thus bespoke, — "Thou faithful maid,
 By whom the queen's commands are well conveyed, 5
 Haste to the house of Sleep, and bid the
 god,
 Who rules the night by visions with a nod,
 Prepare a dream, in figure and in form
 Resembling him who perished in the storm:
 This form before Alcyone present,
 To make her certain of the sad event."
 Endued with robes of various hue she
 flies,
 And flying draws an arch, a segment of
 the skies;
 Then leaves her bending bow, and from the steep
 Descends to search the silent house of Sleep.
 Near the Cimmerians,² in his dark abode,
 Deep in a cavern, dwells the drowsy god;
 Whose gloomy mansion nor the rising sun,
 Nor setting, visits, nor the lightsome
 noon;
 But lazy vapours round the region fly,
 Perpetual twilight, and a doubtful sky;
 No crowing cock does there his wings
 display,
 Nor with his horny bill provoke the day;
 Nor watchful dogs, nor the more wakeful
 geese,
 Disturb with nightly noise the sacred
 peace;
 Nor beast of nature, nor the tame, are nigh,
 Nor trees with tempests rocked, nor human cry;
 But safe repose, without an air of breath,
 Dwells here, and a dumb quiet next to
 death.
 An arm of Lethe,³ with a gentle flow,
 Arising upwards from the rock below,
 The palace moats, and o'er the pebbles
 creeps,
 And with soft murmurs calls the coming sleeps;
 Around its entry nodding poppies grow,
 And all cool simples that sweet rest bestow; 50

² A mythical people dwelling on the far-off western seas, surrounded by perpetual darkness.

³ The river of the lower world whose waters induced forgetfulness.

Night from the plants their sleepy virtue drains,
And passing sheds it on the silent plains:
No door there was the unguarded house
to keep,
On creaking hinges turned, to break his sleep.

But in the gloomy court was raised a bed,
Stuffed with black plumes, and on an ebon 10
stead;

Black was the covering too, where lay
the god,
And slept supine, his limbs displayed
abroad;

About his head fantastic visions fly,
Which various images of things supply,
And mock their forms; the leaves on trees
not more,
Nor bearded ears in fields, nor sands upon 20
the shore.

The virgin, entering bright, indulged
the day

To the brown cave, and brushed the dreams away;

The god, disturbed with this new glare of
light

Cast sudden on his face, unsealed his sight,
And raised his tardy head, which sunk
again,

And, sinking on his bosom, knocked his chin;

At length shook off himself, and asked the dame

(And asking yawned), for what intent she 35
came?

To whom the goddess thus: — "O
sacred Rest,

Sweet pleasing Sleep, of all the powers the best!

O peace of mind, repairer of decay, Whose balms renew the limbs to labours of
the day,

Care shuns thy soft approach, and sullen
flies away!

Adorn a dream, expressing human form,
The shape of him who suffered in the storm,

And send it flitting to the Trachin¹ court,
The wreck of wretched Ceyx to report:

Before his queen bid the pale spectre
stand,

Who begs a vain relief at Juno's hand."
She said, and scarce awake her eyes could keep,

Unable to support the fumes of sleep;
5 But fled, returning by the way she went,
And swerved along her bow with swift ascent.

The god, uneasy till he slept again,
Resolved at once to rid himself of pain;
And, though against his custom, called
aloud,

Exciting Morpheus from the sleepy crowd;
Morpheus, of all his numerous train, expressed

15 The shape of man, and imitated best;
The walk, the words, the gesture could
supply,

The habit mimic, and the mien belie;
Plays well, but all his action is confined;
Extending not beyond our human kind.

Another birds, and beasts, and dragons,
apes,

And dreadful images, and monster shapes:
This dæmon, Icelos, in heaven's high hall

25 The gods have named; but men Phobetor
call:

A third is Phantasus, whose actions roll
On meaner thoughts, and things devoid of
soul;

30 Earth, fruits, and flowers, he represents in dreams,

And solid rocks unmoved, and running
streams.

These three to kings and chiefs their scenes
display,

The rest before the ignoble commons play:
Of these the chosen Morpheus is dispatched;

Which done, the lazy monarch over-watched,

40 Down from his propping elbow drops his
head,

Dissolved in sleep, and shrinks within his bed.

45 Darkling the dæmon glides, for flight
prepared,

So soft that scarce his fanning wings are heard.

To Trachin, swift as thought, the flitting
shade

Through air his momentary journey made:
Then lays aside the steerage of his wings,

¹ Trachis was a town of Thessaly celebrated as the residence of Hercules for a time.

Forsakes his proper form, assumes the king's;
 And pale as death, despoiled of his array,
 Into the queen's apartment takes his way,
 And stands before the bed at dawn of day: 5
 Unmoved his eyes, and wet his beard
 appears,
 And shedding vain, but seeming real tears;
 The briny water dropping from his hairs;
 Then staring on her, with a ghastly look 10
 And hollow voice, he thus the queen bespoke:
 "Knowest thou not me? Not yet, unhappy wife?
 Or are my features perished with my life? 15
 Look once again, and for thy husband lost, Lo! all that's left of him, thy husband's ghost!
 Thy vows for my return were all in vain;
 The stormy south o'ertook us in the main; 20
 And never shalt thou see thy loving lord
 again.
 Bear witness, heaven, I called on thee in
 death,
 And, while I called, a billow stopped my 25
 breath.
 Think not that flying fame reports my
 fate;
 I, present I, appear, and my own wreck
 relate.
 Rise, wretched widow, rise, nor undeplord
 Permit my ghost to pass the Stygian ford;
 But rise, prepared in black to mourn thy perished lord."
 Thus said the player god; and, adding 35
 art
 Of voice and gesture, so performed his part,
 She thought (so like her love the shade
 appears)
 That Ceyx spake the words, and Ceyx shed the tears.
 She groaned, her inward soul with grief
 oppress,
 She sighed, she wept, and sleeping beat 45
 her breast:
 Then stretched her arms to embrace his body bare,
 Her clasping arms inclose but empty air:
 At this, not yet awake, she cried, "Oh, stay, 50
 One is our fate, and common is our way!"
 So dreadful was the dream, so loud she
 spoke,
 That, starting sudden up, the slumber broke;
 Then cast her eyes around, in hope to
 view
 Her vanished lord, and find the vision true; 5
 For now the maids, who waited her commands,
 Ran in with lighted tapers in their hands.
 Tired with the search, not finding what she seeks,
 With cruel blows she pounds her blubbered
 cheeks;
 Then from her beaten breast the linen
 tare,
 And cut the golden caul that bound her
 hair.
 Her nurse demands the cause; with louder
 cries
 She prosecutes her griefs, and thus replies:
 "No more Alcyone, she suffered death
 With her loved lord, when Ceyx lost his
 breath:
 No flattery, no false comfort, give me
 none,
 My shipwrecked Ceyx is for ever gone;
 I saw, I saw him manifest in view,
 His voice, his figure, and his gestures knew:
 His lustre lost, and every living grace,
 Yet I retained the features of his face:
 30 Though with pale cheeks, wet beard, and dropping hair,
 None but my Ceyx could appear so fair;
 I would have strained him with a strict
 embrace,
 But through my arms he slipt, and vanished from the place;
 There, even just there he stood"; — and as she spoke,
 Where last the spectre was, she cast her look; 40
 Fain would she hope, and gazed upon the
 ground,
 If any printed footsteps might be found;
 Then sighed, and said — "This I too well
 foreknew,
 And my prophetic fear presaged too true;
 'Twas what I begged, when with a bleeding
 heart
 I took my leave, and suffered thee to part,
 Or I to go along, or thou to stay,
 Never, ah never to divide our way!
 Happier for me, that, all our hours assigned,

Together we had lived, even not in death
disjoined!

So had my Ceyx still been living here,
Or with my Ceyx I had perished there;
Now I die absent, in the vast profound,
And me without myself the seas have
drowned:

The storms were not so cruel; should I strive

To lengthen life, and such a grief survive! 10

But neither will I strive, nor wretched thee
In death forsake, but keep thee company.
If not one common sepulchre contains
Our bodies, or one urn our last remains,
Yet Ceyx and Alcyone shall join,
Their names remembered in one common line."

No further voice her mighty grief affords,
For sighs come rushing in betwixt her 20
words,

And stopt her tongue; but what her tongue denied,

Soft tears, and groans, and dumb complaints supplied. 25

'Twas morning; to the port she takes her
way,

And stands upon the margin of the sea;
That place, that very spot of ground she
sought,

Or thither by her destiny was brought,
Where last he stood; and while she sadly
said,

"'Twas here he left me, lingering here, delayed

His parting kiss, and there his anchors weighed."

Thus speaking, while her thoughts past actions trace,

And call to mind, admonished by the 40
place,

Sharp at her utmost ken she cast her eyes,
And somewhat floating from afar descries;

It seemed a corpse adrift, to distant sight,
But at a distance who could judge aright? 45

It wafted nearer yet, and then she knew,
That what before she but surmised was
true;

A corpse it was, but whose it was, unknown,

Yet moved, howe'er, she made the case her
own;

Took the bad omen of a shipwrecked man,

As for a stranger wept, and thus began:

"Poor wretch, on stormy seas to lose thy life,

Unhappy thou, but more thy widowed
wife!" 5

At this she paused; for now the flowing tide

Had brought the body nearer to the side:
The more she looks, the more her fears increase

At nearer sight, and she's herself the less:
Now driven ashore, and at her feet it lies;
She knows too much, in knowing whom she sees, —

15 Her husband's corpse; at this she loudly
shrieks,

"'Tis he, 'tis he," she cries, and tears her
cheeks,

Her hair, her vest; and, stooping to the sands,

About his neck she casts her trembling
hands.

"And is it thus, O dearer than my life, Thus, thus return'st thou to thy longing
wife!" 25

She said, and to the neighbouring mole she strode,

Raised there to break the incursions of the flood;

30 Headlong from hence to plunge herself she springs,

But shoots along supported on her wings;
A bird new-made about the banks she
plies,

35 Not far from shore, and short excursions
tries;

Nor seeks in air her humble flight to raise,
Content to skim the surface of the seas;

Her bill, though slender, sends a creaking noise,

And imitates a lamentable voice;
Now lighting where the bloodless body
lies,

She with a funeral note renews her cries.

45 At all her stretch her little wings she
spread,

And with her feathered arms embraced
the dead;

Then flickering to his pallid lips, she strove
50 To print a kiss, the last essay of love;

Whether the vital touch revived the dead,
Or that the moving waters raised his head,

To meet the kiss, the vulgar doubt alone,

For sure a present miracle was shown.
The gods their shapes to winter-birds translate,
But both obnoxious to their former fate.
Their conjugal affection still is tied,
And still the mournful race is multiplied;
They bill, they tread; Alcyone com-
 pressed,

Seven days sits brooding on her floating nest,
A wintry queen: her sire at length is kind,
Calms every storm, and hushes every
5 wind;
Prepares his empire for his daughter's
 ease,
And for his hatching nephews smooths the seas.

SATIRE

GREEK

Satire, as nearly as we can tell, began in ancient Greece in the form of more or less spontaneous and boisterous criticisms of personal defects. Its entry into formal literature seems to have been effected through its association with popular religious festivals, one feature of which consisted of jibes at members of the community. The satire seems to have retained its personal quality even in the hands of the famous Archilocus (ca. 700 B.C.), who established its metrical form in iambic trimeter. The early development in Italy was parallel to that in Greece, and the connection of satire with the coarse pleasantry of harvest and vintage festivals seems to have given it its name, i.e. satura, a miscellany or mixture. The first writer of modern satire was Lucilius (147-103 B.C.), who served as model for Horace, Persius, and others. In the hands of Juvenal the satire becomes definitely rhetorical. Satire as a literary influence rather than a form covers too broad a field to be considered here, for it turns up in drama, epic, lyric, novel, and every other conceivable type of literature. The kind that can be most justifiably compared with Juvenal's is that which satirizes directly, not by implication. Juvenal's closest literary successors are such writers as Dryden, Pope, Defoe, Swift, and Hogarth.

LUCIAN

Lucian was born about 120 A.D. at Samosata in Syria. Despite his humble birth he managed to prepare himself to become an advocate. For a time he practised in Antioch; but before long he started upon a wandering career as a rhetorician, in which capacity he chiefly occupied himself with the preparation of speeches for other people to deliver. Although he made no claim to distinction as a philosopher, he achieved fame as an ironically destructive critic of ambitious philosophical systems. The bulk of his work is devoted to exposing sham and superstition.

Lucian's A True History (ca. 150 A.D.) is a satire on the mad tales with which voyagers were wont to embellish the accounts of their travels. Employing the form of the burlesque travelogue, he not only ridicules the popular superstitions regarding unknown lands beyond the waves, but also takes a sly dig now and then at his favorite victims, the philosophers. The Happy Isles, to which reference is made, were the islands where, according to an ancient tradition, the heroes of the world assembled, after their exploits were finished, to live in perpetual happiness. A True History is an early ancestor of Swift's Gulliver's Travels. Among the many other writings attributed to Lucian the Dialogues of the Gods and the Dialogues of the Dead are especially memorable.

The translation is that of A. M. Harmon, A True Story, New York, The Macmillan Company.

A TRUE STORY

In a little while many islands came in sight. Near us, to port, was Cork, where the men were going, a city built on a great round cork. At a distance and more to starboard were five islands, very large and high, from which much fire was blazing up. Dead ahead was one that was flat and low-lying, not less than five hundred furlongs off. When at length we were near it, a wonderful breeze blew about us, sweet and fragrant, like the one that, on the word of the historian Herodotus, breathes perfume from Araby the blest. The sweetness that met us was as if it came from roses and narcissi and hyacinths and lilies and violets, from myrrh and laurel and vines in bloom. Delighted with the fragrance and cherishing high hopes after our long toils, we gradually drew near to the island at last. Then we saw many harbors all about it, large, and unfretted by beating waves; transparent rivers emptying softly into the sea; mead, too, and woods and song-birds, some of them singing on the shore and many in the branches. A rare, pure atmosphere enfolded the place, and sweet breezes with their blowing stirred the woods gently, so that from the moving branches came a whisper of delightful, unbroken music, like the fluting of Pandean pipes in desert places. Moreover, a confused sound could be heard incessantly, which was not noisy but resembled that made at a drinking party, when some are playing, others singing and others beating time to the flute or the lyre. Enchanted with all this, we put in, anchored our boat and landed, leaving Scinthus and two of my comrades on board. Advancing through a flowery mead, we came upon the guards and sentinels, who bound us with rosy wreaths — the strongest fetter that they have — and led us inland to their ruler. They told us on the way that the island was the one that is called the Isle of the Blest, and that the ruler was the Cretan Rhadamanthus. On being brought before him we were given fourth place among the people awaiting trial. The first case was that of Ajax, son of Telamon, to decide whether he should be allowed to associate with the heroes or not: he was accused of having gone mad and killed himself. At last, when much had been said, Rhadamanthus gave judgment that for the present, after taking a dose of hellebore,¹ he should be given in charge of Hippocrates,² the Coan physician, and that later on, when he had recovered his wits, he should have a place at the table of the heroes. The second case was a love-affair — Theseus and Menelaus at law over Helen, to determine which of the two she should live with. Rhadamanthus pronounced that she should live with Menelaus, because he had undergone so much toil and danger on account of his marriage: then too Theseus had other wives, the Amazon³ and the daughters of Minos.⁴ Then their judgment was given in a matter of precedence between Alexander, son of Philip, and Hannibal of Carthage, and the decision was that Alexander outranked Hannibal, so his chair was placed next the elder Cyrus of Persia. We were brought up fourth; and he asked us how it was that we trod on holy ground while still alive, and we told him the whole story. Then he had us removed, pondered for a long time, and consulted with his associates about us. Among many other associates he had Aristides⁵ the Just, of Athens. When he had come to a conclusion, sentence was given that for being inquisitive and not staying at home we should be tried after death, but that for the present we might stop a definite time in the island and share the life of the heroes, and then we must be off. They set the length of our stay at not more than seven months.

Thereupon our garlands fell away of themselves, and we were set free and taken into the city and to the table of the blessed. The city itself is all of gold and the wall around it of emerald. It has seven gates, all of single planks of cinnamon. The foundations of the city and the ground within the walls are ivory. There are temples of all the gods, built of beryl, and in them great monolithic altars of amethyst, on which they make their great burnt-offerings. Around the city runs a river of the finest myrrh, a hundred royal cubits wide and five deep, so that one can swim in it comfortably. For baths they have large houses of glass, warmed by burning cinnamon; instead of water there is hot dew in the tubs. For clothing they use delicate purple spider-webs. As for themselves, they have no bodies, but are intangible and fleshless, with only shape and figure. Incorporeal as they are, they nevertheless live and move and think and talk. In a word, it would appear that their naked souls go about in the semblance of their bodies. Really, if one did not touch them, he could not tell that what he saw was not a body, for they are like upright shadows, only not black. Nobody grows old, but stays the same age as on coming there. Again, it is neither night among them nor yet very bright day, but the light which is on the country is like the gray morning toward dawn, when the sun has not yet risen. Moreover, they are acquainted with only one season of the year, for it is always spring there and the only wind that blows there is Zephyr. The country abounds in flowers and plants of all kinds, cultivated and otherwise. The grape-vines yield twelve vintages a year, bearing every month; the pomegranates, apples and other fruit-trees were said to bear thirteen times a year, for in one month, their Minoan, they bear twice. Instead of wheat-ears, loaves of bread all baked grow on the tops of the palms, so that they look like mushrooms. In the neighborhood of the city there are three hundred and sixty-five springs of water, as many of honey, five hundred of myrrh — much smaller, however — seven rivers of milk and eight of wine.

Their table is spread outside the city in the Elysian Fields, a very beautiful mead with thick woods of all sorts around it, overshadowing the feasters. The couches they lie on are made of flowers, and they are attended and served by the winds, who, however, do not pour out their wine, for they do not need anyone to do this. There are great trees of the clearest glass around the table, and instead of fruit they bear cups of all shapes and sizes. When any one comes to the table he picks one or two of the cups and puts them at his place. These fill with wine at once, and that is the way they get their drink. Instead of garlands, the nightingales and the other song-birds gather flowers in their bills from the fields hard by and drop them down like snow, flying overhead and singing. Furthermore, the way they are scented is that thick clouds draw up myrrh from the springs and the river, stand over the table and under the gentle manipulation of the winds rain down a delicate dew. At the board they pass their time in poetry and song. For the most part they sing the epics of Homer, who is there himself and shares the revelry, lying at table in the place above Odysseus. Their choruses are of boys and girls, led and accompanied by Eunomus of Locris, Arion of Lesbos, Anacreon and Stesichorus.¹ There can be no doubt about the latter, for I saw him there — by that time Helen had forgiven him. When they stop singing another chorus appears, composed of swans, swallows and nightingales, and as they sing the whole wood renders the accompaniment, with the winds leading. But the greatest thing that they have for ensuring a good time is that two springs are by the table, one of laughter and the other of enjoyment. They all drink from each of these when the revels begin, and thenceforth enjoy themselves and laugh all the while.

* * *

They render especial honors to Achilles and after him to Theseus. About love-making their attitude is such that they all bill-and-coo openly, in plain sight of everyone, without any discrimination, and think no shame of it at all. Socrates, the only exception, used to protest that he was above suspicion in relations with young persons, but everyone held him guilty of perjury. . . . They all have their wives in common and nobody is jealous of his neighbor; in this point they out-Plato Plato. Complaisance is the universal rule. Hardly two or three days had passed before I went up to Homer the poet when we were both at leisure, and questioned him about everything. "Above all," said I, "where do you come from? This point in particular is being investigated even yet at home." "I am not unaware," said he, "that some think me a Chian, some a Smyrniote and many a Colophonian. As a matter of fact I am a Babylonian, and among my fellow-countrymen my name was not Homer but Tigranes.

¹ Famous Greek lyric poets. Stesichorus is said to have written harshly of Helen and later to have recanted.

Later on, when I was a hostage (homeros) among the Greeks, I changed my name." I went on to enquire whether the bracketed lines had been written by him, and he asserted that they were all his own: consequently I held the grammarians Zenodotus and Aristarchus guilty of pedantry in the highest degree. Since he had answered satisfactorily on these points, I next asked him why he began with the wrath of Achilles; and he said that it just came into his head that way, without any study. Moreover, I wanted to know whether he wrote the Odyssey before the Iliad, as most people say: he said no. That he was not blind, as they say, I understood at once — I saw it, and so had no need to ask. Often again at other times I would do this when I saw him at leisure; I would go and make enquiries of him and he would give me a cordial answer to everything, particularly after the lawsuit that he won, for a charge of libel had been brought against him by Thersites¹ because of the way he had ridiculed him in the poem, and the case was won by Homer, with Odysseus for his lawyer.

At about this time arrived Pythagoras² of Samos who had undergone seven transformations, had lived in seven bodies and had now ended the migrations of his soul. All his right side was of gold. Judgment was pronounced that he should become a member of their community, but when I left the point was still at issue whether he ought to be called Pythagoras or Euphorbus. Empedocles³ came too, all burned and his body completely cooked, but he was not received in spite of his many entreaties.

As time went on their games came around, the Games of the Dead. The referees were Achilles, serving for the fifth time, and Theseus for the seventh. The full details would make a long story, but I shall tell the principal things that they did. In wrestling the winner was Caranus, the descendant of Heracles, who defeated Odysseus for the championship. The boxing was a draw between Areius the Egyptian, who is buried at Corinth, and Epeius. For combined boxing and wrestling they offer no prizes. In the foot-race I do not remember who won; and in poetry, Homer was really far the best man, but Hesiod⁴ won. The prize in each case was a crown that was plaited of peacock feathers.

Hardly had the games been concluded when word came that those who were under punishment in the place of the wicked had burst their bonds, had overpowered their guard, and were advancing on the island: that they were under the leadership of Phalaris⁵ of Acragas, Busiris the Egyptian, Diomed of Thrace, and Sciron and Pityocamptes. When Rhadamanthus heard of this he mustered the heroes on the shore. They were led by Theseus, Achilles and Ajax, the son of Telamon, who by this time had recovered his wits. Achilles contributed most to their success, but Socrates, who was stationed on the right wing, was brave, too — far more so than when he fought at Delium⁶ in his lifetime. When four of the enemy came at him he did not run away but kept his face to the front. For this they afterwards gave him a special reward, a beautiful great park in the suburbs, where he used to gather his comrades and dispute: he named the place the Academy of the Dead. Arresting the losers and putting them in irons, they

One of his theories was that of reincarnation. He asserted that he himself was the reincarnation of Euphorbus, a hero of the Trojan War.

³ Empedocles was a philosopher of the fifth century B.C. There was a tradition that he ended his life by throwing himself into the crater of Mt. Aetna.

⁴ An early poet of the eighth century B.C., who wrote somewhat in the epic style. He is famous for his Theogony, which relates a number of early Greek traditions, and his Works and Days, a sort of glorified bucolic. He is not of course to be classed with Homer as a poet.

⁵ The men here mentioned were all famous for their cruelty and inhumanity.

⁶ According to the best tradition Socrates conducted himself with great bravery in this battle. It was in this battle that he was supposed to have saved the life of Xenophon.

sent them off to be punished still more severely than before. An account of this battle was written by Homer, and as I was leaving he gave me the book to take to the people at home, but later I lost it along with everything else. The poem began:

This time sing me, O Muse, of the shades of the heroes in battle!

But to return — they cooked beans, as is their custom when they are successful in war, had a feast in honor of the victory, and made a great holiday. Pythagoras was the only one who did not take part in it; he sat by himself and went dinnerless because he detested beans.

Six months had passed and it was about the middle of the seventh when sedition arose. Cinyras, the son of Scintharus, a tall and handsome lad, had long been in love with Helen, and it was no secret that she herself was madly enamored of the boy. For instance, they often winked at one another at table, drank to each other and got up together and wandered about the wood. Well, one fine day through love and despair Cinyras determined to rape Helen — she agreed to it — and go to one of the islands in the offing, either Cork or Cheesie. As accomplices they had long ago taken on three of the most reckless of my comrades; but Cinyras did not inform his father, for he knew that he would not let him do it. When they had come to a decision, they carried out their stratagem. It was at nightfall, and I was not on hand, as I chanced to be taking a nap under the table. Without the knowledge of the rest they carried Helen off and put to sea in haste. About midnight, when Menelaus woke up, and found that his wife was not in bed, he made a great stir and took his brother and went to King Rhadamanthus. But as day began to break the lookouts said that they saw the ship far out at sea. Then Rhadamanthus put fifty of the heroes aboard a ship made of a single log of asphodel and ordered them to give chase. Rowing with a will, they overtook them about noon, just as they were entering the milky place in the ocean near Cheesie — that is all they lacked of escaping! Securing the ship with a hawser of roses, they sailed home. Helen cried and hid her head for shame. As to Cinyras and the rest, first Rhadamanthus asked them if they had any other accomplices, and they said no; then he had them secured and sent them away to the place of the wicked, after they had been first scourged with mallow. The heroes voted, too, that we be dismissed from the island before our time was up, remaining only till the next day.

Thereupon I began to cry aloud and weep because I had to leave such blessings behind me and resume my wanderings. But they cheered me up, saying that before many years I should come back to them again, and they even pointed out to me my future chair and couch, close to the best people. I went to Rhadamanthus and earnestly besought him to tell me what would happen and indicate my course. He said that I would reach my native land in spite of many wanderings and dangers, but refused to tell the time of my return. However, pointing out the islands near by — there were five in sight and a sixth in the distance —, "These," said he, "are the Isles of the Wicked, here close at hand, from which you see all the smoke arising. The sixth yonder is the City of Dreams. Next comes the island of Calypso,¹ but you cannot see it yet. When you have sailed by these, you will finally come to a great continent opposite the one which your people inhabit. Then at last, after you have had many adventures and have travelled through all sorts of countries and lived among unfriendly men, in course of time you will reach the other continent."

With these words he plucked a root of mallow from the ground and handed it to me, telling me to pray to it in my greatest straits. And he advised me if I ever reached this country, neither to stir the fire with a sword-blade nor to eat lupines nor to make love to anyone over eighteen, saying that if I bore these points in mind I might have good hopes of getting back to the island.

Well, I made preparations for the voyage, and, when the time came, joined them in the feast. On the next day I went to the poet Homer and begged him to compose me a couplet to carve up, and, when he had done so, I set up a slab of beryl near the harbor and had the couplet carved on it. It was:

One Lucian, whom the blessed gods befriend,
Beheld what's here, and home again did wend.

I stayed that day, too, and put to sea on the next, escorted by the heroes. At that juncture Odysseus came to me without the knowledge of Penelope and gave me a letter to carry to Ogygia Island, to Calypso. Rhadamanthus sent the pilot Nauplius¹ with me, so that if we touched at the islands no one might arrest us, thinking we were putting in on another errand.

LATIN

JUVENAL

Decimus Junius Juvenalis, the great Roman satirist, wrote between 96 and 130 A.D. The only biography of him is of unknown date and authorship and therefore of dubious authority. From his works we gather that he was born about 60 A.D. and that he dwelt on a country estate near Tibur. He is thought also to have gone to Egypt to occupy a military post; and according to tradition he was exiled to Britain at one time. The date and place of his death are unknown. Juvenal's literary work consists entirely of satires. Sixteen are ascribed to him, although there is some doubt about one of them. Juvenal was a fiery soul who launched burning reproaches against the sins of a decaying world. He knew the life of his time in intimate detail and spared no pains to expose it in all its hateful reality. The effeminate hypocrisy of decadent Rome, its artistic sterility, its injustice, cruelty, and excesses are perpetually contrasted in his mind with the glorious days of Rome's beginnings. To those who may regard Juvenal as a mere calamity-howler it should be said that the conditions of the times were such as to make it almost impossible to exaggerate. Whoever reads Juvenal with attention cannot fail to be struck by the fact that with very little alteration his satires would apply with as much force to many a modern metropolis as to ancient Rome. Juvenal is the master-poet of indignation. There have been many social critics, many satirists, but none so overwhelmingly devastating in the accumulation of damning detail and the piling up of powerful invective.

This selection was translated by John Dryden in Works (Scott-Saintsbury), 1889.

THE THIRD SATIRE

The story of this satire speaks itself. Umbricitus, the supposed friend of Juvenal, and himself a poet, is leaving Rome, and retiring to Cumæ. Our author accompanies him out of town. Before they take leave of each other, Umbricitus tells his friend the reasons which oblige him to lead a private life, in an obscure place. He complains, that an honest man cannot get his bread at Rome; that none but flatterers make their fortunes there; that Grecians, and other foreigners, raise themselves by those sordid arts which he describes, and against which he bitterly inveighs. He reckons up the several inconveniences which arise from a city life, and the many dangers which attend it; upbraids the noblemen with covetousness, for not rewarding good poets; and arraigns the government for starving them. The great art of this satire is particularly shown in common-places, and drawing in as many vices as could naturally fall into the compass of it.

10 Grieved though I am an ancient friend to lose,

I like the solitary seat he chose,
In quiet Cumæ² fixing his repose:

¹ Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and the nymph Amymone, a famous navigator in classical tradition.

² A small city in Campania, near Puteoli, or Pozzuoli, as it is now called. Originally a Greek colony, it became a great and flourishing city, but it gradually declined in importance until, in Juvenal's day, little remained except ruins. It was anciently famous as the habitation of the Cumæan Sybil.

Where, far from noisy Rome, secure he lives,
And one more citizen to Sibyl gives;
The road to Baïæ,¹ and that soft recess
Which all the gods with all their bounty 5
bless;
Though I in Prochyta² with greater ease
Could live, than in a street of palaces.
What scene so desert or so full of fright,
As towering houses, tumbling in the night, 10
And Rome on fire beheld by its own blazing light?
But worse than all the clattering tiles, and worse
Than thousand padders, is the poet's 15 curse;
Rogues, that in dog-days cannot rhyme
forbear,³
But without mercy read, and make you
hear.
Now while my friend, just ready to depart,
Was packing all his goods in one poor cart,
He stopt a little at the Conduit-gate,
Where Numa⁴ modelled once the Roman 25
State,
In mighty councils with his nymph retired⁵;
Though now the sacred shades and founts are hired
By banished Jews, who their whole wealth can lay
In a small basket, on a wisp of hay:
Yet such our avarice is, that every tree
Pays for his head, nor sleep itself is free; 35
Nor place, nor persons, now are sacred
held,
From their own grove the muses are expelled.
Into this lonely vale our steps we bend, 40
I and my sullen discontented friend;
The marble caves and aqueducts we view;
But how adulterate now, and different from the true!
How much more beauteous had the foun- 45
tain been

Embellished with her first created green,
Where crystal streams through living turf
had run,
Contented with an urn of native stone!
Then thus Umbritius, with an angry
frown,
And looking back on this degenerate
town:—
"Since noble arts in Rome have no support,
And ragged virtue not a friend at court,
No profit rises from the ungrateful stage,
My poverty increasing with my age;
'Tis time to give my just disdain a vent,
And, cursing, leave so base a government.
Where Dædalus his borrowed wings laid
by,
To that obscure retreat⁶ I choose to fly:
While yet few furrows on my face are seen,
20 While I walk upright, and old age is green,
And Lachesis has somewhat left to spin.
Now, now 'tis time to quit this cursed
place,
And hide from villains my too honest face:
Here let Arturius⁷ live, and such as he;
Such manners will with such a town agree.
Knaves, who in full assemblies have the knack
Of turning truth to lies, and white to black,
30 Can hire large houses, and oppress the poor
By farmed excise; can cleanse the common-shore,
And rent the fishery; can bear the dead,
And teach their eyes dissembled tears to
shed;
All this for gain; for gain they sell their very head.
These fellows (see what fortune's power can do!)
Were once the minstrels of a country
show;
Followed the prizes through each paltry
town,
By trumpet-cheeks and bloated faces
known.
But now, grown rich, on drunken holidays,

⁶ Dædalus, in his flight from Crete, alighted at Cumæ.

⁷ A name applied to any debauched, wicked fellow who gains by the times.

At their own costs exhibit public plays;
 Where, influenced by the rabble's bloody will,
 With thumbs bent back, they popularly kill.¹
 From thence returned, their sordid avarice rakes
 In excrements again, and hires the jakes.
 Why hire they not the town, not every
 thing,
 Since such as they have fortune in a string,
 Who, for her pleasure, can her fools advance,
 And toss them topmost on the wheel of
 chance?
 What's Rome to me, what business have
 I there?
 I who can neither lie, nor falsely swear?
 Nor praise my patron's undeserving
 rhymes,
 Nor yet comply with him, nor with his
 times?
 Unskilled in schemes by planets to fore-
 show,
 Like canting rascals, how the wars will go:
 I neither will, nor can, prognosticate
 To the young gaping heir, his father's
 fate;
 Nor in the entrails of a toad have pried,
 Nor carried bawdy presents to a bride:
 For want of these town-virtues, thus alone
 I go, conducted on my way by none;
 Like a dead member from the body rent,
 Maimed, and unuseful to the government.
 Who now is loved, but he who loves the
 times,
 Conscious of close intrigues, and dipt in
 crimes,
 Labouring with secrets which his bosom
 burn,
 Yet never must to public light return?
 They get reward alone, who can betray;
 For keeping honest counsels none will pay.
 He who can Verres² when he will accuse
 The purse of Verres may at pleasure use:
 But let not all the gold which Tagus³
 hides,
 And pays the sea in tributary tides,
 Be bribe sufficient to corrupt thy breast,
 Or violate with dreams thy peaceful rest.
 Great men with jealous eyes the friend
 behold,
 Whose secrecy they purchase with their
 gold.
 "I haste to tell thee, — nor shall shame
 oppose, —
 What confidants our wealthy Romans
 chose;
 And whom I must abhor: to speak my
 mind,
 I hate, in Rome, a Grecian town to find;
 To see the scum of Greece transplanted
 here,
 Received like gods, is what I cannot bear.
 Nor Greeks alone, but Syrians here abound;
 Obscene Orontes,⁴ diving under ground, Conveys his wealth to Tiber's hungry
 shores,
 And fattens Italy with foreign whores:
 Hither their crooked harps and customs
 come;
 All find receipt in hospitable Rome.
 The barbarous harlots crowd the public
 place:—
 Go, fools, and purchase an unclean embrace;
 The painted mitre court, and the more painted face.
 Old Romulus,⁵ and father Mars, look
 down!
 Your herdsman primitive, your homely
 clown,
 Is turned a beau in a loose tawdry gown.
 His once unkem'd and horrid locks, be-
 hold
 'Stilling sweet oil; his neck enchained with
 gold;
 Aping the foreigners in every dress,

⁴ The greatest river of Syria. The poet here puts the river for the inhabitants of Syria.

⁵ The first king of Rome, and son of Mars. The first Romans were herdsmen.

Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less.

Meantime they wisely leave their native
land;

From Sicyon, Samos, and from Alaband, And Amydon, to Rome they swarm in shoals:

So sweet and easy is the gain from fools.
Poor refugees at first, they purchase here;
And, soon as denizen'd, they domineer;
Grow to the great, a flattering, servile rout,
Work themselves inward, and their patrons out.

Quick-witted, brazen-faced, with fluent
tongues,

Patient of labours, and dissembling wrongs.
Riddle me this, and guess him if you can,
Who bears a nation in a single man?

A cook, a conjurer, a rhetorician,
A painter, pedant, a geometrician,
A dancer on the ropes, and a physician;

All things the hungry Greek exactly knows,

And bid him go to heaven, to heaven he goes.

In short, no Scythian, Moor, or Thracian
born,

But in that town¹ which arms and arts
adorn.

Shall he be placed above me at the board,
In purple clothed, and lolling like a lord?
Shall he before me sign, whom t' other day
A small-craft vessel hither did convey,
Where, stowed with prunes, and rotten figs, he lay?

How little is the privilege become
Of being born a citizen of Rome!

The Greeks get all by fulsome flatteries;
A most peculiar stroke they have at lies.

They make a wit of their insipid friend,
His blubber-lips and beetle-brows commend,

His long crane-neck and narrow shoulders
praise,—

You'd think they were describing Hercules.
A creaking voice for a clear treble goes,
Though harsher than a cock, that treads and crows.

We can as grossly praise; but, to our
grief,

No flattery but from Grecians gains belief.

Besides these qualities, we must agree,
They mimic better on the stage than we:
The wife, the whore, the shepherdess, they play,

5 In such a free, and such a graceful way,
That we believe a very woman shown,
And fancy something underneath the gown.

But not Antiochus,² nor Stratocles,³
10 Our ears and ravished eyes can only please;
The nation is composed of such as these.
All Greece is one comedian; laugh, and they

Return it louder than an ass can bray;
15 Grieve, and they grieve; if you weep silently,

There seems a silent echo in their eye;
They cannot mourn like you, but they can cry.

20 Call for a fire, their winter clothes they take;

Begin but you to shiver, and they shake;
In frost and snow, if you complain of heat,
They rub the unsweating brow, and swear
25 they sweat.

We live not on the square with such as these;

Such are our betters who can better please;
Who day and night are like a looking-glass,

30 Still ready to reflect their patron's face;
The panegyric hand, and lifted eye,
Prepared for some new piece of flattery.
Even nastiness occasions will afford;

They praise a belching, or well-pissing lord.
35 Besides, there's nothing sacred, nothing
free

From bold attempts of their rank lechery.
Through the whole family their labours
run;

40 The daughter is debauched, the wife is
won;

Nor 'scapes the bridegroom, or the blooming son.

If none they find for their lewd purpose fit, 45 They with the walls and very floors commit.

They search the secrets of the house, and so Are worshipped there, and feared for what they know.

50 "And, now we talk of Grecians, cast a
view

Turned evidence, and murdered on his oath.
What room is left for Romans in a town
Where Grecians rule, and cloaks control the gown?
Some Diphilus,² or some Protogenes,³
Look sharply out, our senators to seize;
Engross them wholly, by their native art,
And fear no rivals in their bubbles' heart:
And drop of poison in my patron's ear,
One slight suggestion of a senseless fear,
Infused with cunning, serves to ruin me;
Disgraced, and banished from the family.
In vain forgotten services I boast;
My long dependence in an hour is lost.
Look round the world, what country will appear,
Where friends are left with greater ease than here?
At Rome (nor think me partial to the poor)
All offices of ours are out of door:
In vain we rise, and to their levees run;
My lord himself is up before, and gone:
The prætor bids his lictors mend their pace,
Lest his colleague outstrip him in the race.
The childless matrons are, long since,
awake,
And for affronts the tardy visits take.
"Tis frequent here to see a free-born
son
On the left hand of a rich hireling run;
Because the wealthy rogue can throw
away,
For half a brace of bouts, a tribune's pay;
But you, poor sinner, though you love the vice,
And like the whore, demur upon the price;
And, frightened with the wicked sum, for-
bear
To lend a hand, and help her from the chair.
"Produce a witness of unblemished life,
Holy as Numa, or as Numa's wife,
Or him who bid the unhallowed flames retire,

And snatched the trembling goddess from the fire';
The question is not put how far extends
His piety, but what he yearly spends;
Quick, to the business; how he lives and eats;
How largely gives; how splendidly he treats;
How many thousand acres feed his sheep;
What are his rents; what servants does he keep?
The account is soon cast up; the judges rate
Our credit in the court by our estate.
Swear by our gods, or those the Greeks
adore,
Thou art as sure forsworn, as thou art
poor:
The poor must gain their bread by perjury;
And e'en the gods, that other means deny,
In conscience must absolve them, when they lie.
"Add, that the rich have still a gibe in
store,
And will be monstrous witty on the poor;
For the torn surtout and the tattered
vest,
The wretch and all his wardrobe, are a jest;
The greasy gown, sullied with often turn-
ing,
Gives a good hint, to say, — 'The man's in mourning';
Or, if the shoe be ripped, or patches put, —
'He's wounded! see the plaister on his foot.'
Want is the scorn of every wealthy fool,
And wit in rags is turned to ridicule.
'Pack hence, and from the covered benches rise,'
(The master of the ceremonies cries)
'This is no place for you, whose small estate
Is not the value of the settled rate;
The sons of happy punks, the pander's heir,
Are privileged to sit in triumph there,
To clap the first, and rule the theatre.
Up to the galleries, for shame, retreat;

For, by the Roscian law,¹ the poor can claim no seat.—
Who ever brought to his rich daughter's bed
The man that polled but twelve pence for 5
his head?
Who ever named a poor man for his heir,
Or called him to assist the judging chair?
The poor were wise, who, by the rich oppressed,
Withdrew, and sought a sacred place of 10 rest.²
Once they did well, to free themselves
from scorn;
But had done better, never to return. 15
Rarely they rise by virtue's aid, who lie Plunged in the depth of helpless poverty.
At Rome 'tis worse, where house-rent by the year,
And servants' bellies, cost so devilish dear, 20
And tavern-bills run high for hungry cheer.
To drink or eat in earthenware we scorn,
Which cheaply country-cupboards does
adorn, 25
And coarse blue hoods on holidays are worn.
Some distant parts of Italy are known,
Where none but only dead men wear a gown³;
On theatres of turf, in homely state,
Old plays they act, old feasts they celebrate;
The same rude song returns upon the
crowd,
And, by tradition, is for wit allowed.
The mimic yearly gives the same delights;
And in the mother's arms the clownish
infant frights. 40
Thy own third story smokes, while thou, supine,
Art drenched in fumes of undigested wine.
For if the lowest floors already burn,

Cock-lofts and garrets⁴ soon will take the
turn,
Where thy tame pigeons next the tiles
were bred,
Which, in their nests unsafe, are timely
fled.
"Codrus⁵ had but one bed, so short to boot,
That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out;
His cupboard's head six earthen pitchers
graced,
Beneath them was his trusty tankard placed;
And, to support this noble plate, there lay
A bending Chiron cast from honest clay;
His few Greek books a rotten chest contained,
Whose covers much of mouldiness complained;
Where mice and rats devoured poetic
bread,
And with heroic verse luxuriously were fed.
'Tis true, poor Codrus nothing had to boast, 25
And yet poor Codrus all that nothing lost; Begged naked through the streets of wealthy Rome,
And found not one to feed, or take him
home. 30
"But, if the palace of Arturius burn,
The nobles change their clothes, the matrons mourn;
The city-prætor will no pleadings hear;
35 The very name of fire we hate and fear,
And look aghast, as if the Gauls were here.
While yet it burns, the officious nation
flies,
Some to condole, and some to bring supplies. 40
One sends him marble to rebuild, and one
White naked statues of the Parian stone,
Their habits (undistinguished by degree)
Are plain, alike; the same simplicity,

¹ Roscius, a tribune, ordered the distinction of places at public shows betwixt the noblemen of Rome and the plebeians.

² This alludes to the secession of the plebeians to the Mons Sacer, or Sacred Hill, as it was called, when they were persecuted by the aristocracy (494 B.C.). This very extraordinary resignation of their rights on the part of the common people was not unique in Roman history. It argues a much more inconsiderable population than the ancient writers would have us believe.

³ The meaning is that men in some parts of Italy never wore a gown, the usual habit of the Romans, till they were buried in one.

⁴ The Romans used to breed their tame pigeons in their garrets.

⁵ A learned man, very poor: by his books supposed to be a poet; in all probability, the heroic verses here mentioned, which rats and mice devoured, were Homer's work.

Both on the stage, and in the pit, you see.
In his white cloak the magistrate appears;
The country bumpkin the same livery wears.

But here attired beyond our purse we go,
For useless ornament and flaunting show;
We take on trust, in purple robes to shine,
And poor, are yet ambitious to be fine.
This is a common vice, though all things here

Are sold, and sold unconscionably dear.
What will you give that Cossus¹ may but view

Your face, and in the crowd distinguish you;

May take your incense like a gracious God,

And answer only with a civil nod?
To please our patrons, in this vicious age,
We make our entrance by the favourite page;

Shave his first down, and, when he polls his hair,

The consecrated locks to temples bear;
Pay tributary cracknels, which he sells,
And with our offerings help to raise his vails.

"Who fears in country-towns a house's fall,

Or to be caught betwixt a riven wall?
But we inhabit a weak city here,
Which buttresses and props but scarcely bear;

And 'tis the village-mason's daily calling,
To keep the world's metropolis from falling,

To cleanse the gutters, and the chinks to close,

And, for one night, secure his lord's repose.
At Cumæ we can sleep quite round the year,

Nor falls, nor fires, nor nightly dangers fear;

While rolling flames from Roman turrets fly,

And the pale citizens for buckets cry.

And, with imperfect heat, in languid stomachs fry.

What house secure from noise the poor can keep,

35 When even the rich can scarce afford to sleep?

So dear it costs to purchase rest in Rome,
And hence the sources of diseases come.

The drover, who his fellow-drover meets 40 In narrow passages of winding streets;
The wagoners, that curse their standing teams,

Would wake even drowsy Drusus⁴ from his dreams.

45 And yet the wealthy will not brook delay,
But sweep above our heads, and make their way,

In lofty litters borne, and read and write,
Or sleep at ease, the shutters make it night;

Yet still he reaches first the public place.

⁴ The Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41-54).

The press before him stops the client's pace;
 The crowd that follows crush his panting
 sides,
 And trip his heels; he walks not, but he rides.
 One elbows him, one jostles in the shole,
 A rafter breaks his head, or chairman's
 pole;
 Stockinged with loads of fat town-dirt he goes,
 And some rogue-soldier, with his hobnailed shoes,
 Indents his legs behind in bloody rows.
 See, with what smoke our doles we celebrate:
 A hundred guests, invited, walk in state;
 A hundred hungry slaves, with their Dutch kitchens, wait.
 Huge pans the wretches on their heads
 must bear,
 Which scarce gigantic Corbulo¹ could
 rear;
 Yet they must walk upright beneath the
 load,
 Nay run, and, running, blow the sparkling flames abroad.
 Their coats, from botching newly brought,
 are torn.
 Unwieldy timber-trees, in wagons borne, Stretched at their length, beyond their carriage lie,
 That nod, and threaten ruin from on high;
 For, should their axle break, its overthrow Would crush, and pound to dust, the crowd below;
 Nor friends their friends, nor sires their sons could know;
 Nor limbs, nor bones, nor carcase, would
 remain,
 But a mashed heap, a hotchpotch of the
 slain;
 One vast destruction; not the soul alone,
 But bodies, like the soul, invisible are flown.
 Meantime, unknowing of their fellow's
 fate,
 The servants wash the platter, scour the plate,
 Then blow the fire, with puffing cheeks,
 and lay
 The rubbers, and the bathing-sheets display,
 And oil them first; and each is handy in his way.
 But he, for whom this busy care they
 take,
 Poor ghost! is wandering by the Stygian
 lake;
 Affrighted with the ferryman's grim face,
 New to the horrors of that uncouth place,
 His passage begs, with unregarded prayer,
 And wants two farthings to discharge his fare.
 "Return we to the dangers of the night. —
 And, first, behold our houses' dreadful
 height;
 From whence come broken potsherds
 tumbling down,
 And leaky ware from garret-windows thrown;
 Well may they break our heads, that mark
 the flinty stone.
 'Tis want of sense to sup abroad too late,
 Unless thou first hast settled thy estate;
 As many fates attend thy steps to meet,
 As there are waking windows in the street.
 Bless the good Gods, and think thy chance is rare,
 To have a piss-pot only for thy share.
 The scouring² drunkard, if he does not
 fight
 Before his bed-time, takes no rest that
 night;
 Passing the tedious hours in greater pain Than stern Achilles, when his friend was
 slain;
 'Tis so ridiculous, but so true withal,
 A bully cannot sleep without a brawl.
 Yet, though his youthful blood be fired with wine,
 He wants not wit the danger to decline;
 Is cautious to avoid the coach and six,
 And on the lacqueys will no quarrel fix.
 His train of flambeaux, and embroidered coat,
 May privilege my lord to walk secure on
 foot;

² Acting like a "scourer"; i.e., one who roams the streets, robbing and bullying.

But me, who must by moonlight homeward
 bend,
 Or lighted only with a candle's end,
 Poor me he fights, if that be fighting, where He only cudgels, and I only bear.
 He stands, and bids me stand; I must abide,
 For he's the stronger, and is drunk beside.
 "Where did you whet your knife tonight?" he cries,
 'And shred the leeks that in your stomach
 rise?
 Whose windy beans have stuff your guts,
 and where
 Have your black thumbs been dipt in 15 vinegar?
 With what companion-cobbler have you fed,
 On old ox-cheeks, or he-goat's tougher
 head?
 What, are you dumb? Quick, with your answer, quick,
 Before my foot salutes you with a kick.
 Say, in what nasty cellar, under ground,
 Or what church-porch, your roguishness may 25
 be found?'—
 Answer, or answer not, 'tis all the same,
 He lays me on, and makes me bear the blame.
 Before the bar for beating him you come; 30
 This is a poor man's liberty in Rome.
 You beg his pardon; happy to retreat
 With some remaining teeth, to chew your meat.
 "Nor is this all; for when, retired, you 35
 think
 To sleep securely, when the candles wink, When every door with iron chains is barred,
 And roaring taverns are no longer heard;
 The ruffian robbers, by no justice awed,
 And unpaid cut-throat soldiers, are
 abroad;
 5 Those venal souls, who, hardened in each
 ill,
 To save complaints and prosecution, kill.
 Chased from their woods and bogs, the padders come
 10 To this vast city, as their native home,
 To live at ease, and safely skulk in Rome.
 "The forge in fetters only is employed;
 Our iron mines exhausted and destroyed
 In shackles; for these villains scarce allow Goads for the teams, and ploughshares for the plough.
 Oh, happy ages of our ancestors,
 Beneath the kings and tribunitian powers!
 20 One jail did all their criminals restrain,
 Which now the walls of Rome can scarce contain.
 "More I could say, more causes I could
 show
 25 For my departure, but the sun is low;
 The wagoner grows weary of my stay,
 And whips his horses forward on their
 way.
 Farewell! and when, like me, o'erwhelmed
 with care,
 You to your own Aquinum¹ shall repair,
 To take a mouthful of sweet country air,
 Be mindful of your friend; and send me
 word,
 35 What joys your fountains and cool shades
 afford.
 Then, to assist your satires, I will come,
 And add new venom when you write of Rome."

MARTIAL

(43-ca. 102 A.D.)

Like Seneca and Lucan, Marcus Valerius Martialis was a Spaniard. He came to Rome when he was twenty-three years old and remained there for about thirty-five years. He then returned to his native town of Bilbilis, where he died about 102. His writing career included the reigns of Titus, Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan. His protector, Calpurnius Piso, died early and left Martial in poverty, from which he never managed to escape entirely. Literature in Martial's time was not flourishing, for the age of decadence was occupied principally with history and satire. As in the age of Augustus, poets were dependent upon the favors of the wealthy, but there were few men like Mæcenas to encourage and help them. The degrading dole system obliged the poet to assume the rôle of a beggarly flatterer, an entertainer who sang for his supper. It was a natural consequence that he should cultivate the qualities of condensation, wittiness, and aptness. When he had an opportunity to speak out on his own account, his utterances were likely to be rather acid. Martial had the gift of sarcasm and penetrating satire, but he was not too proud to stoop at times to the kind of fulsome flattery that was the order of the day. At the same time it is obvious that he was more than a mere sycophant. He had to act the buffoon at times, but his unusual gift of condensation won him freedom for the exercise of his independent genius. For one who wishes an introduction to epigrammatic literature there is no writer more important than Martial.

The epigram, originating as a conventional inscription upon a monument or a building, developed great diversity as a literary form. In general there are two main developments — the short poem expressing a single beautiful idea, and the short, pithy stinging verse. A glance through the Greek Anthology (see p. 239) will indicate the great popularity of the epigram from the Golden Age of Greece down to the Byzantine period. From the second century to the twentieth there is hardly a writer of note in Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or England by whom Martial is not quoted, translated, or imitated. He is perhaps the most striking example of a poet who, though lacking the essential qualities of greatness, possessed undeniable mastery in his own restricted field and has won himself a place beside Homer, Pindar, Vergil, and Horace.

These selections come from Martial's Epigrams, translated by A. D. Francis and H. F. Tatum, Cambridge University Press, 1924.

Quick, claim a sponsor, or you'll feed the cook,
Or spice or pepper hold, beloved book,
Or else envelop greasy whitebait fries.
You haste to name Faustinus; well, you're wise.
Now, cedar-scented, you may blithely stray
With graceful frontlets and with bosses gay;
Of purple grain shall be your dainty shell,
Your name and matter blushing scarlet tell.

To Rome, my book. If she asks whence,
you'll say,
"From the direction of the Æmilian way."
Demand she in what town I am and where;
Say that I'm staying at Cornelius' Fair.
"Why am I absent?" Say, "Attendance palls
And liveried vanity of morning calls."
"And when returning?" Answer, "He left Rome
A poet; when a harper² he'll come home."

Good-bye, my book. And which will suit
you better,
To one or many shall I write a letter?
One man will give you hospitality,
5 Julius, familiar household word with me.
Forthwith you'll seek him in the Covered
Way; Daphnis lived here, 'tis Julius' home to-
day.
10 He has a wife, who'll give you welcome
home,
Though hot and dusty from the road you
come.
Husband or wife, whichever first you're meeting, 15 You'll say, "My master gives you kindly greeting."
Enough. A letter strangers' worth commends.

Well, Ligurinus, you're too much a poet. 10
A grievous fault, with perilous mischief
fraught.
No tigress, for her captive brood dis-

Or ruthless scorpion is so dread to meet.
Who can endure it? Standing, in repose,
Your strain pursues me; while I bathe it

No, I'll not come, a freedman I will send.
"Tis not the same," you say; 'tis more, I

He'll shout the loud bravo and never cease.
Should brawl arise, he'll scold at any rate,
I am ashamed to deal in Billingsgate.
"Is there no office, then, a friend may fill?"
Whate'er a freedman cannot, that I will. 50

FABLE

GREEK

ÆSOP

Æsop, the composer of fables, is a traditional figure. The biographical details which have come down to us regarding this interesting person are wholly unreliable. He is supposed to have lived in the sixth century B.C. and to have been a slave of Iadmon, king of Samos. He must have been set free later, for he is said to have lived in Athens, enjoying the rights of a citizen.

Samuel Johnson defined a fable thus: "A fable or apologue seems to be, in its genuine state, a narrative in which beings irrational, and sometimes inanimate, are, for the purpose of moral instruction, feigned to act and speak with human interests and passions." Although Æsop is popularly regarded as the father of the fable, there is good evidence that it goes back to remote antiquity. The animal stories of the Orient, the most famous collection of which is the Kalila and Dimna or Fables of Bidpai, are far earlier. Such stories seem to have penetrated even to Greece, for many of the fables ascribed to Æsop are similar to them. Æsop's fables, as far as we can learn, were never committed to writing, but came down to the modern world through Greek writers of antiquity. In the first century A.D. Babrius, a Greek, put together a collection in verse which he attributed to Æsop. This collection was used again by the Roman Phædrus in the time of Augustus. Even in this collection there is so large an admixture of Oriental material that it is difficult to separate Æsop's fables from those derived from Bidpai or other fables of Eastern origin. Aphthonius and Avianus carried the tradition into the Middle Ages. Meanwhile a translation of Bidpai brought the fables to Western European writers and increased the Oriental admixture in the collection made by Alfred of England (probably not King Alfred). This version was used by Marie de France in the twelfth century. Among later fabulists, La Fontaine stands out as the most conspicuous.

The fable, until recently an important part of the school curriculum, has come to be regarded as a form of literature suitable only for children. Approached anew, however, with the experience of maturity, fables reveal fundamental human truths beneath a pleasingly ironical treatment of human foibles.

The translation is that of John Smith, London, 1875.

THE COUNTRY MOUSE AND THE TOWN MOUSE

Once upon a time a Country Mouse who had a friend in town invited him, for old acquaintance sake, to pay him a visit in the country. The invitation being accepted in due form, the Country Mouse, though plain and rough and somewhat frugal in his nature, opened his heart and store, in honour of hospitality and an old friend. There was not a carefully stored up morsel that he did not bring forth out of his larder, peas and barley, cheese-parings and nuts, hoping by quantity to 15 make up what he feared was wanting in quality, to suit the palate of his dainty guest. The Town Mouse, condescending to pick a bit here and a bit there, while the host sat nibbling a blade of barley-straw, at length exclaimed, "How is it, my good friend, that you can endure the dullness of this unpolished life? You are living like a toad in a hole. You can't really prefer these solitary rocks and woods to streets teeming with carriages and men. On my honour, you are wasting your time miserably here. We must make the most of life while it lasts. A mouse, you know, does not live for ever. So come with me and I'll show you life and the town." Overpowered with such fine words and so polished a manner, the Country Mouse assented; and they set out together on their journey to town. It was late in the evening when they crept stealthily into the city, and midnight ere they reached the great house, where the Town Mouse took up his quarters. Here were couches of crimson velvet, carvings in ivory, everything, in short, that denoted wealth and luxury. On the table were the remains of a splendid banquet, to procure which all the choicest shops in town had been ransacked the day before. It was now the turn of the courtier to play the host; he places his country friend on purple, runs to and fro to supply all his wants, presses dish upon dish and dainty upon dainty, and, as though he were waiting on a king, tastes every course ere he ventures to place it before his rustic cousin. The Country Mouse, for his part, affects to make himself quite at home, and blesses the good fortune that had wrought such a change in his way of life; when, in the midst of his enjoyment, as he is thinking with contempt of the poor fare he has forsaken, on a sudden the door flies open, and a party of revellers, returning from a late entertainment, bursts into the room. The affrighted friends jump from the table in the greatest consternation and hide themselves in the first corner they can reach. No sooner do they venture to creep out again than the barking of dogs drives them back in still greater terror than before. At length, when things seemed quiet, the Country Mouse stole out from his hiding place, and, bidding his friend good-bye, whispered in his ear, "Oh, my good sir, this fine mode of living may do for those who like it; but give me my barley-bread in peace and security before the daintiest feast where Fear and Care are in waiting."

THE LION AND THE MOUSE

A Lion was sleeping in his lair, when a Mouse, not knowing where he was going, ran over the mighty beast's nose and awakened him. The Lion clapped his paw upon the frightened little creature, and was about to make an end of him in a moment, when the Mouse, in pitiable tone, besought him to spare one who had so unconsciously offended, and not stain his honourable paws with so insignificant a prey. The Lion, smiling at his little prisoner's fright, generously let him go. Now it happened no long time after, that the Lion, while ranging the woods for his prey, fell into the toils of the hunters; and, finding himself entangled without hope of escape, set up a roar that filled the whole forest with its echo. The Mouse, recognizing the voice of his former preserver, ran to the spot, and without more ado set to work to nibble the knot in the cord that bound the Lion, and in a short time set the noble beast at liberty; thus convincing him that kindness is seldom thrown away, and that there is no creature so much below another but that he may have it in his power to return a good office.

THE WOLF AND THE CRANE

A Wolf had got a bone stuck in his throat, and in the greatest agony ran up and down, beseeching every animal he met to relieve him: at the same time hinting at a very handsome reward to the successful operator. A Crane, moved by his entreaties and promises, ventured her long neck down the Wolf's throat, and drew out the bone. She then modestly asked for the promised reward. To which, the Wolf, grinning and showing his teeth, replied with seeming indignation, "Ungrateful creature! to ask for any other reward than that you have put your head into a Wolf's jaws, and brought it safe out again!"

Those who are charitable only in the hope of a return must not be surprised if, in their dealings with evil men, they meet with more jeers than thanks.

THE FOX AND THE GOAT

A Fox had fallen into a well, and had been casting about for a long time how he should get out again; when at length a Goat came to the place, and, wanting to drink, asked Reynard whether the water was good, and if there was plenty of it. The Fox, dissembling the real danger of his case, replied, "Come down, my friend; the water is so good that I cannot drink enough of it, and so abundant that it cannot be exhausted." Upon this the Goat without any more ado leaped in; when the Fox, taking advantage of his friend's horns, as nimbly leaped out; and coolly remarked to the poor deluded Goat,—

 "If you had half as much brains as you have beard, you would have looked before you leaped."

THE WOLF AND THE LAMB

As a Wolf was lapping at the head of a running brook, he spied a stray Lamb paddling, at some distance, down the stream. Having made up his mind to seize her, he bethought himself how he might justify his violence. "Villain," said he, running up to her, "how dare you muddle the water that I am drinking?" "Indeed," said the Lamb humbly, "I do not see how I can disturb the water, since it runs from you to me, not from me to you." "Be that as it may," replied the Wolf, "it was but a year ago that you called me many ill names." "Oh, Sir!" said the Lamb, trembling, "a year ago I was not born." "Well," replied the Wolf, "if it was not you, it was your father, and that is all the same; but it is no use trying to argue me out of my supper";— and without another word he fell upon the poor helpless Lamb and tore her to pieces.

A tyrant never wants a plea. And they have little chance of resisting the injustice of the powerful whose only weapons are innocence and reason.

THE FROG AND THE OX

An Ox, grazing in a swampy meadow, chanced to set his foot among a parcel of young Frogs, and crushed nearly the whole brood to death. One that escaped ran off to his mother with the dreadful news; "And, O mother!" said he, "it was a beast — such a big four-footed beast! — that did it." "Big?" quoth the old Frog, "how big? was it as big" — and she puffed herself out to a great degree — "as big as this?" "Oh!" said the little one, "a great deal bigger than that." "Well, was it so big?" and she swelled herself out yet more. "Indeed, mother, but it was; and if you were to burst yourself, you would never reach half its size." Provoked at such a disparagement of her powers, the old Frog made one more trial, and burst herself indeed.

So men are ruined by attempting a greatness to which they have no claim.

THE TORTOISE AND THE EAGLE

A Tortoise, dissatisfied with his lowly life, when he beheld so many of the birds, his neighbours, disporting themselves in the clouds, and thinking that, if he could but once get up into the air, he could soar with the best of them, called one day upon an Eagle and offered him all the treasures of Ocean if he could only teach him to fly. The Eagle would have declined the task, assuring him that the thing was not only absurd but impossible, but, being further pressed by the entreaties and promises of the Tortoise, he at length consented to do for him the best he could. So taking him up to a great height in the air and loosing his hold upon him, "Now, then!" cried the Eagle; but the Tortoise, before he could answer him a word, fell plump upon a rock, and was dashed to pieces.

Pride shall have a fall.

BIOGRAPHY

GREEK

PLUTARCH

Plutarch was born into one of the richest and noblest families of Chæronea, in Bœotia. Although he was well endowed with qualities for worldly success, he preferred to remain in his own little town, where he divided his time between his studies and short journeys undertaken for the purpose of increasing his knowledge. Early in life he was entrusted with a mission to the pro-consul of Achaia. Later he went to Rome, where he busied himself with the affairs of his compatriots and with the giving of public readings in philosophy. For all his frequent contact with Rome, however, he did not learn Latin until late in life. His accomplishments were recognized with all the honors that his country could bestow upon him. He was probably teacher of Hadrian, was named consul by Trajan, and put in charge of the troublesome province of Illyria, and, according to some traditions, was adviser to Trajan himself.

Plutarch's many works may be roughly divided into the Lives and Moral Works. The latter includes philosophy, history of philosophy, physics, hygiene, archæology, etc. The Lives (ca. 75 A.D.) are arranged in pairs, each pair consisting of the biographies of a Greek and a Roman of similar character and activity. Plutarch's chronology and facts are not always strictly reliable; but he had a quick eye for the dramatic and moral in history, and his portraits of great men readily took hold of the popular imagination. These portraits are filled with engaging digressions — philosophical and moral discussion, anecdotes of his own life, and historical traditions, — all set forth with great restraint and attractiveness. Lacking the elevation of Plato or Aristotle, he is for that very reason more accessible to all.

The greatest influence of Plutarch's Lives on the literature of Western Europe begins with the translation made by Amyot, bishop of Auxerre, about the middle of the sixteenth century. The part of the life of Cæsar here given contains most of the material used by Shakespeare in Julius Cæsar, with which it should be compared.

The translation is that of Bernadotte Perrin, G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, 1919.

CÆSAR

LVII. However, the Romans gave way before the good fortune of the man and accepted the bit, and, regarding the monarchy as a respite from the evils of the civil wars, they appointed him dictator for life. This was confessedly a tyranny, since the monarchy, besides the element of irresponsibility, now took on that of permanence. It was Cicero who proposed the first honours for him in the senate, and their magnitude was, after all, not too great for a man; but others added excessive honours and vied with one another in proposing them, thus rendering Cæsar odious and obnoxious even to the mildest citizens because of the pretension and extravagance of what was decreed for him. It is thought, too, that the enemies of Cæsar no less than his flatterers helped to force these measures through, in order that they might have as many pretexts as possible against him and might be thought to have the best reasons for attempting his life. For in all other ways, at least, after the civil wars were over, he showed himself blameless; and certainly it is thought not inappropriate that the temple of Clemency was decreed as a thank-offering in view of his mildness. For he pardoned many of those who had fought against him, and to some he even gave honours and offices besides, as to Brutus and Cassius, both of whom were now prætors. The statues of Pompey, too, which had been thrown down, he would not suffer to remain so, but set them up again, at which Cicero said that in setting up Pompey's¹ statues Cæsar firmly fixed his own. When his friends thought it best that he should have a body-guard, and many of them volunteered for this service, he would not consent, saying that it was better to die once for all than to be always expecting death. And in the effort to surround himself with men's good will as the fairest and at the same time the securest protection, he again courted the people with banquets and distributions of grain, and his soldiers with newly planted colonies, the most conspicuous of which were Carthage and Corinth. The earlier capture of both these cities, as well as their present restoration, chanced to fall at one and the same time.²

LVIII. As for the nobles, to some of them he promised consulships and prætorships in the future, others he appeased with sundry other powers and honours, and in all he implanted hopes, since he ardently desired to rule over willing subjects. Therefore, when Maximus the consul died, he appointed Caninius Revilus consul for the one day still remaining of the term of office. To him, as we are told, many were going with congratulations and offers of escort, whereupon Cicero said: "Let us make haste, or else the man's consulship will have expired."

Cæsar's many successes, however, did not divert his natural spirit of enterprise and ambition to the enjoyment of what he had laboriously achieved, but served as fuel and incentive for future achievements, and begat in him plans for greater deeds and a passion for fresh glory, as though he had used up what he already had. What he felt was therefore nothing else than emulation of himself, as if he had been another man, and a sort of rivalry between what he had done and what he purposed to do. For he planned and prepared to make an expedition against the Parthians; and after subduing these and marching around the Euxine by way of Hyrcania, the Caspian sea, and the Caucasus, to invade Scythia; and after over-running the countries bordering on Germany and Germany itself, to come back by way of Gaul to Italy, and so to complete this circuit of his empire, which would then be bounded on all sides by the ocean. During this expedition, moreover, he intended to dig through the isthmus of Corinth, and had already put Anienus in charge of this work; he intended also to divert the Tiber just below the city into a deep channel, give it a bend towards Circeium, and make it empty into the sea at Terracina, thus contriving for merchantmen a safe as well as an easy passage to Rome; and, besides this, to convert the marshes about Pomentinum and Setia into a plain which many thousands of men could cultivate; and, further, to build moles which should barricade the sea where it was nearest to Rome, to clear away the hidden dangers on the shore of Ostia, and then construct harbours and roadsteads sufficient for the great fleets that would visit them. And all these things were in preparation.

LIX. The adjustment of the calendar, however, and the correction of the irregularity in the computation of time, were not only studied scientifically by him, but also brought to completion, and proved to be of the highest utility. For not only in very ancient times was the relation of the lunar to the solar year in great confusion among the Romans, so that the sacrificial feasts and festivals, diverging gradually, at last fell in opposite seasons of the year, but also at this time people generally had no way of computing the actual solar year³; the priests alone knew the proper time, and would suddenly and to everybody's surprise insert the intercalary month called Mercedonius. Numa the king¹ is said to have been the first to intercalate this month, thus devising a slight and short-lived remedy for the error in regard to the sidereal and solar cycles, as I have said in his Life. But Cæsar laid the problem before the best philosophers and mathematicians, and out of the methods of correction which were already at hand compounded one of his own which was more accurate than any. This the Romans use down to the present time, and are thought to be less in error than other peoples as regards the inequality between the lunar and solar years. However, even this furnished occasion for blame to those who envied Cæsar and disliked his power. At any rate, Cicero the orator, we are told, when some one remarked that Lyra² would rise on the morrow, said: "Yes, by decree," implying that men were compelled to accept even this dispensation.

² Both cities were captured in 146 B.C., and both were restored in 44 B.C.

LX. But the most open and deadly hatred towards him was produced by his passion for the royal power. For the multitude this was a first cause of hatred, and for those who had long smothered their hate, a most specious pretext for it. And yet those who were advocating this honour for Cæsar actually spread abroad among the people a report that from the Sibylline books³ it appeared that Parthia could be taken if the Romans went up against it with a king, but otherwise could not be assailed; and as Cæsar was coming down from Alba into the city they ventured to hail him as king. But at this the people were confounded, and Cæsar, disturbed in mind, said that his name was not King, but Cæsar, and, seeing that his words produced an universal silence, he passed on with no very cheerful or contented looks. Moreover, after sundry extravagant honours had been voted him in the senate, it chanced that he was sitting above the rostra, and as the prætors and consuls drew near, with the whole senate following them, he did not rise to receive them, but, as if he were dealing with mere private persons, replied that his honours needed curtailment rather than enlargement. This vexed not only the senate, but also the people, who felt that in the persons of the senators the state was insulted, and in a terrible dejection they went away at once, all who were not obliged to remain, so that Cæsar too, when he was aware of his mistake, immediately turned to go home, and, drawing back his toga from his neck, cried in loud tones to his friends that he was ready to offer his throat to any one who wished to kill him. But afterwards he made his disease an excuse for his behaviour, saying that the senses of those who are thus afflicted do not usually remain steady when they address a multitude standing, but are speedily shaken and whirled about, bringing on giddiness and insensibility. However, what he said was not true; on the contrary, he was very desirous of rising to receive the senate; but one of his friends, as they say, or rather one of his flatterers, Cornelius Balbus, restrained him, saying: "Remember that thou art Cæsar, and permit thyself to be courted as a superior."

LXI. There was added to these causes of offence his insult to the tribunes. It was, namely, the festival of the Lupercalia,⁴ of which many write that it was anciently celebrated by shepherds, and has also some connection with the Arcadian Lycaea. At this time many of the noble youths and of the magistrates run up and down through the city naked, for sport and laughter striking those they meet with shaggy thongs. And many women of rank also purposely get in their way, and like children at school present their hands to be struck, believing that the pregnant will thus be helped to an easy delivery, and the barren to pregnancy. These ceremonies Cæsar was witnessing, seated upon the rostra on a golden throne, arrayed in triumphal attire. And Antony was one of the runners in the sacred race; for he was consul. Accordingly, after he had dashed into the forum and the crowd had made way for him, he carried a diadem, round which a wreath of laurel was tied, and held it out to Cæsar. Then there was applause, not loud, but slight and preconcerted. But when Cæsar pushed away the diadem, all the people applauded; and when Antony offered it again, few, and when Cæsar declined it again, all, applauded. The experiment having thus failed, Cæsar rose from his seat, after ordering the wreath to be carried up to the Capitol; but then his statues were seen to have been decked with royal diadems. So two of the tribunes, Flavius and Maryllus, went up to them and pulled off the diadems, and, after discovering those who had first hailed Cæsar as king, led them off to prison. Moreover, the people followed the tribunes with applause and called them Brutuses, because Brutus was the man who put an end to the royal succession and brought the power into the hands of the senate and people instead of a sole ruler. At this, Cæsar was greatly vexed, and deprived Maryllus and Flavius of their office, while in his denunciation of them, although he at the same time insulted the people, he called them repeatedly Brutes¹ and Cymæans.¹

LXII. Under these circumstances the multitude turned their thoughts towards Marcus Brutus, who was thought to be a descendant of the elder Brutus on his father's side, on his mother's side belonged to the Servilii, another illustrious house, and was a son-in-law and nephew of Cato.² The desires which Brutus felt to attempt of his own accord the abolition of the monarchy were blunted by the favours and honours that he had received from Cæsar. For not only had his life been spared at Pharsalus³ after Pompey's flight, and the lives of many of his friends at his entreaty, but also he had great credit with Cæsar. He had received the most honourable of the prætorships for the current year, and was to be consul three years later, having been preferred to Cassius, who was a rival candidate. For Cæsar, as we are told, said that Cassius urged the juster claims to the office, but that for his own part he could not pass Brutus by. Once, too, when certain persons were actually accusing Brutus to him, the conspiracy being already on foot, Cæsar would not heed them, but laying his hand upon his body said to the accusers: "Brutus will wait for this shrivelled skin," implying that Brutus was worthy to rule because of his virtue, but that for the sake of ruling he would not become a thankless villain. Those, however, who were eager for the change, and fixed their eyes on Brutus alone, or on him first, did not venture to talk with him directly, but by night they covered his prætorial tribune and chair with writings, most of which were of this sort: "Thou art asleep, Brutus," or, "Thou art not Brutus." When Cassius perceived that the ambition of Brutus was somewhat stirred by these things, he was more urgent with him than before, and pricked him on, having himself also some private grounds for hating Cæsar; these I have mentioned in the Life of Brutus. Moreover, Cæsar actually suspected him, so that he once said to his friends: "What, think ye, doth Cassius want? I like him not over much, for he is much too pale." And again, we are told that when Antony⁴ and Dolabella⁴ were accused to him of plotting revolution, Cæsar said: "I am not much in fear of these fat, long-haired fellows, but rather of those pale, thin ones," meaning Brutus and Cassius.

LXIII. But destiny, it would seem, is not so much unexpected as it is unavoidable, since they say that amazing signs and apparitions were seen. Now, as for lights in the heavens, crashing sounds borne all about by night, and birds of omen coming down into the forum, it is perhaps not worth while to mention these precursors of so great an event; but Strabo the philosopher says that multitudes of men all on fire were seen rushing up, and a soldier's slave threw from his hand a copious flame and seemed to the spectators to be burning, but when the flame ceased the man was uninjured; he says, moreover, that when Cæsar himself was sacrificing, the heart of the victim was not to be found, and the prodigy caused fear, since in the course of nature, certainly, an animal without a heart could not exist. The following story, too, is told by many. A certain seer warned Cæsar to be on his guard against a great peril on the day of the month of March which the Romans call the Ides; and when the day had come and Cæsar was on his way to the senate-house, he greeted the seer with a jest and said: "Well, the Ides of March are come," and the seer said to him softly: "Ay, they are come, but they are not gone." Moreover, on the day before, when Marcus Lepidus was entertaining him at supper, Cæsar chanced to be signing letters, as his custom was, while reclining at table, and the discourse turned suddenly upon the question what sort of death was the best; before any one else could answer Cæsar cried out: "That which is unexpected." After this, while he was sleeping as usual by the side of his wife, all the windows and doors of the chamber flew open at once, and Cæsar, confounded by the noise and the light of the moon shining down upon him, noticed that Calpurnia was in a deep slumber, but was uttering indistinct words and inarticulate groans in her sleep; for she dreamed, as it proved, that she was holding her murdered husband in her arms and bewailing him.

Some, however, say that this was not the vision which the woman had; but that there was attached to Cæsar's house to give it adornment and distinction, by vote of the senate, a gable-ornament, as Livy says, and it was this which Calpurnia in her dreams saw torn down, and therefore, as she thought, wailed and wept. At all events, when day came, she begged Cæsar, if it was possible, not to go out, but to postpone the meeting of the senate; if, however, he had no concern at all for her dreams, she besought him to enquire by other modes of divination and by sacrifices concerning the future. And Cæsar also, as it would appear, was in some suspicion and fear. For never before had he perceived in Calpurnia any womanish superstition, but now he saw that she was in great distress. And when the seers also, after many sacrifices, told him that the omens were unfavourable, he resolved to send Antony and dismiss the senate.

LXIV. But at this juncture Decimus Brutus, surnamed Albinus, who was so trusted by Cæsar that he was entered in his will as his second heir, but was partner in the conspiracy of the other Brutus and Cassius, fearing that, if Cæsar should elude that day, their undertaking would become known, ridiculed the seers and chided Cæsar for laying himself open to malicious charges on the part of the senators, who would think themselves mocked at; for they had met at his bidding, and were ready and willing to vote as one man that he should be declared king of the provinces outside of Italy, and might wear a diadem when he went anywhere else by land or sea; but if some one should tell them at their session to be gone now, but to come back again when Calpurnia should have better dreams, what speeches would be made by his enemies, or who would listen to his friends when they tried to show that this was not slavery and tyranny? But if he was fully resolved (Albinus said) to regard the day as inauspicious, it was better that he should go in person and address the senate, and then postpone its business. While saying these things Brutus took Cæsar by the hand and began to lead him along. And he had gone but a little way from his door when a slave belonging to some one else, eager to get at Cæsar, but unable to do so for the press of numbers about him, forced his way into the house, gave himself into the hands of Calpurnia, and bade her keep him secure until Cæsar came back, since he had important matters to report to him.

LXV. Furthermore, Artemidorus, a Cnidian by birth, a teacher of Greek philosophy, and on this account brought into intimacy with some of the followers of Brutus, so that he also knew most of what they were doing, came bringing to Cæsar in a small roll the disclosures which he was going to make; but seeing that Cæsar took all such rolls and handed them to his attendants, he came quite near, and said: "Read this, Cæsar, by thyself, and speedily; for it contains matters of importance and of concern to thee." Accordingly, Cæsar took the roll and would have read it, but was prevented by the multitude of people who engaged his attention, although he set out to do so many times, and holding in his hand and retaining that roll alone, he passed on into the senate. Some, however, say that another person gave him this roll, and that Artemidorus did not get to him at all, but was crowded away all along the route.

LXVI. So far, perhaps, these things may have happened of their own accord; the place, however, which was the scene of that struggle and murder, and in which the senate was then assembled, since it contained a statue of Pompey and had been dedicated by Pompey as an additional ornament to his theatre, made it wholly clear that it was the work of some heavenly power which was calling and guiding the action thither. Indeed, it is also said that Cassius, turning his eyes toward the statue of Pompey before the attack began, invoked it silently, although he was much addicted to the doctrines of Epicurus¹; but the crisis, as it would seem, when the dreadful attempt was now close at hand, replaced his former cool calculations with divinely inspired emotion.

Well, then, Antony, who was a friend of Cæsar's and a robust man, was detained outside by Brutus Albinus, who purposely engaged him in a lengthy conversation; but Cæsar went in, and the senate rose in his honour. Some of the partisans of Brutus took their places round the back of Cæsar's chair, while others went to meet him, as though they would support the petition which Tillius Cimber presented to Cæsar in behalf of his exiled brother, and they joined their entreaties to his and accompanied Cæsar up to his chair. But when, after taking his seat, Cæsar continued to repulse their petitions, and, as they pressed upon him with greater importunity, began to show anger towards one and another of them, Tillius seized his toga with both hands and pulled it down from his neck. This was the signal for the assault. It was Casca who gave him the first blow with his dagger, in the neck, not a mortal wound, nor even a deep one, for which he was too much confused, as was natural at the beginning of a deed of great daring; so that Cæsar turned about, grasped the knife, and held it fast. At almost the same instant both cried out, the smitten man in Latin: "Accursed Casca, what doest thou?" and the smiter, in Greek, to his brother: "Brother, help!"

So the affair began, and those who were not privy to the plot were filled with consternation and horror at what was going on; they dared not fly, nor go to Cæsar's help, nay, nor even utter a word. But those who had prepared themselves for the murder bared each of them his dagger, and Cæsar, hemmed in on all sides, whichever way he turned confronting blows of weapons aimed at his face and eyes, driven hither and thither like a wild beast, was entangled in the hands of all; for all had to take part in the sacrifice and taste of the slaughter. Therefore Brutus also gave him one blow in the groin. And it is said by some writers that although Cæsar defended himself against the rest and darted this way and that and cried aloud, when he saw that Brutus had drawn his dagger, he pulled his toga down over his head and sank, either by chance or because pushed there by his murderers, against the pedestal on which the statue of Pompey stood. And the pedestal was drenched with his blood, so that one might have thought that Pompey himself was presiding over this vengeance upon his enemy, who now lay prostrate at his feet, quivering from a multitude of wounds. For it is said that he received twenty-three; and many of the conspirators were wounded by one another, as they struggled to plant all those blows in one body.

LXVII. Cæsar thus done to death, the senators, although Brutus came forward as if to say something about what had been done, would not wait to hear him, but burst out of doors and fled, thus filling the people with confusion and helpless fear, so that some of them closed their houses, while others left their counters and places of business and ran, first to the place to see what had happened, then away from the place when they had seen. Antony and Lepidus, the chief friends of Cæsar, stole away and took refuge in the houses of others. But Brutus and his partisans, just as they were, still warm from the slaughter, displaying their daggers bare, went all in a body out of the senate-house and marched to the Capitol, not like fugitives, but with glad faces and full of confidence, summoning the multitude to freedom, and welcoming into their ranks the most distinguished of those who met them. Some also joined their number and went up with them as though they had shared in the deed, and laid claim to the glory of it, of whom were Caius Octavius and Lentulus Spinther. These men, then, paid the penalty for their imposture later, when they were put to death by Antony and the young Cæsar, without even enjoying the fame for the sake of which they died, owing to the disbelief of their fellow men. For even those who punished them did not exact a penalty for what they did, but for what they wished they had done.

On the next day Brutus came down and held a discourse, and the people listened to what was said without either expressing resentment at what had been done or appearing to approve of it; they showed, however, by their deep silence, that, while they pitied Cæsar, they respected Brutus. The senate, too, trying to make a general amnesty and reconciliation, voted to give Cæsar divine honours and not to disturb even the most insignificant measure which he had adopted when in power; while Brutus and his partisans it distributed provinces and gave suitable honours, so that everybody thought that matters were decided and settled in the best possible manner.

LXVIII. But when the will of Cæsar was opened and it was found that he had given every Roman citizen a considerable gift, and when the multitude saw his body carried through the forum all disfigured with its wounds, they no longer kept themselves within the restraints of order and discipline, but, after heaping round the body benches, railings, and tables from the forum, they set fire to them and burned it there; then, lifting blazing brands on high, they ran to the houses of the murderers with intent to burn them down, while others went every whither through the city seeking to seize the men themselves and tear them to pieces. Not one of these came in their way, but all were well barricaded. There was a certain Cinna, however, one of the friends of Cæsar, who chanced, as they say, to have seen during the previous night a strange vision. He dreamed, that is, that he was invited to supper by Cæsar, and that, when he excused himself, Cæsar led him along by the hand, although he did not wish to go, but resisted. Now, when he heard that they were burning the body of Cæsar in the forum, he rose up and went thither out of respect, although he had misgivings arising from his vision, and was at the same time in a fever. At sight of him, one of the multitude told his name to another who asked him what it was, and he to another, and at once word ran through the whole throng that this man was one of the murderers of Cæsar. For there was among the conspirators a man who bore this same name of Cinna, and, assuming that this man was he, the crowd rushed upon him and tore him in pieces among them. This more than anything else made Brutus and Cassius afraid, and not many days afterwards they withdrew from the city. What they did and suffered before they died, has been told in the Life of Brutus.

LXIX. At the time of his death Cæsar was fully fifty-six years old, but he had survived Pompey not much more than four years, while of the power and dominion which he had sought all his life at so great risks, and barely achieved at last, of this he had reaped no fruit but the name of it only, and a glory which had awakened envy on the part of his fellow citizens. However, the great guardian-genius of the man, whose help he had enjoyed through life, followed upon him even after death as an avenger of his murder, driving and tracking down his slayers over every land and sea until not one of them was left, but even those who in any way soever either put hand to the deed or took part in the plot were punished.

Among events of man's ordering, the most amazing was that which befell Cassius; for after his defeat at Philippi he slew himself with that very dagger which he had used against Cæsar; and, among events of divine ordering, there was the great comet, which showed itself in great splendour for seven nights after Cæsar's murder, and then disappeared; also, the obscuration of the sun's rays. For during all that year its orb rose pale and without radiance, while the heat that came down from it was slight and ineffectual, so that the air in its circulation was dark and heavy owing to the feebleness of the warmth that penetrated it, and the fruits, imperfect and half ripe, withered away and shrivelled up on account of the coldness of the atmosphere. But more than anything else the phantom that appeared to Brutus showed that the murder of Cæsar was not pleasing to the gods; and it was on this wise. As he was about to take his army across from Abydos to the other continent, he was lying down at night, as his custom was, in his tent, not sleeping, but thinking of the future; for it is said that of all generals Brutus was least given to sleep, and that he naturally remained awake a longer time than anybody else. And now he thought he heard a noise at the door, and looking towards the light of the lamp, which was slowly going out, he saw a fearful vision of a man of unnatural size and harsh aspect. At first he was terrified, but when he saw that the visitor neither did nor said anything, but stood in silence by his couch, he asked him who he was. Then the phantom answered him: "I am thy evil genius, Brutus, and thou shalt see me at Philippi." At the time, then, Brutus said courageously: "I shall see thee"; and the heavenly visitor at once went away. Subsequently, however, when arrayed against Antony and Cæsar at Philippi, in the first battle he conquered the enemy in his front, routed and scattered them, and sacked the camp of Cæsar; but, as he was about to fight the second battle, the same phantom visited him again at night, and, though it said nothing to him, Brutus understood his fate, and plunged headlong into danger. He did not fall in battle, however, but after the rout retired to a crest of ground, put his naked sword to his breast (while a certain friend, as they say, helped to drive the blow home), and so died.

HISTORY

GREEK

THUCYDIDES

(471-400 B.C.)

Thucydides, foremost of Greek historians, was the exact antithesis of Herodotus (484-428 B.C.), who is sometimes called the father of history. Herodotus, an indefatigable traveler, is primarily interested in the human aspect of men and their actions; a tireless collector of tales and legends, he charms by that extraordinary gift for story-telling with which he embellished his dramatic accounts of the struggle of the Greek states against the invading Persians at Marathon, Thermopylæ, and Salamis. Thucydides, on the other hand, is in the main an authentic historian. He has been called the first great war correspondent and reporter. To a large extent an active participant in the Peloponnesian War (431-404), he set down in interesting style what he gained from first-hand knowledge, and supplemented such information with reports which he was always careful to investigate and verify. An acknowledged exception to this standard of scientific accuracy is formed by his speeches, which constitute between a fourth and a fifth part of the History, for Thucydides himself avows that in most cases he has reproduced only the substance of what was actually said and that in others he had to trust to more or less imperfect reports of the general sense of such speeches. It is probable that the case of Pericles, whose "Funeral Oration" is given below, is in a class by itself, for Thucydides must have repeatedly heard the great Athenian statesman deliver orations to the people of Athens.

The History of the Peloponnesian War, in which Thucydides describes the fratricidal struggle among the Greek states, following their victory over the Persians, shows a firm mental grasp which understood and deplored the tragic drama enacted under his eyes. There is a certain majesty of rhythm and a lofty grandeur in the historian's style which is especially evident in this speech of Pericles, as he addresses his countrymen and reveals the Athenian ideal of civic perfection.

The translation is that of Richard Crawley in Everyman's Library.

THE FUNERAL ORATION OF PERICLES

In the same winter the Athenians gave a funeral at the public cost to those who had first fallen in this war. It was a custom of their ancestors, and the manner of it is as follows. Three days before the ceremony, the bones of the dead are laid out in a tent which has been erected; and their friends bring to their relatives such offerings as they please. In the funeral procession cypress coffins are borne in cars, one for each tribe; the bones of the deceased being placed in the coffin of their tribe. Among these is carried one empty bier decked for the missing, that is, for those whose bodies could not be recovered. Any citizen or stranger who pleases joins in the procession: and the female relatives are there to wait at the burial. The dead are laid in the public sepulcher in the beautiful suburb of the city, in which those who fall in war are always buried; with the exception of those slain at Marathon, who for their singular and extraordinary valor were interred on the spot where they fell. After the bodies have been laid in the earth, a man chosen by the state, of approved wisdom and eminent reputation, pronounces over them an appropriate panegyric; after which all retire. Such is the manner of the burying; and throughout the whole of the war, whenever the occasion arose, the established custom was observed. Meanwhile these were the first that had fallen, and Pericles, son of Xanthippus, was chosen to pronounce their eulogium. When the proper time arrived, he advanced from the sepulcher to an elevated platform in order to be heard by as many of the crowd as possible, and spoke as follows:

"Most of my predecessors in this place have commended him who made this speech part of the law, telling us that it is well that it should be delivered at the burial of those who fall in battle. For myself, I should have thought that the worth which had displayed itself in deeds would be sufficiently rewarded by honors also shown by deeds; such as you now see in this funeral prepared at the people's cost. And I could have wished that the reputations of many brave men were not to be imperilled in the mouth of a single individual, to stand or fall according as he spoke well or ill. For it is hard to speak properly upon a subject where it is even difficult to convince your hearers that you are speaking the truth. On the one hand, the friend who is familiar with every fact of the story may think that some point has not been set forth with that fulness which he wishes and knows it to deserve; on the other, he who is a stranger to the matter may be led by envy to suspect exaggeration if he hears anything above his own nature. For men can endure to hear others praised only so long as they can severally persuade themselves of their own ability to equal the actions recounted: when this point is passed, envy comes in and with it incredulity. However, since our ancestors have stamped this custom with their approval, it becomes my duty to obey the law and to try to satisfy your several wishes and opinions as best I may.

"I shall begin with our ancestors: it is both just and proper that they should have the honor of the first mention on an occasion like the present. They dwelt in the country without break in the succession from generation to generation, and handed it down free to the present time by their valor. And if our more remote ancestors deserve praise, much more do our own fathers, who added to their inheritance the empire which we now possess, and spared no pains to be able to leave their acquisitions to us of the present generation. Lastly, there are few parts of our dominions that have not been augmented by those of us here, who are still more or less in the vigor of life; while the mother country has been furnished by us with everything that can enable her to depend on her own resources whether for war or for peace. That part of our history which tells of the military achievements which gave us our several possessions, or of the ready valor with which either we or our fathers stemmed the tide of Hellenic or foreign aggression, is a theme too familiar to my hearers for me to dilate on, and I shall therefore pass it by. But what was the road by which we reached our position, what the form of government under which our greatness grew, what the national habits out of which it sprang; these are questions which I may try to solve before I proceed to my panegyric upon these men; since I think this to be a subject upon which on the present occasion a speaker may properly dwell, and to which the whole assemblage, whether citizens or foreigners, may listen with advantage.

"Our constitution does not copy the laws of neighboring states; we are rather a pattern to others than imitators ourselves. Its administration favors the many instead of the few; this is why it is called a democracy. If we look to the laws, they afford equal justice to all in their private differences; if to social standing, advancement in public life falls to reputation for capacity, class considerations not being allowed to interfere with merit; nor again does poverty bar the way; if a man is able to serve the state, he is not hindered by the obscurity of his condition. The freedom which we enjoy in our government extends also to our ordinary life. There, far from exercising a jealous surveillance over each other, we do not feel called upon to be angry with our neighbor for doing what he likes, or even to indulge in those injurious looks which cannot fail to be offensive, although they inflict no positive penalty. But all this ease in our private relations does not make us lawless as citizens. Against this fear is our chief safeguard, teaching us to obey the magistrates and the laws, particularly such as regard the protection of the injured, whether they are actually on the statute book, or belong to that code which, although unwritten, yet cannot be broken without acknowledged disgrace.

"Further, we provide plenty of means for the mind to refresh itself from business. We celebrate games and sacrifices all the year round, and the elegance of our private establishments forms a daily source of pleasure and helps to banish the spleen; while the magnitude of our city draws the produce of the world into our harbor, so that to the Athenian the fruits of other countries are as familiar a luxury as those of his own.

"If we turn to our military policy, there also we differ from our antagonists. We throw open our city to the world, and never by alien acts exclude foreigners from any opportunity of learning or observing, although the eyes of an enemy may occasionally profit by our liberality; trusting less in system and policy than to the native spirit of our citizens; while in education, where our rivals from their very cradles by a painful discipline seek after manliness, at Athens we live exactly as we please, and yet are just as ready to encounter every legitimate danger. In proof of this it may be noticed that the Lacedæmonians do not invade our country alone, but bring with them all their confederates; while we Athenians advance unsupported into the territory of a neighbor, and fighting upon a foreign soil usually vanquish with ease men who are defending their homes. Our united force was never yet encountered by any enemy, because we have at once to attend to our marine and to despatch our citizens by land upon a hundred different services; so that, wherever they engage with some such fraction of our strength, a success against a detachment is magnified into a victory over the nation, and a defeat into a reverse suffered at the hands of our entire people. And yet if, with habits not of labor but of ease, and courage not of art but of nature, we are still willing to encounter danger, we have the double advantage of escaping the experience of hardships in anticipation and of facing them in the hour of need as fearlessly as those who are never free from them.

"Nor are these the only points in which our city is worthy of admiration. We cultivate refinement without extravagance and knowledge without effeminacy; wealth we employ more for use than for show, and place the real disgrace of poverty not in owning to the fact but in declining the struggle against it. Our public men have, besides politics, their private affairs to attend to, and our ordinary citizens, though occupied with the pursuits of industry, are still fair judges of public matters; for, unlike any other nation, regarding him who takes no part in these duties not as unambitious but as useless, we Athenians are able to judge at all events if we cannot originate, and, instead of looking on discussion as a stumbling-block in the way of action, we think it an indispensable preliminary to any wise action at all. Again, in our enterprises we present the singular spectacle of daring and deliberation, each carried to its highest point, and both united in the same persons; although usually decision is the fruit of ignorance, hesitation of reflection. But the palm of courage will surely be adjudged most justly to those who best know the difference between hardship and pleasure and yet are never tempted to shrink from danger. In generosity we are equally singular, acquiring our friends by conferring not by receiving favors. Yet, of course, the doer of the favor is the firmer friend of the two, in order by continued kindness to keep the recipient in his debt; while the debtor feels less keenly from the very consciousness that the return he makes will be a payment, not a free gift. And it is only the Athenians who, fearless of consequences, confer their benefits not from calculations of expediency, but in the confidence of liberality.

"In short, I say that as a city we are the school of Hellas; while I doubt if the world can produce a man who, where he has only himself to depend upon, is equal to so many emergencies, and graced by so happy a versatility as the Athenian. And that this is no mere boast thrown out for the occasion, but plain matter of fact, the power of the state acquired by these habits proves. For Athens alone of her contemporaries is found when tested to be greater than her reputation, and alone gives no occasion to her assailants to blush at the antagonist by whom they have been worsted, or to her subjects to question her title by merit to rule. Rather, the admiration of the present and succeeding ages will be ours, since we have not left our power without witness, but have shown it by mighty proofs; and far from needing a Homer for our panegyrist, or other of his craft whose verses might charm for the moment only for the impression which they gave to melt at the touch of fact, we have forced every sea and land to be the highway of our daring, and everywhere, whether for evil or for good, have left imperishable monuments behind us. Such is the Athens for which these men, in the assertion of their resolve not to lose her, nobly fought and died; and well may every one of their survivors be ready to suffer in her cause.

"Indeed if I have dwelt at some length upon the character of our country, it has been to show that our stake in the struggle is not the same as theirs who have no such blessings to lose, and also that the panegyric of the men over whom I am now speaking might be by definite proofs established. That panegyric is now in a great measure complete; for the Athens that I have celebrated is only what the heroism of these and their like have made her, men whose fame, unlike that of most Hellenes, will be found to be only commensurate with their deserts. And if a test of worth be wanted, it is to be found in their closing scene, and this not only in the cases in which it set the final seal upon their merit, but also in those in which it gave the first intimation of their having any. For there is justice in the claim that steadfastness in his country's battles should be as a cloak to cover a man's other imperfections; since the good action has blotted out the bad, and his merit as a citizen more than out-weighed his demerits as an individual. But none of these allowed either wealth with its prospect of future enjoyment to unnerve his spirit, or poverty with its hope of a day of freedom and riches to tempt him to shrink from danger. No, holding that vengeance upon their enemies was more to be desired than any personal blessings, and reckoning this to be the most glorious of hazards, they joyfully determined to accept the risk, to make sure of their vengeance and to let their wishes wait; and while committing to hope the uncertainty of final success, in the business before them they thought fit to act boldly and trust in themselves. Thus choosing to die resisting, rather than to live submitting, they fled only from dishonor, but met danger face to face, and after one brief moment, while at the summit of their fortune, escaped, not from their fear, but from their glory.

"So died these men as became Athenians. You, their survivors, must determine to have as unflinching a resolution in the field, though you may pray that it may have a happier issue. And not contented with ideas derived only from words of the advantages which are bound up with the defence of your country, though these would furnish a valuable text to a speaker even before an audience so alive to them as the present, you must yourselves realize the power of Athens, and feed your eyes upon her from day to day, till love of her fills your hearts; and then when all her greatness shall break upon you, you must reflect that it was by courage, sense of duty, and a keen feeling of honor in action that men were enabled to win all this, and that no personal failure in an enterprise could make them consent to deprive their country of their valor, but they laid it at her feet as the most glorious contribution that they could offer. For this offering of their lives made in common by them all they each of them individually received that renown which never grows old, and for a sepulcher, not so much that in which their bones have been deposited, but that noblest of shrines wherein their glory is laid up to be eternally remembered upon every occasion on which deed or story shall call for its commemoration. For heroes have the whole earth for their tomb; and in lands far from their own, where the column with its epitaph declares it, there is enshrined in every breast a record unwritten with no tablet to preserve it, except that of the heart. These take as your model, and judging happiness to be the fruit of freedom and freedom of valor, never decline the dangers of war. For it is not the miserable that would most justly be unsparing of their lives; these have nothing to hope for: it is rather they to whom continued life may bring reverses as yet unknown, and to whom a fall, if it came, would be most tremendous in its consequences. And surely, to a man of spirit, the degradation of cowardice must be immeasurably more grievous than the unfelt death which strikes him in the midst of his strength and patriotism!

"Comfort, therefore, not condolence, is what I have to offer to the parents of the dead who may be here. Numberless are the chances to which, as they know, the life of man is subject; but fortunate indeed are they who draw for their lot a death so glorious as that which has caused your mourning, and to whom life has been so exactly measured as to terminate in the happiness in which it has been passed. Still I know that this is a hard saying, especially when those are in question of whom you will constantly be reminded by seeing in the homes of others blessings of which once you also boasted: for grief is felt not so much for the want of what we have never known, as for the loss of that to which we have been long accustomed. Yet you who are still of an age to beget children must bear up in the hope of having others in their stead; not only will they help you to forget those whom you have lost, but will be to the state at once a reinforcement and a security; for never can a fair or just policy be expected of the citizen who does not, like his fellows, bring to the decision the interests and apprehensions of a father. While those of you who have passed your prime must congratulate yourselves with the thought that the best part of your life was fortunate, and that the brief span that remains will be cheered by the fame of the departed. For it is only the love of honor that never grows old; and honor it is, not gain, as some would have it, that rejoices the heart of age and helplessness.

"Turning to the sons or brothers of the dead, I see an arduous struggle before you. When a man is gone, all are wont to praise him, and, should your merit be ever so transcendent, you will still find it difficult not merely to overtake, but even to approach their renown. The living have envy to contend with, while those who are no longer in our path are honored with a good-will into which rivalry does not enter. On the other hand, if I must say anything on the subject of female excellence to those of you who will now be in widowhood, it will be all comprised in this brief exhortation. Great will be your glory in not falling short of your natural character; and greatest will be hers who is least talked of among the men whether for good or for bad.

"My task is now finished. I have performed it to the best of my ability, and in word, at least, the requirements of the law are now satisfied. If deeds be in question, those who are here interred have received part of their honors already, and, for the rest, their children will be brought up till manhood at the public expense: the state thus offers a valuable prize, as the garland of victory in this race of valor, for the reward both of those who have fallen and their survivors. And where the rewards for merit are greatest, there are found the best citizens.

"And now that you have brought to a close your lamentations for your relatives, you may depart."

LATIN

CÆSAR

Caius Julius Cæsar, the Dictator, was trained in his boyhood by the same teacher who trained Cicero. He gained access to the political life of the country at an early age through the marriage of his aunt to the famous Marius. He himself at the age of nineteen married Cornelia, the daughter of a prominent leader in Marius's party. So strongly identified was he with this party that, when the balance of power swung to Sulla, he had to flee from Rome. Later, having obtained pardon from Sulla, he began his military career by joining an expedition into Asia. At the death of Sulla (78 B.C.) he returned to Rome and introduced himself to the public in the usual Roman fashion by undertaking the defense and prosecution of persons accused of crime by the state. After a brief term of study at Rhodes, he came back to enter various public offices and to bend all his energies toward acquiring the favor of the people. It was at this time that he became implicated in the conspiracy of Catiline. After clearing himself of suspicion, or at least the consequences of it, he continued to rise from one office to another and at length was elected to the consulship. His unofficial union with Pompey and Crassus was later called the first triumvirate. With the help of these men he was able to disregard the other consul, Bibulus. In 58 B.C. Cæsar was granted the Gallic provinces and began his famous series of campaigns to subdue them. The nine campaigns (58 B.C.-50 B.C.) which followed proved him to be one of the greatest military leaders of all time, and won him the unstinted applause of the whole Roman nation. Cæsar's success alarmed Pompey, who sought to protect himself by establishing a senatorial decree against Cæsar, demanding that he give up his command and return to Rome for trial. The tribunes protested uselessly and had at length to flee to Cæsar's camp for safety. Knowing that Pompey was outside Rome with a strong army, Cæsar would not risk resigning his command and coming alone to be tried. Marching southward under the pretext of protecting the tribunes, he boldly crossed the Rubicon and marched triumphantly into Rome. Pompey retired to Brundisium and then to Greece, suffering defeat by Cæsar in both places; finally, fleeing to Egypt, he was pursued by Cæsar, but was murdered before he was captured. Cæsar in Rome was made absolute ruler for one year. In 46 he was made dictator for ten years and censor for three years; and in the year 45 he was made imperator for life. The rest of his story is told in the selection from his life here printed (pp. 305-312).

Cæsar was gifted with an abundance of natural talent. He was a statesman, general, law-giver, jurist, poet, historian, philologist, mathematician, orator, and architect. The only writings by him which have come down to us are his Commentaries on the Gallic War and on the Civil Wars. In these his style is conspicuous for purity and clearness. Though much of the work is merely the record of events, it must be remembered that the Commentaries were written with a Roman audience in mind, an audience before whom Cæsar might some day have to justify himself. As such they reveal a rare skill in marshalling the facts, and at times a ready sense of the dramatic.

THE GALLIC WAR

BOOK V

CHAPTER VIII. When these things were done (and) Labienus, left on the continent with three legions and 2,000 horse, to defend the harbours and provide corn, and discover what was going on in Gaul, and take measures according to the occasion and according to the circumstance; he himself (Cæsar), with five legions and a number of horse, equal to that which he was leaving on the continent, set sail at sun-set, and (though for a time) borne forward by a gentle south-west wind, he did not maintain his course, in consequence of the wind dying away about midnight, and being carried on too far by the tide, when the sun rose, espied Britain passed on his left. Then, again, following the change of tide, he urged on with the oars that he might make that part of the island in which he had discovered the preceding summer, that there was the best landing-place, and in this affair the spirit of our soldiers was very much to be extolled; for they with the transports and heavy ships, the labour of rowing not being (for a moment) discontinued, equalled the speed of the ships of war. All the ships reached Britain nearly at mid-day; nor was there seen a (single) enemy in that place, but, as Cæsar afterwards found from some prisoners, though large bodies of troops had assembled there, yet being alarmed by the great number of our ships, more than eight hundred of which, including the ships of the preceding year, and those private vessels which each had built for his own convenience, had appeared at one time, they had quitted the coast and concealed themselves among the higher points.

IX. Cæsar, having disembarked his army and chosen a convenient place for the camp, when he discovered from the prisoners in what part the forces of the enemy had lodged themselves, having left ten cohorts and 300 horse at the sea, to be a guard to the ships, hastens to the enemy, at the third watch, fearing the less for the ships, for this reason because he was leaving them fastened at anchor upon an even and open shore; and he placed Q. Atrius over the guard of ships. He himself, having advanced by night about twelve miles, espied the forces of the enemy. They, advancing to the river with their cavalry and chariots from the higher ground, began to annoy our men and give battle. Being repulsed by our cavalry, they concealed themselves in woods, as they had secured a place admirably fortified by nature and by art, which, as it seemed, they had before prepared on account of civil war; for all entrances to it were shut up by a great number of felled trees. They themselves rushed out of the woods to fight here and there, and prevented our men from entering their fortifications. But the soldiers of the seventh legion, having formed a *testudo*¹ and thrown up a rampart against the fortification, took the place and drove them out of the woods, receiving only a few wounds. But Cæsar forbade his men to pursue them in their flight any great distance; both because he was ignorant of the nature of the ground, and because, as a great part of the day was spent, he wished time to be left for the fortification of the camp.

X. The next day, early in the morning, he sent both foot-soldiers and horse in three divisions on an expedition to pursue those who had fled. These having advanced a little way, when already the rear (of the enemy) was in sight, some horse came to Cæsar from Quintus Atrius, to report that the preceding night, a very great storm having arisen, almost all the ships were dashed to pieces and cast upon the shore, because neither the anchors and cables could resist, nor could the sailors and pilots sustain the violence of the storm; and thus great damage was received by that collision of the ships.

XI. These things being known (to him), Cæsar orders the legions and cavalry to be recalled and to cease from their march; he himself returns to the ships: he sees clearly before him almost the same things which he had heard of from the messengers and by letter, so that, about forty ships being lost, the remainder seemed capable of being repaired with much labour. Therefore he selects workmen from the legions, and orders others to be sent for from the continent; he writes to Labienus to build as many ships as he could with those legions which were with him. He himself, though the matter was one of great difficulty and labour, yet thought it to be most expedient for all the ships to be brought up on shore and joined with the camp by one fortification. In these matters he employed about ten days, the labour of the soldiers being unremitting even during the hours of night. The ships having been brought up on shore and the camp strongly fortified, he left the same forces which he did before as a guard for the ships; he sets out in person for the same place that he had returned from. When he had come thither, greater forces of the Britons had already assembled at that place, the chief command and management of the war having been entrusted to Cassivellaunus, whose territories a river, which is called the Thames, separates from the maritime states at about eighty miles from the sea. At an earlier period perpetual wars had taken place between him and the other states; but, greatly alarmed by our arrival, the Britons had placed him over the whole war and the conduct of it.

XII. The interior portion of Britain is inhabited by those of whom they say that it is handed down by tradition that they were born in the island itself; the maritime portion by those who had passed over from the country of the Belgæ for the purpose of plunder and making war; almost all of whom are called by the names of those states from which being sprung they went thither, and, having waged war, continued there and began to cultivate the lands. The number of the people is countless, and their buildings exceedingly numerous, for the most part very like those of the Gauls: the number of cattle is great. They use either brass or iron rings, determined at a certain weight, as their money. Tin is produced in the midland regions; in the maritime, iron; but the quantity of it is small: they employ brass, which is imported. There, as in Gaul, is timber of every description, except beech and fir. They do not regard it lawful to eat the hare, and the cock, and the goose; they, however, breed them for amusement and pleasure. The climate is more temperate than in Gaul, the cold being less severe.

XIII. The island is triangular in its form, and one of its sides is opposite to Gaul. One angle of this side, which is in Kent, whither almost all ships from Gaul are directed, (looks) to the east; the lower looks to the south. This side extends about 500 miles. Another side lies towards Spain and the west, on which part is Ireland, less, as is reckoned, than Britain, by one-half; but the passage (from it) into Britain is of equal distance with that from Gaul. In the middle of this voyage is an island, which is called Mona: many smaller islands besides are supposed to lie (there), of which islands some have written that at the time of the winter solstice it is night there for thirty consecutive days. We, in our inquiries about that matter, ascertained nothing, except that, by accurate measurements with water, we perceived the nights to be shorter there than on the continent. The length of this side, as their account states, is 700 miles. The third side is towards the north, to which portion of the island no land is opposite; but an angle of that side looks principally towards Germany. This side is considered to be 800 miles in length. Thus the whole island is (about) 2,000 miles in circumference.

XIV. The most civilized of all these nations are they who inhabit Kent, which is entirely a maritime district, nor do they differ much from the Gallic customs. Most of the inland inhabitants do not sow corn, but live on milk and flesh, and are clad with skins. All the Britons, indeed, dye themselves with wood, which occasions a bluish colour, and thereby have a more terrible appearance in fight. They wear their hair long, and have every part of their body shaved except their head and upper lip. Ten and even twelve have wives common to them, and particularly brothers among brothers, and parents among their children; but if there be any issue by these wives, they are reputed to be the children of those by whom respectively each was first espoused when a virgin.

XV. The horse and charioteers of the enemy contended vigorously in a skirmish with our cavalry on the march; yet so that our men were conquerors in all parts, and drove them to their woods and hills; but, having slain a great many, they pursued too eagerly, and lost some of their men. But the enemy, after some time had elapsed, when our men were off their guard, and occupied in the fortification of the camp, rushed out of the woods, and, making an attack upon those who were placed on duty before the camp, fought in a determined manner; and two cohorts being sent by Cæsar to their relief, and these severally the first of two legions, when these had taken up their position at a very small distance from each other, as our men were disconcerted by the unusual mode of battle, the enemy broke through the middle of them most courageously, and retreated thence in safety. That day, Q. Laberius Durus, a tribune of the soldiers, was slain. The enemy, since more cohorts were sent against them, were repulsed.

XVI. In the whole of this method of fighting since the engagement took place under the eyes of all and before the camp, it was perceived that our men, on account of the weight of their arms, inasmuch as they could neither pursue (the enemy when) retreating, nor dare quit their standards, were little suited to this kind of enemy; that the horse also fought with great danger, because they (the Britons) generally retreated even designedly, and, when they had drawn off our men a short distance from the legions, leaped from their chariots and fought on foot in unequal (and to them advantageous) battle. But the system of cavalry engagement is wont to produce equal danger, and indeed the same, both to those who retreat and those who pursue. To this was added, that they never fought in close order, but in small parties and at great distances, and had detachments placed (in different parts), and then the one relieved the other, and the vigorous and fresh succeeded the wearied.

XVII. The following day the enemy halted on the hills, a distance from our camp, and presented themselves in small parties, and began to challenge our horse to battle with less spirit than the day before. But at noon, when Cæsar had sent three legions, and all the cavalry with C. Trebonius, the lieutenant, for the purpose of foraging, they flew upon the foragers suddenly from all quarters, so that they did not keep off (even) from the standards and the legions. Our men, making an attack on them vigorously, repulsed them; nor did they cease to pursue them until the horse, relying on relief, as they saw the legions behind them, drove the enemy precipitately before them, and, slaying a great number of them, did not give them the opportunity either of rallying, or halting, or leaping from their chariots. Immediately after this retreat, the auxiliaries, who had assembled from all sides, departed; nor after that time did the enemy ever engage with us in very large numbers.

XVIII. Cæsar, discovering their design, leads his army into the territories of Cassivellaunus to the river Thames; which river can be forded in one place only, and that with difficulty. When he had arrived there, he perceives that numerous forces of the enemy were marshalled on the other bank of the river; the bank also was defended by sharp stakes fixed in front, and stakes of the same kind fixed under the water were covered by the river. These things being discovered from (some) prisoners and deserters, Cæsar, sending forward the cavalry, ordered the legions to follow them immediately. But the soldiers advanced with such speed and such ardour, though they stood above the water by their heads only, that the enemy could not sustain the attack of the legions and of the horse, and quitted the banks, and committed themselves to flight.

XIX. Cassivellaunus, as we have stated above, all hope (rising out) of battle being laid aside, the greater part of his forces being dismissed, and about 4,000 chariot-eers only being left, used to observe our marches and retire a little from the road, and conceal himself in intricate and woody places, and, in those neighbourhoods in which he had discovered we were about to march, he used to drive the cattle and the inhabitants from the fields into the woods; and, when our cavalry, for the sake of plundering and ravaging the more freely, scattered themselves among the fields, he used to send out charioteers from the woods by all the well-known roads and paths, and, to the great danger of our horse, engage with them; and this source of fear hindered them from straggling very extensively. The result was that Cæsar did not allow excursions to be made to a great distance from the main body of the legions, and ordered that damage should be done to the enemy in ravaging their lands and kindling fires only so far as the legionary soldiers could, by their own exertion and marching, accomplish it.

XX. In the meantime, the Trinobantes, almost the most powerful state of those parts, from which the young man, Mandubratius, embracing the protection of Cæsar, had come to the continent of Gaul to (meet) him (whose father, Imanuentius, had possessed the sovereignty in that state, and had been killed by Cassivellaunus; he himself had escaped death by flight), send ambassadors to Cæsar, and promise that they will surrender themselves to him and perform his commands; they entreat him to protect Mandubratius from the violence of Cassivellaunus, and send to their state some one to preside over it, and possess the government. Cæsar demands forty hostages from them, and corn for his army, and sends Mandubratius to them. They speedily performed the things demanded, and sent hostages to the number appointed, and the corn.

XXI. The Trinobantes being protected and secured from any violence of the soldiers, the Cenimagni, the Segontiaci, the Ancalites, the Bibroci, and the Cassi, sending embassies, surrender themselves to Cæsar. From them he learns that the capital town of Cassivellaunus was not far from that place, and was defended by woods and morasses, and a very large number of men and of cattle had been collected in it. (Now the Britons, when they have fortified the intricate woods, in which they are wont to assemble for the purpose of avoiding the incursion of an enemy, with an entrenchment and a rampart, call them a town.) Thither he proceeds with his legions: he finds the place admirably fortified by nature and art; he, however, undertakes to attack it in two directions. The enemy, having remained only a short time, did not sustain the attack of our soldiers, and hurried away on the other side of the town. A great amount of cattle was found there, and many of the enemy were taken and slain in their flight.

XXII. While these things are going forward in those places, Cassivellaunus sends messengers into Kent, which, we have observed above, is on the sea, over which districts four several kings reigned, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus and Segonax, and commands them to collect all their forces, and unexpectedly assail and storm the naval camp. When they had come to the camp, our men, after making a sally, slaying many of their men, and also capturing a distinguished leader named Lugotorix, brought back their own men in safety. Cassivellaunus, when this battle was reported to him as so many losses had been sustained, and his territories laid waste, being alarmed most of all by the desertion of the states, sends ambassadors to Cæsar (to treat) about a surrender through the mediation of Commius the Atrebatian. Cæsar, since he had determined to pass the winter on the continent, on account of the sudden revolts of Gaul, and as much of the summer did not remain, and he perceived that even that could be easily protracted, demands hostages, and prescribes what tribute Britain should pay each year to the Roman people; he forbids and commands Cassivellaunus that he wage not war against Mandubratius or the Trinobantes.

XXIII. When he had received the hostages, he leads back the army to the sea, and finds the ships repaired. After launching these, because he had a large number of prisoners, and some of the ships had been lost in the storm, he determines to convey back his army at two embarkations. And it so happened, that out of so large a number of ships, in so many voyages, neither in this nor in the previous year was any ship missing which conveyed soldiers; but very few out of those which were sent back to him from the continent empty, as the soldiers of the former convoy 10 had been disembarked, and out of those (sixty in number) which Labienus had taken care to have built, reached their destination; almost all the rest were driven back, and when Cæsar had waited for them for some time in vain, lest he should be debarred from a voyage by the season of the year, inasmuch as the equinox was at hand, he of necessity stowed his soldiers the more closely, and, a very great calm coming on, after he had weighed anchor at the beginning of the second watch, he reached land at break of day and brought in all the ships in safety.

CRITICISM

LATIN

HORACE

The work of Donatus, the fourth-century Latin scholar, helped to introduce Horace's critical work to later ages in Europe. Dante knew Horace through Donatus, and the power of Dante's name gave Horace a place of prominence during the Revival of Learning. When Aristotle was discovered, the two critics, Greek and Latin, began a parallel course of popularity, which they maintained throughout the Renaissance. It is probable that among the admirers of Aristotle the Greek philosopher carried more weight than Horace; but he also aroused more antagonism. Horace's discussion of poetry dealt with things about which there could be little difference of opinion, and he avoided the more difficult fundamental questions argued by Aristotle. The central doctrine of Horace's creed, that the purpose of drama is pleasure and profit, is easy to understand and to believe. The difficulty arises when, like Aristotle, we try to define pleasure and profit. For Horace's life, see p. 247.

THE ART OF POETRY

Suppose a painter to a human head Should join a horse's neck, and wildly
spread
The various plumage of the feather'd kind O'er limbs of different beasts, absurdly
join'd;
Or if he gave to view a beauteous maid
Above the waist with every charm array'd,
Should a foul fish her lower parts enfold,
Would you not laugh such pictures to behold?
Such is the book, that, like a sick man's dreams,
Varies all shapes, and mixes all extremes.
"Painters and poets our indulgence
claim,
Their daring equal, and their art the
same."
I own th' indulgence. — Such I give and
take;
But not through Nature's sacred rules to break,
Monstrous to mix the cruel and the kind,
Serpents with birds, and lambs with tigers
join'd.

Your opening promises some great
design,
And shreds of purple with broad lustre
shine,
5 Sew'd on your poem. Here in labour'd strain
A sacred grove, or fair Diana's fane, Rises to view; there through delicious
meads
10 A murmuring stream its winding water leads;
Here pours the rapid Rhine; the wat'ry
bow
There bends its colours, and with pride
15 they glow.
Beauties they are, but beauties out of
place;
For though your talent be to paint with grace
20 A mournful cypress, would you pour its shade
O'er the tempestuous deep, if you were paid
To paint a sailor, 'midst the winds and
waves,
When on a broken plank his life he saves?
Why will you thus a mighty vase intend,
If in a worthless bowl your labours end?

Then learn this wandering humour to control,
 And keep one equal tenor through the whole.
 But oft, our greatest errors take their rise
 From our best views. I strive to be concise;
 I prove obscure. My strength, my fire decays,
 When in pursuit of elegance and ease.
 Aiming at greatness, some to fustian soar;
 Some in cold safety creep along the shore,
 Too much afraid of storms; while he, who tries
 With ever-varying wonders to surprise,
 In the broad forest bids his dolphins play,
 And paints his boars disporting in the sea.
 Thus, injudicious, while one fault we shun,
 Into its opposite extreme we run.
 One happier artist of th' Æmilian square,
 Who graves the nails, and forms the flowing hair,
 Though he excels in every separate part,
 Yet fails of just perfection in his art,
 In one grand whole unknowing to unite
 Those different parts; and I no more would write
 Like him, than with a nose of hideous size
 Be gaz'd at for the finest hair and eyes.
 Examine well, ye writers, weigh with care,
 What suits your genius; what your strength can bear.
 To him, who shall his theme with judgment choose,
 Nor words nor method shall their aid refuse.
 In this, or I mistake, consists the grace,
 And force of method, to assign a place
 For what with present judgment we should say,
 And for some happier time the rest delay.
 Would you to Fame a promis'd work produce,
 Be delicate and cautious in the use
 And choice of words: nor shall you fail of praise,
 When nicely joining two known words you raise
 A third unknown. A new-discover'd theme
 For those, unheard in ancient times, may claim
 A just and ample licence, which, if us'd
 With fair discretion, never is refus'd.
 New words, and lately made, shall credit claim,
 If from a Grecian source they gently stream;
 For Virgil, sure, and Varius¹ may receive
 That kind indulgence which the Romans gave
 To Plautus² and Cæcilius³: or shall I
 Be envied, if my little fund supply
 Its frugal wealth of words, since bards, who sung
 In ancient days, enrich'd their native tongue
 With large increase? An undisputed power
 Of coining money from the rugged ore,
 Nor less of coining words, is still confest,
 If with a legal public stamp imprest.
 As when the forest, with the bending year,
 First sheds the leaves which earliest appear,
 So an old age of words maturely dies,
 Others new-born in youth and vigour rise.
 We and our noblest works to Fate must yield;
 Even Cæsar's mole,⁴ which royal pride might build,
 Where Neptune far into the land extends,
 And from the raging North our fleets defends;
 That barren marsh, whose cultivated plain
 Now gives the neighbouring towns its various grain;
 Tiber, who, taught a better current, yields
 To Cæsar's power, nor deluges our fields;

¹ A distinguished poet of the Augustan age, a friend of Vergil and Horace.

² A famous Roman writer of comedy (see introductory note on his life and works).

³ A Roman writer of comedy anciently classed with Plautus and Terence.

⁴ Cæsar proposed to enlarge and to protect the harbor of Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber, to drain the Pontine marshes, and to divert the course of the Tiber. These improvements, suggested by him in 45 B.C., were not finished in his time, but the first two were completed by his successor. The Pontine marshes were not finally drained until 1932 A.D.

All these must perish, and shall words presume

To hold their honours, and immortal bloom?

Many shall rise, that now forgotten lie;
Others, in present credit, soon shall die,
If custom will, whose arbitrary sway,
Words, and the forms of language, must obey.

By Homer taught the modern poet 10
sings,

In epic strains, of heroes, wars, and kings.
Unequal measures first were tun'd to flow,
Sadly expressive of the lover's woe;

But now, to gayer subjects form'd, they 15
move

In sounds of pleasure, to the joys of love:
By whom invented, critics yet contend,
And of their vain disputings find no end.

Archilochus,¹ with fierce resentment 20
warm'd,

Was with his own severe iambics arm'd,
Whose rapid numbers, suited to the stage,
In comic humour, or in tragic rage,

With sweet variety were found to please, 25
And taught the dialogue to flow with ease;
Their numerous cadence was for action fit,
And form'd to quell the clamours of the pit.

The Muse to nobler subjects tunes her 30
lyre;

Gods, and the sons of gods, her song inspire,

Wrestler and steed,² who gain'd th' Olympian prize;

Love's pleasing cares, and wine's unbounded joys.³

But if, through weakness, or my want of art,

I can't to every different style impart 40
The proper strokes and colours it may claim,

Why am I honour'd with a poet's name?

Absurdly modest, why my fault discern,
Yet rather burst in ignorance than learn?

Nor will the genius of the comic Muse
Sublimer tones, or tragic numbers, use;

5 Nor will the direful Thyestean feast
In comic phrase and language be debas'd:
Then let your style be suited to the scene;
And its peculiar character maintain.

Yet Comedy sometimes her voice may raise,

And angry Chremes⁴ rail in swelling phrase:

As oft the tragic language humbly flows,—
For Telephus⁵ or Peleus,⁶ 'midst the woes
Of poverty or exile, must complain

In prose-like style, must quit the swelling
strain,

And words gigantic, if with nature's art
They hope to touch their melting hearer's
heart.

'Tis not enough, ye writers, that ye charm

With ease and elegance; a play should warm

25 With soft concernment; should possess
the soul,

And, as it wills, the listening crowd control.

With them, who laugh, our social joy
appears;

With them, who mourn, we sympathise in
tears:

If you would have me weep, begin the
strain,

35 Then I shall feel your sorrows, feel your
pain;

But if your heroes act not what they say,
I sleep or laugh the lifeless scene away.

The varying face should every passion
show,

And words of sorrow wear the look of woe;
Let it in joy assume a vivid air;

Fierce when in rage; in seriousness severe:

¹ A famous Greek satirical poet (714–676 B.C.). There is a tradition concerning him that, when he was rejected by one of the daughters of Lycambus, he composed a series of such fierce iambics against the whole family that Lycambus's daughters hanged themselves through shame.

² Horace refers here to the subjects chosen by Pindar in his Odes (see the introductory note on Pindar).

³ As in the poetry of Sappho and Anacreon.

⁴ A stock character in Plautus's comedies, usually the irate father.

⁵ Son of Hercules. Various tragic stories are told about him, the most famous being that of his being wounded by Achilles. It was found that the wound could be cured only by the one who inflicted it. Telephus kidnapped the infant Orestes, son of Agamemnon, and thus forced Agamemnon to use his influence with Achilles to cure the wound.

⁶ Father of Achilles. He killed his step-brother Phocus and was forced to go into exile.

For Nature to each change of fortune forms
The secret soul, and all its passions warms; Transports to rage, dilates the heart with mirth, Wrings the sad soul, and bends it down to
earth.
The tongue these various movements must express:
But, if ill-suited to the deep distress
His language prove, the sons of Rome engage
To laugh th' unhappy actor off the stage.
Your style should an important difference make
When heroes, gods, or awful sages speak:
When florid youth, whom gay desires in-
flame;
A busy servant, or a wealthy dame;
A merchant wandering with incessant toil,
Or he who cultivates the verdant soil:
But if in foreign realms you fix your scene,
Their genius, customs, dialects maintain.
Or follow fame, or in th' invented tale
Let seeming, well-united truth prevail:
If Homer's great Achilles tread the stage,
Intrepid, fierce, of unforgiving rage,
Like Homer's hero, let him spurn all laws,
And by the sword alone assert his cause.
With untam'd fury let Medea ¹ glow,
And Ino's ² tears in ceaseless anguish flow.
From realm to realm her griefs let Io ³
bear,
And sad Orestes ⁴ rave in deep despair.
But if you venture on an untried theme,
And form a person yet unknown to fame,
From his first entrance to the closing scene
Let him one equal character maintain.
'Tis hard a new form'd fable to express,
And make it seem your own. With more success
You may from Homer take the tale of
Troy,
Than on an untried plot your strength employ.

Yet would you make a common theme
your own,
Dwell not on incidents already known;
Nor word for word translate with painful
care,
Nor be confin'd in such a narrow sphere,
From whence (while you should only imitate)
Shame and the rules forbid you to retreat.
Begin your work with modest grace and
plain,
Nor like the bard of everlasting strain,
"I sing the glorious war, and Priam's
fate —"
How will the boaster hold this yawning
rate?
The mountains labour'd with prodigious
throes,
And lo! a mouse ridiculous arose.
Far better he, who ne'er attempts in vain:
Opening his poem in this humble strain,
"Muse, sing the man, who, after Troy
subdu'd,
Manners and towns of various nations
view'd."
He does not lavish at a blaze his fire,
Sudden to glare, and in a smoke expire;
But rises from a cloud of smoke to light,
And pours his specious miracles to sight;
Antiphates ⁵ his hideous feast devours,
Charybdis ⁶ barks, and Polyphemus roars.
He would not, like our modern poet,
date
His hero's wanderings from his uncle's
fate;
Nor sing ill-fated Ilium's various woes,
From Helen's birth, from whom the war
arose;
But to the grand event he speeds his
course,
And bears his readers with resistless force
Into the midst of things, while every line
Opens, by just degrees, his whole design.
Artful he knows each circumstance to
leave,

Which will not grace and ornament receive;

Then truth and fiction with such skill he blends,

That equal he begins, proceeds, and ends.

Mine and the public judgment are the same;

Then hear what I and what your audience claim:

If you would keep us till the curtain fall, 10

And the last chorus for a plaudit call,

The manner must your strictest care engage,

The levities of youth and strength of age.

The child, who now with firmer footing 15

walks,

And with unflinching, well-form'd accents talks,

Loves childish sports; with causeless anger burns,

And idly pleas'd with every moment turns.

The youth, whose will no froward tutor bounds,

Joys in the sunny field his horse and hounds;

Yielding like wax, th' impressive folly bears;

Rough to reproof, and slow to future cares; Profuse and vain; with every passion

warm'd,

And swift to leave what late his fancy charm'd. 30

With strength improv'd, the manly spirit bends

To different aims, in search of wealth and friends;

Bold and ambitious in pursuit of fame,

And wisely cautious in the doubtful scheme.

A thousand ills the aged world surround, 40
Anxious in search of wealth, and, when 'tis found,

Fearful to use what they with fear possess,
While doubt and dread their faculties depress.

Fond of delay, they trust in hope no more,
Listless, and fearful of th' approaching hour;

Morose, complaining, and with tedious praise

Talking the manners of their youthful days;

Severe to censure; earnest to advise,
And with old saws the present age chastise.

The blessings flowing in with life's full tide,

5 Down with our ebb of life decreasing glide;

Then let not youth, or infancy, engage

To play the parts of manhood, or of age;

For, where the proper characters prevail,

We dwell with pleasure on the well-wrought tale.

The business of the drama must appear

In action or description. What we hear,

With weaker passion will affect the heart,

Than when the faithful eye beholds the part.

But yet let nothing on the stage be brought,

Which better should behind the scenes be wrought;

20 Nor force th' unwilling audience to behold

What may with grace and eloquence be told.

Let not Medea, with unnatural rage, Slaughter her mangled infants on the 25 stage;

Nor Atreus his nefarious feast prepare,

Nor Cadmus¹ roll a snake, nor Progne wing the air:

For, while upon such monstrous scenes we gaze,

30 They shock our faith, our indignation raise.

If you would have your play deserve success,

35 Give it five acts complete; nor more, nor less;

Nor let a god in person stand display'd,

Unless the labouring plot deserve his aid;

Nor a fourth actor on the crowded scene

40 A broken, tedious dialogue maintain.

The chorus must support an actor's part;

Defend the virtuous, and advise with art;

Govern the cholerick, the proud appease,

45 And the short feasts of frugal tables praise;

Applaud the justice of well-govern'd states,

And Peace triumphant with her open gates.

50 Entrusted secrets let them ne'er betray,

But to the righteous gods with ardour pray,

¹ The traditional founder of Thebes, who was changed into a dragon and transported to Elysium.

That fortune with returning smiles may bless

Afflicted mirth, and impious pride depress;
Yet let their songs with apt coherence join,
Promote the plot, and aid the main design.

Nor was the flute at first with silver bound,

Nor rivall'd emulous the trumpet's sound:
Few were its notes, its form was simply
plain,

Yet not unuseful was its feeble strain
To aid the chorus, and their songs to raise,
Filling the little theatre with ease,
To which a thin and pious audience came,
Of frugal manners and unsullied fame.

But when victorious Rome enlarg'd her
state,
And broader walls enclos'd th' imperial
seat,

Soon as with wine grown dissolutely gay
Without restraint she cheer'd the festal
day,

Then Poesy in looser numbers mov'd,
And Music in licentious tones improv'd:
Such ever is the taste, when clown and wit,
Rustic and critic, fill the crowded pit.

He, who before with modest art had
play'd,

Now call'd in wanton movements to his aid,

Fill'd with luxurious tones the pleasing
strain,

And drew along the stage a length of train;
And thus the lyre, once awfully severe,
Increas'd its strings, and sweeter charm'd
the ear;

Thus Poetry precipitately flow'd,
And with unwonted elocution glow'd;
Pour'd forth prophetic truths in awful
strain,

Dark as the language of the Delphic fane.

The tragic bard, who, for a worthless
prize,

Bid naked satyrs in his chorus rise, Though rude his mirth, yet labour'd to maintain

The solemn grandeur of the tragic scene;
For novelty alone, he knew, could charm
A lawless crowd, with wine and feasting
warm.

And yet this laughing, prating tribe may raise

Our mirth, nor shall their pleasantry dis-
please;

But let the hero, or the power divine,
Whom late we saw with gold and purple
shine,

Stoop not in vulgar phrase, nor yet despise
The words of earth, and soar into the skies.

For as a matron, on our festal days
Oblig'd to dance, with modest grace obeys,

So should the Muse her dignity maintain
Amidst the satyrs and their wanton train.

If e'er I write, no words too grossly vile Shall shame my satyrs, and pollute my style.

Nor would I yet the tragic style forsake
So far, as not some difference to make

Between a slave, or wench, too pertly bold,
Who wipes the miser of his darling gold,

And grave Silenus,¹ with instructive nod
Giving wise lectures to his pupil god.

From well-known tales such fictions would I raise

As all might hope to imitate with ease;
Yet while they strive the same success to

gain,
Should find their labour and their hopes
are vain:

Such grace can order and connexion give;
Such beauties common subjects may receive.

Let not the wood-born satyr fondly
sport

With amorous verses, as if bred at court;
Nor yet with wanton jests, in mirthful vein,

Debase the language, and pollute the scene;

For what the crowd with lavish rapture
praise,

In better judges cold contempt shall raise.

Rome to her poets too much licence
gives,

Nor the rough cadence of their verse perceives;

But shall I then with careless spirit write?

No — let me think my faults shall rise to
light,

And then a kind indulgence will excuse
The less important errors of the Muse.

Thus, though perhaps I may not merit
fame,

I stand secure from censure and from shame.

PROSE NARRATIVE

HEBREW

THE BOOK OF RUTH

The Book of Ruth is a charming story of early Jewish domestic life. Like the Book of Ecclesiastes it contains little material of definitely religious character; but unlike the Book of Ecclesiastes it has its roots deep in ancient Jewish national life. Its chief purpose is to hold up as a model for later generations a rich and generous man who admits into his household the widow of a distant relative. The story is told in a direct and pleasing manner and has been highly regarded down through the centuries for its fine and simple pathos.

CHAPTER I

1 Now it came to pass in the days when the judges ruled, that there was a famine in the land. And a certain man of Bethlehem-judah went to sojourn in the country of Moab,¹ he, and his wife, and his two sons.

2 And the name of the man was Elimelech, and the name of his wife Naomi, and the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah. And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there.

3 And Elimelech Naomi's husband died; and she was left, and her two sons.

4 And they took them wives of the women of Moab; the name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth: and they dwelt there about ten years.

5 And Mahlon and Chilion died also both of them; and the woman was left of her two sons and her husband.

6 ¶ Then she arose with her daughters in law, that she might return from the country of Moab: for she had heard in the country of Moab how that the LORD had visited his people in giving them bread.

7 Wherefore she went forth out of the place where she was, and her two daughters in law with her; and they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah.

8 And Naomi said unto her two daughters in law, Go, return each to her mother's house: the LORD deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead, and with me.

9 The LORD grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Then she kissed them; and they lifted up their voice, and wept.

10 And they said unto her, Surely we will return with thee unto thy people.

11 And Naomi said, Turn again, my daughters: why will ye go with me? are there yet any more sons in my womb, that they may be your husbands?

12 Turn again, my daughters, go your way; for I am too old to have a husband.

13 If I should say, I have hope, if I should have a husband also to night, and should also bear sons;

14 Would ye tarry for them till they were grown? would ye stay for them from having husbands? nay, my daughters; for it grieveth me much for your sakes that the hand of the LORD is gone out against me.

15 And they lifted up their voice, and wept again: and Orpah kissed her mother in law; but Ruth clave unto her.

16 And she said, Behold, thy sister in law is gone back unto her people, and unto her gods: return thou after thy sister in law.

17 And Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God:

17 Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the LORD do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me.

18 When she saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, then she left speaking unto her.

19 ¶ So they two went until they came 10 to Beth-lehem, And it came to pass, when they were come to Beth-lehem, that all the city was moved about them, and they said, Is this Naomi?

20 And she said unto them, Call me 15 not Naomi, call me Mara ¹: for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me.

21 I went out full, and the LORD hath brought me home again empty: why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the LORD hath 20 testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me?

22 So Naomi returned, and Ruth the Moabitess, her daughter in law, with her, which returned out of the country of 25 Moab: and they came to Beth-lehem in the beginning of barley harvest.

CHAPTER II

1 And Naomi had a kinsman of her 30 husband's, a mighty man of wealth, of the family of Elimelech; and his name was Boaz.

2 And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me now go to the field, and 35 glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace. And she said unto her, Go, my daughter.

3 And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her hap 40 was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech.

4 ¶ And, behold, Boaz came from Beth-lehem, and said unto the reapers, 45 The LORD be with you. And they answered him, The LORD bless thee.

5 Then said Boaz unto his servant that was set over the reapers, Whose damsel is 50 this?

6 And the servant that was set over the reapers answered and said, It is the

Moabitish damsel that came back with Naomi out of the country of Moab:

7 And she said, I pray you, let me glean and gather after the reapers among 5 the sheaves: so she came, and hath continued even from the morning until now, that she tarried a little in the house.

8 Then said Boaz unto Ruth, Heariest thou not, my daughter? Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence, but abide here fast by my maidens:

9 Let thine eyes be on the field that they do reap, and go thou after them: have I not charged the young men that 15 they shall not touch thee? and when thou art athirst, go unto the vessels, and drink of that which the young men have drawn.

10 Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?

11 And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath fully been shewed me, all that thou hast done unto thy mother in law since the death of thine husband; and how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people which thou knewest not heretofore.

12 The LORD recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the LORD God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust.

13 Then she said, Let me find favour in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto thine handmaid, though I be not like unto one of thine 40 handmaidens.

14 And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he 45 reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was sufficed, and left.

15 And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, saying, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and 50 reproach her not:

16 And let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.

17 So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned: and it was about an ephah¹ of barley.

18 ¶ And she took it up, and went into the city; and her mother in law saw what she had gleaned: and she brought forth, and gave to her that she had reserved after she was sufficed.

19 And her mother in law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to day? and where wroughtest thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge of thee. And she shewed her mother in law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to day is Boaz.

20 And Naomi said unto her daughter in law, Blessed be he of the LORD, who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen.

21 And Ruth the Moabitess said, He said unto me also, Thou shalt keep fast by my young men, until they have ended all my harvest.

22 And Naomi said unto Ruth her daughter in law, It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens, that they meet thee not in any other field.

23 So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz to glean unto the end of barley harvest and of wheat harvest; and dwelt with her mother in law.

CHAPTER III

1 Then Naomi her mother in law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee?

2 And now is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast? Behold, he winnoweth barley to night in the threshing-floor.

3 Wash thyself therefore, and anoint thee, and put thy raiment upon thee, and get thee down to the floor: but make not thyself known unto the man, until he shall have done eating and drinking.

4 And it shall be, when he lieth down, that thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie, and thou shalt go in, and uncover his feet, and lay thee down; and he will tell thee what thou shalt do.

5 And she said unto her, All that thou sayest unto me I will do.

6 ¶ And she went down unto the floor, and did according to all that her mother in law bade her.

7 And when Boaz had eaten and drunk, and his heart was merry, he went to lie down at the end of the heap of corn: and she came softly, and uncovered his feet, and laid her down.

8 ¶ And it came to pass at midnight, that the man was afraid, and turned himself: and, behold, a woman lay at his feet.

9 And he said, Who art thou? And she answered, I am Ruth thine handmaid: spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid; for thou art a near kinsman.

10 And he said, Blessed be thou of the LORD, my daughter: for thou hast shewed more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning, inasmuch as thou followedst not young men, whether poor or rich.

11 And now, my daughter, fear not; I will do to thee all that thou requirest: for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman.

12 And now it is true that I am thy near kinsman: howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I.

13 Tarry this night, and it shall be in the morning, that if he will perform unto thee the part of a kinsman, well; let him do the kinsman's part: but if he will not do the part of a kinsman to thee, then will I do the part of a kinsman to thee, as the LORD liveth: lie down until the morning.

14 ¶ And she lay at his feet until the morning: and she rose up before one could know another. And he said, Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor.

15 Also he said, Bring the vail that thou hast upon thee, and hold it. And when she held it, he measured six measures of barley, and laid it on her: and she went into the city.

16 And when she came to her mother in law, she said, Who art thou, my daughter? And she told her all that the man had done to her.

17 And she said, These six measures of barley gave he me; for he said to me, Go not empty unto thy mother in law.

18 Then said she, Sit still, my daughter, until thou know how the matter will fall: for the man will not be in rest, until he have finished the thing this day.

CHAPTER IV

1 Then went Boaz up to the gate, and sat him down there: and, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by; unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat down.

2 And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down.

3 And he said unto the kinsman, Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's:

4 And I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it: but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it besides thee; and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it.

5 Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance.

6 ¶ And the kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it.

7 Now this was the manner in former time in Israel concerning redeeming and concerning changing, for to confirm all things; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour: and this was a testimony in Israel.

8 Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee. So he drew off his shoe.

9 ¶ And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi.

10 Moreover Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day.

11 And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The LORD make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel¹ and like Leah,² which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephratah,² and be famous in Beth-lehem:

12 And let thy house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah, of the seed which the LORD shall give thee of this young woman.

13 ¶ So Boaz took Ruth, and she was his wife: and when he went in unto her, the LORD gave her conception, and she bare a son.

14 And the women said unto Naomi, Blessed be the LORD, which hath not left thee this day without a kinsman, that his name may be famous in Israel.

15 And he shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life, and a nourisher of thine old age: for thy daughter in law, which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him.

16 And Naomi took the child, and laid it in her bosom, and became nurse unto it.

17 And the women her neighbours gave it a name saying, There is a son born to Naomi; and they called his name Obed: he is the father of Jesse, the father of David.

18 ¶ Now these are the generations of Pharez: Pharez begat Hezron,

19 And Hezron begat Ram, and Ram begat Amminadab,

20 And Amminadab begat Nahshon, and Nahshon begat Salmon, 21 And Salmon begat Boaz, and Boaz begat Obed,

22 And Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David.

LATIN

APULEIUS

Apuleius was an African, born at Medaura, on the borders of Numidia. He received his early education in Carthage and later went to Athens to study philosophy. He then travelled through Italy, Greece and Asia studying religion, magic, and necromancy. On his return he spent two years in Rome. From there he set out for Alexandria. On the way he fell ill and was nursed by Pudentilla, a rich widow, in the town of Œa. He later married her but was forced to defend himself against an accusation of sorcery made by her family. The later years of Apuleius were spent about Carthage in the teaching of rhetoric. His style shows evidence of the fact that Latin was not his native tongue. It is exuberant and lively, but filled with non-Latin idioms, rare or unusual words, and archaisms from the pre-classical age.

Apuleius' chief work, Melamorphoses, or the Golden Ass (ca. 150 A.D.), is a collection of tales strung upon a loosely connected narrative. It cannot be compared accurately with the Decameron or the Canterbury Tales, for its organization is far less calculated and orderly. It resembles more the half-formed novels of the Renaissance, such as Jack Wilton, and Don Quixote. The main theme follows the adventures of a man who fell in love with a sorceress and by her was turned into an ass. The actual material of the book includes not only the adventures of the hero himself, but also experiences overheard by him, and independent stories told by characters participating in the main action. Lucius, in his character of an ass, is a pícaro, or rascal, who finds his counterpart in many rogue stories from Jack Wilton to Gil Blas.

In the following selection the hero has been transformed into an ass and has fallen in with robbers who use him to carry their booty. He can be restored to human form only by eating a rose. The translation is that of W. Adlington, 1566, revised by S. Gaselee, New York, Macmillan, 1915.

THE GOLDEN ASS

BOOK IV

When noon was come, and now the broiling heat of the sun had most power, we turned into a village to certain old men of the thieves' acquaintance and friends, for verily their meeting and embracing together did give me (poor ass) cause to deem the same: and they took the truss from my back, and gave them part of the treasure that was in it, and they seemed to whisper and tell them that it was stolen goods; and after that we were unladen of 15 our burdens they let us loose into a meadow to pasture, but I would not feed there with my own horse and Milo's ass, for that I was not wont to eat hay, but I must seek my dinner in some other place. 20 Wherefore I leaped into a garden which was behind the stable, and being well nigh perished with hunger, although I could find nothing there but raw and green salads, yet

I filled my hungry guts therewithal abundantly, and, praying unto all the gods, I looked about in every place if I could espy any roses in the gardens nearby, and my being alone did put me in good hope, that if I could find any remedy, being far from the public road and hidden by the bushes, I should presently out of the low gait of a beast be changed out of every one's sight into a man walking upright.

Now while I tossed on the flood of these cogitations, I looked about, and behold I saw afar off a shadowed valley adjoining to a wood, where, amongst divers other herbs and pleasant verdures, I thought I saw many flourishing roses of bright damask colour. So that I said within my mind, which was not wholly bestial: "Verily the place is the grove of Venus and the Graces, where secretly glittereth the royal hue of so lively and delectable a flower." Then I, desiring the help of the god of good fortune, ran lustily towards the wood, in so much that I felt myself no more an ass but a swift-coursing horse, but my agility and quickness could not prevent the cruelty of my fortune; for, when I came to the place, I perceived that they were no roses neither tender nor pleasant, neither moistened with the heavenly drops of dew nor celestial liquor, which grow out of the rich thicket and thorns. Neither did I perceive that there was any valley at all, but only the bank of the river environed with great thick trees, which had long branches like unto laurel, and bear a flower without any manner of scent but somewhat red of hue, and the common people call them by the name of laurel-roses, which are very poisonous to all manner of beasts. Then was I so entangled with unhappy fortune, that I little esteemed mine own life, and went willingly to eat of those roses, though I knew them to be present poison. But as I drew near very slowly, I saw a young man that seemed to be the gardener come upon me, the same that I had devoured up all his herbs in the garden, and he, knowing now full well his great loss, came swearing with a great staff in his hand, and laid upon me in such sort that I was well nigh dead; but I speedily devised some remedy for myself, for I lifted up my legs and kicked him with my hinder heels, so that I left him lying at the hill foot well nigh slain, and so I ran away: incontinently came out a certain woman, doubtless his wife, who, seeing from above her husband lying half dead, cried and howled in pitiful sort, hasting towards her husband, to the intent that by her loud cries she might purchase to me present destruction; for all the persons of the town, moved and raised by her noise, came forth and cried for dogs, and hied them on madly to tear me down. Out came a great company of bandogs and mastiffs, more fit to pull down bears and lions than me, whom when I beheld I thought verily that I should presently die, so that I took what counsel I might from the occasion, and thought no more of flight, but turned myself about and ran as fast as ever I might to the stable whither we had lodged. Then the men of the town called in their dogs, which they scarce could hold, and took me, and bound me to the staple of a post with a great thong, and scourged me till I was well nigh dead.

Not long after, which was now towards eventide, the thieves loaded us again, and especially me, with the heaviest burden, and brought us forth out of the stable, and when we had gone a good part of our journey, what with the long way, my great burden, the beating of staves, and my worn hooves, lame and tottering, I was so weary that I could scarcely go; then, as I walked by a little river running with fair water, I said to myself: "Behold, now I have found a good occasion. For I will fall down when I come yonder, bending my legs beneath me, and surely I will not rise again for any scourging or beating, and not only will I defy the cudgel, but even be pierced by the sword, if they shall use it upon me." And the cause why I determined so to do was this: I thought that I was so utterly feeble and weak that I deserved my discharge for ill health, and certainly that the robbers (partly for that they would not stay in their journey, partly in haste to flee) would take off the burden from my back, and put it upon my two fellows, and so for my further punishment leave me as a prey to the wolves and ravenous beasts. But evil fortune prevented so good a consideration; for the other ass, being of the same purpose that I was of, and forestalling me, by feigned and coloured weariness fell down first with all his burden upon the ground as though he were dead, and he would not rise neither with beating nor pricking, nor stand upon his feet, though they pulled him all about by the tail, by his legs, and by his ears; which when the thieves beheld, as without all hope, they said one to another: "What, should we stand here so long about a dead or rather a stony ass? Let us be gone;" and so they took his burden and divided some to me and some to my horse. And then they drew their swords and cut through all his hamstrings, and dragged him a little from the way, and threw his body while he yet breathed from the point of a hill down into a great valley. Then I, considering with myself of the evil fortune of my poor companion, purposed now to forget all subtlety and deceit and to play the good ass to get my masters' favour, for I perceived by their talk that we were well nigh come home to our journey's end where they lived and had their dwelling. And after that we had passed over a little hill, we came to our appointed place, where when we were unladen of our burdens and all things carried in, I tumbled and wallowed in the dust to refresh myself instead of water.

The thing and the time compel me to make description of the places and especially of the den where the thieves did inhabit: I will prove my wit what I can do, and then consider you whether I was an ass in judgement and sense, or no. First there was an exceeding great hill compassed about with big trees, very high, with many turning bottoms, surrounded by sharp rocks, whereby it was inaccessible; there were many winding and hollow valleys environed with thickets and thorns, and naturally fortified round about. From the top of the hill ran a spring both leaping and bubbling which poured down the steep slope its silvery waves, and then, scattering abroad into many little brooks, watered all the valleys below, that it seemed like unto a sea enclosed, or a standing flood. Before the den, where was no more hill, stood a high tower, and at the foot thereof, and on either side, were sheep-cots fenced and wattled with clay; before the gate of the house were walls enclosing a narrow path, in such sort that I well warrant you would judge it to be a very den for thieves, and there was nothing else near save a little cot covered roughly with thatch, wherein the thieves did nightly accustom to watch by order, as after I perceived.

And when they were all crept crouching into the house, and we fast tied with strong halters at the door, they began to chide with an old woman there, crooked with age, who had the government and rule of all those young men, and said: "How is it, old witch, old trot, that art

the shame of life and rejected of very death, that thou sittest idly all day at home, and (having no regard to our perilous labours) hast provided nothing for our suppers thus late, but sittest doing nought but swilling wine into that greedy belly of thine from morning to night?" Then the old woman trembled and began to say in a terrified and harsh voice: "Behold, my puissant and faithful masters, you shall have meat and pottage enough by and by, cooked with a sweet savour. Here is first store of bread, wine plenty, filled in clean rinsed pots, likewise hot water prepared to bathe you hastily after your wont." Which when she had said, they put off all their garments and refreshed themselves by a great fire, and after that they were washed with the hot water and anointed with oil, they sat down at the table garnished with all kinds of dainty meat.

Now they were no sooner set down, but in came another company of young men, more in number than was before, whom you would judge at once likewise to be thieves; for they also brought in their prey of gold and silver money, and plate, and robes both silken and gold-embroidered, and, when they had likewise washed, they sat amongst the rest, and casting lots they served one another by order. The thieves drank and ate exceedingly, laying out the meat in heaps, the bread in mounds, and the wine-cups like a marching army, crying, laughing, and making such noise, that I thought I was amongst the tyrannous and wild drunken Lapiths¹ and Centaurs.² At length one of them, more stout than the rest, spoke in this sort: "We verily have manfully conquered the house of Milo of Hypata, and besides all the riches and treasure which by force we have brought away, we are all come home safe, none being lost, and are increased the more, if it be worthy of mention, by the eight feet of this horse and this ass. But you, that have roved about among the towns of Boeotia,³ have lost your valiant captain Lamachus, whose loss I more regarded than all this treasure which you have brought. But it is his own bravery that hath destroyed him, and therefore the memory of him shall be renowned forever amongst the most noble kings and valiant captains; but you accustom when you go abroad, like doughty robbers indeed, to creep through every corner and hole for every trifle, doing a paltry business in baths and the huts of aged women."

Then one of them that came last answered: "Why, are you only ignorant, that the greater the house is, the sooner it may be robbed and spoiled? For though the family of servants be great and dispersed in divers lodgings, yet every man had rather defend his life than save at his own hazard the riches of his master; but when the people be few and poor and live alone, then will they hide and protect very fiercely, even at the danger of their lives, their substance, how little or great soever it be. And to the intent you will believe me, I will show you our story as an example. We were scarce come nigh unto seven-gated Thebes, and began at once to enquire of the fortunes of the greatest men thereof, which is the fountain of our art and science, and we learned at length where a rich chuff called Chryseros did dwell, who, for fear of offices and burdens in the public weal, with great pains dissimulated his estate and lived sole and solitary in a small cot (howbeit well fortified) and huddled daily in ragged and torn apparel over his bags of gold. Wherefore we devised with ourselves to go first to his house and spoil him of all his riches, which we thought we should easily do if we had but to fight against him alone. And at once when night came we quickly drew towards his door, which we thought best neither to move it, nor lift it out of the hinges, and we would not break it open lest by the noise we should raise up (to our harm) the neighbours by. Then our strong and valiant captain Lamachus, trusting his own strength and force, thrust in his hand through a hole of the door, which was made for the key, and thought to pull back the bolt; but the covetous caitiff Chryseros, vilest of all that go on two feet, being awake and seeing all, but making no noise, came softly to the door and caught his hand, and with a great nail nailed it fast to a post of the gate, which when he had done, and had left him thus crucified, he ran up to a high chamber of his hovel, and in a very loud voice called every one of his neighbours by name, desiring them to look to their common safety with all possible speed, for his house was afire. Then every one, for fear of the danger that was nigh him, came running out to aid him; wherewith we (fearing our present peril) knew not what was best to be done, whether we should leave our companion there, or yield ourselves to die with him; but by his consent we devised a better way, for we cut through the joint of this our leader where the arm joins to the shoulder, and so let it hang there, and then bound up his wound with clouts lest we should be traced by the drops of blood, and so we took all that was left of Lamachus and led him away. Now when we hurried along, trembling for our affection to him, and were so nigh pursued that we were in present danger, and Lamachus could not keep our company by reason of faintness (and on the other side it was not for his profit to linger behind) he spoke unto us as a man of singular courage and virtue, desiring us by much entreaty and prayer, and by the puissance of the god Mars and the faith of our confederacy, to deliver our brave comrade from torment and miserable captivity: and further he asked how was it possible that so courageous a captain could live without his hand, wherewith alone he could rob and slay so many people, but he would rather think himself sufficiently happy if he might be slain by the hand of a friend. But when he saw that we all refused to commit any such wicked deed, he drew out his sword with his other hand, and after that he had often kissed it, he thrust it with a strong blow clean through his body. Then we honoured the corpse of so puissant a man, and wrapped it in linen clothes and threw it into the sea to hide it: so lieth our master Lamachus buried and hid in the grave of water.

"Now he ended his life worthily of his courage, as I have declared; but Alcimus, though he were a man of great enterprise, yet could he not void himself from evil fortune: for on a day when he had entered into an old woman's hut that slept, to rob her, he went up into the higher chamber, where he should first have strangled her, but he had more regard to throw down everything out of the window to us 10 that stood under: and when he had cleverly despoiled all, he would leave nothing behind, but went to the old woman's bed where she lay asleep and threw her from it, and would have taken off the coverlet to have thrown down likewise, but the old hag awaked and fell at his knees, and desired him in this manner: 'O sir, I pray you, cast not away such torn and ragged clouts into my neighbours' houses, whither 20 this window looks; for they are rich enough and need no such things.' Then Alcimus (thinking her words to be true) was brought in belief that such things as he had thrown out already, and such things 25 as he should throw out after, were not fallen down to his fellows, but into other men's houses; wherefore he went to the window to see, and especially to behold the places round about, as she had told 30 him, thrusting his body out of the window; but while he strove to do this, strongly indeed but somewhat rashly, the old trot marked him well, and came behind him softly, and although she had but 35 small strength, yet with a sudden force she took him by the heels and thrust him out headlong while his body was balancing and unsure; and beside that the height was very great, he fell upon a marvellous 40 great stone that lay near and burst his ribs, whereby he vomited and spewed flakes of blood, and when he had told us all, he suffered not long torment, but presently died. Then we gave unto him 45 the same burial and sent him a worthy comrade to Lamachus, as we had done before.

"When we had thus lost two of our companions, we liked not Thebes, but marched 50 towards the next city called Plataea,¹ where we found great fame concerning a man named Demochares that purposed to set forth a great game, where should be a trial of all kinds of weapons: he was come of a good house, marvellous rich, 5 liberal, and well deserved that which he had, and had prepared many shews and pleasures for the common people: in so much that there is no man can either by wit or eloquence shew in fit words all the manifold shapes of his preparations, for 10 first he had provided gladiators of a famous band, then all manner of hunters most fleet of foot, then guilty men without hope of reprieve who were judged for their 15 punishment to be food for wild beasts. He had ordained a machine made of beams fixed together, great towers and platforms like a house to move hither and thither, very well painted, to be places to 20 contain all the quarry: he had ready a great number of wild beasts and all sorts of them, especially he had brought from abroad those noble creatures that were soon to be the death of so many condemned 25 persons. But amongst so great preparations of noble price, he bestowed the most part of his patrimony in buying of a vast multitude of great bears, which either by 30 chasing he had caught himself, or which he dearly bought or which were given him by divers of his friends, who strove one with another in making him such gifts: and all these he kept and nourished to his very great cost. Howbeit for all his care of the 35 public pleasure, he could not be free from the malicious eyes of envy: for some of them were well nigh dead, with too long tying up; some meagre with the broiling heat of the sun; some languished with 40 long lying, but all (having sundry diseases) were so afflicted that they died one after another, and there were well nigh none left, in such sort that you might see their wrecks piteously lying in the streets and 45 all but dead: and then the common people, having no other meat to feed on, and forced by their rude poverty to find any new meat and cheap feasts, would come forth and fill their bellies with the flesh of the bears.

"Then by and by Babulus and I devised a pretty sport to suit this case; we drew to our lodging one of the bears that was greater of bulk than all the rest, as though we would prepare to eat thereof, where we flayed off his skin and kept his claws whole, but we meddled not with the head, but cut it off by the neck, and so let it hang to the skin. Then we razed off the flesh from the back, and cast dust thereon, and set it in the sun to dry: and while it was drying by the heat of the heavenly fire, we made merry with the flesh, and then we devised with ourselves with an oath that one of us, being more valiant than the rest, not so much in body as in courage (so that he would straightway consent thereto) should put on the skin, and, feigning that he were a bear, should be led to Demochares' house in the night, by which means we thought to be received and easily let in. Many of our brave brotherhood were desirous to play the bear in this subtle sleight, but especially one Thrasyleon of a courageous mind was chosen by all our band to take the risk of this enterprise. Then we put him, very calm in mind and face, into the bear's skin, which was soft and fitted him finely in every point; we buckled fast the edges thereof with fine stitching, and covered the same, though small, with the thick hair growing about it that it might not be seen: we thrust his head into the opening of the bear's throat where his neck had been cut out, and after this we made little holes through his nostrils and eyes for Thrasyleon to see out and take wind at, in such sort that he seemed a very lively and natural beast: when this was done, we brought him into a cage which we hired with a little money for the purpose, and he crept nimbly in after like a bear with a good courage.

"Thus we began our subtlety, and then we imagined thus: we feigned letters as though they came from one Nicanor which dwelt in the country of Thrace, which was of great acquaintance with this Demochares, wherein we wrote that he had sent him, being his friend, the first-fruits of his coursing and hunting. When night was come, we took cover of the darkness, and brought Thrasyleon's cage and our forged letters, and presented them to

Demochares. When Demochares wonderingly beheld this mighty bear, and saw the timely liberality of Nicanor his friend, he was glad, and commanded his servant to deliver unto us that brought him this joy ten gold crowns, as he had great store in his coffers: then (as the novelty of a thing doth accustom to stir men's minds to behold the same) many persons came on every side to see this bear, but Thrasyleon (lest they should by curious viewing and prying perceive the truth) ran often upon them to put them in fear, so that they durst not come nigh. Then the people said with one voice: 'Verily Demochares is right happy, in that, after the death of so many beasts, he hath gotten, in spite of fortune, so goodly a bear to supply him afresh.' He commanded that with great care his servants should put him into the park close by, but I immediately spoke unto him and said: 'Sir, I pray you, take heed how you put a beast tired with the heat of the sun and with long travel amongst others which (as I hear say) have divers maladies and diseases; let him rather lie in some open place of your house, where the breeze blows through, yea nigh to some water, where he may take air and ease himself, for do not you know that such kind of beasts do greatly delight to couch under shadow of trees and dewy caves, nigh unto pleasant wells and waters?' Hereby Demochares, admonished and remembering how many he had before that perished, was contented that we should put the bear's cage where we would. Moreover we said unto him: 'We ourselves are determined to lie all night nigh unto the bear, to look unto him, which is tired with the heat and his long journey, and to give him meat and drink at his due hour.' Then he answered: 'Verily, masters, you need not to put yourselves to such pains: for I have men, yea, almost all my family of servants, that serve for nothing but for this purpose of tending bears.'

"Then we took leave of him and departed, and when we were come without the gates of the town we perceived before us a great sepulchre standing out of the highway, in a privy and secret place. And thither we went and opened there certain coffins, half rotted with age, wherein we found the corruption of man, and the ashes and dust of his long-buried body, which should serve to hold the prey we were very soon to get: and then, according to the custom of our band, having a respect to the dark and moonless time of the night when we thought that every man was sunk in his first and strongest sleep, we went with our weapons and besieged the doors of Demochares round about, in earnest that we were soon to plunder the same. Then Thrasyleon was ready at hand, seizing upon that time of night which is for robbers most fit, and crept out of the cage and went to kill all such of his guards as he found asleep; but when he came to the porter he slew him also and took the key and opened the gates and let us all in: and he shewed us now in the midst of the house a large counter, wherein looking sharply he saw put the night before a great abundance of treasure: which when by violence of us all we had broken open, I bade every one of my fellows take as much gold and silver as they could quickly bear away, and carry it to the sepulchre, and there quickly hide it in the house of those dead who were to us most faithful allies, and then come soon back to take another burden; but I, for our common weal, would stand alone at the gate watching diligently when they would return, and the bear running about the house would make such of the family afraid as fortune to wake and come out: for who is he that is so puissant and courageous, that at the sight of so great a monster would not quail and flee away and keep his chamber well barred, especially in the night?

"Now when we had brought this matter to so good a point, there chanced a pitiful case; for as I looked for my companions that should come from the sepulchre, behold there was a boy of the house that fortune to be awaked by the noise, as fate would have it, and look out of a window and espy the bear running freely about the house, and he went back on his steps a-tiptoe and very secretly, and told all the servants, and at once the house was filled with the whole train of them. Incontinently they came forth with torches, lanterns, candles and tapers, and other lights, that they might see all the yard over; they came not unarmed, but with clubs, spears, and naked swords, to guard the entrances, and they set on greyhounds and mastiffs, even those with great ears and shaggy hair, to subdue the poor beast. Then I, during this broil, thought to run away, but because I would see Thrasyleon fighting wonderfully with the dogs, I lay behind the gate to behold him. And although I might perceive that he was at the very term or limit of life, yet remembered he his own faithfulness and ours, and valiantly resisted the gaping and ravenous mouths of the hound of Hell: for he took well to play the part which he so willingly had taken in hand himself, and with much ado, so long as the breath was in him, now flying and now pursuing, with many twistings and turnings of his body, tumbled at length out of the house; but when he was come to liberty abroad, yet could he not save himself by flight, for all the dogs of the street (which were fierce and many) joined themselves to the greyhounds and mastiffs that had just come out of the house, to chase him like a great host: alas, what a pitiful sight it was when our poor Thrasyleon was thus environed and compassed with so many furious dogs that tore and rent him miserably! Then I, impatient of his so great misery, ran in amongst the press of the people, and aiding my comrade secretly with my words (for no more could I do) exhorted all the leaders of this chase in this manner: 'O great extreme mischance, what a precious and excellent beast do we lose!' but my words did nothing prevail to help the poor wretch. For there came running out a tall man with a spear in his hand, that thrust him clean through, and afterwards many that stood by, released of their fear, drew out their swords, and so they killed him. But verily our brave captain Thrasyleon, the great honour of our band, when his life, (that was worthy never to die), was utterly overcome, but not his fortitude, would not bewray the league between us, either by crying, howling, or any other means, but (being torn with dogs, and wounded with weapons) did still send forth a bellowing cry more like that of a beast than of a man: and taking his present fortune in good part, with courage and glory enough did finish his life with such a terror unto the assembly, that no person was so hardy (until it was morn, nay, until it was high day) as to touch him, though he were a 10 beast stark dead: but at last there came a butcher more valiant than the rest, who (opening the paunch of the beast) slit off the skin from the hardy and venturous thief. In this manner there was lost to us 15 also our captain Thrasyleon, but there was not lost to him his fame and honour. When all this was done, we packed up our treasure which the faithful dead in the sepulchre had kept for us, and we got us 20 out of the bounds of Platæa, thinking always with ourselves that there was no fidelity to be found amongst the living; and no wonder, for that it hath passed over to the ghosts and the dead in hatred 25 of our deceitfulness. And so, being wearied with the weight of our burdens, and very tired with our rough travel, having thus lost three of our soldiers, we are come home with this present prey that you 30 see."

Thus when they had spoken and poured libation of pure wine from cups of gold in memory of their slain companions, they sung hymns to the god Mars to pacify him 35 her in this sort: "Weep not, fair gentlewoman, we pray you, for be you assured that we will do no outrage or violence to your person, but take patience awhile for our profit; for necessity and poor estate hath compelled us to this enterprise: we warrant you that your parents (although they be covetous) from their great store will be contented to give us money enough to redeem and ransom you, that are their 45 own blood, from our hands."

bread left by all the band, I got me thither, and used upon them my jaws which ached with long famine and seemed to be full of cobwebs. Now when the night was come 5 the thieves awaked and rose up: and when they had buckled on their weapons and disguised their faces with vizors, like unto spectres, they departed, and yet for all the great sleep that came upon me, I could in no wise leave eating, and whereas, when I was a man, I could be contented with one or two loaves at the most, now my guts were so greedy that three panniers full would scarcely serve me; and while I 15 laboured at this business, the morning came, and, being moved by even an ass's shamefastness, I left my food at last (though well I liked it) and at a stream hard by I quenched my thirst. And suddenly after, the thieves returned home careful and heavy, bringing no burdens with them, no not so much as one poor cloak, but with all their swords and strength, yea even with the might of their 25 whole band, only a maiden that seemed by her habit to be some gentlewoman born, and the daughter of some noble of that country, who was so fair and beautiful, that though I were an ass, yet I swear that I had a great affection to her. The virgin lamented and tore her hair, and spoiled her garments for the great sorrow she was in, but the thieves brought her within the cave, and essayed to comfort 35 her in this sort: "Weep not, fair gentlewoman, we pray you, for be you assured that we will do no outrage or violence to your person, but take patience awhile for our profit; for necessity and poor estate hath compelled us to this enterprise: we warrant you that your parents (although they be covetous) from their great store will be contented to give us money enough to redeem and ransom you, that are their 45 own blood, from our hands."

MIDDLE AGES

The Middle Ages is the term used to designate that period of European history which lies between the fourth and the fifteenth centuries of the Christian era. During this age the European peoples gradually developed their various national languages (called vernaculars to distinguish them from Greek and Latin), built up a national consciousness, and put new social institutions into motion. Two great organizations arose during this age: the Christian Church and the feudal system. The Church, with its central head at Rome, began as early as the fourth century to establish uniform sub-centers throughout the world. Into every quarter of Western Europe went representatives of this great religious system, establishing even in the most remote and forbidding regions innumerable homogeneous units. The Church, irrespective of its purely spiritual service, performed an important function in the intellectual unification of incredibly diverse peoples as they gradually emerged from barbarism. Small wonder that in the Middle Ages the Church built up for itself a position of command which it was able to maintain for many centuries.

Later in the period, with the development of Norman civilization in Northern France, another powerful unifying influence arose — the system of feudalism, which provided for every person in the land a place in a series of obligations to his superior and to his inferior. The bungling attempts of native populations at democratic organization utterly unsuited to these unsettled times gave way to an orderly, if somewhat inflexible, system which bound the whole social structure into a dependable and recognizable set of political duties. By the beginning of the eleventh century the navigable rivers and principal travel routes were guarded by fortifications which represented, however remotely, the existence of a partially centralized governmental system.

At the beginning of the period the language of history, philosophy, science, and even of poetry was still Latin. Even as late as the seventeenth century the Latin language retained an important place in the learned world. At what date the various national languages of Europe came into general use it is impossible to say. We know, however, that the earliest surviving records in the vernacular come from about the middle of the eighth century. The earliest documents of this sort are those of the Irish, who, as early as 750 and possibly before, committed to writing the deeds of their national heroes (see The Feast of Bricriu, p. 344). At about the same time or shortly afterward came the Anglo-Saxon heroic poems, the greatest surviving example of which is, of course, Beowulf. Then followed the French chansons de geste (see The Song of Roland, p. 359), and the Norse Eddas (p. 351). The earliest tales deal with the military exploits of national heroes, and because of their general similarity to the Iliad and Odyssey are often referred to as epic literature, and this early period is spoken of as the Epic Age. It must be remembered, however, that The Cid (p. 380) and the Nibelungenlied (p. 369), although epic in style and form, emerge at a period when chivalric romance is the leading fashion, and their heroes appear in the guise of courtly knights.

About the middle of the twelfth century there began to appear a kind of narrative dealing with the adventures of brave knights and fair ladies. The stories were concerned not with matters important to national history but with the strange, the unusual, the supernatural. In this period national lines are less sharply drawn. The Welsh Mabinogion (p. 408) shows the influence of French courtliness, and the German Tristan and Iseult (p. 416) owes an immediate debt to the French and a remote one to Celtic tradition. Even the Orient contributes a share to the development of the romances, as for example the story of Amadace, of Florice and Blaunche flour, and of Aucassin and Nicolette (p. 424).

During the whole period industrious compilers were at work gathering up great collections of tales, often fitting them into a sort of framework of continuity. In the Orient there was being put into the form in which we now know it the famous Thousand and One Nights (p. 432). Fitted into a somewhat similar frame was the widely popular collection of tales known as The Seven Sages of Rome, and in Italy Boccaccio compiled the Decameron (p. 435), a series of stories which vies with Chaucer's Canterbury Tales for the honor of being the most famous collection.

The literature of meditation and philosophy was written chiefly in Latin. Augustine (p. 439) with his enthusiastic religious devotion and Boëthius (p. 443) with his calm and beautiful re-statement of Neo-Platonic doctrines each represents the high point in his particular field of thought. The revival of the ascetic ideal and of complete abnegation of worldly delights in the monastic reforms appears most strikingly in the writings of the followers of St. Francis (p. 450).

Secular lyric poetry, although it must have had a continuous existence all through the period, first appears in written documents dating from about the ninth century. The earliest ones were in Latin, and these Latin lyrics continued in popularity down to the thirteenth century. In the meantime there arose a lyric stream in the vernaculars which increased in volume and structural development through the rough beginnings of Anglo-Saxon laments and historical songs, the softer cadences of the Provençal troubadours (e.g. Rudel, p. 479), the German minnesänger (e.g. Walther von der Vogelweide, p. 475), the complicated measures of Charles d'Orléans (p. 481) and Eustache Deschamps (p. 480), until it reached its full power in the lyrics of Dante (p. 490) and of Politian (p. 492).

Near the end of the period comes Dante's Divine Comedy (p. 391), an epic poem which in plan and perhaps in theology looks toward the Middle Ages, but in spirit and treatment belongs to the dawn of the Renaissance. The same is true, although on a smaller scale, of Villon (p. 482), who, though he uses the meter and the subjects of his predecessors, looks at life through the eyes of a citizen of the modern world.

The drama, for some strange reason, had to begin anew. In spite of the efforts of devoted admirers of Seneca, Plautus, and Terence, the heritage of ancient Rome did but little service to the Middle Ages. The Greek drama was of course unknown. The origin of the Western drama, like that of the Greeks, lies in decorative additions to religious observances. The subjects were taken from the Bible or from religious tradition. No strictly secular play was presented until the Renaissance was well under way.

EPIC

CELTIC

THE FEAST OF BRICRIU

(9TH CENTURY?)

The largest and oldest body of imaginative vernacular literature in Western Europe is in Irish. Although the manuscripts in which it is preserved go no farther back than the eleventh century, the actual composition dates back to the ninth, and in many cases to the eighth century. The stories are usually grouped in three classes: (1) those dealing with the heroes of Ulster gathered about King Connor; (2) those of the heroes grouped about Finn McCool; (3) those dealing with the doings of the earlier mythical kings and their connections with the immortals. The Feast of Bricriu belongs to the first group. The Red Branch warriors of King Conchobar (Connor) constitute an organization strikingly similar to King Arthur's Round Table. Parallels between Irish heroic tales and the stories of King Arthur's knights have led to the conclusion that at least the general outlines of the Arthurian tradition are based on Celtic tradition. The Feast of Bricriu is generally recognized as the kind of story that furnished the model for the best episodes of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. The brilliance and slightly acid satire of this piece, and its disturbing combination of extremely ancient details with a sophisticated narrative technique, are typical of early Irish heroic literature. The utter indifference to chronology is confusing, but it has resulted in the preservation of many primitive features that might have been lost among people with a keener sense of history. Even in the ninth century the Irish had their antiquaries, and it is possible that many primitive features in their stories may have been the result of conscious "archaizing."

The following passage is based on the Translation of George Henderson, Irish Texts Society, II.

Here beginneth the Feast of Bricriu, and the Champion's Portion of Emain, and the Ulster Women's War-of-Words, and the Hosting of the Men of Ulster to Cruachan, and the Champion's Wager in Emain.

CHAPTER I

1. Bricriu of the Evil Tongue¹ held a great feast for Conchobar mac Nessa and for all the Ultonians. The preparation of the feast took a whole year. For the entertainment of the guests a spacious house was built by him. He erected it in Dun Rudraige after the likeness (of the palace) of the Red Branch² in Emain.³ Yet it surpassed the buildings of that period entirely for material and for artistic design, for beauty of architecture — its pillars and frontings splendid and costly, its carving and lintel-work famed for magnificence.

2. The House was made on this wise: on the plan of Tara's⁴ Mead-Hall, having nine compartments from fire to wall, each fronting of bronze thirty feet high, overlaid with gold. In the fore part of the palace a royal couch was erected for Conchobar high above those of the whole house. It was set with carbuncles and other precious stones which shone with a lustre of gold and of silver, radiant with every hue, making night like unto day. Around it were placed the twelve couches of the twelve heroes of Ulster. The nature of the workmanship was on a par with the material of the edifice. It took a wagon team to carry each beam, and the strength of seven Ulster men to fix each pole, while thirty of the chief artificers of Erin were employed on its erection and arrangement.

3. Then a balcony¹ was made by Bricriu on a level with the couch of Conchobar (and as high as those) of the heroes of valour. The decorations of its fittings were magnificent. Windows of glass were placed on each side of it, and one of these was above Bricriu's couch, so that he could view the hall from his seat, as he knew the Ulster men would not suffer him within.

4. When Bricriu had finished building the hall and balcony, supplying it both with quilts and blankets, beds and pillows, providing meat and drink, so that nothing was lacking, neither furnishings nor food, he straightway went to Emain to meet Conchobar and the nobles of Ulster.

5. It fell upon a day there was in Emain a gathering of the Ulster men. He was anon made welcome, and was seated by the shoulder of Conchobar. Bricriu addressed himself to him as well as to the body of the Ulster men. "Come with me," quoth Bricriu, "to partake of a banquet with me." "Gladly," rejoined Conchobar, "if that please the men of Ulster." Fergus mac Rōig² and the nobles of Ulster also made answer: "No; for if we go our dead will outnumber our living, when Bricriu has incensed us against each other."

6. "If ye come not, worse shall ye fare," quoth Bricriu. "What then," asked Conchobar, "if the Ulster men go not with thee?" "I will stir up strife," quoth Bricriu, "between the kings, the leaders, the heroes of valour, and the yeomen, till they slay one another, man for man, if they do not come with me to share my feast." "That we shall not do to please thee," quoth Conchobar. "I will stir up enmity between father and son so that it will come to mutual slaughter. If I do not succeed in doing so, I will make a quarrel between mother and daughter. If that does not succeed, I will set each of the Ulster women at variance, so that they come to deadly blows till their breasts become loathsome and putrid." "Sure 'tis better to come," quoth Fergus. "Do ye straightway take counsel with the chief Ultonians," said Sencha,³ son of Ailill. "Unless we take counsel against this Bricriu, mischief will be the consequence," quoth Conchobar.

7. Thereupon all the Ulster nobles assembled in council. In discussing the matter Sencha counselled them thus: "Take hostages from Bricriu, since ye have to go with him, and set eight swordsmen about him so as to compel him to retire from the house as soon as he has laid out the feast." Furbaide Ferbenn, son of Conchobar, brought Bricriu reply, and showed him the whole matter. "It is happily arranged," quoth Bricriu. The men of Ulster straightway set out from Emain, host, battalion and company, under king, chieftain and leader. Excellent and admirable the march of the brave and valiant heroes to the palace.

CHAPTER II

8. The hostages of the braves had gone security on his behalf, and Bricriu accordingly bethought him how he should manage to set the Ulstermen at variance. His deliberation and self-scrutiny being ended, he betook himself to the company of Loigaire⁴ the Triumphant, son of Connad mac Iliach. "Hail now, Loigaire the Triumphant, thou mighty mallet of Bregia, thou hot hammer of Meath,⁵ flame-red thunderbolt, thou victorious warrior of Ulster, what hinders the championship of Emain being thine alway?" "If I so choose, it shall be mine," quoth Loigaire. "Be thine the sovranity of the braves of Erin," quoth Bricriu, "if only thou act as I advise." "I will indeed," quoth Loigaire.

9. "Sooth, if the champion's portion¹ of my house be thine, the championship of Emain is thine for ever. The champion's portion of my house is worth contesting, for it is not the portion of a fool's house," quoth Bricriu. "Belonging to it is a caldron full of generous wine, 10 with room enough for three of the valiant braves of Ulster; furthermore, a seven-year-old boar; nought has entered its lips since it was little save fresh milk and fine meal in springtime, curds and sweet milk 15 in summer, the kernel of nuts and wheat in autumn, beef and broth in winter; a cow-lord full seven-year-old; since it was a little calf neither heather nor twig-tops have entered its lips, nought but sweet milk and herbs, meadow hay and corn. (Add to this) fivescore cakes of wheat, cooked in honey withal. Five-and-twenty bushels, that is what was supplied for these fivescore cakes — four cakes from 25 each bushel. Such is the champion's portion of my house. And since thou art the best hero among the men of Ulster, it is but just to give it thee, and I so wish it. By the end of the day, when the feast is spread out, let thy charioteer get up, and it is to him the champion's portion will be given." "Among them shall be dead men if it is not done so," quoth Loigaire. Bricriu laughed at that, for it liked him well.

10. When he had done inciting Loigaire the Triumphant to enmity, Bricriu betook himself into the company of Conall the Victorious. "Hail to thee, Conall the Victorious, thou art the hero of victories 40 and of combats; great are the victories thou hast already scored over the heroes of Ulster. By the time the Ulster men go into foreign bounds thou art a distance of three days and three nights in advance 45 over many a ford²; thou protectest their rear when returning, so that (an assailant) may not spring past thee, nor through thee nor over thee; what then should hinder the champion's portion of Emain being thine alway?" Though great his treachery with regard to Loigaire, he showed twice as much in the case of Conall the Victorious.

11. When he had satisfied himself with inciting Conall the Victorious to quarrel, he hied to the presence of Cuchulainn³. "Hail to thee, Cuchulainn, thou victor of Bregia (i.e. Bray), thou bright banner 5 of the Liffey, darling of Emain, belov'd of wives and of maidens, for thee to-day Cuchulainn is no nickname,⁴ for thou art the champion of the Ulster men, thou wardest off their great feuds and frays, 20 thou seekest justice for each man of them; thou attainest alone to what all the Ulster men fail in; all the men of Ulster acknowledge thy bravery, thy valour and thine achievements surpassing theirs. What meaneth therefore thy leaving of the champion's portion for some one else of the men of Ulster, since no one of the men of Erin is capable of contesting it against thee?" "By the god of my tribe," quoth Cuchulainn, "his head shall he lose whoso comes to contest it with me." Thereafter Bricriu severed himself from them and followed the host as if no contention had been made among the heroes.

12. Whereupon they entered the palace, and each one occupied his couch therein, king, prince, noble, yeoman, and young brave. The half of the palace was set apart for Conchobar and his retinue of 40 valiant Ulster heroes; the other half (was reserved) for the ladies of Ulster attending on Mugan, daughter of Eochaid Fedlech, wife of King Conchobar. The following were those who attended upon Conchobar in the fore-part of the palace,

¹ A special tid-bit, often the tail of the pig, which was awarded to the best warrior present at the feast.

² Since there were no bridges in ancient Ireland, fords were strategic points of great importance and the best warriors were set to guard them.

⁴ Cuchulainn really was a nickname — The Hound of Culann — bestowed upon the hero as a child in consequence of his extraordinary encounter with a large, fierce watch dog.

namely, Fergus mac Rōig, Celtchar son of Uthechar, Eogan son of Durthact, and the two sons of the king, namely, Fiacha and Fiachaig, Fergna son of Findchōim, Fergus son of Leti, Cūscraid the-stuttering-of-Macha, son of Conchobar, Sencha son of Ailill, the three sons of Fiachach, namely, Rus and Dāre and Imchad, Muinremur son of Geirrgind, Errge Echbēl, Amorgene son of Ecit, Mend son of Salchad, Dubtach 10 Dōel Ulad, Feradach Find Fectnach, Fedelm mac Ilair Chētaig, Furbaide Ferbend, Rochad son of Fathemon, Loigaire the Triumphant, Conall the Victorious, Cuchulainn, Connad son of Mornai, 15 Erc son of Fedelm, Illand son of Fergus, Fintan son of Nial, Ceternd son of Fintan, Factna son of Sencad, Conla the False, Ailill the Honey-tongued, Bricriu himself, the chief Ultonian warriors, with the body 20 of youths and artists.

13. While the feast was being spread for them, the musicians and players performed. The moment Bricriu spread the feast with its savouries, he was ordered by 25 the hostages to leave the hall. They straightway got up with drawn swords in their hands to expel him. Whereupon Bricriu and his followers went out to the balcony. Arrived at the threshold of the 30 palace, he called out, "That Champion's Portion, such as it is, is not the portion of a fool's house; do ye give it to the Ulster hero ye prefer for valour." He thereupon left them.

14. Anon the spencers¹ rose up to serve the food. The charioteer of Loigaire the Triumphant, to wit, Sedlang mac Riagabra, then rose up and said to the distributors: "Do ye assign to Loigaire 40 the Triumphant the Champion's Portion which is by you, for he alone is entitled to it before the other young braves of Ulster." Then Id mac Riagabra, charioteer to Conall the Victorious, got up and spake to the like effect. And Loig mac 45 Riagabra spake thus: "Do ye bring that to Cuchulainn; it is no disgrace for all the Ulster men to give it to him; it is he who is most valiant among you." "That's not 50 true," quoth Conall the Victorious and Loigaire the Triumphant.

15. They then got up upon the floor and donned their shields and seized their swords. At one another they hewed till the half of the palace was an atmosphere 5 of fire with the (clash of) sword- and spear-edge, the other half one white sheet from the enamel of the shields. Great alarm gat hold upon the palace; the valiant heroes shook; Conchobar himself and Fergus mac Rōig got furious on seeing the injury and the injustice of two men sur- 10 rounding one, namely, Conall the Victorious and Loigaire the Triumphant attacking Cuchulainn. There was no one among the Ultonians who dared separate them till Sencha spake to Conchobar: "Part the men," quoth he. (For at that period, among the Ultonians, Conchobar 15 was a god upon earth.)

16. Thereupon Conchobar and Fergus intervened, (the combatants) immediately let drop their hands to their sides. "Execute my wish," quoth Sencha. "Your will shall be obeyed," they responded. 20 "My wish, then," quoth Sencha, "is to-night to divide the Champion's Portion there among all the host, and after that to decide with reference to it according to the will of Ailill mac Māgach, for it is ac- 30 counted unlucky among the men of Ulster to close this assembly unless the matter be adjudged in Cruachan." The feasting was then resumed; they made a circle round the fire and got "jovial" and made 35 merry.

CHAPTER III

17. Bricriu, however, and his queen were in their sollar. From his couch the condition of the palace was observable to him, and how things were going on withal. He exercised his mind as to how he should contrive to get the women to quarrel as he had likewise incited the men. When Bricriu had done examining his mind, it 45 just chanced as he could have wished that Fedelm-of-the-fresh-heart came from the palace with fifty women in her train, in mood hilarious. Bricriu observed her coming past him. "Hail to thee to-night, wife of Loigaire the Triumphant! Fe- 50 delm-of-the-fresh-heart is no nickname for thee with respect to thine excellency of form and of wisdom and of lineage. Conchobar, king of a province of Erin, is thy father, Loigaire the Triumphant thy husband; I should deem it but small honour to thee that any of the Ulster women should take precedence of thee in entering the banqueting hall; only at thy heel should all Ultonian women tread. If thou comest first into the hall to-night, the sovereignty of queen-ship shalt thou enjoy for ever over all the ladies of Ulster." Fedelm anon takes a leap over three ridges from the hall.

18. Thereafter came Lendabair, daughter of Eogan mac Durthacht, wife of Conall the Victorious. Bricriu addressed her and spake: "Hail to thee, Lendabair; for thee that is no nickname; thou art the darling and pet of all mankind on account of thy splendour and of thy lustre. As far as thy spouse hath surpassed all the heroes of mankind in valour and in comeliness, so far hast thou distinguished thyself above the women of Ulster." Though great the deceit he applied in the case of Fedelm, he applied twice as much in the case of Lendabair.

19. Emer¹ came out anon with half-a-hundred women (in her train). "Greeting and hail to thee, Emer, daughter of Forgall Manach² wife of the best wight in Erin! Emer of the Fair Hair is for thee no nickname; Erin's kings and princes contend for thee in jealous rivalry. As the sun surpasseth the stars of heaven, so far dost thou outshine the women of the whole world in form and shape and lineage, in youth and beauty and elegance, in good name and wisdom and address." Though great his deceit in the case of the other ladies, in that of Emer he applied twice as much.

20. The three companies thereupon went out till they met at one spot, to wit, three ridges from the hall. None of them wot that Bricriu had incited them one against another. To the hall they straightway return. Even and graceful and easy their carriage on the first ridge; scarcely did one of them raise a foot before the other. But on the ridge following, their steps were shorter and quicker. Moreover, on the ridge next the house it was with difficulty each kept up with the other; so they raised their robes to the rounds of their limbs to compete in the attempt to go first into the hall. For what Bricriu said to each of them regarding the other was, that whosoever should first enter should be queen of the whole province. The amount of confusion then occasioned by the competition to enter the hall first was as it were the noise of fifty chariots approaching. The whole palace shook and the warriors sprang to their arms and made essay to kill one another within.

21. "Stay," quoth Sencha, "they are not enemies who have come; it is Bricriu who has set a-quarrelling the women who have gone out. By the god of my tribe, unless the hall be closed against them our dead will outnumber our living." Thereupon the doorkeepers close the doors. Emer, daughter of Forgall the Wily, wife of Cuchulainn, by reason of her speed, outran the others and put her back against the door, and straightway called upon the doorkeepers ere the other ladies (came), so that the men within got up, each of them to open for his own wife that she might be the first to come within. "Bad (look-out) to-night," quoth Conchobar. He struck the silver sceptre that was in his hand against the bronze pillar of the couch and the folks gat seated. "Stay," quoth Sencha, "'tis not a warfare of arms that shall be held here; it will be a warfare of words." Each woman went out under the protection of her spouse, and then followed the Ulster women's war-of-words.

The story now proceeds with no diminution of vivacity to relate the speeches of the women concerning the qualities of their husbands and themselves. At the end of the speeches the men arose and engaged in another general riot. Cuchulainn with a mighty heave raised the wall high enough to admit his wife and her train. He dropped it again with such a mighty jolt that it sank seven feet into the earth on one side and tumbled Bricriu and his wife out of their balcony onto the floor. At the solicitation of Bricriu and the Ulster warriors Cuchulainn restored the house. In order to settle the argument over who was the best of the Ulster warriors, it was decided that the whole assembly should journey to Queen Meave and King Aillil of Connaught to hear the case judged. King Aillil asked for three days in which to prepare his decision, and the Ulstermen departed, leaving the three heroes to await judgment. After pondering long upon his embarrassing duty, Aillil finally decided to settle it by calling each one in separately and awarding him the decision accompanied by a handsome cup. They were then sent on from one person to another to be judged. As they went, they engaged in contests of bravery and dexterity, all of which were won by Cuchulainn. Finally they returned to Emain, where each produced the cup given him by Aillil. The result was another general fight. They were then sent first to Buide mac Bain and Uath mac Imomain. With the latter they had a beheading contest like that related in the next section (see below). Cuchulainn won all these contests. They were next sent to Curoi mac Daire, a mysterious person in Munster. He tested each of them by having him put on guard outside his fortress at night and subjecting him to all sorts of terrifying experiences. As a result of this test the champion's portion was again awarded to Cuchulainn. The acceptance of this decision was deferred, however, until after the last test, which is described in the following selection.

CHAPTER XVI: THE CHAMPION'S COVENANT

91. Once upon a time as the Ultonians were in Emain, fatigued after the gathering and the games, Conchobar and Fergus mac Rōig, with Ultonia's nobles as well, proceeded from the sporting field outside and gat seated in the Royal Court (Red Branch) of Conchobar. Neither Cuchulainn nor Conall the Victorious nor Loigaire the Triumphant were there that night. But the hosts of Ultonia's valiant heroes were there. As they were seated, it being eventide, and the day drawing towards the close, they saw a big uncouth fellow of exceeding ugliness drawing nigh them into the hall. To them it seemed as if none of the Ultonians would reach half his height. Horrible and ugly was the carle's guise. Next his skin he wore an old hide with a dark dun mantle around him, and over him a great spreading club-tree (branch) the size of a winter-shed, under which thirty bullocks could find shelter. Ravenous yellow eyes he had, protruding from his head, each of the twain the size of an ox-vat. Each finger as thick as another person's wrist. In his left hand a stock, a burden for twenty yoke of oxen. In his right hand an axe weighing thrice fifty glowing molten masses (of metal). Its handle would require a plough-team (a yoke of six) to move it. Its sharpness such that it would lop off hairs, the wind blowing them against its edge.

92. In that guise he went and stood by the fork-beam beside the fire. "Is the hall lacking in room for you," quoth Duach of the Chafer Tongue to the uncouth clodhopper, "that ye find no other place than by the fork-beam, unless ye wish to be domestic luminary?—only sooner will a blaze be to the house than brightness to the household." "What property soever may be mine, sooth ye will agree, no matter how big I am, that the household as a whole will be enlightened, while the hall will not be burnt."

93. "That, however, is not my sole function; I have others as well. But neither in Erin nor in Alba nor in Europe nor in Africa nor in Asia, including Greece, Scythia, the Isle of Gades, the Pillars of Hercules, and Bregon's Tower (Brigantium), have I found the quest on which I have come, nor a man to do me fairplay regarding it. Since ye Ultonians have excelled all the folks of those lands in strength, prowess, valour; in rank, magnanimity, dignity; in truth, generosity and worth, get ye one among you to give me the boon I crave."

94. "In sooth it is not just that the honour of a province be carried off," quoth Fergus mac Rōig, "because of one man who fails in keeping his word of honour. Death, certainly, is not a whit nearer to him than to you." "Not that I shun it," quoth he. "Make thy quest known to us then," quoth Fergus mac Rōig. "If but fairplay be vouchsafed me, I will tell it." "It is right also to give fairplay," quoth Sencha, son of Aillil, "for it beseemeth not a great clannish folk to break a mutual covenant over any unknown individual. To us too it seemeth likely, if at long last you find such a person, you will find here one worthy of you."

"Conchobar I put aside," he quoth, "for sake of his sovranty, and Fergus mac Rōig also on account of his like privilege. These two excepted, come whosoever of you that may venture, that I may cut off his head¹ to-night, he mine to-morrow night."

95. "Sure then there is no warrior here," quoth Duach, "after these two." "By my troth there will be this moment," quoth Fat-Neck, son of Short Head, as he sprang on to the floor of the hall. The strength then of yon Fat-Neck was as the strength of a hundred warriors, each arm having the might of a hundred "centaurs." "Bend down, bachlach," quoth Fat-Neck, "that I may cut your head off to-night, you to cut off mine to-morrow night." "Were that my quest, I could have got it anywhere," quoth the bachlach. "Let us act according to our covenant," he quoth, "I to cut off your head to-night, you to avenge it to-morrow night." "By my people's god," quoth Duach of the Chafer Tongue, "death is thus for thee no pleasant prospect should the man killed to-night attack thee on the morrow. It is given to you alone if you have the power to be killed every night, (and) to avenge it next day." "Truly I will carry out what you all as a body agree upon by way of counsel, strange as it may seem to you," quoth the bachlach. He then pledged the other to keep his troth in this contention as to fulfilling his tryst on the morrow.

96. With that Fat-Neck took the axe from out of the bachlach's hand. Seven feet apart were its two angles. Then did the bachlach put his neck across the block. Fat-Neck dealt a blow across it with the axe till it stuck in the block underneath, cutting off the head till it lay by the base of the fork-beam, the house being filled with the blood. Straightway the bachlach rose, recovered himself, clasped his head, block and axe to his breast, thus made his exit from the hall with blood streaming from his neck. It filled the Red Branch on every side. Great was the folk's horror, wondering at the marvel that had appeared to them. "By my people's god," quoth Duach of the Chafer Tongue, "if the bachlach, having been killed to-night, come back to-morrow, he will not leave a man alive in Ultonia." The following night, however, he returned, and Fat-Neck shirked him. Then began the bachlach to urge his pact with Fat-Neck. "Sooth it is not right for Fat-Neck not to fulfil his covenant with me."

97. That night, however, Loigaire the Triumphant was present. "Who of the warriors that contest Ultonia's Champion's Portion will carry out a covenant to-night with me? Where is Loigaire the Triumphant?" quoth he. "Here," said Loigaire. He pledged him too, yet Loigaire kept not his tryst. The bachlach returned on the morrow and similarly pledged Conall Cernach, who came not as he had sworn.

98. The fourth night the bachlach returned, and fierce and furious was he. All the ladies of Ultonia came that night to see the strange marvel that had come into the Red Branch. That night Cuchulainn was there also. Then the fellow began to upbraid them. "Ye men of Ultonia, your valour and your prowess are gone. Your warriors greatly covet the Champion's Portion, yet are unable to contest it. Where is yon poor mad wight that is hight Cuchulainn? Fain would I know if his word be better than the others'." "No covenant do I desire with you," quoth Cuchulainn. "Likely is that, you wretched fly²; greatly thou dost fear to die." Whereupon Cuchulainn sprang towards him and dealt him a blow with the axe, hurling his head to the top rafter of the Red Branch till the whole hall shook. Cuchulainn again caught up the head and gave it a blow with the axe and smashed it. Thereafter the bachlach rose up.

99. On the morrow the Ultonians were watching Cuchulainn to see whether he would shirk the bachlach as the other heroes had done. As Cuchulainn was awaiting the bachlach, they saw that great dejection seized him. It had been fitting had they sung his dirge. They felt sure his life would last only till the bachlach came. Then quoth Cuchulainn with shame to Conchobar: "Thou shalt not go until my pledge to the bachlach is fulfilled; for death awaits me, and I would rather have death with honour."

100. They were there as the day was closing when they saw the bachlach approaching. "Where is Cuchulainn?" he quoth. "Here am I," he answered. "You're dull of speech to-night, unhappy one; greatly you fear to die. Yet, though great your fear, death you have not shirked." Thereafter Cuchulainn went up to him and stretched his neck across the block, which was of such size that his neck reached but half-way. "Stretch out your neck, you wretch," the bachlach quoth. "You keep me in torment," quoth Cuchulainn. "Despatch me quickly; last night, by my troth, I tormented you not. Verily I swear if you torment me, I shall make myself as long as a crane above you." "I cannot slay you," quoth the bachlach, "what with the size of the block and the shortness of your neck and of your side" (sic!).

101. Then Cuchulainn stretched out his neck so that a warrior's full-grown foot would have fitted between any two of his ribs; his neck he distended till it reached the other side of the block. The bachlach raised his axe till it reached the roof-tree of the hall. The creaking of the old hide that was about the fellow and the crashing of the axe — both his arms being raised aloft with all his might — were as the loud noise of a wood tempest-tossed in a night of storm. Down it came then . . . on his neck, its blunt side below, — all the nobles of Ultonia gazing upon them.

102. "O Cuchulainn, arise! . . . Of the warriors of Ultonia and Erin, no matter their mettle, none is found to be compared with thee in valour, bravery and truthfulness. The sovranity of the heroes of Erin to thee from this hour forth and the Champion's Portion undisputed, and to thy lady the precedence alway of the ladies of Ultonia in the Mead Hall. And whosoever shall lay wager against thee from now, as my folks swear I swear, while on life he will be in (sore scathe)." Then the bachlach vanished. It was Curoi mac Dairi who in that guise had come to fulfil the promise he had given to Cuchulainn.

NORSE

THE EDDA OF SAEMUND

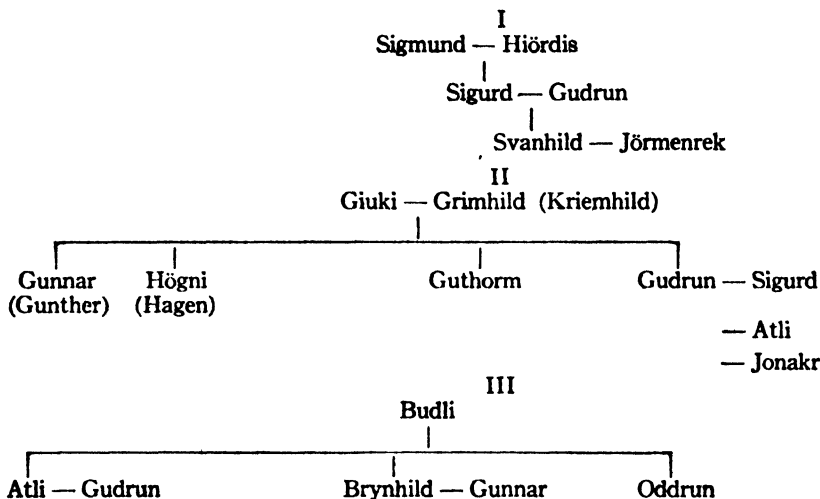

(11TH CENTURY)

There are two Old Norse writings called by the name of Edda: one in prose, called the Younger Edda, composed by Snorri Sturluson about 1225; the other a collection of poems, called the Elder Edda, formerly attributed to Saemund the Wise (1056-1133). The poems of the Elder Edda may be divided roughly into those dealing with gods and those telling of famous mortal heroes. The heroic tradition of Sigurd, which occupies the most important place in early Norse heroic literature, seems to have originated among the Germanic tribes of the Rhine valley and to have been carried north. The elements of this tradition were brought back to their original habitat with certain alterations and were used as the basis for the great Germanic epic the Nibelungenlied (p. 369). The verse form of the original was somewhat similar to that of Beowulf in that it was based on alliteration and divided into half-lines. The grim directness of the poem, it hardly need be said, is the product of a highly developed literary sense.

The selection is taken from B. Thorpe, the Edda of Saemund the Learned, London, 1886, Part II. In Thorpe's translation the half-lines are printed as whole lines.

The rather complicated family relationships are illustrated in the accompanying diagrams:

THE THIRD LAY OF SIGURD

1. It was of old that Sigurd, the young Völsung,¹ Giuki sought,²
after his conflict,
received the pledge of friendship
from the two brothers;
oaths exchanged
the bold of deed.

2. A maid they offered him, and treasures many,
Gudrun, Giuki's
youthful daughter.
Drank and conversed,
many days together,
Sigurd the young and Giuki's sons.

3. Until they went to woo Brynhild,³
and with them Sigurd,
the youthful Völsung, rode in company,⁵
who knew the way.
He would have possessed her,
if possess her he might.

104. Sigurd the southern laid a naked sword, a glittering falchion,⁴ between them;
nor the damsel 15 did he kiss, nor did the Hunnish king⁶
to his arm lift her.
He the blooming maid to Giuki's son⁶ delivered.

¹ This name is applied to any of the descendants of Völsung, a king of the Huns.

² Before coming to the court of Giuki, Sigurd had been united with Brynhild. When he left her she vowed never to accept another man. By sorcery she surrounded the castle with a wall of fire that no one but Sigurd would be able to penetrate. Sigurd at Giuki's court was given a potion by Grimhild which caused him to forget Brynhild and to accept as a bride Giuki's daughter, Gudrun.

³ Gunnar persuaded Sigurd to help him in his wooing of the warlike Brynhild. None but Sigurd could penetrate the magic fire, and so Sigurd, by sorcery, assumed the shape of Gunnar, won the bride, and brought her back. Then each resumed his proper form.

⁴ A slightly curved, broadbladed sword.

⁵ Sigurd was king of the Huns.

⁶ Gunnar.

5. She to herself of body was of no sin conscious,
nor at her death-day,
of any crime,
that could be a stain,
or thought to be:
intervened therein
the grisly fates.

6. Alone she sate without,
at eve of day,
began aloud
with herself to speak:
"Sigurd must be mine;
I must die,
or that blooming youth
clasp in my arms."

7. "Of the words I have uttered
I now repent;
He is Gudrun's consort,
and I am Gunnar's.
The hateful Norns¹
long suffering have decreed us."

8. Ofttimes she wandered, filled with evil thoughts,
o'er ice and icebergs,
every eve,
when he and Gudrun
had to their couch withdrawn, and Sigurd her in the coverings wrapt, the Hunnish king
his wife caressed.

9. "Devoid I go
of spouse and pleasure;
I will beguile myself with vengeful thoughts."

10. By those fits of fury
She was impelled to murder.
"Thou, Gunnar! shalt wholly lose my land
and myself, also.
Never shall I be happy,
king! with thee.

11. "I will return

thither from whence I came,
to my near kindred,
my relations;
there will I remain,
5 and slumber life away,
unless thou Sigurd
cause to be slain,
and a king become than the other greater.

10

12. "Let the son go together with the father,
the young wolf may not longer be fostered.

15 For whom will vengeance be the easier to appease,
if the son lives?"

20 13. Wroth was Gunnar, and with grief borne down;
in his mind revolved,
sat the whole day;
he knew not well,

25 nor could devise,

what were most desirable
for him to do, or were most fitting to be done,

30 when he should find himself of the Völsung bereft, and in Sigurd
a great loss sustain.

35 14. Much he thought,
and also long,
that it did not often happen,
that from their royal state 40 women withdrew.

Högni he then
to counsel summoned, in whom he placed
the fullest trust.

45

15. "Of all to me Brynhild, Budli's daughter,
is dearest;
she is the chief of women:

50 rather will I
my life lay down

than that fair one's treasures lose.

16. "Wilt thou the prince for his wealth circumvent?
good 'tis to command the ore of the Rhine,¹ and at ease
over riches rule and in tranquillity happiness enjoy."

17. This alone Högni for answer gave:
"It beseems us not
so to do,
by the sword to break
sworn oaths,
oaths sworn,
and plighted faith.

18. "We know not on earth men more fortunate, while we four ²
over the people rule,
and the Hun lives,
that warlike chief;
nor on earth
a race more excellent,
if we five sons
long shall foster,
and the good progeny
can increase.

19. "I know full well
whence the causes spring:
Brynhild's importunity
is over-great.

20. "We will Guthorm,
our younger brother,
and not over-wise,
for the deed prepare:
he is free from
sworn oaths,
sworn oaths,
and plighted faith."

21. Easy it was to instigate

the ferocious spirit:
in the heart of Sigurd stood his sword.

5 22. On vengeance bent, the warrior in his chamber ³ hurled his brand after the fierce assassin;
to Guthorm flew 10 dartlike Gram's ⁴ gleaming steel
from the king's hand.

23. Fell the murderer
15 in two parts, arms and head
flew far away, but his feet's part fell backwards on the place.

20 24. Sunk deep in sleep was Gudrun, in her bed,
void of cares,
by Sigurd's side:
25 but she awoke
of joys bereft,
when in the blood of Frey's friend ⁵ she swam.

30 25. So violently struck she her hands together,
that the stout of heart
rose in his bed.
"Weep not, Gudrun!
35 my blooming bride!
thy brothers live.

26. "An heir I have,
alas! too young;
40 he cannot flee from
the hostile house;
among themselves they recently have dark and evil
45 counsels devised.

27. "Never henceforth,
although seven thou bear,
will such a son

to the trysting with them ride.
Full well I know
how this has befallen:
Brynhild the sole cause is of all the evil.

28. "Me the maiden loved more than any man;
but towards Gunnar
I sinned not;
affinity I held sacred,
and sworn oaths;
thenceforward I was called his consort's friend."

29. The woman gave forth sighs, and the king his life.
So violently she struck
her hands together,
that the beakers on the wall responsive rang,
and in the court
the geese loudly screamed.

30. Laughed then Brynhild, Budli's daughter,
once only,
from her whole soul,
when in her bed
she listened to the loud lament
of Giuki's daughter.

31. Then said Gunnar,
the hawk-bearing prince:
"Laugh not thereat,
thou barbarous woman!
glad on thy couch,
as if good awaited thee.
Why hast thou lost
that beauteous color?
authoress of crime!
Methinks to death thou art doomed.

32. "Well dost thou deserve, above all women,
that before thy eyes,
we should lay Atli low,
that thou shouldst see thy brother's blood-streaming sore, his gory wounds
shouldst have to bind."

33. Then said Brynhild,
Budli's daughter:
"No one provokes thee, Gunnar!
complete is thy work of death.

5 Little does Atli
thy hatred fear;
his life will outlast thine, and his might 10 be ever greater.

34. "Gunnar! I will tell thee, though well thou knowest it,
how early ye 15 resolved on crimes.

I was o'er-young and unrestrained, with wealth endowed
in my brother's house.

20 35. "Nor did I desire to marry any man, before ye Giukings
rode to our dwelling, 25 three on horseback,
powerful kings:
would that journey
had never been!

30 36. "Then myself I promised to the great king, who with gold sat
on Grani's ¹ back.
In eyes he did not 35 you resemble, nor was at all
in aspect like:
yet ye thought yourselves mighty kings.

40 37. "And to me apart
Atli said, that he would not have our heritage divided, 45 nor gold nor lands,
unless I let myself be married, nor grant me any part of the acquired gold, which he to me a girl 50 had given to possess, and to me a child
in moneys counted.

38. "Then distracted was my mind thereon,
whether I should engage in conflict,
and death dispense,
valiant in arms,
for my brother's quarrel.
That would then be world-widely known,
and to many a one
bring heartfelt anguish.

39. "Our reconciliation
we let follow:
to me it had been more pleasing
the treasures to accept, the red-gold rings
of Sigmund's son:
nor did I another's
gold desire;
him alone I loved,
none other.
Menskögul¹ had not a changing mind.

40. "All this will Atli hereafter find,
when he shall hear of my funeral rites completed;
for never shall
the heavy-hearted woman with another's husband pass her life.
Then will my wrongs
be all avenged."

41. Up rose Gunnar, prince of warriors,
and round his consort's neck laid his hands;
all drew nigh,
yet each one singly,
through honest feeling,
to dissuade her.

42. She from her neck
those about her cast;
she let no one stay her from her long journey.

43. Then he called Högni to consultation:

² A sword.

"I will that all our folk to the hall be summoned, thine with mine —
now 'tis most needful —
5 to see if we can hinder my consort's fatal course, till from our speech
a hindrance may come:
then let us leave 10 necessity to rule."

44. To him Högni
answer gave:
"Let no one hinder her from the long journey, 15 whence she may never born again return.
Unblest she came on her mother's lap,
born in the world 20 for ceaseless misery, for many a man's heartfelt sorrow."

45. Downcast he from the meeting turned 25 to where the lady treasures distributed.
She was viewing all she owned:
Hungry female thralls²
and chamber-women.
30 She put on her golden corselet — no good meditating —
ere herself she pierced,
with the sword's point.

35 46. On the pillow she turned to the other side, and, wounded with the glaive,³
on her last counsels thought.

40 47. "Now let come those who desire gold,
and aught less precious,
to receive from me.
To every one I give 45 a gilded necklace, needle-work and coverlets, splendid weeds."

thought on what to do,
and all together
answer gave:
"Too many are there dead:
we will yet live,
still be hungry hall-servants,
to do what fitting is."

49. At length after reflection, the lady linen-clad,
young in years,
words in answer uttered:
"I desire that none, dead to entreaty, should
by force, for our sake, lose their life.

50. "Yet o'er your bones will burn .
fewer ornaments,
Menia's good meal,¹ when ye go hence me to seek.

51. "Gunnar! sit down,
I will tell to thee,
that of life now hopeless is thy bright consort.
Thy vessel will not be always afloat, though I shall have my life resigned.

52. "With Gudrun thou wilt be reconciled,
sooner than thou thinkest:
that wise woman has
by the king
sad memorials,
after her consort's death.

53. "There is born a maid, which her mother rears;
brighter far
than the clear day,
than the sun's beam,
will Svanhild be.

54. "Gudrun thou wilt give to an illustrious one,

a warrior, the bane
of many men:
not to her wish

Atli will come
her to espouse,

55. "Much have I in memory
how I was treated,
when ye me so cruelly
had deceived.
15 Robbed I was of happiness, while my life lasted.

56. "Thou wilt desire Oddrun to possess,
but Atli will 20 permit it not;
in secret ye will
each other meet.
She will love thee,
as I had done,
25 if us a better fate
had been allotted.

57. "Thee will Atli barbarously treat;
in the narrow serpent-den²
30 wilt thou be cast.

58. "It will too come to pass,
not long after,
that Atli will 35 his soul resign,
his prosperity,
and cease to live;
for Gudrun in her vengeance³
him in his bed will slay, 40 through bitterness of spirit,
with the sword's sharp edge.

59. "More seemly would appear her first consort followed, had but good counsel

been to her given,

yet to make,
in this world 'twill be my last request.
Let in the plain be raised that for us all

for those who shall have died with Sigurd.

with splendid ring,
if my train
him hence shall follow.
25 Then will our procession appear not mean.

67. "For him will follow
five female thralls, eight male slaves

fostered with me,
and with my patrimony,
which to his daughter Budli gave.

and more would say
if the sword would grant me

my wounds swell:
truth only have I uttered;
so I will cease."

FRENCH

THE SONG OF ROLAND

(IITH CENTURY)

The Song of Roland belongs to a type of early French poems called chansons de geste, or historical songs. One class of chansons de geste dealt primarily with the adventures of Charlemagne and his twelve paladins or principal warriors. The Song of Roland, composed before 1080, tells of Charlemagne's campaign against the Saracens who were invading southern France. The original author was not a great literary artist, like Homer or Dante. He told a plain story, using at all times the natural order of the events. Rude and simple, like the manners and life it depicted, the style nevertheless reflects the noble spirit of a group of heroes free from pettiness and self-interest. Roland the hero is not distinguished for wisdom — great epic heroes seldom are; but the very blindness of his devotion to his king and country and the stubbornness of his determination not to yield even in the face of obviously overwhelming odds are traits common to great national heroes. The well-known phrase taken from the poem, "Roland is bold, but Oliver is wise," does not represent delicate character analysis; but such characterization was all that seemed necessary. That quality most characteristic of the French epic is its national patriotism. "Douce France" echoes through the poem, sounding a new note in literature, a note that continues to resound to the very present. The attitude toward Nature is also markedly different from that of the Germanic heroic literature. The air is light, the sun brilliant; weapons flash and glitter; Charlemagne sits on a throne of pure gold; the whole action goes forward in an atmosphere of shimmering light. The vein of brightness and joy that comes into English literature during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries owes much to French influence.

In the selection here printed Charlemagne is withdrawing from Spain; Roland is in charge of the rear-guard. At Roncevaux the army, filing through a narrow pass, is attacked by the Saracens. Roland with the rear-guard undertakes to hold the enemy in check while the main army makes its retreat. He has promised Charlemagne to blow his famous horn if in need of help. The little army is cut to pieces, and he, Oliver, and the fighting archbishop are left practically alone to repel the last attack.

CXXXVIII

High were the peaks and shadowy and grand,

The valleys deep, the rivers swiftly ran.
Trumpets they blew in rear and in the van,
Till all again answered that olifant.¹

That Emperour canters with fury mad,
And all the Franks dismay and wonder
have;

There is not one but weeps and waxes sad
And all pray God that He will guard Rollant

Till in the field together they may stand;
There by his side they'll strike as well they 15 can.

But what avail? No good there is in that;
They're not in time; too long have they held back.

CXXXIX

In his great rage on canters Charlemagne;

Over his sark ² his beard is flowing plain.
Barons of France, in haste they spur and
strain;

There is not one that can his wrath contain 5 That they are not with Rollant the Captain,

Whereas he fights the Sarrazins of Spain.
If he be struck, will not one soul remain.
— God! Sixty men are all now in his 10 train!

Never a king had better Capitains.

CXL

Rollant regards the barren mountain-
sides;

Dead men of France, he sees so many lie,
And weeps for them as fits a gentle knight:
"Lords and barons, may God to you be
kind!

20 And all your souls redeem for Paradise!
And let you there mid holy flowers lie!
Better vassals than you saw never I.

² Cuirass.

Ever you've served me, and so long a time,
By you Carlon ¹ hath conquered kingdoms
wide;

That Emperour reared you for evil plight!
Douce land of France, O very precious clime,

Laid desolate by such a sour exile!

Barons of France, for me I've seen you die,
And no support, no warrant could I find;
God be your aid, Who never yet hath lied! ¹⁰
I must not fail now, brother, by your side;
Save I be slain, for sorrow shall I die.
Sir companion, let us again go strike!"

CXLI

The count Rollant, back to the field then hieing

Holds Durendal,² and like a vassal striking Faldrun of Pui has through the middle slicèd,

With twenty-four of all they rated highest;
Was never man, for vengeance shewed such liking.

Even as a stag before the hounds goes flying,
Before Rollant the pagans scatter, frightened.

Says the Archbishop: "You deal now very wisely!

Such valour should he shew that is bred knightly,

And beareth arms, and a good charger
rideth;

In battle should be strong and proud and sprightly;

Or otherwise he is not worth a shilling,
Should be a monk in one of those old minsters,

Where, day by day, he'd pray for us poor sinners."

Answers Rollant: "Strike on; no quarter ⁴⁰ give them!"

Upon these words Franks are again beginning;

Very great loss they suffer then, the Christians.

CXLI

The man who knows, for him there's no prison,

In such a fight with keen defence lays on;
Wherefore the Franks are fiercer than lions.

Marsile ³ you'd seen go as a brave baron,
⁵ Sitting his horse, the which he calls Gaignon;

He spurs it well, going to strike Bevon,
That was the lord of Beaune and of Dijon,
His shield he breaks, his hauberk ⁴ has undone,

So flings him dead, without condition;

Next he hath slain Yvoerie and Ivon,
Also with them Gerard of Russillon.

The count Rollant, being not far him from,
¹⁵ To th' pagan says: "Confound thee our Lord God!

So wrongfully you've slain my companions,
A blow you'll take, ere we apart be gone,
And of my sword the name I'll bid you ²⁰ con."

He goes to strike him, as a brave baron,
And his right hand the count clean slices
off;

Then takes the head of Jursaleu the blond;
That was the son of king Marsilion.

Pagans cry out: "Assist us now, Mahom! ⁵
God of our race, avenge us on Carlon!

Into this land he's sent us such felons
That will not leave the fight before they ³⁰ drop."

Says each to each: "Nay let us fly!"
Upon

That word, they're fled, an hundred thousand gone;

³⁵ Call them who may, they'll never more come on.

CXLI

But what avail? Though fled be Marsilies,
He's left behind his uncle, the alcaliph ⁶

Who holds Alferne, Kartagene, Garmalie,
And Ethiopie, a cursèd land indeed;

The blackamoors from there are in his keep,

⁴⁵ Broad in the nose they are and flat in the ear,

Fifty thousand and more in company.

These canter forth with arrogance and heat,

¹ Charlemagne.

² Like many epic heroes, Roland had a sword which bore a special name.

³ King of the Saracens.

⁴ Mohammed.

⁵ Coat of mail.

⁶ Caliph, ruler.

Then they cry out the pagans' rallying-
cheer;

And Rollant says: "Martyrdom we'll receive;

Not long to live, I know it well, have we; 5

Felon he's named that sells his body cheap!

Strike on, my lords, with burnished swords
and keen;

Contest each inch your life and death between,

That ne'er by us Douce France in shame be steeped.

When Charles my lord shall come into this
field,

Such discipline of Sarrazins he'll see,

For one of ours he'll find them dead fifteen;

He will not fail, but bless us all in peace."

CXLIV

When Rollant sees those misbegotten 20
men,

Who are more black than ink is on the pen
With no part white, only their teeth except,

Then says that count: "I know now very 25
well

That here to die we're bound, as I can tell.

Strike on, the Franks! For so I recommend."

Says Oliver: "Who holds back, is con- 30
demned!"

Upon those words, the Franks to strike again.

CXLV

Franks are but few; which, when the pagans know,

Among themselves comfort and pride they shew;

Says each to each: "Wrong was that Em- 40
perour."

Their alcaliph upon a sorrel rode,

And pricked it well with both his spurs of
gold;

Struck Oliver, behind, on the back-bone, 45

His hauberk white into his body broke,

Clean through his breast the thrusting spear he drove;

After he said: "You've borne a mighty
blow.

Charlès the great should not have left you
so;

He's done us wrong, small thanks to him
we owe;

I've well avenged all ours on you alone."

CXLVI

Oliver feels that he to die is bound,

Holds Halteclere, whose steel is rough and brown,

Strikes the alcaliph on his helm's golden mount;

Flowers and stones fall clattering to the
ground,

Slices his head, to th' small teeth in his mouth;

So brandishes his blade and flings him
down;

After he says: "Pagan, accurst be thou!
Thou'lt never say that Charles forsakes
me now;

Nor to thy wife, nor any dame thou'lt
found,

Thou'lt never boast, in lands where thou wast crowned,

One pennyworth from me thou'lt taken
out,

Nor damage wrought on me nor any
around."

After, for aid, "Rollant!" he cries aloud.

CXLVII

Oliver feels that death is drawing nigh;

To avenge himself he hath no longer time;

Through the great press most gallantly

he strikes,

35 He breaks their spears, their buckled
shields doth slice,

Their feet, their fists, their shoulders and their sides,

Dismembers them: whoso had seen that
sight,

Dead in the field one on another piled,
Remember well a vassal brave he might.

Charlè's ensign he'll not forget it quite;
Aloud and clear "Monjoie" ¹ again he cries.

To call Rollant, his friend and peer, he tries:

"My companion, come hither to my side.
With bitter grief we must us now divide."

CXLVIII

Then Rollant looked upon Oliver's face;

Which was all wan and colourless and pale,
While the clear blood, out of his body sprayed,

Upon the ground gushed forth and ran
away.

"God!" said that count. "What shall I do or say?

My companion, gallant for such ill fate!
Ne'er shall man be, against thee could prevail.

Ah! France the Douce, henceforth art thou made waste

Of vassals brave, confounded and disgraced!

Our Emperour shall suffer damage great." 15
And with these words upon his horse he faints.

CLXIX

You'd seen Rollant aswoon there in his 20
seat,

And Oliver, who unto death doth bleed,
So much he's bled, his eyes are dim and weak;

Nor clear enough his vision, far or near, 25
To recognise whatever man he sees;

His companion, when each the other meets,
Above the helm jewelled with gold he beats,

Slicing it down from there to the nose- 30
piece,

But not his head; he's touched not brow
nor cheek.

At such a blow Rollant regards him keen,
And asks of him, in gentle tones and sweet: 35
"To do this thing, my comrade, did you mean?

This is Rollant, who ever held you dear;
And no mistrust was ever us between."

Says Oliver: "Now can I hear you speak; 40
I see you not: may the Lord God you
keep!

I struck you now: and for your pardon plead."

Answers Rollant: "I am not hurt, indeed; 45
I pardon you, before God's Throne and
here."

Upon these words, each to the other leans;
And in such love you had their parting seen.

CL

Oliver feels death's anguish on him now;

And in his head his two eyes swimming
round;

Nothing he sees; hears he not any sound;
Dismounting then, he kneels upon the 5 ground,

Proclaims his sins both firmly and aloud,
Clasps his two hands, heavenwards holds them out,

Prays God himself in Paradise to allow;
10 Blessings on Charles, and on Douce

France he vows,
And his comrade, Rollant, to whom he's bound.

Then his heart fails; his helmet nods and bows;

Upon the earth he lays his whole length
out:

And he is dead, may stay no more, that count.

Rollant the brave mourns him with grief profound;

Nowhere on earth so sad a man you'd found.

CLII

So Rollant's friend is dead; whom when he sees

Face to the ground, and biting it with's
teeth,

Begins to mourn in language very sweet:
"Unlucky, friend, your courage was indeed!

Together we have spent such days and
years;

No harmful thing twixt thee and me has been.

Now thou art dead, and all my life a grief."
And with these words again he swoons,
that chief,

Upon his horse, which he calls Veillantif;
Stirrups of gold support him underneath;

He cannot fall, whichever way he lean.

CLIII

Soon as Rollant his senses won and knew,
Recovering and turning from that swoon,

Bitter great loss appeared there in his view:
Dead are the Franks; he'd all of them to lose,

50 Save the Archbishop, and save Gualter del
Hum;

He is come down out of the mountains,
who

'Gainst Spanish men made there a great
ado;

Dead are his men, for those the pagans
slew;

Will he or nill, along the vales he flew,
And called Rollant, to bring him succour soon:

"Ah! Gentle count, brave soldier, where are you?

For by thy side no fear I ever knew.

Gualter it is, who conquered Maëlgut,
And nephew was to hoary old Droün;
My vassalage thou ever thoughtest good.
Broken my spear, and split my shield in
two;

Gone is the mail that on my hauberk grew;
This body of mine eight lances have gone
through;

I'm dying. Yet full price for life I took."
Rollant has heard these words and understood,

Has spurred his horse, and on towards him
drew.

CLIII

Grief gives Rollant intolerance and pride;
Through the great press he goes again to strike;

To slay a score of Spaniards he contrives,
Gualter has six, the Archbishop other five. 30
The pagans say: "Men, these, of felon
kind!

Lordings, take care they go not hence alive!

Felon he's named that does not break their 35
line,

Recreant, who lets them any safety find!"
And so once more begin the hue and cry,
From every part they come to break the line.

CLIV

Count Rollant is a noble and brave soldier,
Gualter del Hum's a right good chevalier,
That Archbishop hath shewn good prow- 45
ess there;

None of them falls behind the other pair;
Through the great press, pagans they strike again.

Come on afoot a thousand Sarrazins,
And on horseback some forty thousand
men.

But well I know, to approach they never
dare;

Lances and spears they poise to hurl at
them,

5 Arrows, barbs, darts and javelins in the air.
With the first flight they've slain our Gualtier;

Turpin of Reims has all his shield broken,
And cracked his helm; he's wounded in the head, 10

From his hauberk the woven mail they
tear,

In his body four spear-wounds doth he
bear;

15 Beneath him too his charger's fallen dead.
Great grief it was, when that Archbishop fell.

CLV

20 Turpin of Reims hath felt himself undone, Since that four spears have through his body come;

Nimble and bold upon his feet he jumps;
Looks for Rollant, and then towards him

25 runs,
Saying this word: "I am not overcome.
While life remains, no good vassal gives
up."

He's drawn Almace, whose steel was brown and rough, 30

Through the great press a thousand blows
he's struck:

As Charlès said, quarter he gave to none;
He found him there, four hundred else
among, 35

Wounded the most, speared through the middle some,

Also there were from whom the heads he'd cut:

40 So tells the tale, he that was there says
thus,

The brave Saint Giles, whom God made marvellous,¹

Who charters wrote for th' Minster at Loüm;

Nothing he's heard that does not know this much.

CLVI

50 The count Rollant has nobly fought and
well,

But he is hot, and all his body sweats;

¹ The writer here refers to a source that is probably imaginary.

Great pain he has, and trouble in his head,
His temples burst when he the horn sounded;

But he would know if Charles will come to
them,

Takes the olifant, and feebly sounds again.
That Emperour stood still and listened
then:

"My lords," said he, "right evilly we fare!
This day Rollant, my nephew, shall be 10
dead:

I hear his horn, with scarcely any breath.
Nimbly canter, whoever would be there!
Your trumpets sound, as many as ye
bear!"

Sixty thousand so loud together blare,
The mountains ring, the valleys answer
them.

The pagans hear, they think it not a jest;
Says each to each: "Carlum doth us 20
bestead." ¹

CLVII

The pagans say: "That Emperour's at
hand, 25

We hear their sound, the trumpets of the Franks;

If Charlès come, great loss we then shall
stand,

And wars renewed, unless we slay Rollant; 30
All Spain we'll lose, our own clear father-
land."

Four hundred men of them in helmets
stand;

The best of them that might be in their 35
ranks

Make on Rollant a grim and fierce attack;
'Gainst these the count had well enough in
hand.

CLVIII

The count Rollant, when their approach
he sees,

Is grown so bold and manifest and fierce
So long as he's alive he will not yield.

He sits his horse, which men call Veillantif, 45
Pricking him well with golden spurs beneath,

Through the great press he goes, their line
to meet,

And by his side is the Archbishop Turpin.

"Now, friend, begone!" say pagans, each to each;

"These Frankish men, their horns we plainly hear;

5 Charle is at hand, that King in Majesty."

CLIX

The count Rollant has never loved cowards,

10 Nor arrogant, nor men of evil heart,

That chevalier that was not good vassal.

That Archbishop, Turpin, he calls apart:

"Sir, you're afoot, and I my charger have;

For love of you, here will I take my stand,

15 Together we'll endure things good and bad;

I'll leave you not, for no incarnate man:

We'll give again these pagans their attack;

The better blows are those from Durendal."

Says the Archbishop: "Shame on him that holds back!

Charle is at hand, full vengeance he'll exact."

CLX

The pagans say: "Unlucky were we born!
An evil day for us did this day dawn!

For we have lost our peers and all our lords.

Charles his great host once more upon us draws,

Of Frankish men we plainly hear the horns,
'Monjoie' they cry, and great is their uproar.

The count Rollant is of such pride and
force

He'll never yield to man of woman born;
Let's aim at him, then leave him on the spot!" 40

And aim they did: with arrows long and short,

Lances and spears and feathered javelots;

Count Rollant's shield they've broken 45
through and bored,

The woven mail have from his hauberk
torn,

But not himself, they've never touched his corse;

50 Veillantif is in thirty places gored,

Beneath the count he's fallen dead, that horse.

¹ Locate.

Pagans are fled, and leave him on the spot;
The count Rollant stands on his feet once more.

CLXI

Pagans are fled, enangered and enraged, Home into Spain with speed they make their way;
The count Rollant, he has not given chase,
For Veillantif, his charger, they have 10
slain;

Will he or nill, on foot he must remain.
To the Archbishop, Turpin, he goes with
aid;

He's from his head the golden helm un- 15
laced,

Taken from him his white hauberk away,
And cut the gown in strips, was round his waist;

On his great wounds the pieces of it placed, 20
Then to his heart has caught him and embraced;

On the green grass he has him softly laid,
Most sweetly then to him has Rollant prayed:

"Ah! Gentle sir, give me your leave, I
say;

Our companions, whom we so dear appraised,

Are now all dead; we cannot let them 30
stay;

I will go seek and bring them to this place,
Arrange them here in ranks, before your
face."

Said the Archbishop: "Go, and return 35
again.

This field is yours and mine now; God be praised!"

CLXII

So Rollant turns; through the field, all
alone,

Searching the vales and mountains, he is
gone;

He finds Gerin, Gerers his companion,
Also he finds Berenger and Otton,
There too he finds Anséis and Sanson,
And finds Gerard the old, of Russillon;

By one and one he's taken those barons,
To the Archbishop with each of them he 50
comes,

Before his knees arranges every one.
That Archbishop, he cannot help but sob,

He lifts his hand, gives benediction;
After he's said: "Unlucky, Lords, your
lot!

But all your souls He'll lay, our Glorious
5 God,

In Paradise, His holy flowers upon!
For my own death such anguish now I've got;

I shall not see him, our rich Emperour."

CLXIII

So Rollant turns, goes through the field in quest;

His companion Oliver finds at length;
He has embraced him close against his
breast,

To the Archbishop returns as he can best;
Upon a shield he's laid him, by the rest;
And the Archbishop has them absolved

and blest:

Whereon his grief and pity grow afresh.

Then says Rollant: "Fair comrade Oliver,

You were the son of the good count
25 Reinier,

Who held the march by th' Vale of Runier;
To shatter spears, through buckled shields
to bear,

And from hauberks the mail to break and
tear,

Proof men to lead, and prudent counsel
share,

Gluttons in field to frighten and conquer,
No land has known a better chevalier."

CLXIV

The count Rollant, when dead he saw his peers,

And Oliver, he held so very dear,

40 Grew tender, and began to shed a tear;
Out of his face the colour disappeared;

No longer could he stand, for so much
grief,

Will he or nill, he swooned upon the field.

45 Said the Archbishop: "Unlucky lord, indeed!"

CLXV

When the Archbishop beheld him swoon, Rollant,

Never before such bitter grief he'd had;
Stretching his hand, he took that olifant.
Through Rencesvals a little river ran;

He would go there, fetch water for Rollant.
 Went step by step, to stumble soon began,
 So feeble he is, no further fare he can,
 For too much blood he's lost, and no strength has;
 Ere he has crossed an acre of the land,
 His heart grows faint, he falls down forwards and
 Death comes to him with very cruel pangs.

CLXVI

The count Rollant wakes from his swoon
 once more,
 Climbs to his feet; his pains are very sore;
 Looks down the vale, looks to the hills 15
 above;
 On the green grass, beyond his companions,
 He sees him lie, that noble old baron;
 'Tis the Archbishop, whom in His name 20
 wrought God;
 There he proclaims his sins, and looks
 above;
 Joins his two hands, to Heaven holds them
 forth,
 And Paradise prays God to him to accord.
 Dead is Turpin, the warrior of Charlon.
 In battles great and very rare sermons
 Against pagans ever a champion.
 God grant him now His Benediction!

CLXVII

The count Rollant sees the Archbishop lie
 dead,
 Sees the bowels out of his body shed,
 And sees the brains that surge from his forehead;
 Between his two arm-pits, upon his breast,
 Crossways he folds those hands so white 40
 and fair.
 Then mourns aloud, as was the custom
 there:
 "Thee, gentle sir, chevalier nobly bred,
 To the Glorious Celestial I commend; Ne'er shall man be, that will Him serve so
 well;
 Since the Apostles was never such prophet,
 To hold the laws and draw the hearts of
 men.
 Now may your soul no pain nor sorrow
 ken,
 Finding the gates of Paradise open!"

CLXVIII

Then Rollant feels that death to him draws near,
 5 For all his brain is issued from his ears;
 He prays to God that He will call the peers,
 Bids Gabriel, the angel, t' himself appear.
 Takes the olifant, that no reproach shall
 hear,
 10 And Durendal in the other hand he wields;
 Further than might a cross-bow's arrow speed
 Goes towards Spain into a fallow-field;
 Climbs on a cliff; where, under two fair
 trees,
 Four terraces, of marble wrought, he sees.
 There he falls down, and lies upon the green;
 He swoons again, for death is very near.

CLXIX

High are the peaks, the trees are very high.
 Four terraces of polished marble shine;
 On the green grass count Rollant swoons thereby.
 25 A Sarrazin him all the time espies,
 Who feigning death among the others
 hides;
 Blood hath his face and all his body dyed;
 30 He gets afoot, running towards him hies;
 Fair was he, strong and of a courage
 high;
 A mortal hate he's kindled in his pride.
 He's seized Rollant, and the arms were at 35 his side.
 "Charlè's nephew," he's said, "here conquered lies.
 To Araby I'll bear this sword as prize."
 As he drew it, something the count described.

CLXX

So Rollant felt his sword was taken forth,
 Opened his eyes, and this word to him
 45 spoke:
 "Thou'rt never one of ours, full well I
 know."
 Took the olifant, that he would not let go, Struck him on th' helm, that jewelled was 50 with gold,
 And broke its steel, his skull and all his
 bones,
 Out of his head both the two eyes he drove;

Dead at his feet he has the pagan thrown:
 After he's said: "Culvert,¹ thou wert too
 bold,
 Or right or wrong, of my sword seizing
 hold!
 They'll dub thee fool, to whom the tale is told.
 But my great one, my olifant I broke;
 Fallen from it the crystal and the gold."

CLXXI

Then Rollant feels that he has lost his
 sight,
 Climbs to his feet, uses what strength he might;
 In all his face the colour is grown white.
 In front of him a great brown boulder lies;
 Whereon ten blows with grief and rage he strikes;
 The steel cries out, but does not break
 outright;
 And the count says: "Saint Mary, be my
 guide!
 Good Durendal, unlucky is your plight!
 I've need of you no more; spent is my pride!
 We in the field have won so many fights,
 Combating through so many regions wide
 That Charle's holds, whose beard is hoary white!
 Be you not his that turns from any in
 flight!
 A good vassal has held you this long time;
 Never shall France the Free behold his like."

CLXXII

Rollant hath struck the sardonyx terrace;
 The steel cries out, but broken is no ways.
 So when he sees he never can it break,
 Within himself begins he to complain:
 "Ah! Durendal, white art thou, clear of stain!
 Beneath the sun reflecting back his rays!
 In Moriane was Charle's, in the vale,
 When from heaven God by His angel bade
 Him give thee to a count and captain;
 Girt thee on me that noble King and great.
 I won for him with thee Anjou, Breitaine,
 And won for him with thee Peitou, the 50
 Maine,
 And Normandy the free for him I gained,

Also with thee Provence and Equitaine,
 And Lombardie and all the whole Ro-
 maine,

I won Baivere, all Flanders in the plain,
 5 Also Burguigne and all the whole Puillane, Costentinople, that homage to him pays;
 In Saisonie all is as he ordains;
 With thee I won him Scotland, Ireland,
 Wales,
 10 England also, where he his chamber makes;
 Won I with thee so many countries strange That Charle's holds, whose beard is white with age!
 For this sword's sake sorrow upon me 15 weighs,
 Rather I'd die, than it mid pagans stay.
 Lord God Father, never let France be shamed!"

CLXXIII

Rollant his stroke on a dark stone repeats,
 And more of it breaks off than I can speak.
 The sword cries out, yet breaks not in the least,
 25 Back from the blow into the air it leaps.
 Destroy it can he not; which when he sees,
 Within himself he makes a plaint most
 sweet:
 "Ah! Durendal, most holy, fair indeed!
 30 Relics enough thy golden hilt conceals:
 Saint Peter's Tooth, the Blood of Saint Basile,
 Some of the Hairs of my Lord, Saint Denise,
 35 Some of the Robe, was worn by Saint Mary.
 It is not right that pagans should thee seize,
 For Christian men your use shall ever be.
 40 Nor any man's that worketh cowardice!
 Many broad lands with you have I retrieved
 Which Charles holds, who hath the great white beard;
 45 Wherefore that King so proud and rich is he."

CLXXIV

But Rollant felt that death had made a
 way
 Down from his head till on his heart it lay;
 Beneath a pine running in haste he came,

¹ Traitor.

On the green grass he lay there on his face;
 His olifant and sword beneath him placed,
 Turning his head towards the pagan race,
 Now this he did, in truth, that Charles
 might say
 (As he desired) and all the Franks his race; —
 "Ah, gentle count; conquering he was
 slain!" —
 He owned his faults often and every way, 10
 And for his sins his glove to God upraised.¹

CLXXV

But Rollant feels he's no more time to seek;
 Looking to Spain, he lies on a sharp peak,
 And with one hand upon his breast he
 beats:
 "Mea Culpa! God, by Thy Virtues clean
 Me from my sins, the mortal and the mean,
 Which from the hour that I was born have been Until this day, when life is ended here!"
 Holds out his glove towards God, as he speaks;
 Angels descend from heaven on that scene.

CLXXVI

The count Rollant, beneath a pine he sits;
 Turning his eyes towards Spain, he begins 30
 Remembering so many divers things:
 So many lands where he went conquering,
 And France the Douce, the heroes of his kin,
 And Charlemagne, his lord who nourished 35
 him.
 Nor can he help but weep and sigh at this.
 But his own self, he's not forgotten him,
 He owns his faults, and God's forgiveness bids:
 "Very Father, in Whom no falsehood is,
 Saint Lazon from death Thou didst remit,
 And Daniel save from the lions' pit;
 My soul in me preserve from all perils
 And from the sins I did in life commit!"
 His right-hand glove, to God he offers it
 Saint Gabriel from 's hand hath taken it.
 Over his arm his head bows down and slips,
 He joins his hands: and so is life finish'd. 50
 God sent him down His angel cherubin,
 And Saint Michael, we worship in peril;

And by their side Saint Gabriel alit;
 So the count's soul they bare to Paradise.

CLXXVII

5 Rollant is dead; his soul to heav'n God
 bare.
 That Emperour to Rencesvals doth fare.
 There was no path nor passage anywhere Nor of waste ground no ell nor foot to spare
 Without a Frank or pagan lying there.
 Charles cries aloud: "Where are you, nephew fair?
 Where's the Archbishop and that count
 15 Oliver?
 Where is Gerins and his comrade Gerers?
 Otès the Duke, and the count Berengiers
 And Ivorie, and Ive, so dear they were?
 What is become of Gascon Engelier, 20 Sansun the Duke and Anséis the fierce?
 Where's old Gerard of Russillon; oh,
 where
 The dozen peers I left behind me here?"
 But what avail, since none can answer
 25 bear?
 "God!" says the King. "Now well may I
 despair,
 I was not here the first assault to share!"
 Seeming enraged, his beard the King doth
 tear.
 Weep from their eyes barons and cheva-liers,
 A thousand score, they swoon upon the
 earth;
 Duke Neimes for them was moved with pity rare.

CLXXVIII

No chevalier nor baron is there, who 40 Pitifully weeps not for grief and dule;
 They mourn their sons, their brothers,
 their nephews,
 And their liege lords, and trusty friends
 and true;
 45 Upon the ground a many of them swoon.
 Thereon Duke Neimes doth act with wisdom proof,
 First before all he's said to the Emperour:
 "See beforehand, a league from us or two,
 50 From the highways dust rising in our view;
 Pagans are there, and many of them,
 too.

¹ As a vassal to his lord.

Canter therefore! Vengeance upon them do!"	Let the dead lie, all as they are, unmoved, Let not approach lion, nor any brute,
"Ah, God!" says Charles, "so far are they removed!	Let not approach esquire, nor any groom;
Do right by me, my honour still renew!	5 For I forbid that any come thereto,
They've torn from me the flower of France the Douce."	Until God will that we return anew."
The King commands Gebuin and Otun,	These answer him sweetly, their love to prove:
Tedbalt of Reims, also the count Milun:	"Right Emperour, dear Sire, so will we do."
"Guard me this field, these hills and val- leys too,	10 A thousand knights they keep in retinue.

GERMAN

NIBELUNGENLIED

(ca. 1200)

The Nibelungenlied is the great German epic. The oldest manuscript was written in the twelfth or thirteenth century, but much of the material of which the poem consists comes to us from remote antiquity. The work as we now have it wears a thin coating of chivalry and feudalism borrowed from the age in which it was composed — elements curiously inconsistent with the barbaric substance which forms the real backbone of the story. It is usually held that Siegfried, the Achilles of Germanic heroic sagas and national hero of the Germanic peoples, is the hero of this poem. It is believed that stories about Siegfried grew up in the valley of the Rhine, were carried up into Scandinavia and to Ireland, where they were further developed, and were then brought back to Germany to form the basis of the extant heroic literature of that country. Nevertheless in the Nibelungenlied the stories of Siegfried form only a small part of the whole, for he meets his death soon after the beginning of the epic. Hagen, Dietrich, and Hildebrand are of far more importance to the epic as a whole. The character that endures throughout the entire poem is Kriemhild, and we might not be far wrong in calling this a poem with a heroine rather than a hero. On the other hand it is not so much her actions that constitute the narrative as it is the actions of those whom she influences and inspires. If this be true, the central hero is Hagen, the murderer of Siegfried. He is a splendid example of the faithful German retainer. His killing of Siegfried was prompted by a mistaken sense of loyalty, and his final fight and death were the culmination of his life-long adherence to his sovereign.

The action preceding the selection here presented is as follows: Siegfried, brought up at the court of his father Sigmund, king of the Netherlands, hears of the beauty of Kriemhild and rides to Worms in Burgundy to pay court to her. He is given Kriemhild as wife on condition that he help Kriemhild's brother Gunther to win Brunhild, who will wed only the one who can defeat her in three contests. He accompanies Gunther to Is(a)land and, concealed by his magic cloak of invisibility, aids him to win his warlike bride. But Brunhild, dissatisfied with her husband, on the bridal night ties him up and hangs him on a hook in the bridal chamber. Gunther asks Siegfried for help, and the latter again overcomes Brunhild in behalf of her husband and takes from her a girdle and ring, which he gives to Kriemhild. Kriemhild later reveals her possessions and her knowledge of the fact that Siegfried, not Gunther, had overcome Brunhild.

Hagen, loyal to Gunther and his brother, kills Siegfried as he drinks from a spring after a contest. Kriemhild, after trying for thirteen years in vain to avenge her husband upon her brothers, accepts an offer of marriage from Etzel, king of the Huns, and invites her brothers to visit her at her new court. Although Hagen opposes the journey, he finally agrees to conduct the visiting host. At the court of Etzel the feud breaks out. The visiting Burgundians take possession of the hall and are besieged by the Huns and their allies. Various allies of Etzel storm the hall unsuccessfully. At last comes the turn of Rüdiger, who has guaranteed the safe return of the Burgundians but is under feudal obligations to Etzel. The conflict between his pledged word and his feudal obligations constitute for him a tragic problem that can be solved only by death. The present selection deals with his attack and death. Following this incident in the poem come the final overpowering of the Burgundians by Dietrich of Bern, the death of Gunther and Hagen at the hands of Kriemhild, and the killing of Kriemhild by Hildebrand.

In this selection, which it will be interesting to compare with the Edda of Saemund, there appear some of the finest of mediæval virtues — feudal loyalty, the obligations of hospitality, fair play, and friendship. The translation is from the Lay of the Nibelungs, by Alice Horton, revised and edited by Bell, London, 1909.

ADVENTURE XXXVII
HOW THE MARGRAVE RÜDEGER WAS SLAIN

2135

The strangers, until morning, right gallantly had done.
By then Gotlinda's husband ¹ unto the court had gone,
And, looking round on all sides, he saw ¹⁰ such horrors there
As moved to inward weeping true-hearted Rüdeger.

2136

"Woe's me," then said the warrior, "that e'er I saw the day!
To think that none availeth this misery to stay!
Though peace would I make gladly, the ²⁰ king will ne'er agree,
For more and more he dwelleth upon his injury."

2137

Good Rüdeger inquiring straightway to Dietrich ² sent,
If they might make between them the noble king relent.
But he of Bern made answer: "Who ³⁰ could avail thereto?
King Etzel wills that no one should come betwixt the two."

2138

Now by a Hunnish warrior Sir Rüdeger was seen
With eyes bedimm'd with weeping, as they for long had been.
Unto the queen then spake he: "Now ⁴⁰ look how standeth he, —
The man who hath with Etzel the most authority,

2139

"And who hath at his service the people and the land.
How many a castle is there in Rüdeger's ⁵ command,
Of which, through the king's bounty, so many he may own!
Yet he throughout this struggle no worthy stroke hath done.

2140

"Methinks he little recketh if things go well or ill,
As long as he hath all things according to his will. ¹⁵
'Tis said that he is braver than other men mote be:
But that, in all this trouble, hath been full hard to see."

2141

The warrior true-hearted, with downcast mood and grim,
Gave heed unto the speaker. The hero ²⁵ look'd on him,
And thought: "This shalt thou pay for! Thou say'st I am afraid?
Thou hast at court thy story somewhat too loudly said."

2142

His fists to clench began he, and at him straight he ran,
And smote to such good purpose upon that Hunnish man ³⁵
That lifeless on the instant him at his feet he laid.
But thus King Etzel's troubles were all the greater made.

2143

"Away with thee, base scoundrel!" thereon said Rüdeger;

¹ Rüdeger.

² Dietrich of Berne, a powerful ally of King Etzel.

2145

Then answer to the margrave the great "In that thou speak'st not falsely; I

The noble knight made answer: "The "O Rüdeger," she answer'd, "thy stead-

2152

Now came the queen unto them, who eke Then likewise mighty Etzel to supplicate

To Rüdeger thus spake she: "How have 45 The ever faithful warrior right sorrow-

At all times, noble Rüdeger, you promised 50 Henceforward all mine honour I must for heretofore aye dismiss,—
My truth and noble breeding that erst from God I got!

Woe on me, God in Heaven, that death hath saved me not!

2159

2154

"Whichever side I part from to take the other one,
I shall have acted basely and grievous ill
have done;
But if from both I sever, on all sides blame I have:
May He vouchsafe to guide me Who life unto me gave."

2155

Yet still they urged him straitly, the king and eke his wife.
Thence came it many a warrior ere long must lose his life
By Rüdiger's achieving; till eke that hero fell.
Now of his direful doing I must the story tell.

2156

He knew how this must evil and fearful sorrow bring,
And liefer would he therefore denial to the king,
And eke the queen, have given: full sorely fear'd he that If e'er a guest he slaughter'd, the world would bear him hate.

2157

Unto the king then spake he — that man of spirit bold:
"Lord king, take back whatever from thee I have and hold,
Both land and burghs: with neither will
I have aught to do,
But on my feet departing, will into exile
go."

2158

Then spake the royal Etzel: "Who then will succour me?
The land as well as castles all will I give
to thee,
If thou upon my foemen avenge me, Rū-deger.
Thou'lt be a mighty sovran, of Etzel nigh
the peer."

But Rüdiger made answer: "How could
I this essay?

5 At home within my dwelling I bade them
come and stay;
Of drink and meat I offer'd to them in kindly wise,
And gave them gifts: how can I now death for them devise?

2160

"The folk belike are thinking that I am cowardly!

15 My services in nothing to them did I deny —
Or to the noble princes, or any of their
men —
That we are knit in friendship repenteth me amain.

2161

"I gave away my daughter to Giseler¹
the thane,

25 In all the world she could not have look'd for better gain
In honour or good breeding, in truth or worldly gear;
I ne'er saw prince so youthful in virtuous mind his peer."

2162

But yet again spake Kriemhild: "Right
noble Rüdiger,

35 Now let our grievous trouble for both your pity stir,
For me and the king also; and bear ye well in mind
That never host was fated such baleful guests to find."

2163

Then to the noble lady the margrave
answer made:

45 "To-day, with life, must ransom by Rüdiger be paid
For what to me of kindness thou and my lord have shown:
For that cause I must perish,— and it must now be done.

2164

"This very day, well know I, my castles and my land
Must, ownerless, fall to you, through what ye now command.
My wife and child commend I unto your gracious care,
And eke the hapless people that at Bech-laren¹ are."

2169

So Rüdeger in armour with men five hundred went,
Besides a dozen warriors who help unto him lent.
These would the meed of valour win in the stormy fray; —
They had but little warning that death so near them lay.

10

2170

"Now Rüdeger, God bless thee!" the king in answer said;
He and the queen together exceeding glad were made:
"Right well unto thy people our care we both will give,
Though if good luck be with me I trust
thou yet mayst live."

Then Rüdeger in helmet one saw march on before;
Keen-edged were all the weapons the margrave's liegemen bore,
And broad the shining bucklers upon their arms as well.
'Twas all seen by the fiddler: sore ruth upon him fell.

2166

20

2171

And so upon the venture body and soul
he cast;
Whereon the wife of Etzel began to weep
at last.
Said he: "What I have promised I must to you fulfil; — Woe for my friends, whose foeman I am against my will."

Young Giselher beheld, too, the father of his bride
With fast-bound helmet marching. That this could aught betide, Save what was good and friendly, how could he then forbode?
The noble prince was therefore exceeding glad of mood.

2167

30

2172

Then from the king one saw him depart
in mournful mood.
And to his warriors turning, who close beside him stood,
He spake: "To don your armour 'tis time, my liegemen all.
On yonder brave Burgundians, alas! I needs must fall."

"Now suchlike friends be welcome," said
Giselher the thane,
"Which we upon our journey have had
the luck to gain.
Of my betrothed lady we'll profit here
right well:
I'm glad, upon my honour, this plighting e'er befell."

2168

45

2173

They bade their folk then hasten to where their arms were found, — Haply it were a helmet, or else a buckler
round, —
Whate'er it was they wanted, their servants brought the same.
Ere long the baleful tidings to the proud exiles came.

"I know not what doth cheer you," the minstrel² answer made:
"When saw you e'er for friendship so many knights array'd,
With fasten'd helmets marching, and bearing sword in hand?
By us will Rüdeger pay for his castles and his land."

² Volker, the famous fighting minstrel.

2174

E'en as the fiddle-player of speaking made an end,
One saw the noble Rüdeger before the palace wend.
His goodly shield he lower'd and set before his feet:
He could not offer service, his friends he might not greet.

2179

"Too late dost thou forswear us," the great king answer made;
"Thou, Rüdeger most noble, by God shalt be repaid
For all the love and fealty that thou to us hast shown, —
If thou wilt in thy kindness still to the end go on.

2175

10

2180

Then cried the noble margrave to those within the hall:
"Be on your guard, I warn you, ye valiant Niblungs all!
Ye should have had my succour, now 15
must ye ransom me;
Once were we friends; now will I be from the troth-pledge free."

"And we'll be aye beholden, for all that thou didst give,
Myself and eke my kinsfolk, if thou'lt
but let us live;
Those precious gifts thou gavest, what time, in good faith, here
To Etzel's land thou ledst us: think of it, Rüdeger!"

2176

2181

They shudder'd at these tidings, those 20
sorely troubled men;
For them but little comfort there was therefrom to gain,
Since he would fight against them whom they had held so dear!
From foes they had already had mickle ills to bear.

"How gladly would I do it," said Rüdeger
the thane;
"As willingly at this time as ever I was
fain
My gifts in full abundance upon you to bestow;
No blame should I thereover e'er need to undergo."

2177

2182

"Now grant it, God in Heaven," the warrior Gunther said;
"That you will let your pity be movéd to our aid,
And that abounding honour which hope unto us gave;
Much liefer would I trust you thus never 35
to behave."

"Then have thy way," said Gernot,¹
"O noble Rüdeger!
For never yet to strangers a welcome
kindlier
By any host was bidden than thou to us
didst give:
Of that thou hast the profit if we should longer live."

2178

2183

"I can in nowise help it," the brave man said thereto;
"In battle I must meet you, since so I 40
swore to do.
Now guard yourselves, bold heroes, as ye your lives hold dear:
From me the wife of Etzel would no refusal hear."

"Would God, most noble Gernot," said
Rüdeger again,
"That ye were back in Rhineland, and I myself were slain
With some degree of honour, — since I with you must fight!
From friends have heroes never suffer'd such foul despite."

- 2184
 "Now God reward thee, Rüdeger," spake Gernot in reply,
 "For those rich gifts thou gavest: I grieve 5 that thou shouldst die
 If with thee there must perish a mind so virtuous too; —
 Here carry I the weapon thou gavest me, hero true!
- 2185
 "And never hath it fail'd me in all this struggle dread,
 And many a knight hath fallen, beneath 15
 its edges, dead.
 Strong is it and well-temper'd, a good and handsome blade;
 I ween a gift so worthy by knight will ne'er be made.
- 2186
 "And should we not persuade thee to come unto our side,
 If friends of mine thou slayest who still 25
 within abide,
 With thine own sword I'll smite thee and take away thy life:
 Thee, Rüdeger, I pity, and eke thy noble
 wife."
- 2187
 "Now would to God, Sir Gernot, that thus it e'en might be,
 That all your will and purpose might be 35
 fulfill'd on me,
 Whereby your kinsmen longer might yet
 enjoy their life!
 Ay! gladly would I trust you with daughter and with wife."
- 2188
 Then spake the young Burgundian, the child of Uté fair:
 "Why do you thus, Sir Rüdeger? All 45
 these who with me are
 To you are well-disposéd; an evil course you take;
 Your daughter fair too early a widow you will make.
- 2189
 "If you and your retainers in strife contend with me,
- How grievously unfriendly will that appear to be!
 In that beyond all others my faith in you
 I laid,—
 5 In such wise that your daughter my wife
 I would have made."
- 2190
 "Unto your pledge be faithful, O prince of noble race,"
 Said Rüdeger, "if haply God send you
 from this place;
 Suffer not that the maiden for me atonement make;
 15 Be pitiful towards her, for your own virtue's sake."
- 2191
 "That would I do right gladly," young Giseler replied:
 "But these my high-born kinsmen who still are here inside,
 If they at your hands perish, the friendship firmly knit 25 With you and eke your daughter by me must be acquit."
- 2192
 "Then God have mercy on us!" the gallant warrior spake.
 Thereon they raised their bucklers, as though a way to make,
 By force, unto the strangers within Kriemhilda's hall.
 30 Then loudly from the stairway was Hagen heard to call:
- 2193
 "Now for a while yet tarry, most noble Rüdeger";
 40 Such were the words of Hagen: "we would again confer,— Myself and eke my masters,— forced by necessity:
 45 How will it profit Etzel if we poor exiles die?"
- 2194
 "I am in grievous trouble," yet Hagen said, "the shield 50 That Lady Gotelinda gave me as mine to wield,
 The Huns for me have batter'd and
 hack'd it out of hand:

In friendliness I brought it unto King
Etzel's land.

2200

2195

"If so be God in heaven would grant me
of His grace
To hold as good a buckler once more before my face,
As that which thou dost handle, right
noble Rüdiger,
No longer in the combat need I a hauberk
wear."

"Woe's me for this betiding!" said Hagen
yet again:

5 "We've had to bear already so great a load of pain,
Must we with friends be striving? Now
God our refuge be!"
Then made the margrave answer: "It grieves me bitterly."

2201

2196

Right gladly would I serve thee as touching this my shield,
Durst I make thee the offer in spite of Dame Kriemhild.
But do thou take it, Hagen, and bear it
on thine hand;
Ay! what if thou shouldst bring it to thy Burgundian land!"

"Your gift I'll now requite you, most
noble Rüdiger,—

15 Howe'er these high-born warriors themselves towards you bear,—
To wit that here in battle you ne'er shall feel my hand,
Though all by you should perish of the Burgundian land."

2202

2197

When he to give the buckler so readily agreed,
Then were there eyes in plenty that with hot tears were red.
Of gifts it was the latest that unto warrior
e'er
By Rüdiger was given, the lord of Bechelar.

In courtly wise he bent him, the worthy Rüdiger;

25 On all sides they were weeping that such heart-sorrows were
By no one to be mended:— a dread
necessity!
The father of all virtues in Rüdiger would die.

2203

2198

How fierce soe'er was Hagen, however hard in mood,
Yet stirr'd that gift his pity, with which the warrior good,
So nigh to his last moments, had freely
him endow'd;
And with him fell to weeping full many a chieftain proud.

Then from the house-door speaking the minstrel Volker said:

35 "Since my companion Hagen a truce with you has made,
To you I also promise safe-conduct from my hand;
For well have you deserved it since came we to the land.

2204

2199

"Now God in Heaven reward thee, most
noble Rüdiger;
The like of thee will never be met with anywhere,
Who unto exiled warriors so royally dost
give:
God grant that all thy virtue for evermore
may live."

"You must, most noble margrave, be messenger of mine.

45 These ruddy golden armlets gave me the margravine,
That I should surely wear them here at the revelry:
You must yourself behold them and witness bear for me."

2205

"Would God in Heaven allow it," then answer'd Rüdeger,
"The margravine should give you still more of such to wear!
Unto my wife your message right gladly will I give — Thereof be ye not doubtful — if I to see her live."

2210

Many the swift strokes also the weary warriors spent
On him of Bechelaren, that straight and surely went Right through the bright mail armour,
nigh to the very life;
And glorious deeds of daring achieved
they in that strife.

2206

And even whilst he promised, his buckler
Rüdeger
Raised: and in mood of madness no longer could forbear,
But rush'd upon the strangers, — a very warrior now;
And fast the mighty margrave dealt round him many a blow.

10

2211

When Rüdeger's noble comrades within had made their way, Volker along with Hagen rush'd swiftly
to the fray:
They gave to no one quarter, save to that single man.
The blood through helmets, shatter'd by hands of either, ran.

2207

Aloof together standing Volker and Hagen stay'd,
According to the promise the warriors
twain had made.
Yet more, as gallant, found he waiting beside the door;
Whence Rüdeger the battle began with trouble sore.

20

2212

How grimly in that chamber the clang
of swords uprose,
And many of the shield-plates sprang off
beneath their blows;
The jewels hack'd from off them fell on the bloody floor.
In such grim humour fought they as might be never more.

25

2208

With murderous intention he was allow'd therein
By Gunther and by Gernot, who heroes should have been.
But Giseler aside stood, so great his sorrows were; —
For life he hoped, and therefore avoided Rüdeger.

30

2213

The lord of Bechelaren went up and down
the hall,
As one who might in battle by strength accomplish all.
By Rüdeger's achievements that day it might be told
He was indeed a warrior, right praiseworthy and bold.

35

2209

Anon the margrave's liegemen rush'd forth upon the foe;
Like warriors true one saw them after their leader go;
They bore their keen-edged weapons
ready in hand to wield,
And many a helm they shatter'd and many a noble shield.

45

2214

Here also stood those warriors Gunther and Gernot too,
Who in the stress of battle full many a hero slew;
And Giseler and Dankwart, — the twain reck'd not for aught, —
And so full many a warrior unto his last day brought.

2215

Well Rüdiger bore witness that he was strong enow,
 And brave, with proven armour; what heroes laid he low!
 'Twas seen by a Burgundian: wrath
 strove within him deep.
 On Rüdiger the noble then death began to creep.

2220

Aloft the gift of Rüdiger in hand he swung: and though
 His own wound, too, was deadly, he dealt 5 on him a blow
 Right through his stalwart buckler unto his helmet's slot.
 The fair Gotlinda's husband fell dead
 upon the spot.

10

Stout Gernot 'twas, who loudly the hero challenged then.
 He cried unto the margrave: "Wilt thou of all my men
 Not one unscathed leave me, most noble
 Rüdiger?
 It moves me beyond measure; the sight
 I cannot bear.

2221

In sooth a gift so precious was worse
 requited ne'er;
 The two fell slain together, Gernot and Rüdiger,
 15 Like-fated in the combat, each by the other's stroke.
 When this great loss to Hagen was known,
 his wrath outbroke.

2217

2222

"Now lo! the gift you gave me to your own ruin tends,
 Since you have taken from me so many of my friends.
 Now turn towards me hither, thou noble,
 gallant man,
 I'll make your gift avail me with all the skill I can."

Thus spake the Tronian hero¹: "In evil plight are we!
 In these two have we suffer'd so great an injury
 As ne'er can be o'ertided by peoples or 25 by lands;
 Now hold we Rüdiger's chieftains as bail in luckless hands."

2218

2223

Or ever that the margrave had won his way to him,
 Mail coats that erst were shining must needs be spoilt and dim.
 Then either at the other, thirsting for honour, ran;
 And each to guard his body from deadly wounds began.

30 "Woe on me for my brother, who here in death doth lie!
 How cometh, every moment, some tale of misery!
 And I must mourn for ever the noble
 Rüdiger:
 35 The loss to me is double, and grievous
 'tis to bear."

2219

2224

Yet smote their swords so keenly, against them all was vain.
 And then was Gernot stricken by Rüdiger
 the thane
 Athwart his flint-like helmet, till downward flow'd the blood;
 All in a trice repaid him that gallant knight and good.

So Giseler, beholding his lady's father dead: —
 40 And they who still were living a grievous reckoning paid,
 Death fell upon them sorely seeking to take his own;
 Of them from Bechelaren there lived ere 45 long not one.

2225

Now Giseler and Gunther and with them Hagen too,
Dankwart and Volker also, — all warriors good and true, —
Came forward all together, to where the twain were laid:
Then was there by the heroes great lamentation made.

2230

"Not so, alas! the story, most noble
queen, I rede;
And, dare I charge with falsehood a dame
so nobly bred,
Thee, devilishly lying of Rüdeger, I
heard;
For he and his companions from peace have sorely err'd.

2226

"Death sorely us despoileth," spake the lad Giseler:
"But make an end of weeping, and get
we to the air
To cool our mail-clad bodies, worn as we are with strife;
Here God, I ween, will grant us but scanty spell of life."

10

2231

"That which the king commanded he did so zealously,
That he and all his people dead in yon
chamber lie.
Now cast about, Kriemhilda, on errands whom to send!
For Rüdeger the hero hath served thee to the end.

2227

Some sitting, others leaning, one saw
there many a thane.
They once again were idle: and round about them, slain,
Lay Rüdeger's companions. The uproar
all was laid.
So long the silence lasted, that Etzel grew afraid.

20

2232

"And wilt thou not believe me, see it thou shalt anon!"
And to her heartfelt sorrow so was it straightway done:
They bore the mangled hero before the king and queen.
The thanes of Etzel never so sad a sight had seen.

25

2228

"Woe on me for such service!" then spake
the royal wife:
"These folk are not so trusty that on our foeman's life
Shall vengeance due be taken by Rüde-
ger's command:
He means to take them safely back to Burgundian land.

30

2233

When they beheld the margrave thus borne before them dead,
No penman could have written, nor elsewise could be said,
How manifold the mourning of women
and of men,
Who one and all bore witness unto their heart-felt pain.

35

2229

"What boots it us, King Etzel, that we with him and his Have shared whate'er he wanted? The chief hath done amiss:
He who should wreak our vengeance
doth wish a peace to gain."
Thereunto answer'd Volker, the allaccomplish'd thane:

40

2234

The sorrowing of Etzel so great was, that the noise
Was even as a lion's, — the mighty king his voice
So lifted in his anguish: eke mourn'd his wife no less:
Good Rüdeger bewail'd they with utmost bitterness.

SPANISH

THE POEM OF THE CID

(ca. 1200)

The first real literary document in Spanish is the Poem of the Cid, a heroic narrative poem about three thousand lines in length. It deals with the adventures of the national hero Rodrigo Diaz (known as the Cid Campeador), who became famous in the wars between the Christians and the Moors. The Cid, a widely known traditional character, unlike most epic heroes actually existed. He was a landed baron in the northwest part of Spain and lived in the last half of the eleventh century. His name of the Cid Campeador is said to have been given him because he was so often acknowledged as Seid (Lord) by the Moorish nobles whom he conquered; Campeador is the Spanish for Champion. Although the hero himself was a real personage, his adventures are largely fabulous.

The literary character of the poem is simple, heroic, and national. The manners of the chivalric age gleam forth in the midst of epic plainness of literary structure. The meter is rude and undeveloped, the line varying in length between twelve and fourteen syllables. Like the Chanson de Roland (q.v.), the verse structure is dependent upon assonance. Rough and undeveloped as it is, it is valuable for its rugged strength, for its striking pictures of contemporary life, and for its vigorous assertion of the ancient virtues of courage and honor.

At the beginning of the story (the first pages of the manuscript are lost) the Cid has just been exiled by his king. He puts his wife and children into sanctuary and departs for the war against the Moors. The first part of the poem relates his successes against the pagans. The Cid then defeats the Count of Barcelona and captures Valencia. He is restored to the favor of the king, and his two daughters are married to the two Counts of Carrion, the most powerful lords of the realm. The marriages later are dissolved because of the misconduct of the husbands, the Cid triumphs over them in a public contest, and the two daughters are affianced to the heirs of Navarre and Aragon. The part given here begins with the Cid's accusation of the Counts of Carrion and continues through to the end. It is especially notable as a spirited account of a mediæval trial by combat.

This selection is translated by Archer M. Huntington, Hispanic Society of America, copyright Archer M. Huntington.

King Don Alfonso passed within Toledo,
My Cid Ruy Diaz camped in San Servan.
He bade them candles make and place
upon

The altar. Wish he hath to watch within
This holy spot, in prayer and secret speech Unto Creator. When the morn had come Minaya and the other good men there Were warned. They matins said and prime till dawn.

The mass was over ere the sun arose,
Their offering complete and fair they
made.

"Minaya Albarfáñez, thou who art
Right arm of mine, ye shall accompany me, 15
And Bishop Don Jerome, Pero Vermudez,
That Muño Gustioz as well shall go,
And Martin Antolinez, noble man
Of Burgos town, and Albar Albarez,
Martin Muñoz, at time propitious born, 20

And Albar Salvadorez go as well,
And Felez Muñoz too, my nephew he.
With me shall go Mal Anda, wise is he;
Galin García, good man of Aragon.

5 With these, they fill the number of five score
From good men present; wearing gambessons,¹

More easily to bear the weight of arms.
10 Beneath, cuirasses brilliant as the sun,
And o'er cuirasses ermines and pelisses,
And, that the arms show not, well-drawn the cords.

Beneath the cloaks the trenchant swords
and keen.

In such a guise I wish to seek the court,
To say my say and my deserts demand.
If Lords of Carrion plan evil act,
With such an hundred shall I fearless

¹ A sort of long shirt worn under the armor.

They all made answer: "Liege, 'tis thus we wish."

As he hath bidden do they all prepare.
Naught stays the one on hour propitious
born.

In hose of goodly stuff his limbs he clad,
And over them shoes most ornate. A shirt

Of linen fine, as white as is the sun;
The fastenings, with gold and silver all:
Bound fast upon the wrist, for so he bade.
Above the shirt a tunic rich he wore Of ciclaton¹; with gold 'twas wrought, and
all

Appeared to be of gold. And over this
A scarlet skin, the edges are of gold;
My Cid the Campeador he wore it aye.
A noble scarlet coif upon his hair.

And it is wrought with gold, for this 'tis
made
That might the hair of good Cid Campea-dor

Be never cut away. His beard was long,
He bound it with a cord; and that he did
That might he all his person keep secure
Beneath, he wore a cloak of greatest worth:
In this, all present found whereon to gaze.
With that five score he ordered to prepare,
He quickly mounts and goes from San Servan.

Thus unto court My Cid departs prepared.
He would dismount beside the outer gate.
With circumspection passed My Cid
within,

With all his men, and seeks the midst of all,
And round about him stand his hundred
men.

When they the man on hour propitious
born

Beheld arrive, good King Alfonso rose
And Count Don Anrrich, Count Don Raymond too,

And, know ye, thereupon all others rose.
With greatest honor they receive the man
On hour propitious born. But was no wish
In Crespo de Granon to rise, nor all
The party of the Lords of Carrion.

The king addressed the Cid: "Sir Cam-
peador,

Come hither, on the seat ye gave to me.
Though some it grieve, ye better are than
we."

Thereon the man who gained Valencia Gave many thanks: "Rest thou upon thy seat

As king and liege, and here will I remain
5 With all of these, my men." What said the Cid

Right heartily it pleased the king.
Thereon

Upon a fair-wrought seat My Cid reposed.
10 The hundred men who guard him stood
about.

All gaze upon My Cid within the court,
Upon his beard so long and bound with cord.

15 He truly in his trappings seems a man!
For very shame the Lords of Carrion Dared not regard him. Rose good King
Alfonso:

"Hark me, my men, so help you the 20 Creator!

Since I was king but twice I called my
court:

In Burgos one, the other Carrion;
This third to-day I come to hold within 25 Toledo. For the love I bear My Cid,
The one who on propitious hour was born,
That right he have of Lords of Carrion.
We all are 'ware great wrong they bore to
him.

30 Count Anrrich and Count Raymond judge
herein,

And ye, the other counts, who join them
not.

Thereto attend ye all, for are ye wise,
35 To find the right, for wrong I order not.
In each division be there peace this day.
And do I by Saint Isidor make oath
That, whosoever shall disturb my court,
My kingdom shall he leave and lose my
love.

Whose cause is just I favor. Let My Cid
The Campeador demand and shall we learn

The answer of the Lords of Carrion."
My Cid arose and kissed the royal hand:
45 "Great thanks I render you as king and liege,

Wherein ye called this court through love
of me.

50 Of Lords of Carrion this thing I seek;
Not mine the shame that they my daughters left.

¹ Silk or other rich stuff.

For did ye wed them, king, and will ye know What thing this day to do. But when they took My daughters from Valencia the great I loved them well of heart and soul, and gave
 Two swords to them, Colada and Tizon — In manly guise I gained them — that they earn Honor with them and service render you. When they in Corpes' oaken forest left
 My daughters twain, they nothing sought of me
 And lost my love. Return my swords to me, Since are they sons-in-law of mine no more."
 The judges grant it: "All of this is just." Count Don Garcia said: "We'll speak on this."
 The Lords of Carrion then drew apart With all their kin and party present there. They soon discuss the thing and all agree: "Still unto us Çid Campeador doth show Great love, wherein this day he seeketh not
 The payment for his daughters' shame from us.
 And will we place us well with King Alfonso: Give back his swords, since there his seeking ends.
 He having them, the court will go. Nor more
 Of us Çid Campeador shall justice gain." Upon that word again they sought the court:
 "Now, King Alfonso, grace; our liege are ye.
 We may deny it not, two swords he gave us.
 And since he asks for these and wishes them,
 Before you here we'd give them back to him."
 They drew the swords Colada and Tizon And placed in hands of their liege lord the king.

He drew the swords, the court was lighted all.
 The pommels¹ and the quillons² all were gold.
 5 Then marvelled all the good men in the court.
 He took the swords, the king's hand kissed, and turned,
 And sought once more the seat from whence he rose.
 10 He held them in his hands and gazed on both;
 Nor might they change them; knew them well the Çid.
 15 His body all rejoiced, and did he smile With all his heart. He raised his hand aloft
 And grasped his beard: "By this beard man ne'er plucked, 20 Avenged Dame Sol and Dame Elvira thus."
 By name he called his nephew; then he stretched
 His arm and gave to him the sword Tizon.
 25 "Take, nephew, this, for gains it better lord."
 He reached and gave to Martin Antolinez, The noble burgales,³ the sword Colada.
 "My noble vassal, Martin Antolinez, Colada take, from worthy lord I gained it, 'Twas from the Count Don Raymond Verengel
 Of mighty Barcelona; unto you I give to guard it well. If chance befall, 35 I know with that great prize and fame were yours."
 He kissed his hand, the sword accepting took;
 Right soon arose My Çid the Campeador:
 40 "Grace to Creator and to you, liege king, Now of my swords Colada and Tizon I satisfaction have. Yet other cause Have I against the Lords of Carrion. When from Valencia my daughters twain They led, in gold and silver gave I them Three thousand silver marks. While this I did
 They yet their deed performed. Give back my wealth,

¹ The knobs on the hilts of swords.² Arms of the cross guards of the swords.³ Citizen of Burgos. The Çid was born near Burgos, and it is there that the remains of the hero and his wife are preserved.

Since they no more are sons-in-law of mine."
 Here had ye seen the Lords of Carrion Complain. Count Raymond cried: "Say yes or no."
 Then spake the Lords of Carrion: "We gave Çid Campeador his swords that naught
 beyond
 He ask of us and there the matter end. 10
 An't please the king 'tis thus that we reply."
 The king said: "Must ye meet the Çid's demands." And said the good king: "Thus do I or- 15
 dain."
 Spake Albarfáñez: "Rise, Çid Campea-
 dor!"
 "That wealth I gave return, or make account."
 Then drew the Lords of Carrion apart.
 Nor in their talk agree, for great the
 wealth;
 The Lords of Carrion have spent it all.
 They this decision brought and spake 25
 their wish:
 "Who gained Valencia doth press us hard.
 Since wealth he seeks from us, we needs must pay
 With property in lands of Carrion." 30
 When this was shown the judges made
 reply:
 "That do we not forbid, an't please the Çid;
 But thus, upon our judgment, we com- 35
 mand:
 That here, within the court, ye payment
 make."
 Upon these words King Don Alfonso spake:
 "Çid Campeador seeks justice well we 40
 know.
 Of these three thousand marks have I
 two hundred,
 Received from those two Lords of Carrion.
 Are all prepared, I wish to give them 45
 back.
 Unto My Çid, on hour propitious born, Let them be given. Since must they render them,
 I wish them not." Fernan Gonzalez 50
 spake:
 "No coin have we." Count Raymond
 then replied:

"Now have ye spent the gold and silver
 all.
 'Fore King Alfonso thus do we ordain:
 That they shall pay a fair equivalent 5 And that the Campeador accept the same."
 Now did the Lords of Carrion perceive It must be done. Ye had beheld them bring 10 Fleet steeds in number, many sturdy mules,
 And palfreys and full store of goodly
 swords
 Equipped in full. My Çid accepted all
 Upon their valuation in the court.
 O'er that two hundred marks of King Alfonso
 The lords paid him on hour propitious
 born.
 20 Their own sufficing not, they borrowed it.
 Know ye, ill served they 'scaped from this affair.
 My Çid accepted these equivalents.
 His men received them and will give them
 care.
 This done, full soon to other thought they came.
 "Oh, Lord King, grace, for love of charity!
 The chief complaint, it may not be forgot.
 Attend me all this court and grieve ye all 30 With my affliction. Lords of Carrion,
 Who dire dishonor brought me, will I not Permit that short of challenge they escape.
 Speak, Lords, and say wherein I did ye harm,
 35 In jest or earnest, or what way soe'er;
 I'll make amends as shall the court decide.
 Why stripped ye bare my heart? I gave
 to you
 40 My daughters, when ye left Valencia,
 With honor very high and riches great.
 Dogs, traitors, since ye wished for them no
 more,
 Why take them from Valencia their fief?
 45 And wherefore struck ye them with girths and spurs?
 Alone ye left them in the oaken wood
 Of Corpes, to the wild beasts and the birds
 That haunt the mountain. 'Tis yourselves that stand,
 In what ye did to them, the less in worth.
 An ye redress me not, this court attend it."
 Then rose upon his feet Count Don Garcia.

"Grace now, O king, in all of Spain the best!

Here stands My Cid, announced before this court.

His beard he lets to grow and wears it long. With wonder some are filled and some with fear.

The Lords of Carrion are such by birth, For concubines they should not wish his daughters.

As wives and equals who had thought to give?

Deserting them they acted in their right. We naught esteem what thing soe'er he saith."

The Campeador laid hand upon his beard. "My thanks to God who heaven and earth commands.

'Tis long, for, while it grew, 'twas cared for well.

What moves you, Count, to thus attack my beard?

For since it grew it every care received.

Ne'er son of woman born laid hand thereon,

Nor ever plucked it Christian's son nor Moor's,

As I did yours in Cabra's castle, Count, When took I Cabra and you by your beard,

No boy was there but plucked a thumb's length forth,

Not yet the part I plucked hath even grown."

Fernan Gonzalez rose upon his feet.

With voice uplifted, hear the word he spake:

"Now leave ye, Cid, this talk. For are ye now

Of wealth and all content. Let quarrel not arise 'tween you and us. For we by birth Are Counts of Carrion, 'twere ours to wed Daughters of kings or emperors; for us Daughters of Infanzones¹ ne'er were meet.

And have we done the right in leaving them.

Know ye, we more, not less, esteem ourselves."

My Cid Ruy Diaz gazed on Pero Vermudez:

"Dumb Peter speak, thou ever silent man!

My daughters and your cousins-german they.

To me they speak, upon your ears it falls. An I reply, ye may not arms assume."

5 Pero Vermudez then began to speak.

His speech was halting and unable he To reason, yet, when once he had begun, Know ye, not any rest he took therein:

"Cid, will I say to you your ways are 10 strange;

In cortes,² aye, Dumb Peter call ye me.

Ye well are 'ware that I can do no more.

Whate'er be mine to do lacks not through me.

15 Ye lie, Fernando, lie in all ye spake.

For great your honor, through the Campeador.

And I your evil ways will tell. Recall, When near Valencia the great, we fought, 20 First blows ye begged the loyal Campeador.

Ye saw a Moor and forth to try him went, But ere ye gained him turned about in flight.

25 Had I not charged the Moor, he ill had served you.

I took your place and fought against the Moor.

The blows that first I dealt him conquered 30 him.

I gave his horse to you, and hid the thing. Unto this day to none discovered it.

And might ye boast before My Cid and all That ye had slain a Moor and that ye did

35 A feat of arms. They all believed it true, But knew they not the truth, and are ye fair

But cowardly. Thou tongue devoid of hands,

40 How dare ye talk? Fernando, speak and grant

The justice of my words. Recall ye not

The lion story in Valencia,

When slept My Cid and broke the lion 45 loose?

And thou, Fernando, what, with fear, didst thou?

Didst hide thyself behind the couch where slept

50 My Cid the Campeador; didst hide thyself, Fernando, whence to-day your worth is less.

² Court, meeting, assembly.

About the couch we drew to guard our
 liege,
 Until awoke My Cid, the man who gained Valencia. He from the couch arose
 And toward the lion went. The lion bowed His head, and did await My Cid, and let Him seize his neck; he placed him in the cage.
 When turned him back the goodly Cam-
 peador,
 His vassals round about him he beheld.
 Inquiry for his sons-in-law he made,
 But neither found. For evil one and traitor
 Do I defy thy body here before King Don Alfonso. Daughters of the Cid,
 Dame Sol and Dame Elvira, as to them,
 In that ye left them is your worth the less,
 For they but women are and ye are men: 20
 In every guise their worth is more than yours.
 An't please Creator, when the fight is
 come,
 In traitor guise ye shall acknowledge it. 25
 I'll prove the truth of all that I have said."
 Of these two now the talking came to
 end.
 Attend the words Diego Gonzalez spake:
 "By birth are we of counts of purest blood. 30
 These marriages were all unsuitable,
 Wherein we did accept as father-in-law
 My Cid Don Roderick. And that we left
 His daughters do we still repent us not.
 While living let them sigh! For what to 35
 them
 We did they will forever be reproached;
 On this I'll fight the most courageous one,
 That through deserting them we honored
 are."
 Rose Martin Antolinez to his feet.
 "Silence, ye false one, mouth that knows not truth!
 Shouldst not forget the story of the lion.
 Didst through the portal fly and place 45
 thyself
 Within the court, didst go to hide behind
 The wine-press beam, but ne'er again didst
 wear
 Thy cloak nor tunic. Will I fight thereon, 50
 Nor shall it otherwise befall. What cause Hath made ye leave the daughters of the Cid?
 Know ye their worth is greater than your
 own
 In every way. When ye the fight desert
 Thy mouth shall say it, that ye are a 5 traitor,
 And lied in whatsoever ye have said."
 Here talk about these two was brought to
 end.
 Asur Gonzalez in the palace came,
 10 Trailing a tunic and an ermine cloak.
 All flushed he came, for had he broken fast.
 He little did attend whereof he spake:
 "Now, men, whoe'er such evil thing be-
 held?
 15 Who'll bring us information of My Cid,
 He of Bivar? How hath he sought the stream
 Of Obierna, there to drive his mills
 And take his miller's dues, as was his wont?
 Who led him to contract these marriages
 With those of Carrion?" Then to his feet Rose Muño Gustioz: "Thou treacherous
 one,
 Thou evil man and traitor, hold thy peace!
 Ye breakfast ere ye pray; to those ye give Your salutation, do ye all disgust;
 Nor do ye speak the truth to friend or 25 liege,
 To all men false, and more to the Creator.
 No sharing in your friendship I desire.
 I'll make ye grant that are ye what I say."
 Said King Alfonso: "Cease ye now this talk.
 Those who defied shall fight, else God defend."
 Now as this talking to an end was brought,
 Behold there came two knights within the 40 court.
 The one was called Oiarra, and the other Ynego Ximenez. And the one,
 The Infant of Navarre, and was the other Infant of Aragon. And did they kiss King Don Alfonso's hands, and did they
 ask
 His daughters of My Cid the Campeador
 For queens of Aragon and of Navarre,
 That be they honorably given them,
 And blessed. And thereupon the court was still.
 All harkened. Rose My Cid the Cam-
 peador:

"Grace, King Alfonso, are ye liege of mine!
 For this I render the Creator thanks,
 Since from Navarre and Aragon they ask My daughters. You before in marriage
 gave,
 For 'twas not I. Behold, my daughters
 are Within your hands. And lest you bid me
 so,
 I naught will do." The king arose; he bade
 The court be silent: "I desire you, Cid, Most worthy Campeador, that you be pleased,
 And I will grant it, that this wedding be Within this court accomplished on this
 day.
 Thereon your honor grows and lands and fief."
 My Cid arose; the king's hands did he
 kiss:
 "Since that is your desire, I yield it, liege."
 Then said the king: "God give ye guerdon
 thence!
 Oiarra, and you, Ynego Ximenez,
 This marriage do I grant it unto you:
 The ladies Dame Elvira and Dame Sol,
 The daughters of My Cid, unto the Lords
 Of Aragon and of Navarre be given
 To you in blessed wedlock honorable."
 Oiarra rose with Ynego Ximenez.
 King Don Alfonso's hands they kissed, and
 then
 My Cid the Campeador's. They pledged their faith,
 The oaths are given, that as thus 'twas said
 It so befell, or better e'en than that.
 Of all that court it many satisfied,
 But did it not the Lords of Carrion.
 Minaya Albarfañez rose: "I beg Your grace, as king and liege, and may this
 not Cid Campeador displease. Full leisure I Have given unto you through all this court.
 Now would I tell you something of my
 own." The king replied: "Right glad am I thereof.
 Minaya, speak what thing soe'er thou
 wish."
 "I pray you that you hear me all the
 court;

For high is my resentment 'gainst the Lords
 Of Carrion. My cousins gave I them,
 By King Alfonso's order. They received
 5 them
 With blessing and with honor. Great the wealth
 My Cid the Campeador on them bestowed.
 And have they, to our grief, deserted them.
 As evil men and traitors I defy Their bodies. They by nature are of those Of Vanigomez, whence came counts of worth 15 And valor; but full well we know their ways!
 For this I thank Creator, since the Lords
 Of Aragon and of Navarre demand Dame Sol and Dame Elvira, cousins mine.
 Ere this ye deemed them equals to be held Within your arms, but now their hands
 ye'll kiss,
 And needs must call them ladies, and must serve them,
 25 Though it be grievous unto ye. My thanks
 To God in heaven, and that King Don
 Alfonso,
 My Cid the Campeador in honor thus Increaseth! Such a man as I have named, 30 In every guise ye are. If one there be
 To answer make or to deny the thing,
 I, Albarfañez, am in all his better."
 Gomez Pelayet thereupon arose:
 "Of what avail, Minaya, all this talk?
 35 For in this court are quite enough for you:
 Whoso would else desire 'twould be his
 death.
 God will, an forth from this unscathed we
 come,
 40 Ye after shall perceive ye spake not truth." The king: "Now cease the talking. None
 thereon
 Another word address. At morrow morn,
 When cometh forth the sun, be then the 45 fight
 Between these three 'gainst three in court defied."
 Then soon outspake the Lords of Carrion:
 "King, grant us time, it may not be tomorrow;
 For those who service bear the Campeador
 Have arms and horses, needs we first must go

To lands of Carrion." The king addressed
The Campeador: "Wherever you ordain, Be there the fight." Thereon My Cid
replied:

"I will not so, my liege, for I esteem Valencia more than lands of Carrion."

And thereupon the king an answer made:
"Content ye, Campeador, and give to me
Your knights and all equipments; leave
with me,

And I will guardian be. I guarantee it,
As vassal good to liege; they'll ne'er be harmed

By count nor infanzon. Hereon within My court a time I set: at three weeks
hence,

Let them engage before me, on the plains
Of Carrion, and whoso fail to come Upon the time agreed this cause shall lose
And thence as conquered and a traitor go." That judgment took the Lords of Carrion.
My Cid the king's hands kissed and said:

"My liege,

It pleaseth me. These three knights mine are now

Within your hands. I hence commend them you,

As king and liege; to do their part prepared.

For love of the Creator send them back
To me with honor in Valencia."

Thereon replied the king: "God so or-
dain!"

His headgear then Cid Campeador removed,—

The linen coif was white as sun,— his beard

He freed, its cord he loosened. All in court

With look that never tired did gaze on
him.

Straightway to him the Count Don Anrrich came,

And Count Don Raymond. Well embraced he them,

And begged them heartily that from his wealth

They take whate'er they would. Both these and others

Amongst the fitting ones, he begged them
all

To take as they desired. Now some there were

Who took thereof, but others who took naught.

The twice an hundred marks he left the
king;

5 And of the rest the king took what he pleased.

"For love of the Creator, king, I beg Your grace! Since all these things are now arranged,

10 With your good grace, liege, do I kiss your
hands,

And would I seek Valencia. I gained
The place with toil." Then raised his hand the king,

15 And on his face the sign of cross he made.
"Now, by Saint Isidor, he of Leon,

I swear, no man so good in all my lands!"
Straight forward rode My Cid upon his horse.

20 His liege Alfonso's hand he went to kiss:
"Ye bade me stir my steed, fleet Babieca.

'Mongst Moors or Christians lives there not his like.

To you as present do I give him, liege.

25 Bid them to take him." Then the king
replied:

"This like I not. An took I him from you,
The steed would not so good a lord possess.
Such steed for such as you were fit to rout,

30 And chase the Moors afield. What man from you

Would take him may Creator guard him
not,

For by yourself and steed we honored are."

35 Then took they leave, and soon the court
dissolved.

The Campeador full well instructed those Who were to fight: "Now, Martin An-tolinez,

40 And you, Pero Vermudez, Muño Gustioz,
Be firm upon the field in manly guise.

Let good word reach me in Valencia Concerning you." Said Martin Antolinez:

"Liege, wherefore speak ye so? We undertook

45 This task, and will it be by us fulfilled.
Of dead men may ye hear, but conquered,
no!"

Thereat the one on hour propitious born Rejoiced and leave he took of all his friends.

My Cid betook him toward Valencia,
The king to Carrion. But now complete

The three weeks set. Behold the ones who serve
 The Campeador at time allotted come.
 They wish to fill the trust their liege hath set.
 In power of King Alfonso of Leon
 They stand. Upon the Lords of Carrion
 Two days they waited. Well equipped they come,
 Of steeds and trappings, all their kin with 10
 them,
 In hope that those who serve the Cam-
 peador
 They might decoy apart and on the field
 Might slay them, for dishonor to their lord. 15
 The scheme was ill, but fell there naught
 beyond,
 For much they feared Alfonso of Leon.
 They watched their arms by night and prayed Creator.
 The night has passed, already breaks the 20
 dawn.
 There gathered many goodly men and rich
 This fight to see, for pleased they were thereof.
 And more than all the rest, King Don Alfonso
 To seek the right and not permit the wrong.
 The men who service bear the Campeador 30
 Now don their arms and all the three accord,
 For theirs a single liege. On other spot,
 The Lords of Carrion equip themselves.
 The Count Garciordoñez counselled them. 35
 They make a plea and told the King Al-
 fonso:
 That in the battle might not bear a part,
 And those who serve the Campeador use
 not,
 The trenchant blades Colada and Tizon.
 The lords repented sore they gave them
 up.
 They told the king, but would he grant it
 not:
 "When held we court ye did not any take.
 And if ye good ones have they'll serve ye
 well.
 And 'twere the same for those who service
 bear
 The Campeador. Rise, Lords of Carrion, And forth to field. It doth behoove that ye
 In manner of brave men shall bear the
 fight,
 For naught will lack who serve the Cam-
 peador.
 5 Great honor yours, if well ye leave the
 field,
 And be ye vanquished, make us no complaint,
 For all men know 'twas ye who sought the
 thing."
 Regretful go the Lords of Carrion.
 They do repent them of the deed they did,
 For all in Carrion they had not done it.
 The three who serve the Campeador are armed.
 King Don Alfonso went to look on them.
 Thus spake the men who serve the Cam-
 peador:
 "As unto king and liege we kiss your
 hands,
 20 That ye to-day be judge 'tween them and
 us.
 Lend us your aid in justice, not in wrong.
 The Lords of Carrion have here their friends.
 25 We know not what they plan or do not plan.
 Unto your charge our liege confided us;
 For love of the Creator guard our right." Thereon the king replied: "With heart and soul."
 They lead to them the goodly steeds, and swift
 Upon their saddles sign of cross they made 35 And boldly mount their steeds; they wear their shields
 Upon their necks, and bossed right well are they.
 Grasp keen-tipped shafts; these lances
 40 three have each
 A pennant; round them many worthy
 men.
 The field where stood the boundaries now
 they sought.
 45 All three who serve the Campeador agreed That each of them should well assail his foe.
 Behold, upon the other hand the Lords
 Of Carrion, full well accompanied,
 50 For great the number of their relatives.
 The king appointed judges to decide
 The righteous cause, nor any wrong up-
 hold,

That no discussion should between them
 rise
 This way or that. King Don Alfonso
 spake,
 From where on field he stood: "Attend
 my words,
 Ye Lords of Carrion. Ye wished it not,
 Else had ye held this fight within Toledo.
 These three knights of My Cid the Campeador
 I safely brought to lands of Carrion.
 Maintain your right, but seek ye nought of wrong,
 For who would do a wrong, in evil guise,
 Will I prevent him; through my realm's extent
 No rest for him." The Lords of Carrion Are filled with grief. The king and judges marked
 The boundaries. All others left the field.
 All six they fully told, that whoso pass
 Outside the boundary was vanquished
 there.
 All those about withdrew, and did they stay
 Six lances' lengths beyond the boundary.
 The field by lot is chosen and they place
 them
 Where falls the sunlight fairly. From their midst
 The judges go and face to face they stand.
 Then 'gainst the Lords of Carrion advanced
 My Cid's men, and the Lords of Carrion
 'Gainst those who serve the Campeador, and each Attends his foe. Before their hearts they hold
 Their shields and lances decked with pennons all;
 O'er saddle-bows they bow their faces low.
 With spurs they strike their steeds; the very earth
 Appeared to quake beneath their onward
 rush;
 And closely each his enemy regards.
 Now all the three with three have joined their fight.
 Those round prepared to see them fall in
 death.
 Pero Vermudez, he who first defied, Straight facing, with Fernan Gonzalez closed.
 Each fearless struck their shields. Fernan Gonzalez
 5 Pero Vermudez' shield transfixed; he struck
 On naught, nor reached the flesh; the lance's shaft
 At two points brake. Pero Vermudez
 10 stood Right firmly, was he not thereby disturbed.
 A blow he took, but other blow he dealt.
 The boss upon the shield he burst apart, 15 And hurled aside. Completely did he pierce it,
 And naught availed. Through breast he drove the lance,
 For naught protected. Ferdinand was clad 20 In thrice thick cuirass,¹ and it lent him aid.
 Two broke, but held the third. The gambeson,
 Together with the shirt and garniture,²
 25 Within the flesh he drove a hand in depth.
 Whereon the blood came gushing from his mouth.
 Then brake his horse's girths, nor one that
 held.
 30 To earth he bore him o'er the horse's croup.
 The people deem him stricken unto death.
 He flung the lance aside and grasped his sword.
 When that Fernan Gonzalez saw, he knew 35 Tizon, nor stayed to feel the blow, but
 cried:
 "I vanquished am!" The judges yield it
 him.
 Pero Vermudez left him. Then with lance 40 Diego Gonzalez and Martin Antolinez
 Each other struck. Such blows the lances brake.
 Then Martin Antolinez grasped his sword,
 So clean and bright it lighted all the field.
 45 A blow he dealt, aslant it fell upon him.
 And from his head he hurled the helm
 aside;
 The fastenings of the helmet all he cut,
 And bore away the hood and reached the 50 coif.
 Both coif and hood he bore away, and cut

The hair upon his head and reached the flesh.
 Part fell to earth; the rest remained upon
 him.
 This blow by fair Colada dealt, perceived Diego Gonzalez he'd not 'scape alive.
 He pulled the reins to turn his horse's
 face.
 Then Martin Antolinez did receive him
 With sword. A blow with flat against him aimed;
 The edge attained him not. Diego Gonzalez
 Held sword within his hand, but tried it
 not.
 Thereon the lord his voice upraised and
 cried.
 "Now aid me, glorious God! Protect me,
 Sire,
 Against this sword!" He reined his steed
 aside
 To fly the blade, and from the bounds escaped.
 Stayed Martin Antolinez on the field.
 Then said the king. "Come join my company;
 Your deed this battle won." The judges
 grant
 That truth he spake. They have o'ercome
 the two.
 Now will I tell how Muño Gustioz
 Made with Assur Gonzalez settlement:
 Great blows they dealt upon each other's shields.
 Assur Gonzalez, strong and valorous,
 Hath struck the shield of Muño Gustioz, Hath pierced the shield and through the trappings torn.
 Wild flew the lance, for touched it not the flesh.
 That blow accomplished, Muño Gustioz
 Another dealt; it shield and trappings pierced.
 The buckle of the shield at midst it brake.
 The trappings yielded, nor defense could make.
 Aside he took it, for his heart it failed.
 He plunged the lance and pennon in his
 flesh,
 And drove an arm's length out the other
 side.
 Dire shock he gave him, on his saddle dazed.

The lance drawn forth, to earth he hurled
 it down.
 The shaft, both lance and pennon, red came forth.
 All present deemed him wounded unto
 death.
 The lance he lowered, standing over him.
 Gonzalo Assurez cried: "For God, strike
 not!
 The field is won." This done, the judges
 spake:
 "We understand it thus." Good King
 Alfonso
 Bade clear the field. He took the arms they left.
 Who serve the Campeador with honor
 go.
 Now, by Creator's grace, this fight they won.
 Dire sorrow weighs the lands of Carrion.
 By night the king My Çid's attendants
 sent,
 That none attack, nor filled with fear they
 go.
 In manner shrewd by night and day they march.
 Together with My Çid the Campeador,
 Behold them in Valencia! They left
 As evil men the Lords of Carrion.
 The task their lord hath set they have fulfilled.
 Rejoiced thereof My Çid the Campeador.
 The Lords of Carrion's disgrace is deep.
 Who treateth ill sweet woman and deserts,
 May like befall, or e'en a fate more dire!
 This question of the Lords of Carrion
 Now let us leave; of what they earned they grieve.
 But speak of him on hour propitious born.
 High joy is in Valencia the great,
 Because the men who serve the Campeador
 Such high degree of honor have attained.
 Their lord Ruy Diaz grasped his beard:
 "Be praised
 The King of Heaven, my daughters are avenged —
 Freed now of heritage in Carrion!
 I will in marriage give them, free of shame,
 Be that to some a pleasing thing or no."
 The ones of Aragon and of Navarre
 Their question urged; Alfonso of Leon
 In talk they held; their weddings thereupon

With Dame Elvira and Dame Sol arranged.
 The first were great, these weddings better far;
 The Cid hath wed them higher than before.
 Behold, to him on hour propitious born
 What honor falls! His daughters have become
 The queens of Aragon and of Navarre;
 His relatives to-day are kings of Spain.
 To him on hour propitious born hath come
 In all things honor. From this age he passed

Upon Cinquesma day.¹ Christ pardon him!
 And grant us pardon, just and sinners all!
 5 These are the tales related of My Cid
 The Campeador; and here the story ends.
 God grant who wrote it Paradise, amen!
 The abbot Peter was the man who wrote it
 10 In month of May, and fashioned was the tale
 In era of twelve hundred forty-five.
 Now if ye have not money give us wine.

ITALIAN

DANTE ALIGHIERI

(1265-1321)

Dante was born in Florence of an old and honorable family. His father died when Dante was very young, and the duty of rearing the child fell upon the mother, a person well suited to the task. He was given his early education partly by Brunetto Latini and partly by the schools of his native city; and at the age of thirteen he went to Bologna for more advanced schooling. During the next ten years he led an active and varied life. He became acquainted with musicians and painters, he fought in a civil war, and composed poetry. As he became more prominent in political life, he was given a public office in Florence. At this time the affairs of the city were in a violent commotion caused by two political factions, the Guelphs and the Ghibellines. Dante was drawn into the dispute and in 1302 was exiled. For a time he lived in France. In 1304 the exiles made an attempt to storm the city, but they were unsuccessful; from then on Dante wandered as a refugee from place to place and finally died without being repatriated. The outstanding fact about the life of Dante was the love he bore Beatrice Portinari. The poet saw her only once or twice, and Beatrice probably knew little of him. But the poet's devotion to the ideal he made of her guided his life for thirteen years; and it was the spirit of Beatrice that purified his later years and, in the Divine Comedy, revealed to him the mysteries of Paradise.

The Divine Comedy is an epic poem in one hundred cantos. The introduction takes one canto, and thirty-three are used for each of the three parts, the Inferno, Purgatory, and Paradise. This poem does not, like the Iliad or Nibelungenlied, describe great national heroes in conflict; yet it is intimately connected with the national life of Italy. The characters of the Inferno are actual persons, many of whom lived in Italy in Dante's own time. It may be said of the poem that the human soul is the hero, not in a vague allegorical sense, but vividly pictured in the person of the poet himself. The plan of the poem was ambitious beyond the dreams of any other great epic poet besides Milton. With a boldness equal to Homer's in reproducing the song of the sirens, Dante moves forward firmly through all the staggering profundities of Hell, through the wonders of Purgatory, and strikes steadily on to the ineffable glories of Paradise. In executing this breath-taking plan Dante never falters, nor does he allow himself to be frightened into qualification and physical elucidation, as Milton does. One needs no great imagination to realize the obligations incurred by such a plan. The poet must consider the whole religious and social scheme in the most fundamental fashion. Politics, manners, ethics, metaphysics — every kind of mediæval thought and feeling has its place. Dante's answers to the fundamental questions of existence were intended for his own time, and their literal value is limited to the age for which they were written; but the magnificent setting that Dante provided for them and the language in which he expressed them — these things are timeless.

Not only is the Divine Comedy one of the mountain peaks of poetic genius but it is also the first really important and serious work in the Italian language. It is through Dante's influence that Boccaccio, Petrarch, and the other humanists were able to use Italian for literary purposes. But in spite of his free spirit and his sympathy with innovation, Dante belongs definitely to the Middle Ages. His theology and his politics are essentially mediæval, and with all his powers of imagination he was not a prophet of a new age, but rather the last and most glorious spokesman of the old.

The selection presented here is translated by Rev. Henry Francis Cary, Dante's Inferno, London, Cassell and Co.

INFERNO

CANTO I

The Poet, having lost his way in a gloomy forest, and being hindered by certain wild beasts from ascending a mountain, is met by Virgil, who promises to show him the punishments of Hell, and afterwards of Purgatory; and that he shall then be conducted by Beatrice into Paradise. He follows the Roman poet.

In the midway of this our mortal life,¹
I found me in a gloomy wood, astray, Gone from the path direct: and e'en to
tell,

It were no easy task, how savage wild
That forest, how robust and rough its growth,

Which to remember only, my dismay
Renews, in bitterness not far from death. 20
Yet to discourse of what there good befell,
All else will I relate discovered there.

How first I entered it I scarce can say,
Such sleepy dulness in that instant weighed

My senses down, when the true path I
left;

But when a mountain's foot I reached,
where closed

The valley that had pierced my heart with 30
dread,

I looked aloft, and saw his shoulders broad
Already vested with that planet's beam,
Who leads all wanderers safe through every
way.

Then was a little respite to the fear,
That in my heart's recesses deep had lain,
All of that night, so pitifully past:
And as a man, with difficult short breath,

Forespent with toiling, 'scaped from sea to
shore,

Turns to the perilous wide waste, and stands

5 At gaze; e'en so my spirit, that yet failed Struggling with terror, turned to view the straits,

That none hath past and lived. My weary frame

10 After short pause recomforted, again
I journeyed on over that lonely steep,
The hinder foot still firmer. Scarce the ascent

Began, when, lo! a panther,² nimble, light, 15 And covered with a speckled skin, appeared;

Nor, when it saw me, vanished; rather strove

To check my onward going; that oft-times, 20 With purpose to retrace my steps, I turned.
The hour was morning's prime, and on his way

Aloft the sun ascended with those stars,
That with him rose when Love divine first 25 moved

Those its fair works; so that with joyous
hope

All things conspired to fill me, the gay skin
Of that swift animal, the matin dawn

30 And the sweet season. Soon that joy was chased,

And by a new dread succeeded, when in
view

A lion³ came, 'gainst me, as it appeared,
35 With his head held aloft and hunger-mad,
That e'en the air was fear-struck. A she-wolf⁴

Was at his heels, who in her leanness seemed

¹ This statement is usually interpreted to mean that the poet was thirty-five years of age.

² The mediæval symbol for pleasure or luxury. Here we have a hint as to the allegorical aspect of the poem. Dante reveals his ideas regarding the progress of the soul through his own emotions in the presence of the wonders of Heaven and Hell.

³ Pride or ambition.

⁴ Avarice.

Full of all wants, and many a land hath
made

Disconsolate ere now. She with such fear O'erwhelmed me, at the sight of her appalled,

That of the height all hope I lost. As one,
Who, with his gain elated, sees the time
When all unwares is gone, he inwardly Mourns with heart-gripping anguish; such was I,

Haunted by that fell beast, never at peace,
Who, coming o'er against me, by degrees
Impelled me where the sun in silence rests.

While to the lower space with backward step

I fell, my ken discerned the form of one,
Whose voice seemed faint through long disuse of speech.

When him in that great desert I espied,
"Have mercy on me," cried I out aloud, 20
"Spirit! or living man! whate'er thou be!"

He answered: "Now not man, man once
I was,

And born of Lombard parents, Mantuans
both

By country, when the power of Julius¹ yet Was scarcely firm. At Rome my life was past

Beneath the mild Augustus, in the time
Of fabled deities and false. A bard

Was I, and made Anchises' upright son
The subject of my song, who came from
Troy,

When the flames preyed on Ilium's haughty towers.

But thou, say wherefore to such perils past Return'st thou? wherefore not this pleasant mount

Ascendest, cause and source of all de-
light?"

"And art thou then that Virgil, that well-
spring,

From which such copious floods of eloquence

Have issued?" I with front abashed re- 45
plied.

"Glory and light of all the tuneful train!

May it avail me, that I long with zeal
Have sought thy volume, and with love immense

Have conned it o'er. My master thou,
5 and guide!

Thou he from whom alone I have derived
That style, which for its beauty into fame Exalts me. See the beast, from whom I fled.

10 O save me from her, thou illustrious sage!
For every vein and pulse throughout my frame

She hath made tremble." He, soon as he saw

15 That I was weeping, answered, "Thou must needs

Another way pursue, if thou wouldst 'scape
From out that savage wilderness. This beast,

20 At whom thou criest, her way will suffer
none

To pass, and no less hindrance makes than
death:

So bad and so accursed in her kind,

25 That never sated is her ravenous will,
Still after food more craving than before,

To many an animal in wedlock vile
She fastens, and shall yet to many more,

30 Until that greyhound² come, who shall destroy

Her with sharp pain. He will not life support

By earth nor its base metals, but by love, Wisdom, and virtue, and his land shall be 35 The land 'twixt either Feltro.³ In his might

Shall safety to Italia's plains arise,

For whose fair realm, Camilla,⁴ virgin
pure,

40 Nisus, Euryalus, and Turnus⁵ fell.

He, with incessant chase, through every town

Shall worry, until he to hell at length
Restore her, thence by envy first let loose.

45 I for thy profit pondering now devise,
That thou mayst follow me; and I, thy
guide,

¹ This is a reference to Cæsar's assumption of the perpetual dictatorship (see introduction to Cæsar, p. 318), which occurred when Vergil was twenty-five years of age.

² Probably a political reference to hoped-for better times through the accession to power of Can Grande della Scala, Dante's Veronese patron.

³ Possibly Verona, the country of Can Grande, which lies between two Feltros.

⁴ A famous Latin woman warrior in the Æneid, who defended Italy against the invading Trojans.

⁵ Italian heroes who opposed the invasion of the Trojans under Æneas.

Will lead thee hence through an eternal space,
Where thou shalt hear despairing shrieks,
and see
Spirits of old tormented, who invoke
A second death; and those next view, who dwell
Content in fire,¹ for that they hope to
come,
Whene'er the time may be, among the 10
blest,
Into whose regions if thou then desire
To ascend, a spirit worthier ² than I Must lead thee, in whose charge, when I depart,
Thou shalt be left: for that Almighty
King,
Who reigns above, a rebel to his law
Adjudges me; and therefore hath decreed
That, to his city, none through me should 20
come.
He in all parts hath sway; there rules,
there holds
His citadel and throne. O happy those, Whom there he chooses!" I to him in few: 25
"Bard! by that God, whom thou didst not
adore,
I do beseech thee (that this ill and worse
I may escape) to lead me, where thou said'st,
That I Saint Peter's gate ³ may view, and those
Who, as thou tell'st, are in such dismal plight."
Onward he moved, I close his steps pur- 35 sued.

CANTO II

After the invocation, which poets are used to prefix to their works, he shows that, on a consideration of his own strength, he doubted whether it sufficed for the journey proposed to him, but that, being comforted by Virgil, he at last took courage, and followed him as his guide and master.

Now was the day departing, and the air,
Imbrowned with shadows, from their toils released
All animals on earth; and I alone

Prepared myself the conflict to sustain,
Both of sad pity, and that perilous road,
Which my unerring memory shall retrace.
O Muses! O high genius! now vouchsafe
5 Your aid! O mind! that all I saw hast kept
Safe in a written record, here thy worth
And eminent endowments come to proof.
I thus began: "Bard! thou who art my
guide,
Consider well, if virtue be in me
Sufficient, ere to this high enterprise
Thou trust me. Thou hast told that 15 Silvius' sire,⁴
Yet clothed in corruptible flesh, among The immortal tribes had entrance, and was there Sensibly present. Yet if heaven's great
Lord,
Almighty foe to ill, such favor showed,
In contemplation of the high effect,
Both what and who from him should issue
forth,
It seems in reason's judgment well deserved:
Sith he of Rome and of Rome's empire
wide,
In heaven's empyreal height was chosen
30 sire:
Both which, if truth be spoken, were ordained
And 'stablished for the holy place, where sits
Who to great Peter's sacred chair ⁵ succeeds.
He from this journey, in thy song renowned,
Learned things, that to his victory gave 40 rise
And to the papal robe. In after-times
The chosen vessel ⁶ also travelled there
To bring us back assurance in that faith
Which is the entrance to salvation's way.
45 But I, why should I there presume? or who Permits it? not Æneas I, nor Paul,
Myself I deem not worthy, and none else
Will deem me. I, if on this voyage then
I venture, fear it will in folly end.

¹ In Purgatory.² The entrance to Purgatory, opened only to the elect.³ Æneas.⁴ St. Paul.⁵ Beatrice.⁶ The papal throne.

Thou, who art wise, better my meaning know'st
 Than I can speak." As one, who unre-solves
 What he hath late resolved, and with new thoughts
 Changes his purpose, from his first intent Removed; e'en such was I on that dun coast,
 Wasting in thought my enterprise, at first 10
 So eagerly embraced. "If right thy words
 I scan," replied that shade magnanimous,
 "Thy soul is by vile fear assailed, which oft
 So overcasts a man, that he recoils
 From noblest resolution, like a beast
 At some false semblance in the twilight gloom.
 That from this terror thou mayst free thy-
 self,
 I will instruct thee why I came, and what 20
 I heard in that same instant, when for thee Grief touched me first. I was among the tribe,
 Who rest suspended,¹ when a dame, so
 blest
 And lovely I besought her to command, Called me; her eyes were brighter than the star
 Of day; and she with gentle voice and soft,
 Angelically tuned, her speech addressed: 30
 'O courteous shade of Mantua! thou whose fame
 Yet lives, and shall live long as nature lasts!
 A friend, not of my fortune but myself, 35
 On the wide desert in his road has met Hindrance so great, that he through fear has turned.
 Now much I dread lest he past help have strayed,
 And I be risen too late for his relief,
 From what in heaven of him I heard.
 Speed now,
 And by thy eloquent persuasive tongue,
 And by all means for his deliverance meet, 45
 Assist him. So to me will comfort spring,
 I, who bid thee on this errand forth,
 Am Beatrice²; from a place I come

Revisited with joy. Love brought me
 thence,
 Who prompts my speech. When in my Master's sight
 5 I stand, thy praise to him I oft will tell.'
 "She then was silent, and I thus began:
 'O Lady! by whose influence alone,
 Mankind excels whatever is contained Within that heaven which hath the smallest orb,
 So thy command delights me, that to obey,
 If it were done already, would seem late.
 No need hast thou further to speak thy
 will;
 15 Yet tell the reason, why thou art not loth
 To leave that ample space, where to return
 Thou burnest, for this centre here beneath.'
 "She then: 'Since thou so deeply wouldst inquire,
 20 I will instruct thee briefly, why no dread Hinders my entrance here. Those things
 alone
 Are to be feared, whence evil may proceed;
 None else, for none are terrible beside.
 25 I am so framed by God, thanks to his grace!
 That any sufferance of your misery
 Touches me not, nor flame of that fierce fire
 30 Assails me. In high heaven a blessed dame³
 Resides, who mourns with such effectual
 grief
 That hindrance, which I send thee to remove,
 35 That God's stern judgment to her will inclines.
 To Lucia⁴ calling, her she thus bespake:
 "Now doth thy faithful servant need thy
 aid, 40 And I commend him to thee." At her
 word
 Sped Lucia, of all cruelty the foe,
 And coming to the place, where I abode
 Seated with Rachel, her of ancient days,
 She thus addressed me: "Thou true praise of God!
 Beatrice! why is not thy succor lent

¹ In a state neither of blessedness nor damnation which in the poem is designated as Limbo.

² Dante's guiding star, to whom also his sonnets in the Vita Nuova are addressed, appears here as the personification of celestial wisdom.

³ The Divine Mercy.

⁴ Probably St. Lucia the martyr. Here she has also a certain allegorical function as an embodiment of the Grace of Heaven.

To him, who so much loved thee, as to leave
For thy sake all the multitude admires?
Dost thou not hear how pitiful his wail,
Nor mark the death, which in the torrent 5
flood,
Swoln mightier than a sea, him struggling holds?"

Ne'er among men did any with such speed
Haste to their profit, flee from their annoy, 10
As, when these words were spoken, I came
here,
Down from my blessed seat, trusting the
force
Of thy pure eloquence, which thee, and all 15
Who well have marked it, into honor brings.'

"When she had ended, her bright beaming eyes
Tearful she turned aside; whereat I felt 20 Redoubled zeal to serve thee. As she willed,
Thus am I come: I saved thee from the
beast,
Who thy near way across the goodly 25
mount Prevented. What is this comes o'er thee
then?
Why, why dost thou hang back? why in thy breast
Harbor vile fear? why hast not courage
there,
And noble daring; since three maids,¹ so
blest,
Thy safety plan, e'en in the court of 35
heaven;
And so much certain good my words forebode?"

As florets, by the frosty air of night
Bent down and closed, when day has 40
blanched their leaves,
Rise all unfolded on their spiry stems;
So was my fainting vigor new restored,
And to my heart such kindly courage ran,
That I as one undaunted soon replied: 45
"O full of pity she, who undertook
My succor! and thou kind who didst perform
So soon her true behest! With such desire Thou hast disposed me to renew my voy- 50
age,
That my first purpose fully is resumed.

Lead on: one only will is in us both.
Thou art my guide, my master thou, and
lord."

So spake I; and when he had onward
moved,
I entered on the deep and woody way.

CANTO III

Dante, following Virgil, comes to the gate of Hell; where, after having read the dreadful words that are written thereon, they both enter. Here, as he understands from Virgil, those were punished who had passed their time (for living it could not be called) in a state of apathy and indifference both to good and evil. Then pursuing their way, they arrive at the river Acheron; and there find the old ferryman Charon, who takes the spirits over to the opposite shore; which as soon as Dante reaches, he is seized with terror, and falls into a trance.

"Through me ye pass into the city of woe:
Through me ye pass into eternal pain:
Through me among the people lost for aye.
Justice the founder of my fabric moved:
To rear me was the task of power divine,
Supremest wisdom, and primeval love.
Before me things create were none, save
things
Eternal, and eternal I endure.

30 All hope abandon, ye who enter here."
Such characters in color dim, I marked
Over a portal's lofty arch inscribed:
Whereat I thus: "Master, these words import Hard meaning." He as one prepared replied:

"Here thou must all distrust behind thee
leave;
Here be vile fear extinguished. We are
come
Where I have told thee we shall see the souls
To misery doomed, who intellectual good Have lost." And when his hand he had stretched forth 45
To mine, with pleasant looks, whence I was cheered,
Into that secret place he led me on.

Here sighs, with lamentations and loud
moans,
Resounded through the air pierced by no
star,

That e'en I wept at entering. Various tongues,
 Horrible languages, outcries of woe,
 Accents of anger, voices deep and hoarse,
 With hands together smote that swelled 5
 the sounds,
 Made up a tumult, that forever whirls Round through that air with solid darkness stained,
 Like to the sand that in the whirlwind 10
 flies.
 I then, with error yet encompass'd,
 cried:
 "O master! what is this I hear? what race
 Are these, who seem so overcome with 15
 woe?"
 He thus to me: "This miserable fate Suffer the wretched souls of those, who lived Without or praise or blame, with that ill 20 band
 Of angels mixed, who nor rebellious proved
 Or yet were true to God, but for themselves Were only. From his bounds Heaven drove them forth,
 Not to impair his lustre; nor the depth
 Of Hell receives them, lest the accursed
 tribe
 Should glory thence with exultation vain."
 I then: "Master! what doth aggrrieve 30 them thus,
 That they lament so loud?" He straight
 replied:
 "That will I tell thee briefly. These of
 death
 No hope may entertain; and their blind
 life
 So meanly passes, that all other lots
 They envy. Fame of them the world hath
 none,
 Nor suffers; mercy and justice scorn them
 both.
 Speak not of them, but look, and pass them by."
 And I, who straightway looked, beheld a 45
 flag,
 Which whirling ran around so rapidly,
 That it no pause obtained: and following came
 Such a long train of spirits, I should ne'er 50
 Have thought that death so many had despoiled.
 When some of these I recognized, I saw
 And knew the shade of him, who to base
 fear
 Yielding, abjured his high estate.¹ Forthwith
 I understood, for certain, this the tribe
 Of those ill spirits both to God displeasing
 And to his foes. These wretches, who ne'er
 lived,
 Went on in nakedness, and sorely stung
 By wasps and hornets, which bedewed their cheeks
 With blood, that, mixed with tears,
 dropped to their feet,
 And by disgustful worms was gathered
 there.
 Then looking farther onwards, I beheld
 A throng upon the shore of a great stream: Whereat I thus: "Sir! grant me now to
 know Whom here we view, and whence impelled
 they seem
 25 So eager to pass o'er, as I discern Through the blear light?" He thus to me in few:
 "This shalt thou know, soon as our steps arrive
 Beside the woeful tide of Acheron."² Then with eyes downward cast, and filled with shame,
 Fearing my words offensive to his ear,
 Till we had reached the river, I from 35 speech
 Abstained. And lo! toward us in a bark Comes on an old man, hoary white with eld,
 Crying, "Woe to you, wicked spirits!
 40 hope not Ever to see the sky again. I come
 To take you to the other shore across,
 Into eternal darkness, there to dwell
 In fierce heat and in ice. And thou, who
 there Standest, live spirit! get thee hence, and leave These who are dead." But soon as he beheld
 I left them not, "By other way," said he,

¹ Many of the references to contemporary characters are difficult to interpret with certainty. Some think that Dante here refers to Pope Celestine V, who abdicated the papacy in 1294.

² One of the four rivers of Hell.

"By other haven shalt thou come to shore,
Not by this passage; thee a nimbler boat Must carry." Then to him thus spake my
guide:

"Charon! thyself torment not: so 'tis
willed,
Where will and power are one: ask thou no
more."

Straightway in silence fell the shaggy
cheeks

Of him, the boatman o'er the livid lake,
Around whose eyes glared wheeling flames.
Meanwhile

Those spirits, faint and naked, color
changed,

And gnashed their teeth, soon as the cruel
words

They heard. God and their parents they blasphemed,

The human kind, the place, the time, and seed,

That did engender them and give them
birth.

Then all together sorely wailing drew
To the curst strand, that every man must pass

Who fears not God. Charon, demoniac
form,

With eyes of burning coal, collects them
all,

Beckoning, and each, that lingers, with his oar

Strikes. As fall off the light autumnal
leaves,

One still another following, till the bough
Strews all its honors on the earth beneath;

E'en in like manner Adam's evil brood Cast themselves, one by one, down from

the shore,
Each at a beck, as falcon at his call.

Thus go they over through the umbered wave;

And ere they on the opposing bank
Be landed, on this side another throng

Still gathers. "Son," thus spake the courteous guide,

"Those who die subject to the wrath of God

All here together come from every clime,

And to o'erpass the river are not loth:
For so heaven's justice goads them on, that
fear

Is turned into desire. Hence ne'er hath past

Good spirit. If of thee Charon complain, Now mayst thou know the import of his
words."

This said, the gloomy region trembling shook

So terribly, that yet with clammy dew Fear chills my brow. The sad earth gave a blast,

That, lightening, shot forth a vermilion
flame,

Which all my senses conquered quite,
and I

Down dropped, as one with sudden slumber seized.

CANTO IV

The poet, being roused by a clap of thunder, and following his guide onwards, descends into Limbo, which is the first circle of Hell,¹ where he finds the souls of those, who, although they have lived virtuously and have not to suffer for great sins, nevertheless, through lack of baptism, merit not the bliss of Paradise. Hence he is led on by Virgil to descend into the second circle.

Broke the deep slumber in my brain a crash

Of heavy thunder, that I shook myself,
As one by main force roused. Risen up-
right,

My rested eyes I moved around, and searched,

With fixed ken, to know what place it was Wherein I stood. For certain, on the brink

I found me of the lamentable vale,
The dread abyss, that joins a thunderous
sound

Of plaints innumerable. Dark and deep,
And thick with clouds o'erspread, mine eye in vain

Explored its bottom, nor could aught discern.

"Now let us to the blind world there
beneath

¹ Dante's conception of Hell was that of a vast cavity in the form of an inverted cone with its apex at the center of the earth and its circular base beneath the hemisphere of land from which it is shut off by a crust. The huge cone is divided into descending circles or terraces, each destined to house the dead according to their various degrees of sin.

Descend"; the bard began, all pale of look:
 "I go the first, and thou shalt follow next."

Then I, his altered hue perceiving, thus:
 "How may I speed, if thou yieldst to
 dread,
 Who still art wont to comfort me in doubt?"

He then: "The anguish of that race below
 With pity stains my cheek, which thou for fear
 Mistakest. Let us on. Our length of way Urges haste." Onward, this said, he moved;
 And entering led me with him, on the bounds

Of the first circle that surrounds the abyss.
 Here, as mine ear could note, no plaint was heard
 Except of sighs, that made the eternal air Tremble, not caused by tortures, but from
 grief

Felt by those multitudes, many and vast,
 Of men, women, and infants. Then to me
 The gentle guide: "Inquirest thou not what spirits
 Are these, which thou beholdest? Ere thou pass

Farther, I would thou know, that these of sin
 Were blameless; and if aught they merited,

It profits not, since baptism was not theirs,
 The portal to thy faith. If they before The Gospel lived, they served not God aright;

And among such am I. For these defects,
 And no other evil, we are lost;
 Only so far afflicted, that we live Desiring without hope." Sore grief assailed

My heart at hearing this, for well I knew Suspended in that Limbo many a soul
 Of mighty worth. "Oh, tell me, sire revered!

Tell me, my master!" I began, through wish

Of full assurance in that holy faith
 Which vanquishes all error; "say, did e'er
 Any, or through his own or other's merit,

Come forth from thence, who afterward was blest?"

Piercing the secret purport of my speech,
 He answered: "I was new to that estate,
 5 When I beheld a puissant one arrive¹ Amongst us, with victorious trophy crowned.

He forth the shade of our first parent drew,
 Abel his child, and Noah righteous man,
 10 Of Moses lawgiver for faith approved,
 Of patriarch Abraham, and David king,
 Israel with his sire and with his sons,
 Nor without Rachel whom so hard he won,
 And others many more, whom he to bliss
 15 Exalted. Before these, be thou assured,
 No spirit of human-kind was ever saved."

We, while he spake, ceased not our onward road,
 Still passing through the wood; for so I
 name

20 Those spirits thick beset. We were not far On this side from the summit, when I kenned

A flame, that o'er the darkened hemisphere
 Prevailing shined. Yet we a little space
 Were distant, not so far but I in part Discovered, that a tribe in honor high That place possessed. "O thou, who every art

And science valuest! who are these, that boast

Such honor, separate from all the rest?"
 He answered: "The renown of their great names,

35 That echoes through your world above, acquires

Favor in heaven, which holds them thus advanced."

Meantime a voice I heard: "Honor the bard

40 Sublime! his shade returns, that left us late!"

No sooner ceased the sound, than I beheld Four mighty spirits toward us bend their steps,

Of semblance neither sorrowful nor glad.
 When thus my master kind began:

"Mark him,
 Who in his right hand bears that falchion keen,

The other three preceding, as their lord.

¹ Dante here refers to the salvation of the Hebrew patriarchs who, of course, were not Christians. The explanation is that Christ went down into Hell and led them up into Heaven.

This is that Homer, of all bards supreme:
Flaccus¹ the next, in satire's vein excelling;

The third is Naso²; Lucan is the last.
Because they all that appellation own,
With which the voice singly accosted me,
Honoring they greet me thus, and well
they judge."

So I beheld united the bright school
Of him the monarch of sublimest song,
That o'er the others like an eagle soars.

When they together short discourse had
held,

They turned to me, with salutation kind Beckoning me; at the which my master smiled:

Nor was this all; but greater honor still They gave me, for they made me of their tribe;

And I was sixth amid so learned a band.

Far as the luminous beacon on we passed
Speaking of matters, then befitting well
To speak, now fitter left untold. At foot
Of a magnificent castle we arrived, Seven times with lofty walls begirt, and
round

Defended by a pleasant stream. O'er this As o'er dry land we passed. Next, through seven gates,

I with those sages entered, and we came
Into a mead with lively verdure fresh.

There dwelt a race, who slow their eyes
around

Majestically moved, and in their port
Bore eminent authority; they spake

Seldom, but all their words were tuneful
sweet.

We to one side retired, into a place
Open and bright and lofty, whence each
one

Stood manifest to view. Incontinent
There on the green enamel of the plain Were shown me the great spirits, by whose
sight

10 I am exalted in my own esteem.

Electra³ there I saw accompanied By many, among whom Hector I knew,
Anchises' pious son, and with hawk's eye
Cæsar all armed, and by Camilla there 15 Penthesilea.⁴ On the other side,
Old King Latinus, seated by his child
Lavinia,⁵ and that Brutus⁶ I beheld,
Who Tarquin chased, Lucretia, Cato's
wife

20 Marcia, with Julia⁷ and Cornelia⁷ there;
And sole apart retired, the Soldan⁸ fierce.

Then when a little more I raised my
brow,

I spied the master of the sapient throng,⁹
Seated amid the philosophic train.

Him all admire, all pay him reverence due.
There Socrates and Plato both I marked,
Nearest to him in rank, Democritus,¹⁰

Who sets the world at chance, Diogenes,
30 With Heraclitus, and Empedocles,

And Anaxagoras, and Thales sage,

Zeno, and Dioscorides¹¹ well read

In nature's secret lore. Orpheus¹² I marked

35 And Livy, Tully and moral Seneca,¹³

¹ Horace.

² Ovid. Lucan was a Roman poet, author of the Pharsalia, an epic poem much admired in the Middle Ages.

³ Daughter of Atlas and mother of Dardanus, founder of Troy.

⁴ Famous queen of the Amazons.

⁵ Latin princess for whose hand Turnus and Æneas were rivals.

⁶ Lucius Junius Brutus, nephew of King Tarquin the Haughty. In a dispute over the succession Tarquin put to death the father and brother of Brutus. The latter saved himself by pretending to be simple-minded; hence the name Brutus, "feeble-minded, stupid." After the outrage upon Lucretia, wife of Collatinus, by Tarquin's son Sextus, Brutus led the people in a rebellion which drove the tyrant from his throne.

⁷ Daughter of Julius Cæsar and wife of Pompey. Cornelia was the wife of Tiberius Gracchus.

⁸ The famous Saladin, a Turkish prince noted for his valor and courtesy. He was the principal opponent of Richard Cœur-de-Lion. See the romantic treatment of this character by Sir Walter Scott in The Talisman.

⁹ Aristotle, the great philosopher. See the biographical note, p. 187.

¹⁰ These seven names are those of famous Greek philosophers of the seventh to the fourth centuries B.C.

¹¹ A Greek physician of the first century A.D.

¹² The traditional Greek patron of song.

¹³ Cicero (Tully) was one of the first philosophers whom Dante studied. Livy wrote histories. Seneca the moralist was thought to be a different person from the dramatist.

Euclid and Ptolemy,¹ Hippocrates,² Galenus, Avicenna, and him who made
That commentary vast, Averroes.³

Of all to speak at full were vain attempt;
For my wide theme so urges, that ofttimes
My words fall short of what bechanced.

In two

The six associates part. Another way
My sage guide leads me, from that air serene,
Into a climate ever vexed with storms:

And to a part I come, where no light shines.

CANTO V

Coming into the second circle of Hell, Dante at the entrance beholds Minos the Infernal Judge, by whom he is admonished to beware how he enters those regions. Here he witnesses the punishment of carnal sinners, who are tossed about ceaselessly in the dark air by the most furious winds. Amongst these, he meets with Francesca of Rimini, through pity at whose sad tale he falls fainting to the ground.

From the first circle I descended thus Down to the second, which, a lesser space
Embracing, so much more of grief contains, Provoking bitter moans. There Minos stands

Grinning with ghastly feature: he, of all
Who enter, strict examining the crimes,
Gives sentence, and dismisses them beneath,

According as he foldeth him around:
For when before him comes the ill-fated
soul,

It all confesses; and that judge severe
Of sins, considering what place in hell Suits the transgression, with his tail so
oft

Himself encircles, as degrees beneath
He dooms it to descend. Before him stand Always a numerous throng; and in his turn

Each one to judgment passing, speaks, and hears
His fate, thence downward to his dwelling hurled.

"O thou! who to this residence of woe

Approachest"; when he saw me coming,
cried

Minos, relinquishing his dread employ,
"Look how thou enter here; beware in whom

Thou place thy trust; let not the entrance broad

Deceive thee to thy harm." To him my
guide:

10 "Wherefore exclaimest? Hinder not his
way

By destiny appointed; so 'tis willed Where will and power are one. Ask thou no more."

15 Now 'gin the rueful wailings to be heard.
Now am I come where many a plaining
voice

Smites on mine ear. Into a place I came Where light was silent all. Bellowing there groaned

A noise, as of a sea in tempest torn By warring wings. The stormy blast of hell

With restless fury drives the spirits on, 25 Whirled round and dashed amain with sore annoy.

When they arrive before the ruinous sweep,
There shrieks are heard, there lamentations, moans,

30 And blasphemies 'gainst the good Power in heaven.

I understood that to this torment sad
The carnal sinners are condemned, in whom

35 Reason by lust is swayed. As in large troops

And multitudinous, when winter reigns,
The starlings on their wings are borne
abroad;

40 So bears the tyrannous gust those evil
souls

On this side and on that, above, below,
It drives them: hope of rest to solace them
Is none, nor e'en of milder pang. As

45 cranes,
Chanting their dolorous notes, traverse
the sky,

Stretched out in long array; so I beheld

² Hippocrates, Avicenna, and Galen were three famous physicians.

³ Ibn-Roshd, a twelfth-century Spanish Arab, a celebrated philosopher and scholar, who translated and wrote commentaries upon the works of Aristotle. It was largely through the works of Averroes that Aristotle was introduced to Western Europe.

Spirits, who came loud wailing, hurried
 on
 By their dire doom. Then I: "Instructor!
 who
 Are these, by the black air so scourged?"—
 "The first
 'Mong those, of whom thou question'st,"
 he replied,
 "O'er many tongues was empress. She in vice
 Of luxury was so shameless, that she made Liking be lawful by promulged decree,
 To clear the blame she had herself incurred.
 This is Semiramis,¹ of whom 'tis writ,
 That she succeeded Ninus her espoused; 15
 And held the land, which now the Soldan rules.
 The next * in amorous fury slew herself,
 And to Sicheus' ³ ashes broke her faith:
 Then follows Cleopatra, lustful queen."
 There marked I Helen, for whose sake
 so long
 The time was fraught with evil; there the great Achilles, who with love fought to the 25
 end.
 Paris I saw, and Tristan; and beside,
 A thousand more he showed me, and by
 name
 Pointed them out, whom love bereaved of 30
 life.
 When I had heard my sage instructor
 name
 Those dames and knights of antique days, o'erpowered
 By pity, well-nigh in amaze my mind
 Was lost; and I began: "Bard! willingly
 I would address those two ⁴ together
 coming,
 Which seem so light before the wind." He 40
 thus:
 "Note thou, when nearer they to us approach.
 Then by that love which carries them along, Entreat; and they will come." Soon as the wind

Swayed them toward us, I thus framed my
 speech:
 "O wearied spirits! come, and hold discourse
 5 With us, if by none else restrained." As doves
 Beyond desire invited, on wide wings
 And firm, to their sweet nest returning
 home,
 10 Cleave the air, wafted by their will along;
 Thus issued, from that troop, where Dido
 ranks,
 They, through the ill air speeding; with such force
 15 My cry prevailed by strong affection urged.
 "O gracious creature and benign! who
 goest
 Visiting, through this element obscure,
 20 Us, who the world with bloody stain imbrued;
 If, for a friend the King of all, we owned,
 Our prayer to him should for thy peace
 arise,
 25 Since thou hast pity on our evil plight.
 Of whatsoe'er to hear or to discourse
 It pleases thee, that will we hear, of that Freely with thee discourse, while e'er the
 wind,
 As now, is mute. The land, that gave me
 birth,
 Is situate on the coast, where Po descends
 To rest in ocean with his sequent streams.
 "Love, that in gentle heart is quickly 35 learnt,
 Entangled him by that fair form, from me
 Ta'en in such cruel sort, as grieves me still:
 Love, that denial takes from none beloved,
 Caught me with pleasing him so passing
 well,
 That, as thou seest, he yet deserts me not.
 Love brought us to one death: Caina ⁵ waits
 The soul who spilt our life." Such were 45 their words:
 At hearing which downward I bent my looks,

¹ A celebrated queen of Assyria, supposed to have lived 1250 B.C., who succeeded Ninus, her husband, on the throne. She was known for her licentious character.

² Dido, queen of Carthage, who, being enamoured of Æneas, immolated herself upon a funeral pyre when he departed.

³ First husband of Dido.

⁴ Here begins the famous story of Paolo and Francesca treated by modern writers.

⁵ The place to which slayers of their own kindred were doomed in Hell awaits Francesca's husband.

And held them there so long, that the bard
cried:

"What art thou pond'ring?" I in answer
thus:

"Alas! by what sweet thoughts, what fond desire

Must they at length to that ill pass have reached!"

Then turning, I to them my speech addressed.

And thus began: "Francesca! your sad
fate

Even to tears my grief and pity moves.

But tell me; in the time of your sweet
sighs,

By what, and how love granted, that ye
knew

Your yet uncertain wishes?" She replied:

"No greater grief than to remember days
Of joy, when misery is at hand! That kens

Thy learned instructor. Yet so eagerly
If thou art bent to know the primal root,

From whence our love gat being, I will do,
As one, who weeps and tells his tale. One

day,

For our delight we read of Lancelot,¹

How him love thrall'd. Alone we were,
and no

Suspicion near us. Ofttimes by that reading

Our eyes were drawn together, and the hue Fled from our altered cheek. But at one point

Alone we fell. When of that smile we read,
The wished smile, rapturously kissed²

By one so deep in love, then he, who ne'er
From me shall separate, at once my lips

All trembling kissed. The book and writer
both

Were love's purveyors. In its leaves that day

We read no more." While thus one spirit
spake,

The other wailed so sorely, that heart-
struck

I, through compassion fainting, seemed not far

From death, and like a corpse fell to the ground.

CANTO VI

On his recovery, the Poet finds himself in the third circle, where the gluttonous are punished.

5 Their torment is, to lie in the mire, under a continual and heavy storm of hail, snow, and discolored water; Cerberus³ meanwhile barking over them with his threefold throat, and rending them piecemeal. One of these, who on earth was named Clacco, foretells the divisions with which 10 Florence is about to be distracted. Dante proposes a question to his guide, who solves it, and they proceed towards the fourth circle.

My sense reviving, that erewhile had drooped

15 With pity for the kindred shades, whence
grief

O'ercame me wholly, straight around I
see

New torments, new tormented souls, which way

Soe'er I move, or turn, or bend my sight.
In the third circle I arrive, of showers

Ceaseless, accursed, heavy and cold, unchanged

25 Forever, both in kind and in degree.

Large hail, discolored water, sleety flaw

Through the dun midnight air streamed down amain:

Stank all the land whereon that tempest
30 fell.

Cerberus, cruel monster, fierce and
strange,

Through his wide threefold throat, barks
as a dog

35 Over the multitude immersed beneath.

His eyes glare crimson, black his unctuous
beard,

His belly large, and clawed the hands, with which

40 He tears the spirits, flays them, and their limbs

Piecemeal disparts. Howling there spread,
as curs,

Under the rainy deluge, with one side

45 The other screening, oft they roll them
round,

A wretched, godless crew. When that great worm

Descried us, savage Cerberus, he oped

² The three-headed monster who guarded the gate of Hades.

His jaws, and the fangs showed us; not a limb
 Of him but trembled. Then my guide, his palms
 Expanding on the ground, thence filled with earth
 Raised them, and cast it in his ravenous maw.
 E'en as a dog, that yelling bays for food
 His keeper, when the morsel comes, lets fall 10
 His fury, bent alone with eager haste
 To swallow it; so dropped the loathsome cheeks
 Of demon Cerberus, who thundering stuns
 The spirits, that they for deafness wish in vain.
 We, o'er the shades thrown prostrate by the brunt
 Of the heavy tempest passing, set our feet
 Upon their emptiness, that substance 20
 seemed.
 They all along the earth extended lay,
 Save one, that sudden raised himself to sit,
 Soon as that way he saw us pass. "O 25
 thou!"
 He cried, "who through the infernal shades art led,
 Own, if again thou know'st me. Thou wast framed 30
 Or ere my frame was broken." I replied:
 "The anguish thou endurest perchance so takes Thy form from my remembrance, that it seems
 As if I saw thee never. But inform Me who thou art, that in a place so sad
 Art set, and in such torment, that although
 Other be greater, none disgusteth more."
 He thus in answer to my words rejoined: 40
 "Thy city heaped with envy to the brim,
 Aye, that the measure overflows its bounds,
 Held me in brighter days. Ye citizens Were wont to name me Ciacco.¹ For the sin

Of gluttony, damned vice, beneath this
 rain,
 E'en as thou seest, I with fatigue am worn;
 Nor I sole spirit in this woe: all these 5 Have by like crime incurred like punishment."
 No more he said, and I my speech resumed:
 "Ciacco! thy dire affliction grieves me
 much,
 Even to tears. But tell me, if thou knowest,
 What shall at length befall the citizens
 Of the divided city; whether any 15 Just one inhabit there: and tell the cause, Whence jarring discord hath assailed it
 thus?"
 He then: "After long striving they will
 come
 To blood; and the wild party ² from the woods
 Will chase the other ³ with much injury
 forth.
 Then it behooves, that this must fall,⁴ within
 Three solar circles; and the other rise
 By borrowed force of one ⁵ who under
 shore
 Now rests. It shall a long space hold 30 aloof
 Its forehead, keeping under heavy weight
 The other opprest, indignant at the load,
 And grieving sore. The just are two in number, 35 But they neglected. Avarice, envy,
 pride,
 Three fatal sparks, have set the hearts of
 all
 On fire." Here ceased the lamentable
 sound;
 And I continued thus: "Still would I learn
 More from thee, further parley still entreat.
 Of Farinata and Tegghiaio ⁶ say,
 45 They who so well deserved; of Giacompo,⁷

² The Whites, or Bianchi, so called because the party was headed by Vieri de' Cerchi, whose family had come from Acone and the wooded country of the Val di Sieve.

³ The Blacks, or Neri, headed by Corso Donati.

⁴ i.e. the Whites must fall.

⁵ Pope Boniface VIII, who "hugged the shore," i.e. acted ambiguously by dealing with both parties.

⁶ Leaders of the two opposing factions who were thought guilty of various crimes.

⁷ Giacompo Rusticucci, a rich Florentine.

Arrigo, Mosca,¹ and the rest, who bent Their minds on working good. Oh! tell me where They bide, and to their knowledge let me
 come.
 For I am prest with keen desire to hear If heaven's sweet cup or poisonous drug of hell
 Be to their lips assigned." He answered straight:
 "These are yet blacker spirits. Various crimes
 Have sunk them deeper in the dark abyss.
 If thou so far descendest, thou mayst see
 them.

But to the pleasant world when thou re-
 turnest,

Of me make mention, I entreat thee, there.
 No more I tell thee, answer thee no more."

This said, his fixed eyes he turned 20
 askance,

A little eyed me, then bent down his head,
 And 'midst his blind companions with it
 fell.

When thus my guide: "No more his 25
 bed he leaves,

Ere the last angel-trumpet blow. The Power

Adverse to these shall then in glory come,
 Each one forthwith to his sad tomb repair, 30

Resume his fleshly vesture and his form,
 And hear the eternal doom re-echoing rend

The vault." So passed we through that mixture foul

Of spirits and rain, with tardy steps;
 meanwhile

Touching, though slightly, on the life to
 come.

For thus I questioned: "Shall these tor- 40
 tures, Sir!

When the great sentence passes, be increased,

Or mitigated, or as now severe?"

He then: "Consult thy knowledge; 45 that decides

That, as each thing to more perfection
 grows,

It feels more sensibly both good and pain.
 Though ne'er to true perfection may arrive
 This race accurst, yet nearer then, than
 now,

5 They shall approach it." Compassing that path,

Circuitous we journeyed, and discourse,
 Much more than I relate between us
 passed:

10 Till at the point, whence the steps led be-
 low,

Arrived, there Plutus, the great foe, we found.

CANTO VII

In the present Canto, Dante describes his descent into the fourth circle, at the beginning of which he sees Plutus stationed. Here one like doom awaits the prodigal and the avaricious;
 which is, to meet in direful conflict, rolling great weights against each other with mutual upbraidings. Virgil takes occasion to show how vain the goods that are committed into the charge of Fortune; and this moves our author to inquire what being that Fortune is, of whom he speaks: which question being resolved, they go down into the fifth circle, where they find the wrathful and slothful tormented in the Stygian lake. Having made a compass round great part of this lake, they come at last to the base of a lofty tower.

"Ah me! O Satan! Satan!" loud exclaimed

Plutus, in accent hoarse of wild alarm:
 And the kind sage, whom no event surprised,

To comfort me thus spake: "Let not thy
 fear

Harm thee, for power in him, be sure, is
 none

To hinder down this rock thy safe descent."

Then to that swoln lip turning, "Peace!"
 he cried,

"Curst wolf! thy fury inward on thyself Prey, and consume thee! Through the dark profound

Not without cause he passes. So 'tis willed

On high, there where the great Archangel poured

¹ A noble Florentine whose advice is said to have started the feud between the Guelphs and the Ghibellines. A certain noble, Buondelmonte, broke off his match with a lady of the Amidei family and united himself with the family of the Donati. The lady's kinsmen, upon the advice of Mosca, assassinated him. This assassination gave rise to the feud which disrupted politics in Florence for many years.

Heaven's vengeance on the first adulterer proud."¹

As sails, full spread and bellying with the wind,

Drop suddenly collapsed, if the mast split;
So to the ground down dropped the cruel fiend.

Thus we, descending to the fourth steep ledge,

Gained on the dismal shore, that all the woe

Hems in of all the universe. Ah me!

Almighty Justice! in what store thou heap'st

New pains, new troubles, as I here beheld.
Wherefore doth fault of ours bring us to this?

E'en as a billow, on Charybdis rising,
Against encountered billow dashing breaks;

Such is the dance this wretched race must lead,

Whom more than elsewhere numerous here I found,

From one side and the other, with loud voice,

Both rolled on weights, by main force of their breasts,

Then smote together, and each one forth-with

Rolled them back voluble, turning again;
Exclaiming these, "Why holdest thou so fast?"

Those answering, "And why castest thou away?"

So, still repeating their spiteful song,
They to the opposite point on either hand

Traversed the horrid circle: then arrived,
Both turned them round, and through the middle space

Conflicting met again. At sight whereof
I, stung with grief, thus spake: "O say, my guide!

What race is this? Were these, whose heads are shorn,

On our left hand, all separate to the church?"

He straight replied: "In their first life, these all

In mind were so distorted, that they made, 50

According to due measure, of their wealth
No use. This clearly from their words collect,

Which they howl forth, at each extremity
5 Arriving of the circle, where their crime

Contrary in kind disparts them. To the church

Were separate those, that with no hairy cows

10 Are crowned, both Popes and Cardinals, o'er whom Avarice dominion absolute maintains."

I then: "Mid such as these some needs must be,

15 Whom I shall recognize, that with the blot
Of these foul sins were stained." He answering thus:

"Vain thought conceivest thou. That ignoble life,

20 Which made them vile before, now makes them dark,

And to all knowledge indiscernible.

Forever they shall meet in this rude shock:
These from the tomb with clenched grasp

25 shall rise,
Those with close-shaven locks. That ill they gave,

And ill they kept, hath of the beauteous world

30 Deprived, and set them at this strife, which needs

No labored phrase of mine to set it off.

Now mayest thou see, my son! how brief, how vain,

35 The goods committed into Fortune's hands,

For which the human race keep such a coil!

Not all the gold that is beneath the moon,

40 Or ever hath been, of these toil-worn souls Might purchase rest for one." I thus rejoined:

"My guide! of thee this also would I learn;

45 This fortune, that thou speakest of, what it is,

Whose talons grasp the blessings of the world?"

He thus: "O beings blind! what ignorance

Besets you? Now my judgment hear and mark.

He, whose transcendent wisdom passes all,
The heavens creating, gave them ruling powers

To guide them; so that each part¹ shines to each,

Their light in equal distribution poured.

By similar appointment he ordained
Over the world's bright images to rule,

Superintendence of a guiding hand

And general minister,² which, at due time,

May change the empty vantages of life

From race to race, from one to other's blood,

Beyond prevention of man's worst care:

Wherefore one nation rises into sway,

Another languishes, e'en as her will

Decrees, from us concealed, as in the grass

The serpent train. Against her naught avails

Your utmost wisdom. She with foresight plans,

Judges, and carries on her reign, as theirs

The other powers divine. Her changes know

None intermission: by necessity

She is made swift, so frequent come who claim Succession in her favors. This is she,

So execrated e'en by those whose debt

To her is rather praise; they wrongfully

With blame requite her, and with evil word;

But she is blessed, and for that reck not:

Amidst the other primal beings glad,

Rolls on her sphere,³ and in her bliss exults.

Now on our way pass we, to heavier woe

Descending: for each star is falling now,

That mounted at our entrance, and forbids

Too long our tarrying." We the circle crossed

To the next steep, arriving at a well,

That boiling pours itself down to a foss
Sluiced from its source. Far murkier was the wave

Than sablest grain: and we in company
Of the inky waters, journeying by their side,

Entered, though by a different track, beneath.

Into a lake, the Stygian named, expands

The dismal stream, when it hath reached the foot

Of the gray withered cliffs. Intent I stood

To gaze, and in the marish sunk descried

A miry tribe, all naked, and with looks

Betokening rage. They with their hands alone

Stuck not, but with the head, the breast, the feet,

Cutting each other piecemeal with their fangs.

The good instructor spake: "Now seest thou, son!

The souls of those, whom anger overcame.

This too for certain know, that underneath

The water dwells a multitude, whose sighs

Into these bubbles make the surface heave;

As thine eye tells thee wheresoe'er it turn.

Fix'd in the slime, they say: 'Sad once were we

In the sweet air made gladsome by the sun,

Carrying a foul and lazy mist within:

Now in these murky settlements are we sad.'

Such dolorous strain they gurgle in their throats.

But word distinct can utter none." Our route

Thus compassed we, a segment widely stretched

Between the dry embankment, and the core

Of the loathed pool, turning meanwhile our eyes

Downward on those who gulped its muddy lees;

Nor stopped, till to a tower's low base we came.

ROMANCE

WELSH

THE MABINOIGION

(11TH OR EARLY 12TH CENTURY)

The literary men of ancient Wales practiced a highly technical art and were required to undergo a very careful training. Speaking strictly, the Mabinogion (pronounced: Máb-i-nó-gion) includes a group of four mediæval Welsh tales (called the "Four Branches of the Mabinogi") which formed a sort of textbook for the young mabinog, aspirant to the title of bard. More generally, the term "Mabinogion" is applied to a collection of some dozen stories (including the four just referred to) which illustrate the cultural and literary background of mediæval Wales. Although written in Welsh, they should be known to all serious students of literature for more than one reason. First, they are told in delightful style and are packed with motifs drawn from the superstition and fancies of the folk. Even more important is the fact that they help us to visualize the cultural background against which some of the most fascinating of the legends of the Round Table should be viewed. The Four Branches (from one of which our selection is taken) do not mention Arthur and hence may go back to ancient pagan Welsh mythology before Arthur became a popular hero. Others of the Mabinogion contain Arthurian figures, but represent them as highly grotesque and markedly different from the courtly knights of Anglo-Norman romance.

The translation here given is based on that of Lady Charlotte Guest, The Mabinogion, London, 1849.

PWYLL PRINCE OF DYVED

Once upon a time, Pwyll¹ was at Narberth his chief palace, where a feast had been prepared for him, and with him was a great host of men. And after the first meal, Pwyll arose to walk, and he went to the top of a mound that was above the palace, and was called Gorsedd Arberth.² 'Lord,' said one of the Court, 'it is peculiar to the mound that whosoever sits upon it cannot go thence, without either receiving wounds or blows, or else seeing a wonder.' 'I fear not to receive wounds and blows in the midst of such a host as this, but as to the wonder, gladly would

I see it. I will go therefore and sit upon the mound.'

And upon the mound he sat. And while he sat there, they saw a lady, on a pure white horse of large size, with a garment of shining gold around her, coming along the highway that led from the mound; and the horse seemed to move at a slow and even pace, and to be coming up towards the mound. 'My men,' said Pwyll, 'is there any among you who knows yonder lady?' 'There is not, Lord,' said they. 'Go one of you and meet her, that we may know who she is.' And one of them arose, and, as he came upon the road to meet her, she passed by, and he followed as fast as he could, being on foot; and the greater was his speed, the further was she from him. And when he saw that it profited him nothing to follow her, he returned to Pwyll, and said unto him, 'Lord, it is idle for any one in the world to follow her on foot.' 'Verily,' said Pwyll, 'go unto the palace, and take the fleetest horse that thou seest, and go after her.'

² The mound of Arbeth. Such mounds are often associated in Celtic tradition with supernatural appearances or with buried treasure, and hence are dangerous.

And he took a horse and went forward. And he came to an open level plain, and put spurs to his horse; and the more he urged his horse, the further was she from him. Yet she held the same pace as at first. And his horse began to fail; and when his horse's feet failed him, he returned to the place where Pwyll was. 'Lord,' said he, 'it will avail nothing for any one to follow yonder lady. I know of no horse in these realms swifter than this, and it availed me not to pursue her.' 'Of a truth,' said Pwyll, 'there must be some illusion here. Let us go towards the palace.' So to the palace they went, and they spent that day. And the next day they arose, and that also they spent until it was time to go to meat. And after the first meal, 'Verily,' said Pwyll, 'we will go the same party as yesterday to the top of the mound. And do thou,' said he to one of his young men, 'take the swiftest horse that thou knowest in the field.' And thus did the young man. And they went towards the mound, taking the horse with them. And as they were sitting down they beheld the lady on the same horse, and in the same apparel, coming along the same road. 'Behold,' said Pwyll, 'here is the lady of yesterday. Make ready, youth, to learn who she is.' 'My lord,' said he, 'that will I gladly do.' And thereupon the lady came opposite to them. So the youth mounted his horse; and, before he had settled himself in his saddle, she passed by, and there was a clear space between them. But her speed was no greater than it had been the day before. Then he put his horse into an amble, and thought that, notwithstanding the gentle pace at which his horse went, he should soon overtake her. But this availed him not; so he gave his horse the reins. And still he came no nearer to her than when he went at a foot's pace. And the more he urged his horse, the further was she from him. Yet she rode not faster than before. When he saw that it availed not to follow her, he returned to the place where Pwyll was. 'Lord,' said he, 'the horse can no more than thou hast seen.' 'I see indeed that it avails not that any one should follow her. And by Heaven,' said he, 'she must needs have an errand to some one in this plain, if her haste would allow her to declare it. Let us go back to the palace.' And to the palace they went, and they spent that night in songs and feasting, as it pleased them.

And the next day they amused themselves until it was time to go to meat. And when meat was ended, Pwyll said, 'Where are the hosts that went yesterday and the day before to the top of the mound?' 'Behold, Lord, we are here,' said they. 'Let us go,' said he, 'to the mound, to sit there. And do thou,' said he to the page who tended his horse, 'saddle my horse well, and hasten with him to the road, and bring also my spurs with thee.' And the youth did thus. And they went and sat upon the mound; and ere they had been there but a short time, they beheld the lady coming by the same road, and in the same manner, and at the same pace. 'Young man,' said Pwyll, 'I see the lady coming; give me my horse.' And no sooner had he mounted his horse than she passed him. And he turned after her and followed her. And he let his horse go bounding playfully, and thought that at the second step or the third he should come up with her. But he came no nearer to her than at first. Then he urged his horse to his utmost speed, yet he found that it availed nothing to follow her. Then said Pwyll, 'O maiden, for the sake of him whom thou best lovest, stay for me.' 'I will stay gladly,' said she, 'and it were better for thy horse hadst thou asked it long since.' So the maiden stopped, and she threw back that part of her headdress which covered her face. And she fixed her eyes upon him, and began to talk with him. 'Lady,' asked he, 'whence comest thou, and whereunto dost thou journey?' 'I journey on mine own errand,' said she, 'and right glad am I to see thee.' 'My greeting be unto thee,' said he. Then he thought that the beauty of all the maidens, and all the ladies that he had ever seen, was as nothing compared to her beauty. 'Lady,' he said, 'wilt thou tell me aught concerning thy purpose?' 'I will tell thee,'¹ said she. 'My chief quest was to seek thee.' 'Behold,' said Pwyll, 'this is to me the most pleasing quest on which thou couldst have come; and wilt thou tell me who thou art?' 'I will tell thee, Lord,' said she. 'I am Rhiannon,² the daughter of Heveydd Hên,³ and they sought to give me to a husband against my will. But no husband would I have, and that because of my love for thee, neither will I yet have one unless thou reject me. And hither have I come to hear thy answer.' 'By Heaven,' said Pwyll, 'behold this is my answer. If I might choose among all the ladies and damsels in the world, thee would I choose.' 'Verily,' said she, 'if thou art thus minded, 20 make a pledge to meet me ere I am given to another.' 'The sooner I may do so, the more pleasing will it be unto me,' said Pwyll, 'and wheresoever thou wilt, there will I meet with thee.' 'I will that thou 25 meet me this day twelvemonth at the palace of Heveydd. And I will cause a feast to be prepared, so that it be ready against thou come.' 'Gladly,' said he, 'will I keep this tryst.' 'Lord,' said she, 'remain in health, and be mindful that thou keep thy promise; and now I will go hence.' So they parted, and he went back to his kins and to them of his household. And whatsoever questions they asked him respecting 35 the damsel, he always turned the discourse upon other matters. And when a year from that time was gone, he caused a hundred knights to equip themselves and to go with him to the palace of Heveydd Hên. And he came to the palace, and there was great joy concerning him, with much concourse of people and great rejoicing, and vast preparations for his coming. And the whole Court was placed under his orders.

And the hall was garnished and they went to meat, and thus did they sit; Heveydd Hên was on one side of Pwyll, and Rhiannon on the other. And all the rest according to their rank. And they ate and feasted and talked one with another, and at the beginning of the carousal, after the meat, there entered a tall auburn-haired youth, of royal bearing, clothed in a garment of satin. And when he came into the hall, he saluted Pwyll and his companions. 'The greeting of Heaven be 15 unto thee, my soul,' said Pwyll, 'come thou and sit down.' 'Nay,'⁴ said he, 'a suitor am I, and I will do mine errand.' 'Do so willingly,' said Pwyll. 'Lord,' said he, 'my errand is unto thee, and it is to crave a boon of thee that I come.' 'What boon soever thou mayest ask of me, as far as I am able, thou shalt have.' 'Ah,' said Rhiannon, 'wherefore didst thou give that answer?' 'Has he not given it before the 20 presence of these nobles?' asked the youth. 'My soul,' said Pwyll, 'what is the boon thou askest?' 'The lady whom best I love is to be thy bride this night; I come to ask her of thee, with the feast and the banquet that are in this place.' And Pwyll was silent because of the answer which he had given. 'Be silent as long as thou wilt,' said Rhiannon. 'Never did man make worse use of his wits than thou hast done.' 'Lady,' said he, 'I knew not who he was.' 'Behold this is the man to whom they would have given me against my will,' said she. 'And he is Gwawl⁵ the son of Clud, a man of great power and wealth, and, be- 35 cause of the word thou hast spoken, bestow me upon him lest shame befall thee.' 'Lady,' said he, 'I understand not thine answer. Never can I do as thou sayest.' 'Bestow me upon him,' said she [secretly],

⁴ The stranger who arrives just in time for dinner, and enforces a request by refusing to accept hospitality till his boon be granted, is a common figure in mediæval romance.

⁵ Custom required that Arthur and other worthies of mediæval romance should grant whatever was asked on a high festival. When once the king's promise was given, it must be kept at any cost.

⁶ Pronounced, Goo-owl.

'and I will cause that I shall never be his.' 'By what means will that be?' asked Pwyll. 'In thy hand will I give thee a small bag,' said she. 'See that thou keep it well, and he will ask of thee the banquet, and the feast, and the preparations which are not in thy power. Unto the hosts and the household will I give the feast. And such will be thy answer respecting this. And as concerns myself, I will engage to become his bride this night twelvemonth. And at the end of the year be thou here,' said she, 'and bring this bag with thee, and let thy hundred knights be in the orchard up yonder. And when he is in the midst of joy and feasting, come thou in by thyself, clad in ragged garments, and holding thy bag in thy hand, and ask nothing but a bagful of food, and I will cause that if all the meat and liquor that are in these seven Cantreys were put into it, it would be no fuller than before. And after a great deal has been put therein, he will ask thee whether thy bag will ever be full. Say thou then that it never will, until a man of noble birth and of great wealth arise and press the food in the bag with both his feet, saying, "Enough has been put therein"; and I will cause him to go and tread down the food in the bag, and when he does so, turn thou the bag, so that he shall be up over his head in it, and then slip a knot upon the thongs of the bag. Let there be also a good bugle horn about thy neck, and, as soon as thou hast bound him in the bag, wind thy horn, and let it be a signal between thee and thy knights. And, when they hear the sound of the horn, let them come down upon the palace.' 'Lord,' said Gwawl, 'it is meet that I have an answer to my request.' 'As much of that thou hast asked as it is in my power to give, thou shalt have,' replied Pwyll. 'My soul,' said Rhiannon unto him, 'as for the feast and the banquet that are here, I have bestowed them upon the men of Dyved, and the household, and the warriors that are with us. These can I not suffer to be given to any. In a year from to-night a banquet shall be prepared for thee in this palace, so that I may become thy bride.'

So Gwawl went forth to his possessions, and Pwyll went also back to Dyved. And they both spent that year until it was the time for the feast at the palace of Heveydd Hên. Then Gwawl the son of Clud set out to the feast that was prepared for him, and he came to the palace, and was received there with rejoicing. Pwyll, also, came to the orchard with his hundred knights, as Rhiannon had commanded him, having the bag with him. And Pwyll was clad in coarse and ragged garments, and wore large clumsy old shoes upon his feet. And when he knew that the carousal after the meat had begun, he went towards the hall, and when he came into the hall he saluted Gwawl the son of Clud, and his company, both men and women. 'Heaven prosper thee,' said Gwawl, 'and the greeting of Heaven be unto thee.' 'Lord,' said he, 'may Heaven reward thee, I have an errand unto thee.' 'Welcome be thine errand, and, if thou ask of me that which is just, thou shalt have it gladly.' 'It is fitting,' answered he. 'I crave but from want, and the boon that I ask is to have this small bag that thou seest filled with meat.' 'A request within reason is this,' said he, 'and gladly shalt thou have it. Bring him food.' A great number of attendants arose and began to fill the bag, but, for all that they put into it, it was no fuller than at first. 'My soul,' said Gwawl, 'will thy bag be ever full?' 'It will not, I declare to Heaven,' said he, 'for all that may be put into it, unless one possessed of lands, and domains, and treasure, shall arise and tread down with both his feet the food that is within the bag, and shall say, "Enough has been put therein."' Then said Rhiannon unto Gwawl the son of Clud, 'Rise up quickly.' 'I will willingly arise,' said he. So he rose up, and put his two feet into the bag. And Pwyll turned up the sides of the bag, so that Gwawl was over his head in it. And he shut it up quickly and slipped a knot upon the thongs, and blew his horn. And thereupon behold his household came down upon the palace. And they seized all the host that had come with Gwawl, and cast them into his own prison. And Pwyll threw off his rags, and his old shoes, and his tattered array; and as they came in, every one of Pwyll's knights struck a blow upon the bag, and asked, 'What is here?'

'A Badger,' said they. And in this manner they played, each of them striking the bag, either with his foot or with a staff. And thus played they with the bag. Every one as he came in asked, 'What game are you playing at thus?' 'The game of Badger in the Bag,' said they. And then was the game of Badger in the Bag first played.

'Lord,' said the man in the bag, 'if thou wouldest but hear me, I merit not to be slain in a bag.' Said Heveydd Hên, 'Lord, he speaks truth. It were fitting that thou listen to him, for he deserves not this.' 'Verily,' said Pwyll, 'I will do thy counsel concerning him.' 'Behold this is my counsel then,' said Rhiannon; 'thou art now in a position in which it behoves thee to satisfy suitors and minstrels; let him give unto them in thy stead, and take a pledge from him that he will never seek to revenge that which has been done to him. And this will be punishment enough.' 'I will do this gladly,' said the man in the bag. 'And gladly will I accept it,' said Pwyll, 'since it is the counsel of Heveydd and Rhiannon.' 'Such then is our counsel,' answered they. 'I accept it,' said Pwyll. 'Seek thyself sureties.'¹ 'We will be for him,' said Heveydd, 'until his men be free to answer for him.' And upon this he was let out of the bag, and his liegemen were liberated. 'Demand now of Gwawl his sureties,' said Heveydd, 'we know which should be taken for him.' And Heveydd numbered the sureties. Said Gwawl, 'Do thou thyself draw up the covenant.' 'It will suffice me that it be as Rhiannon said,' answered Pwyll. So unto that covenant were the sureties pledged. 'Verily, Lord,' said Gwawl, 'I am greatly hurt, and I have many bruises. I have need to be anointed; with thy leave I will go forth. I will leave nobles in my stead, to answer for me in all that thou shalt require.' 'Willingly,' said Pwyll, 'mayest thou do thus.' So Gwawl went towards his own possessions.

And the hall was set in order for Pwyll and the men of his host, and for them also of the palace, and they went to the tables and sat down. And as they had sat that time twelvemonth, so sat they that night.

And they ate, and feasted, and spent the night in mirth and tranquillity. And the time came that they should sleep, and Pwyll and Rhiannon went to their chamber.

And next morning at the break of day, 'My Lord,' said Rhiannon, 'arise and begin to give thy gifts unto the minstrels. Refuse no one to-day that may claim thy bounty.' 'Thus shall it be gladly,' said Pwyll, 'both to-day and every day while the feast shall last.' So Pwyll arose, and he caused silence to be proclaimed, and desired all the suitors and the minstrels to show and to point out what gifts were to their wish and desire. And this being done, the feast went on, and he denied no one while it lasted. And when the feast was ended, Pwyll said unto Heveydd, 'My Lord, with thy permission I will set out for Dyved to-morrow.' 'Certainly,' said Heveydd, 'may Heaven prosper thee. Fix also a time when Rhiannon may follow thee.' 'By Heaven,' said Pwyll, 'we will go hence together.' 'Willest thou this, Lord?' said Heveydd. 'Yes, by Heaven,' answered Pwyll.

And the next day, they set forward towards Dyved, and journeyed to the palace of Narberth, where a feast was made ready for them. And there came to them great numbers of the chief men and the most noble ladies of the land, and of these there was none to whom Rhiannon did not give some rich gift, either a bracelet, or a ring, or a precious stone. And they ruled the land prosperously both that year and the next.

And in the third year the nobles of the land began to be sorrowful at seeing a man whom they loved so much, and who was moreover their lord and their foster-brother, without an heir. And they came to him. And the place where they met was Preseleu, in Dyved. 'Lord,' said they, 'we know that thou art not so young as some of the men of this country, and we fear that thou mayest not have an heir of the wife whom thou hast taken. Take therefore another wife of whom thou mayest have heirs. Thou canst not always continue with us, and, though thou desire to remain as thou art, we will not suffer thee.' 'Truly,' said Pwyll, 'we have not long been joined together, and many things may yet befall. Grant me a year from this time, and for the space of a year we will abide together, and after that I will do according to your wishes.' So they granted it. And before the end of a year a son was born unto him. And in Narberth was he born; and on the night that he was born, women were brought to watch the mother and the boy. And the women slept, as did also Rhiannon, the mother of the boy. And the number of the women that were brought into the chamber was six. And they watched for a good portion of the night, and before midnight every one of them fell asleep, and towards break of day they awoke; and, when they awoke, they looked where they had put the boy, and behold he was not there. 'Oh,' said one of the women, 'the boy is lost!' 'Yes,' said another, 'and it will be small vengeance if we are burnt or put to death because of the child.' Said one of the women, 'Is there any counsel for us in the world in this matter?' 'There is,' answered another, 'I offer you good counsel.' 'What is that?' asked they. 'There is here a stag-hound bitch, and she has a litter of whelps. Let us kill some of the cubs, and rub the blood on the face and hands of Rhiannon, and lay the bones before her, and assert that she herself hath devoured her son, and she alone will not be able to gainsay us six.' And according to this counsel it was settled. And towards morning Rhiannon awoke, and she said, 'Women, where is my son?' 'Lady,' said they, 'ask us not concerning thy son, we have nought but the blows and the bruises we got by struggling with thee, and of a truth we never saw any woman so violent as thou, for it was of no avail to contend with thee. Hast thou not thyself devoured thy son? Claim him not therefore of us.' 'For pity's sake,' said Rhiannon; 'the Lord God knows all things. Charge me not falsely. If you tell me this from fear, I assert before Heaven that I will defend you.' 'Truly,' said they, 'we would not bring evil on ourselves for any one in the world.' 'For pity's sake,' said Rhiannon, 'you will receive no evil by telling the truth.' But for all her words, whether fair or harsh, she received but the same answer from the women.

And Pwyll the chief of Dyved arose, and his household, and his hosts. And this occurrence could not be concealed, but the story went forth throughout the land, and all the nobles heard it. Then the nobles came to Pwyll, and besought him to put away his wife, because of the great crime which she had done. But Pwyll answered them, that they had no cause wherefore they might ask him to put away his wife, save for her having no children. 'But children has she now had, therefore will I not put her away; if she has done wrong, let her do penance for it.' So Rhiannon sent for the teachers and the wise men, and, as she preferred doing penance to contending with the women, she took upon her a penance. And the penance that was imposed upon her was, that she should remain in that palace of Narberth until the end of seven years, and that she should sit every day near unto a horse-block that was without the gate. And that she should relate the story to all who should come there, whom she might suppose not to know it already; and that she should offer the guests and strangers, if they would permit her, to carry them upon her back into the palace. But it rarely happened that any would permit. And thus did she spend part of the year.

Now at that time Teirnyon Twryv Vliant¹ was Lord of Gwent Is Coed,² and he was the best man in the world. And unto his house there belonged a mare, than which neither mare nor horse in the kingdom was more beautiful. And on the night of every first of May she foaled, and no one ever knew what became of the colt. And one night Teirnyon talked with his wife: 'Wife,' said he, 'it is very simple of us that our mare should foal every year, and that we should have none of her colts.' 'What can be done in the matter?' said she. 'This is the night of the first of May,' said he. 'The vengeance of Heaven be upon me, if I learn not what it is that takes away the colts.' So he caused the mare to be brought into a house, and he armed himself, and began to watch that night. And in the beginning of the night, the mare foaled a large and beautiful colt. And it was standing up in the place. And Teirnyon rose up and looked at the size of the colt, and as he did so he heard a great tumult, and after the tumult behold a claw came through the window into the house, and it seized the colt by the mane. Then Teirnyon drew his sword, and struck off the arm at the elbow, so that portion of the arm together with the colt was in the house with him. And then did he hear a tumult and wailing, both at once. And he opened the door, and rushed out in the direction of the noise, and he could not see the cause of the tumult because of the darkness of the night, but he rushed after it and followed it. Then he remembered that he had left the door open, and he returned. And at the door behold there was an infant boy in swaddling-clothes, wrapped around in a mantle of satin. And he took up the boy, and behold he was very strong for the age that he was.

Then he shut the door, and went into the chamber where his wife was. 'Lady,' said he, 'art thou sleeping?' 'No, lord,' said she, 'I was asleep, but as thou camest in I did awake.' 'Behold, here is a boy for thee if thou wilt,' said he, 'since thou hast never had one.' 'My lord,' said she, 'what adventure is this?' 'It was thus,' said Teirnyon; and he told her how it all befell. 'Verily, lord,' said she, 'what sort of garments are there upon the boy?' 'A mantle of satin,' said he. 'He is then a boy of gentle lineage,' she replied. 'My lord,' she said, 'if thou wilt, I shall have great diversion and mirth. I will call my women unto me, and tell them that I have been pregnant.' 'I will readily grant thee to do this,' he answered. And thus did they, and they caused the boy to be baptized, and the ceremony was performed there; and the name which they gave unto him was Gwri Wallt Euryn,¹ because what hair was upon his head was as yellow as gold. And they had the boy nursed in the Court until he was a year old. And before the year was over he could walk stoutly. And he was larger than a boy of three years old, even one of great growth and size. And the boy was nursed the second year, and then he was as large as a child six years old. And before the end of the fourth year, he would bribe the grooms to allow him to take the horses to water. 'My lord,' said his wife unto Teirnyon, 'where is the colt which thou didst save on the night that thou didst find the boy?' 'I have commanded the grooms of the horses,' said he, 'that they take care of him.' 'Would it not be well, lord,' said she, 'if thou wæst to cause him to be broken in, and given to the boy, seeing that on the same night that thou didst find the boy, the colt was foaled and thou didst save him?' 'I will not oppose thee in this matter,' said Teirnyon. 'I will allow thee to give him the colt.' 'Lord,' said she, 'may Heaven reward thee; I will give it him.' So the horse was given to the boy. Then she went to the grooms and those who tended the horses, and commanded them to be careful of the horse, so that he might be broken in by the time that the boy could ride him.

And while these things were going forward, they heard tidings of Rhiannon and her punishment. And Teirnyon Twryv Vliant, by reason of the pity that he felt on hearing this story of Rhiannon and her punishment, inquired closely concerning it, until he had heard from many of those who came to his court. Then did Teirnyon, often lamenting the sad history, ponder within himself, and he looked steadfastly on the boy, and, as he looked upon him, it seemed to him that he had never beheld so great a likeness between father and son, as between the boy and Pwyll the Chief of Dyved. Now the semblance of Pwyll was well known to him, for he had of yore been one of his followers. And thereupon he became grieved for the wrong that he did, in keeping with him a boy whom he knew to be the son of another man. And the first time that he was alone with his wife, he told her that it was not right that they should keep the boy with them, and suffer so excellent a lady as Rhiannon to be punished so greatly on his account, whereas the boy was the son of Pwyll the Chief of Dyved. And Teirnyon's wife agreed with him, that they should send the boy to Pwyll. 'And three things, lord,' said she, 'shall we gain thereby. Thanks and gifts for releasing Rhiannon from her punishment; and thanks from Pwyll for nursing his son and restoring him unto him; and thirdly, if the boy is of gentle nature, he will be our foster-son, and he will do for us all the good in his power.' So it was settled according to this counsel.

And no later than the next day was Teirnyon equipped, and two other knights with him. And the boy, as a fourth in their company, went with them upon the horse which Teirnyon had given him. And they journeyed towards Narberth, and it was not long before they reached that place. And as they drew near to the palace, they beheld Rhiannon sitting beside the horse-block. And when they were opposite to her, 'Chieftain,' said she, 'go not further thus, I will bear every one of you into the palace, and this is my penance for slaying my own son and devouring him.' 'Oh, fair lady,' said Teirnyon, 'think not that I will be one to be carried upon thy back.' 'Neither will I,' said the boy. 'Truly, my soul,' said Teirnyon, 'we will not go.' So they went forward to the palace, and there was great joy at their coming. And at the palace a feast was prepared, because Pwyll was come back from the confines of Dyved. And they went into the hall and washed, and Pwyll rejoiced to see Teirnyon. And in this order they sat. Teirnyon between Pwyll and Rhiannon, and Teirnyon's two companions on the other side of Pwyll, with the boy between them. And after meat they began to carouse and to discourse. And Teirnyon's discourse was concerning the adventure of the mare and the boy, and how he and his wife had nursed and reared the child as their own. 'And behold here is thy son, lady,' said Teirnyon. 'And whosoever told that lie concerning thee has done wrong. And when I heard of thy sorrow, I was troubled and grieved. And I believe that there is none of this host who will not perceive that the boy is the son of Pwyll,' said Teirnyon. 'There is none,' said they all, 'who is not certain thereof.' 'I declare to Heaven,' said Rhiannon, 'that if this be true, there is indeed an end to my trouble.' 'Lady,' said Pendaran¹ Dyved, 'well hast thou named thy son Pryderi, and well becomes him the name of Pryderi² son of Pwyll Chief of Dyved.' 'Look you,' said Rhiannon, 'will not his own name become him better?' 'What name has he?' asked Pendaran Dyved. 'Gwri Wallt Euryn is the name that we gave him.' 'Pryderi,' said Pendaran, 'shall his name be.' 'It were more proper,' said Pwyll, 'that the boy should take his name from the word his mother spoke when she received the joyful tidings of him.' And thus was it arranged.

'Teirnyon,' said Pwyll, 'Heaven reward thee that thou hast reared the boy up to this time, and, being of gentle lineage, it were fitting that he repay thee for it.' 'My lord,' said Teirnyon, 'it was my wife who nursed him, and there is no one in the world so afflicted as she at parting with him. It were well that he should bear in mind what I and my wife have done for him.' 'I call Heaven to witness,' said Pwyll, 'that while I live I will support thee and thy possessions, as long as I am able to preserve my own. And when he shall have power, he will more fitly maintain them than I. And if this counsel be pleasing unto thee, and to my nobles, it shall be that, as thou hast reared him up to the present time, I will give him to be brought up by Pendaran Dyved, from henceforth. And you shall be companions, and shall both be foster-fathers unto him.' 'This is good counsel,' said they all. So the boy was given to Pendaran Dyved, and the nobles of the land were sent with him.

¹ According to tradition, Pendaran was a powerful Welsh chieftain who possessed an immense herd of swine.

² Pronounced, Prid-eri. The name is suggested by the fact that Rhiannon has just used the word pryderi, which means "trouble."

And Teirnyon Twryv Vliant, and his companions, set out for his country, and his possessions, with love and gladness. And he went not without being offered the fairest jewels and the fairest horses, and the choicest dogs; but he would take none of them.

Thereupon they all remained in their own dominions. And Pryderi, the son of Pwyll the Chief of Dyved, was brought up 10 carefully as was fit, so that he became the fairest youth, and the most comely, and the best skilled in all good games, of any in the kingdom. And thus passed years and years, until the end of Pwyll the Chief 15 of Dyved's life came, and he died.

And Pryderi ruled the seven Cantrevs¹ of Dyved prosperously, and he was beloved by his people, and by all around him. And at length he added to them the 5 three Cantrevs of Ystrad Tywi,² and the four Cantrevs of Cardigan; and these were called the Seven Cantrevs of Seisyllwch. And when he made this addition, Pryderi the son of Pwyll the Chief of Dyved desired to take a wife. And the wife he chose was Kicva, the daughter of Gwynn Gohoyw, the son of Gloyw Wallt Lydan, the son of Prince Casnar, one of the nobles of this Island.

And thus ends this portion of the Mabinogion.

GERMAN

•TRISTAN AND ISEULT

Of the various versions of the story of Tristan and Iseult told by mediæval writers, the best is that by the German poet Gottfried von Strassburg. Indeed it is doubtful whether, as a narrative love poem, it has ever been surpassed. The story had been told many times before Gottfried. He himself states that he learned it from a certain Thomas of Britain (whose poem now exists only in fragments), but he contributed to it a fine psychological treatment and a beautiful simplicity of narrative method. The part printed in this volume is the conclusion of the poem. In the beginning we learn that Tristan, son of Rivalin and Blancheflour, after a number of misfortunes is received at Tintagel, the court of his uncle, King Mark of Cornwall. He frees his country from the paying of tribute by killing the powerful warrior Morholt, but receives in the contest a wound which can be cured only by Morholt's sister, Iseult of Ireland. Disguised as a minstrel he sails to Ireland, where he is healed by Iseult of Ireland and becomes acquainted with her daughter, also named Iseult, the heroine of the poem. There is, so far, no thought of love between them, and Tristan returns to Mark's court. Later King Mark, having been urged to marry, hears of Iseult the princess of Ireland, and sends Tristan as his representative to fetch her over to Cornwall. Realizing that her daughter is to marry a man older than herself, and wishing to insure her against domestic infelicity, Iseult the elder sends along with her a love potion to be drunk by bride and groom on their wedding night. On the journey to Cornwall, Tristan and Iseult drink the potion by mistake and find themselves plunged into eternal love for each other. The rest of the story is concerned with the tragic consequences of this love. Iseult is bound to marry King Mark, and Tristan remains in his uncle's service. Perhaps the most tragic element of the story is the character of the good King Mark, who loves his nephew and his wife, and tries to blind himself to their disloyalty.

The following translation from the German of Gottfried von Strassburg is by Jessie L. Weston, London, D. Nutt, 1899.

Now King Mark and his courtiers were doubter, prayed them straitly for God's in all things anxious to do [Tristan and sake, and for his, to keep a watch on Iseult] honour, yet they might no longer be their looks and words, and no longer to openly friendly as before, for Mark, the 20 shew each other favour and confidence as of yore; and this grieved the lovers sorely.

But King Mark was joyful: he had as much happiness as his heart desired with his lady Iseult; he would that all should shew her open honour, and nothing rejoiced him more than that she should be hailed as queen and lady wherever he was king and lord. 'Tis the blindness of love that will close its eyes to that which it would not see. For in truth he knew that his wife's heart and soul were given to Tristan, yet would he not know it.

To whom then shall the shame of his dishonour be given? For in truth 'twere wrong to say that Tristan and Iseult deceived him; he saw with his eyes, and knew, unseeing, that she loved him not; and yet he loved her!

*Alas! many a Mark and many an Iseult doth one see to-day — men who are blind, or whose hearts and eyes are blind. Many are there who hug their blindness, and will not see that which lieth before their eyes, but hold for a lie that which their heart knoweth to be the truth. And would we look upon it fairly, then ought we scarce to blame the woman, if she let the man see that which she doth think and do. For so soon as a man seeth the shame, then is he no longer deceived, but hath at his own will turned his back upon the truth. And in truth the wondrous beauty of Iseult had so fettered King Mark's eyes and senses that he could not see in her aught that should displease him, for he loved her so well that he overlooked all the sorrow she might cause him.

But to Iseult separation from Tristan was even as death; the more her husband forbade her to shew favour and kindness towards him the more her heart clung to him. For this is ever the way of women; children of Mother Eve are they all; 'twas she who brake the first commandment. For our Lord God bade her do as she would with fruit, flowers, and grass, all that was in the fair garden of Paradise save one tree only (and the priests say 'twas the fig-tree), the which was forbidden her on peril of death. Yet she plucked the fruit, and brake the commandment, and lost Paradise.

Now is it my firm belief that Eve would never have desired to eat of that tree had it not been forbidden to her. Even so the first thing that she did shewed of what mind she was, for 'twas the thing that she was forbidden. Of every fruit might she eat at her pleasure, yet would she have none save that for which she must pay so heavily.

Yet what greater honour may a woman have than that she fight against her love and her desire for the sake of honour? For in sooth the strife shall end in that her womanhood and her honour alike be justified; and he who is beloved of such a lady findeth himself elect to all bliss. He hath Paradise in his heart, and need vex himself with no fear lest the serpent be hidden amongst the flowers, or that a thorn will pierce his hand if he pluck a rose, for thorns and thistles alike are banished from that garden.

But alas! such happiness was not for Tristan and Iseult; the watch they must keep upon their words and looks was bitter to them both, and never had they sought so earnestly for means whereby they might come together; yet when they found them 'twas but to their sorrow and bitter grief.

It was midday, and the sun shone hotly, so that the queen would no longer abide in the palace, but took her way forth to the orchard. There, under the cool shade of a tree, she bade her maidens prepare a couch that she might rest awhile. This they did, spreading the couch with purple and fine linen, and Queen Iseult bade them leave her, all save Brangœne alone.

Then, since the place was lonely, and none were abroad at that hour, she sent Brangœne secretly to Tristan, bidding him come and speak with her. This she did, and Tristan did even as Adam when Eve proffered him the fruit — he took it, and ate death thereof with her.

But Brangœne went away sadly, bidding the chamberlain see that none enter the queen's apartments, and sat herself down by one of the doors, sorrowing to think that her caution and her counsel might not serve her lady better.

Scarcely had the chamberlain taken his stand before the door ere King Mark came towards him, and asked impatiently for the queen.

"She sleepeth, sire," answered her maidens; and Brang ene, as she sat, hid her face in her hands, for her heart failed her.

But the King said: "Where doth the queen sleep?" And they told him, in the garden. And Mark went thither and found his heart-sorrow, for there lay his wife and his nephew, clasped in each other's arms, cheek to cheek, and lip to lip. So were Mark's doubts at an end — he suspected no more, for he knew.

Silently he turned and went his way, and, calling the lords of his council, told them how Tristan and the queen were even now together, and bade them go, and take the twain, and judge them according to the law of the land.

But even as Mark turned to go Tristan awoke, and saw him, and said within himself: "Alas! what hast thou done, faithful Brang ene? I wot well this shall be our death! Awake, Iseult, unhappy love, heart's queen, we are betrayed!"

"Betrayed?" she spake, "how may that be?"

"My lord the king stood but now above us; he saw us, and I saw him. Now hath he gone to bring witnesses, he worketh for our death. Heart's lady, fair Iseult, now must we part, never again may we rejoice in each other as aforetime. Now bethink thee of the true love that hath been betwixt us, and see that it remain ever steadfast, let me not out of thine heart! For whatever befall mine, thou shalt never depart from it. Iseult must ever dwell in Tristan's heart! See, love, that neither time nor distance change thy mind towards me. Forget me not, whatever befall. Sweet love, fair Iseult, kiss me, and bid me farewell!"

She stepped a little back, and spake, sighing: "Our hearts and our souls have been too long and too closely knit together that they may ever learn forgetfulness. Whether thou art far or near, in my heart shall be nothing living save Tristan alone — my love and my life. Body and soul have been thine this long while; see that no other woman ever separate thee from me, so that our love and our faith be ever steadfast and true as they have been betwixt us these many years. And take thou this ring, let it be a token to thee of faith and love, that at any time if thou lovest other than me thou mayest look upon it and remember how thou abidest in mine heart. Think of this parting, how near it goeth to heart and life! Remember the many heavy sorrows I have suffered through thee, and let none be ever nearer to thee than Iseult! Forget me not for the sake of another! We two have loved and sorrowed in such true fellowship unto this time, we should not find it over-hard to keep the same faith even to death. Yet methinks 'tis needless to remind thee thus. If Iseult were ever one heart and one faith with Tristan, that is she now, that must she ever be. • Yet would I fain make one prayer to thee: whatever land thou seekest, have a care for thyself — my life; for if I be robbed of that, then am I, thy life, undone. And myself, thy life, will I for thy sake, not for mine, guard with all care. For thy body and thy life, that know I well, they rest on me. Now bethink thee well of me, thy body, Iseult. Let me see my life in thee, if it may well be so, and see thou thy life in me! Thou guardest the life of both. Now come hither and kiss me. Tristan and Iseult, thou and I, we twain are but one being, without distinction or difference. This kiss shall be a seal that I thine, and thou mine, remain even to death but one Tristan and one Iseult!"

Now that they had set the seal on their covenant, Tristan departed thence, with bitter sorrow; his self, his other life, Iseult, remained weeping sorely. Never aforetime had their parting been thus sorrowful.

Herewith came the king, and with him a company of his lords and counsellors, yet they came too late, for they found but Iseult alone.

Then they drew the king aside, and said: "Sire, herein hast thou wronged both thy wife and thine honour. Now, as many a time before, hast thou accused the queen needlessly and for nought. Thou wrongest thyself. How canst thou be joyful the while thou dost shame thy wife, and make her and thyself the mock of the land? Yet hast thou found no wrong in her. Why slander the queen who hath not betrayed thee? For thine own self and thine honour do so no more." Thus they counselled him; and Mark held his peace, and went thence unavenged.

Herein Ye May Read the Ending of Tristan and Iseult — Of Tristan's Valiant Deeds — How He Wedded Iseult of the White Hand — Of His Deadly Wound — Of the Coming of Iseult of Ireland — Of the Death of the Lovers.

Tristan betook him to his lodging, and bade his folk make ready and come with him swiftly to the haven. There he went aboard the first ship he found, and sailed with his men to Normandy. But there he abode not long, for he sought a life that should bring him some comfort for his sadness. He fled from death that he might seek death, and so free him from the death of the heart — his separation from Iseult. What profit to flee from death if he bare death with him? What profit if the torment that drave him forth from Cornwall yet lay, day and night, upon him?

He bethought him that if his sorrow were ever to be lessened it must needs be by deeds of knighthood; so, hearing that there was war in Almayne,¹ he journeyed thither, and served sceptre and crown so faithfully that the Roman Empire never won under its banners a warrior who wrought such doughty deed. Many an adventure had he, the which I will not recount, for, if I were to tell all the deeds that have been written of him, the tale would indeed be marvellous! But the many fables men tell of him I cast to the winds; 'tis toil and labour enow to record the truth.

Tristan's life and death, the fair-haired Iseult, she had sorrow and grief enough. Her heart well nigh broke as she watched his ship sail thence; but his life kept her in life — apart from him she might neither live nor die. She watched the sail flutter in the wind, and spake in her heart: "Alas, alas! Sir Tristan, my heart clingeth to thee, my eyes follow thee, and thou speedest from me! Why go thus quickly? Know-est thou not that thou dost flee thy life in fleeing from Iseult? Thou canst no more live a day without me than I can live without thee. Our lives are so interwoven that thou bearest my life with thee; and though in sooth thou leavest thine, yet may neither of us rightly die nor fully live! So am I, poor Iseult, henceforth neither dead nor living! What may I do, alas? I am here, and I am there, yet am I in neither place. I see myself on the sea, and know myself on the land. I sail hence with Tristan, and sit here beside King Mark!" So she bemoaned herself.

When Tristan had been half a year and more in Almayne he became heavy at heart, hearing nought of his lady, and thought to return to the land where he might hear some rumours of her doings. So he gat him back to Normandy, and from thence to Parmenie, thinking that he would find comfort and counsel with Rual. But alas! he and his wife were both dead, yet his sons welcomed Tristan gladly, and were joyful at his coming. They kissed his hands and feet, eyes and mouth, many a time. "Lord," they said, "in thee hath God given us back both father and mother. Now abide here with us, and take again all that was thine, and let us serve thee even as our father served thee, who was thy man, as we would gladly be! Our father and mother are alike dead, but God hath looked upon our need, and sent thee back to us!"

Then they shewed Tristan the tomb, and he stood and wept awhile beside it, and said: "Now if faith and honour may be buried in the earth, here do they lie entombed. Yet if faith and honour are aught akin to God, as men say, then doubt I not that these twain are now crowned above, even as the children of God are crowned."

The sons of Rual, even as their father, laid themselves and all they had at Tristan's service, and vexed themselves in all things to do his will; and thus he abode with them many days.

Now was there a dukedom, betwixt Brittany and England, which was called Arundel, and lay upon the sea coast. The ruler of the land was an old man, but a brave and courteous. The story saith that his neighbours had made war upon him, and had robbed him of possessions by sea and land. Right willingly had he avenged himself, but as yet he lacked the power to do so. One son and one daughter had the duke. The son had received knighthood three years past, and had won much praise and honour for his valiant deeds. His sister was a fair maiden, Iseult of the white hand was she called, and her brother's name was Kahedin. The duke's name was Jovelin.

A rumour came to Parmenie that there was fighting in the dukedom of Arundel, and Tristan, thinking thereby to forget his sorrow, journeyed thither, and found the duke in his castle of Karke. Thither went he with all his friends, and the duke received him with the welcome befitting a noble warrior, for he knew Tristan well by report — all the islands of the Western Sea were full of his fame. The duke was joyful of his coming, and Kahedin, his son, was minded to show him all the honour he might, and would ever be in his company. Friendship was sworn betwixt the two, and they kept that oath faithfully, even unto their death.

Tristan bade the duke tell him how matters stood with him; what was the might of his enemies, and where they most straitly beset his land; and when he knew that they had in truth a mighty force against them, he sent secretly to Parmenie, to Rual's sons, telling them he was in need of aid; and they came swiftly, with five hundred men, and great store of food and drink, for the duke's foemen had laid the land waste.

When Tristan knew of their coming he went to meet them, and led them under cover of night into the land. One half he bade abide at the castle of Karke, and keep their presence secret till he and Kahedin had need of them. With the other half he rode to a castle which the duke had bidden him guard, and commanded them to lie hidden, even as those at Karke.

With the daylight Tristan and Kahedin rode to the border, burning and sacking every fortress on their path, so that the cry went abroad through all the land that Kahedin had ridden forth openly to dare the enemy. And when the former heard this they gathered their men together and came out to meet them, and fell in with them beneath the walls of Karke. When the battle was at its height Tristan's knights who had lain hidden within the castle fell upon them suddenly, and, thus taken by surprise, the foe could do nought but fly, or yield themselves prisoners, or die on the field.

When they had thus taken the leaders captive, Tristan and Kahedin, with all their knights, rode into the enemy's land. There was no fortress so strong that it might resist them, and all the goods and all the prisoners they won they sent to Karke, till the land was once more in their power, and the duke was well avenged.

Then Tristan bade Rual's sons return to Parmenie, and thanked them much for the aid they had given him. The prisoners he bade receive their lands again from the hands of Duke Jovelin, and swear to remain his men, and abstain henceforth from making war upon him; and to this all the princes agreed. Hereafter was Tristan held in great honour at court and through all the land, and all men alike were fain to do his bidding.

Now Kahedin's sister, Iseult of the white hand, was a fair and noble maiden, the flower of the land for beauty and virtue. As Tristan beheld her the old sorrow awoke in his heart. She reminded him of the other Iseult, the Princess of Ireland; nor might he hear or speak her name but that his sorrow might be read in his face. Yet he loved the grief that lay at his heart, and saw the maiden gladly, in that she called to his mind the faith he had sworn to the fair-haired Iseult. Iseult was alike his sorrow and his joy; she brought him comfort, and she vexed him sore. The more his heart yearned for the one Iseult, the more gladly he beheld the other.

And he said in his heart: "Yea, God, how the name doth lead me astray! truth and falsehood betray alike mine eyes and my soul. Iseult rings laughing in mine ear at all times, yet know I not who Iseult may be — mine eyes behold her, and yet they see her not. Iseult is far from me, and yet is she near. Once more am I bewitched, and Cornwall hath become Arundel; Tintagel, Karke; and Iseult hath taken the form of Iseult! I deemed when men spake of this maiden as Iseult, that I had found my love again — and yet was I deceived. Over-long do I desire the sight of Iseult; now am I come where Iseult is, and find her not! I see her day by day, yet see her not, therefore make I my moan. I have found Iseult, yet not the fair-haired Iseult, who was so kindly cruel. The Iseult who vexeth thus my heart is she of Arundel, not Iseult the fair; she, alas! mine eyes behold not. And yet she whom I now behold, and who is sealed with her name, her I must ever honour and love, for the sake of the dear name that so oft hath given me joy and gladness unspeakable."

So Tristan spake oft with himself, and the maid, Iseult of the white hand, marked his troubled glances, and saw how they rested upon her, and her heart went out towards him, for she heard how throughout the land all men praised him; and her eyes strove to answer the thought in him, till the man began to marvel in his heart whether here he might not find an ending to his woe.

Then he upbraided himself for falsehood. "Ah, faithless Tristan! wouldst thou love two Iseults, when thine other life, Iseult, will have but one Tristan? She will have none other love but me; shall I woo another? Woe to thee, Tristan, lay aside this blind folly, and put the thought far from thee."

So was his heart turned again to the love that was his true heritage, and he thought but of his old grief.

Yet was he ever courteous to the maiden Iseult, and whatever her pleasure might be, that would he do. He told her knightly tales, he sang for her, and wrote and read, even as she bade him. And in those days he made the noble "Lay of Tristan," which men in all lands love and prize, and shall prize while the world endures. For often it chanced when all the folk sat together, Tristan, Iseult, and Kahedin, the duke and the duchess, with all the lords and ladies of the court, that he wove fair verses, and roundels, and courteous songs, and ever he sang this refrain:

"Iseut ma drue, Iseut m'amie,

En vous ma mort, en vous ma vie!"

But since he was so fain to sing thus, all who hearkened deemed that he meant their lady, the maiden Iseult, and were beyond measure joyful. And none more than Kahedin. Many a time and oft did he set Tristan beside his sister, and she, when she smiled on Tristan, and gave him her hand, did it as if to please her brother — yet was it to pleasure herself.

Yet day by day Tristan's sorrow grew heavier; he desired but one Iseult, Iseult of Ireland; and Iseult of the white hand, she would have none but Tristan. Her heart and soul were his, his grief was hers, and as she saw him grow pale and sigh for sorrow, so she herself sighed and grew pale, till at length she shewed her love to him so openly, in sweet gestures, looks, and words, that he scarce knew what he might do, and his heart was tossed on a sea of doubt.

And as time passed on, and never word or message came from Queen Iseult, he began to think whether his sorrow and his faith were not all in vain.

"Ah, sweet friend, love Iseult!" he said, "now is our life too far apart. 'Tis no longer as erewhile, when we had but one joy, one sorrow, one love, and one life between us. Now is our fate unlike. I am sad, and thou art joyful. My heart yearneth for thy love, but thy longings for me, they are methinks but feeble. Alas! alas! that which I have lost for thee dost thou hold; thou art at home with thy lord Mark, and thy friends around thee, and I am alone, a stranger in a strange land. Little comfort may I have henceforth from thee, and yet my heart clingeth to thee. Little need hast thou of me! Why dost thou ask not what befalls me? Ah! sweet Queen Iseult, hadst thou departed from me as I from thee, surely had I sent to learn tidings of her who was my life. And yet it may be that she hath sought me, and found me not, for he who seeketh a wanderer hath no fixed goal for his search. She may well have sought secretly through Cornwall and England, through France and Normandy, even to my land of Par-menie, and, finding me not, she thinketh of me no more."

Thus his doubt of Iseult of Ireland, and the love shewn him by Iseult of the white hand, wrought on Tristan's heart, and vexed him day and night, till at last, for the friendship he bare to Kahedln, and for the sweetness and beauty of Iseult the maiden, he determined to wed her. So 10 the duke proclaimed a great feast, and the folk came from far and wide, and Iseult of the white hand and Tristan were made man and wife by the bishop of the land, in the Minster¹ at Karke. And yet, for the love which he bare to Iseult of Ireland, which might not be stilled, was she but his wife in name. Yet none but they two knew of it, and Iseult's doubts were laid at rest, for Tristan told her how he had made 20 a vow, many a year ago, should he ever wed, to leave his wife a maiden for a year.

Now Kahedln, Iseult's brother, had loved, from his youth up, a lady of the land, and she, too, loved him well; yet her 25 parents, against her will, had given her in marriage to another knight, the lord of Gamaroch, which lay near to the land of Arundel. And there, in his castle of 30 Gamaroch, did her husband keep her strictly guarded, for he knew well that she loved him not; nor would he go abroad save that he bare the keys of the castle with him.

Then Kahedln in his sorrow took counsel with Tristan, and Tristan bade him, if he could by any means win speech with his lady from without, to pray her to make 40 moulds in wax of the keys while her husband slept, and throw the moulds into the moated ditch below the castle wall. This she did, and with the aid of a cunning smith they made keys that would fit the locks.

So when next Nampotenis, for so was the knight called, rode abroad, and left his wife in guard, Kahedln and Tristan came secretly, and unlocked the castle gates, and entered. The lady received them with 50 much joy; but as they crossed the moat the wind loosened the circlet from Kahedln's helmet and it fell to the ground; but neither of the twain were ware of it.

Then Kahedln and his lady spake together through the hours of the night, and Tristan kept watch without till the dawning. With the morning light they rode away, and deemed that none knew of their coming.

But when Nampotenis came again in the morning, he beheld in the moat the circlet that had fallen from Kahedln's helmet, and knew well it was none of his or of his knights', and deemed that forsooth his 15 wife's lover had been with her. Then with stern words he bade her confess the truth, and because she greatly feared his wrath and cruelty she told him all; and Nampotenis forthwith called his men together, and pursued after the two knights, and overtook them in the forest.

They had no thought that they were pursued, and were taken at unawares, and ere they wist their foes were upon them. Nampotenis fell on Kahedln and ran 25 him through the body with his spear, so that he fell dead. But Tristan in wrath drew out his sword and ran upon Nampotenis and smote him dead, and put all his men to flight. Yet ere they fled had one of them smitten Tristan through the thigh with a poisoned spear. With great sorrow did Tristan bear his dead comrade back to Karke, and they buried him in the 35 minster.

Iseult of the white hand dressed Tristan's wound, and bade the leeches of the land do what they might to heal him, but nought that they might do was of any 40 avail, for the venom was so potent their skill might not prevail against it.

Then Tristan saw well how it stood with him, and he said to himself: "Now might I but send to my lady Iseult, methinks she 45 would cure me now, even as her mother did aforetime, otherwise must I die of this hurt." Then secretly he sent for Kurwenal, and prayed him to go with all speed to Tintagel and seek out Iseult the queen. "Bear with thee this ring, and shew it to her as a token from me, and say how that I lie, sorely wounded, and must needs die an she come not to mine aid. And if for love of me she will come, then I pray thee to set a white sail to the ship; but if she cometh not, then let the sail be black, for I shall know she loveth me no more."

Then Kurwenal departed, even as Tristan bade him, and came to Tintagel, and told Iseult the queen secretly all that Tristan had bade him say. She made ready in haste, and wrapped her in her veil, and stole to the harbour, and sailed away ere any might know of it.

Now Tristan bade them bear him day by day to the shore that he might watch for the ship from Cornwall till his weakness grew so great he might do so no longer; then he bade his wife, Iseult, watch from the window of his chamber and bear him tidings when Kurwenal should return.

But Iseult of the white hand had heard more secretly when her husband spake to Kurwenal, and her heart was hot within her for anger 'gainst the other Iseult, for she knew well who it was that Tristan loved. So when at last she spied the ship that bare Iseult the queen thither, she said to her husband: "Yonder cometh the ship wherein Kurwenal sailed hence."

"What manner of sail doth it bear?" spake Tristan.

"'Tis black as night," answered Iseult of the white hand, yet she lied, for the sail was white as snow.

Then Tristan spake no word, but turned his face to the wall, and said in his heart: "God keep thee, my love Iseult, for I shall look on thee no more," and with that he loosed his hold of the life he had held till then, and his soul departed.

Now the ship wherein was Iseult of Ireland drew nigh to the haven; and as they came to shore they heard the bells toll from the Minster and the chapels, and the voice of weeping and lamentation in the streets. "What meaneth this woe?" asked Iseult the queen, "and wherefore do ye toll the bells?" Then an old man answered, and said: "Fair lady, a great misfortune hath befallen our land. Tristan, the bravest of knights, he who drave out our enemies and restored our duke to his own, is but now dead. He hath died of a wound from a poisoned spear; but now have they borne his body to the Minster."

Then Iseult answered no word, but turned her on the way to the Minster, and went thither swiftly; and all looked upon her, and marvelled at her beauty and her woe. And when she came to the Minster Tristan lay dead on the bier, and beside him sat Iseult of the white hand. Then Iseult of Ireland looked upon her: "Why sittest thou here beside the dead, thou who hast slain him? Arise, and get thee hence!" And Iseult of the white hand arose and drew aside, for she feared the queen.

But Iseult of Ireland spake no word more, but laid her down on the bier by her lover, and put her arms around him, and sighed once, and her soul departed from her body.

Now tidings had been brought to King Mark how that Iseult the queen had fled with Kurwenal, and he took ship and pursued after her swiftly, but ere he came to shore at Arundel she lay dead beside Tristan. And there Kurwenal told Mark all that had chanced, and the secret of the love potion, and how it was by no will of their own but through the magic of the love drink that the twain had wronged him. And Mark spake, weeping: "Alas! Tristan, hadst thou but trusted in me, and told me all the truth, then had I given Iseult to thee for wife."

Then he bade them embalm the bodies, and he bare them back with him to Tintagel, and laid them in marble tombs on either side of the chapel wherein the kings of his line lay buried. And by the tomb of Tristan he bade them plant a rose-tree, and by that of Iseult a vine, and the two reached towards each other across the chapel, and wove branches and root so closely together that no man hereafter might separate them.

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE

This charming little romance, which is preserved in only one manuscript, enjoys at the present day greater popularity among English-speaking people than any other romance of its period. Various attempts have been made to discover the name of the author, but the past refuses to give up the secret. We can be sure that he was an old man, and he must have been a very wise and kind one, for he treats his lovers with a playful benevolence impossible to any but the most sophisticated. Even the father who breaks his pledge does not arouse his indignation.

The form, known as the chanle-fable, which consists of alternate sections of prose and poetry, both of which assist in furthering the progress of the plot, is apparently not paralleled in any other mediæval work. There are many that resemble it slightly, as for example the Consolation of Philosophy of Boëthius and the Vita Nuova of Dante; but the similarity is only external.

The present translation is by Andrew Lang.

THE SONG-STORY OF AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE

'Tis of Aucassin and Nicolette.

Who would list to the good lay Gladness¹ of the captive grey?
'Tis how two young lovers met,
Aucassin and Nicolette,
Of the pains the lover bore
And the sorrows he outwore,
For the goodness and the grace
Of his love, so fair of face.

• Sweet the song, the story sweet,
There is no man hearkens it,
No man living 'neath the sun,
So outwearied, so foredone,
Sick and woful, worn and sad,
But is healèd, but is glad
'Tis so sweet.

So say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

How the Count Bougars de Valence made war on Count Garin de Biaucaire, war so great, and so marvellous, and so mortal that never a day dawned but alway he was there, by the gates and walls, and barriers of the town with a hundred knights, and ten thousand men at arms, horsemen and footmen: so burned he the Count's land, and spoiled his country, and slew his men. Now the Count Garin de Biaucaire was old and frail, and his good days were gone over. No heir had he, neither son nor daughter, save one young man only; such an one as I shall tell you.

Aucassin was the name of the damoiseau²:
fair was he, goodly, and great, and featly 5 fashioned of his body, and limbs. His hair was yellow, in little curls, his eyes blue and laughing, his face beautiful and shapely, his nose high and well set, and so richly seen was he in all things good, that 10 in him was none evil at all. But so suddenly overtaken was he of Love, who is a great master, that he would not, of his will, be dubbed knight, nor take arms, nor follow tournaments, nor do whatsoever him 15 beseeemed. Therefore his father and mother said to him:

"Son, go take thine arms, mount thy horse, and hold thy land, and help thy men, for if they see thee among them, 20 more stoutly will they keep in battle their lives, and lands, and thine, and mine."

"Father," said Aucassin, "I marvel that you will be speaking. Never may God give me aught of my desire if I be 25 made knight, or mount my horse, or face stour³ and battle wherein knights smite and are smitten again, unless thou give me Nicolette, my true love, that I love so
well."

"Son," said the father, "this may not be. Let Nicolette go, a slave girl she is, out of a strange land, and the captain of this town bought her of the Saracens, and carried her hither, and hath reared her and let christen the maid, and took her for his daughter in God, and one day will find a young man for her, to win her bread honourably. Herein hast thou nought to make or mend, but if a wife thou wilt have, I will give thee the daughter of a King, or a Count. There is no man so rich in France, but if thou desire his daughter, thou shalt have her."

"Faith! my father," said Aucassin, "tell me where is the place so high in all the world, that Nicolette, my sweet lady and love, would not grace it well? If she were Empress of Constantinople or of Germany, or Queen of France or England, it were little enough for her; so gentle is she and courteous, and debonaire, and compact of all good qualities."

Here singeth one:

Aucassin was of Biaucaire
Of a goodly castle there,
But from Nicolette the fair
None might win his heart away,
Though his father, many a day,
And his mother said him nay.
"Ha! fond child, what wouldest thou?
Nicolette is glad enow!
Was from Carthage cast away,
Paynims¹ sold her on a day!
Wouldst thou win a lady fair,
Choose a maid of high degree;
Such an one is meet for thee."
"Nay of these I have no care,
Nicolette is debonaire.
Her body sweet and the face of her
Take my heart as in a snare,
Loyal love is but her share
That is so sweet."

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When the Count Garin de Biaucaire knew that he would not avail to withdraw Aucassin his son from the love of Nicolette, he went to the Captain of the city, who was his man, and spake to him saying:

"Sir Count: away with Nicolette thy daughter in God; cursed be the land whence she was brought into this country, for by reason of her do I lose Aucassin, that will neither be dubbed knight, nor do aught of the things that fall to him to be done. And wit ye well," he said, "that, if I might have her at my will, I would burn her in a fire, and yourself might well be sore adread."

"Sir," said the Captain, "this is grievous to me that he comes and goes and hath speech with her. I had bought the maiden at mine own charges, and nourished her, and baptized, and made her my daughter in God. Yea, I would have given her to a young man that should win her bread honourably. With this had Aucassin thy son naught to make or mend. But, sith it is thy will and thy pleasure, I will send her into that land and that country where never will he see her with his eyes."

"Have a heed to thyself," said the Count Garin, "thence might great evil come on thee."

So parted they from each other. Now the Captain was a right rich man: so had he a rich palace with a garden in face of it; in an upper chamber thereof he let place Nicolette with one old woman to keep her company, and in that chamber put bread and meat and wine and such things as were needful. Then he let seal the door, that none might come in or go forth, save that there was one window, over against the garden, and strait enough, where through came to them a little air.

Here singeth one:

Nicolette as ye heard tell Prisoned is within a cell
That is painted wondrously
With colours of a far countrie,
And the window of marble wrought,
There the maiden stood in thought,
With straight brows and yellow hair
Never saw ye fairer fair!
On the wood she gazed below,
And she saw the roses blow,
Heard the birds sing loud and low,
Therefore spoke she wofully:
"Ah me, wherefore do I lie
Here in prison wrongfully:
Aucassin, my love, my knight,
Am I not thy heart's delight,
Thou that lovest me aright!
'Tis for thee that I must dwell
In the vaulted chamber cell,
Hard beset and all alone!
By our Lady Mary's Son
Here no longer will I wonn,²
If I may flee!"

¹ Infidels.

² Dwell.

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette was in prison, as ye have heard soothly, in the chamber. And the noise and bruit ¹ of it went through all the country and all the land, how that Nicolette was lost. Some said she had fled the country, and some that the Count Garin de Biaucaire had let slay her. Whosoever ¹⁰ had joy thereof, Aucassin had none, so he went to the Captain of the town and spoke to him, saying:

"Sir Captain, what hast thou made of Nicolette, my sweet lady and love, the thing that best I love in all the world? Hast thou carried her off or ravished her away from me? Know well that if I die of it, the price shall be demanded of thee, and that will be well done, for it shall be ²⁰ even as if thou hadst slain me with thy two hands, for thou hast taken from me the thing that in this world I loved the best."

"Fair Sir," said the Captain, "let these things be. Nicolette is a captive that I did ²⁵ bring from a strange country. Yea, I bought her at my own charges of the Saracens, and I bred her up and baptized her, and made her my daughter in God. And I have cherished her, and one of these ³⁰ days I would have given her a young man, to win her bread honourably. With this thou hast naught to make, but do thou take the daughter of a King or a Count. Nay more, what wouldst thou deem thee ³⁵ to have gained, hadst thou made her thy leman, and taken her to thy bed? Plentiful lack of comfort hadst thou got thereby, for in Hell would thy soul have lain while the world endures, and into Paradise ⁴⁰ wouldst thou have entered never."

"In Paradise what have I to win? Therein I seek not to enter, but only to have Nicolette, my sweet lady that I love so well. For into Paradise go none but ⁴⁵ such folk as I shall tell thee now. Thither go these same old priests, and halt old men and maimed, who all day and night cower continually before the altars, and in the crypts; and such folk as wear old amices ⁵⁰ and old clouted frocks, and naked folk and shoeless, and covered with sores, perishing of hunger and thirst, and of cold, and of little ease. These be they that go ⁵ into Paradise, with them have I naught to make. But into Hell would I fain go; for into Hell fare the goodly clerks, and goodly knights that fall in tourneys and great wars, and stout men at arms, and all ¹⁰ men noble. With these would I liefly ³ go. And thither pass the sweet ladies and courteous that have two lovers, or three, and their lords also thereto. Thither goes the gold, and the silver, and cloth of vair, ¹⁵ and cloth of gris, ⁸ and harpers, and makers, and the prince of this world. With these I would gladly go, let me but have with me Nicolette, my sweetest lady."

"Certes," quoth the Captain, "in vain wilt thou speak thereof, for never shalt thou see her; and if thou hadst word with her, and thy father knew it, he would let burn in a fire both her and me, and thyself might well be sore adread."

"That is even what irketh me," quoth Aucassin. So he went from the Captain sorrowing.

Here singeth one:

Aucassin did so depart
Much in dole and heavy at heart
For his love so bright and dear,
None might bring him any cheer,
None might give good words to hear.
To the palace doth he fare,
Climbeth up the palace-stair,
Passeth to a chamber there,
Thus great sorrow doth he bear,
For his lady and love so fair.
"Nicolette, how fair art thou,
Sweet thy foot-fall, sweet thine eyes,
Sweet the mirth of thy replies,
Sweet thy laughter, sweet thy face,
Sweet thy lips and sweet thy brow,
And the touch of thine embrace.
All for thee I sorrow now,
Captive in an evil place,
Whence I ne'er may go my ways,
Sister, sweet friend!"

As Aucassin sat sorrowing in his chamber, his father came to him and reproached him for his inactivity. Aucassin offered to take up arms against the invader, provided he receive Nicolette as a reward. When this request was refused, he offered to fight if he could only be granted an interview with her. His father agreed to this arrangement and Aucassin went out to fight. In spite of his lover-like abstraction, he fought successfully and brought the Count Bougars as captive to his father. Much to his surprise, however, the bargain was repudiated and, when he insisted upon his right to see Nicolette, he was thrown into a dungeon.

Aucassin was cast into prison as ye have heard tell, and Nicolette, in another place, was in a chamber. Now it was summer time, the month of May, when days are warm, and long, and clear, and the night still and serene. Nicolette lay one night on her bed, and saw the moon shine clear through a window, yea, and heard the nightingale sing in the garden, so she minded her of 20 Aucassin her lover whom she loved so well. Then fell she to thoughts of Count Garin de Biaucaire, that hated her to the death; therefore deemed she that there she would no longer abide, for that, if she were told 25 of, and the Count knew whereas she lay, an ill death would he make her die. Now she knew that the old woman slept who held her company. Then she arose, and clad her in a mantle of silk she had by her, very 30 goodly, and took napkins, and sheets of the bed, and knotted one to the other, and made therewith a cord as long as she might, so knitted it to a pillar in the window, and let herself slip down into the 35 garden, then caught up her raiment in both hands, behind and before, and kilted up her kirtle, because of dew that she saw lying deep on the grass, and so went her way down through the garden.

•Her locks were yellow and curled, her eyes blue and smiling, her face featly fashioned, the nose high and fairly set, the lips more red than cherry or rose in time of summer, her teeth white and small; her 45 breasts so firm that they bore up the folds of her bodice as they had been two apples; so slim she was in the waist that your two hands might have clipped her, and the daisy flowers that brake beneath her as 50 she went tip-toe, and that bent above her instep, seemed black against her feet, so white was the maiden. She came to the postern gate,¹ and unbarred it, and went out through the streets of Biaucaire, keeping always on the shadowy side, for the moon was shining right clear, and so wandered she till she came to the tower where her lover lay. The tower was flanked with buttresses, and she cowered under one of them, wrapped in her mantle. 10 Then thrust she her head through a crevice of the tower that was old and worn, and so heard she Aucassin wailing within, and making dole and lament for the sweet lady he loved so well. And when she had listened to him she began to say:

Here one singeth:

Nicolette the bright of brow,
On a pillar leanest thou,
All Aucassin's wail dost hear
For his love that is so dear,
Then thou spakest, shrill and clear,
"Gentle knight withouten fear
Little good befalleth thee,
Little help of sigh or tear,
Ne'er shalt thou have joy of me.
Never shalt thou win me; still Am I held in evil will
Of thy father and thy kin,
Therefore must I cross the sea,
And another land must win."
Then she cut her curls of gold,
Cast them in the dungeon hold.
Aucassin doth clasp them there,
Kissed the curls that were so fair,
Them doth in his bosom bear,
Then he wept, even as of old,
All for his love!

Then say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

40 When Aucassin heard Nicolette say that she would pass into a far country, he was all in wrath.

"Fair sweet friend," quoth he, "thou shalt not go, for then wouldst thou be my death. And the first man that saw thee, and had the might withal, would take thee straightway into his bed to be his leman. And once thou camest into a man's bed and that bed not mine, wit ye well that 50 I would not tarry till I had found a knife to pierce my heart and slay myself. Nay, verily, wait so long I would not; but would hurl myself on it so soon as I could find a wall, or a black stone, thereon would I dash my head so mightily, that the eyes would start, and my brain burst. Rather would I die even such a death, than know thou hadst lain in a man's bed, and that bed not mine."

"Aucassin," she said, "I trow thou lovest me not as much as thou sayest, but I love thee more than thou lovest me."

"Ah, fair sweet friend," said Aucassin, "it may not be that thou shouldst love me even as I love thee. Woman may not love man as man loves woman, for a woman's love lies in the glance of her eye, and the bud of her breast, and her foot's tip-toe, but the love of man is in his heart planted, whence it can never issue forth and pass away."

Now while Aucassin and Nicolette held this parley together, the town's guards came down a street, with swords drawn beneath their cloaks, for the Count Garin had charged them that if they could take her they should slay her. But the sentinel that was on the tower saw them coming, and heard them speaking of Nicolette as they went, and threatening to slay her.

"God!" quoth he, "this were great pity to slay so fair a maid! Right great charity it were if I could say aught to her, and they perceive it not, and she should be on her guard against them, for if they slay her, then were Aucassin, my damoiseau, dead, and that were great pity."

Here one singeth:

Valiant was the sentinel,
Courteous, kind, and practiced well,
So a song did sing and tell
Of the peril that befell.
"Maiden fair that lingerest here,
Gentle maid of merry cheer,
Hair of gold, and eyes as clear
As the water in a mere,
Thou, meseems, hast spoken word
To thy lover and thy lord,
That would die for thee, his dear;
Now beware the ill accord,
Of the cloaked men of the sword,
These have sworn and keep their word,
They will put thee to the sword
Save thou take heed!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

"Ha!" quoth Nicolette, "be the soul of thy father and the soul of thy mother in the rest of Paradise, so fairly and so courteously hast thou spoken me! Please God, I will be right ware of them, God keep me out of their hands."

So she shrank under her mantle into the shadow of the pillar till they had passed by, and then took she farewell of Aucassin, and so fared till she came unto the castle wall. Now that wall was wasted and broken, and some deal mended, so she clomb thereon till she came between wall and fosse, and so looked down, and saw that the fosse was deep and steep, whereat she was sore adread.

"Ah, God," saith she, "sweet Saviour! If I let myself fall hence, I shall break my neck, and, if here I abide, to-morrow they will take me and burn me in a fire. Yet liefer would I perish here than that to-morrow the folk should stare on me for a gazing-stock."

Then she crossed herself, and so let herself slip into the fosse, and when she had come to the bottom, her fair feet, and fair hands that had not custom thereof, were bruised and frayed, and the blood springing from a dozen places, yet felt she no pain nor hurt, by reason of the great dread wherein she went. But if she were in cumber¹ to win there, in worse was she to win out. But she deemed that there to abide was of none avail, and she found a pike sharpened, that they of the city had thrown out to keep the hold. Therewith made she one stepping place after another, till, with much travail, she climbed the wall. Now the forest lay within two cross-bow shots, and the forest was of thirty leagues this way and that. Therein also were wild beasts, and beasts serpentine, and she feared that if she entered there they would slay her. But anon she deemed that if men found her there they would hale her back into the town to burn her.

Here one singeth:

Nicolette, the fair of face,
Climbed upon the coping stone,

There made she lament and moan
 Calling on our Lord alone
 For his mercy and his grace.
 "Father, king of Majesty,
 Listen, for I nothing know
 Where to flee or whither go.
 If within the wood I fare,
 Lo, the wolves will slay me there,
 Boars and lions terrible,
 Many in the wild wood dwell,
 But if I abide the day,
 Surely worse will come of it,
 Surely will the fire be lit
 That shall burn my body away.
 Jesus, lord of Majesty,
 Better seemeth it to me,
 That within the wood I fare,
 Though the wolves devour me there,
 Than within the town to go,
 Ne'er be it so!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette made great moan, as ye have heard; then commended she herself to God, and anon fared till she came unto the forest. But to go deep in it she dared not, by reason of the wild beasts, and beasts serpentine. Anon crept she into a little thicket, where sleep came upon her, and she slept till prime next day, when the shepherds issued forth from the town and drove their bestial between wood and water. Anon came they all into one place by a fair fountain which was on the fringe of the forest, thereby spread they a mantle, and thereon set bread. So while they were eating, Nicolette wakened, with the sound of the singing birds, and the shepherds, and she went unto them, saying, "Fair
 boys, our Lord keep you!"

"God bless thee," quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest.

"Fair boys," quoth she, "know ye Aucassin, the son of Count Garin de Biaucaire?"

"Yea, well we know him."

"So may God help you, fair boys," quoth she, "tell him there is a beast in this forest, and bid him come chase it, and if he can take it, he would not give one limb thereof for a hundred marks of gold, nay, nor for five hundred, nor for any ransom."

¹ About 1/12 of a sou.

Then looked they on her, and saw her so fair that they were all astonished.

"Will I tell him thereof?" quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the 5 rest; "foul fall him who speaks of the thing or tells him the tidings. These are but visions ye tell of, for there is no beast so great in this forest, stag, nor lion, nor boar, that one of his limbs is worth more 10 than two deniers,¹ or three at the most,
 and ye speak of such great ransom. Foul fall him that believes your word, and him that telleth Aucassin. Ye be a Fairy, and we have none liking for your company, 15 nay, hold on your road."

"Nay, fair boys," quoth she, "nay, ye will do my bidding. For this beast is so mighty of medicine that thereby will Aucassin be healed of his torment. And 20 lo! I have five sols² in my purse, take them, and tell him: for within three days must he come hunting it hither, and, if within three days he find it not, never will he be healed of his torment."

"My faith," quoth he, "the money will we take, and if he come hither we will tell him, but seek him we will not."

"In God's name," quoth she; and so took farewell of the shepherds, and went 30 her way.

Here one singeth:

Nicolette the bright of brow
 From the shepherds doth she pass
 All below the blossomed bough
 Where an ancient way there was,
 Overgrown and choked with grass,
 Till she found the cross-roads where Seven paths do all way fare,
 Then she deemeth she will try,
 Should her lover pass thereby,
 If he love her loyally.
 So she gathered white lilies,
 Oak-leaf, that in green wood is,
 Leaves of many a branch I wis,
 Therewith built a lodge of green,
 Goodlier was never seen,
 Swore by God who may not lie,
 "If my love the lodge should spy,
 He will rest awhile thereby
 If he love me loyally."
 Thus his faith she deemed to try,
 "Or I love him not, not I, Nor he loves me!"

² Sous.

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette built her lodge, of boughs, as ye have heard, right fair and feteously, and wove it well, within and without, of flowers and leaves. So lay she hard by the lodge in a deep coppice to know what Aucassin will do. And the cry and the bruit went abroad through all the country and all the land, that Nicolette was lost. Some told that she had fled, and some that the Count Garin had let slay her. Whosoever had joy thereof, no joy had Aucassin. And the Count Garin, his father, had taken him out of prison, and had sent for the knights of that land, and the ladies, and let make a right great feast, for the comforting of Aucassin his son. Now at the high time of the feast, was Aucassin leaning from the gallery, all woful and discomfited. Whatsoever men might devise of mirth, Aucassin had no joy thereof, nor no desire, for he saw not her that he loved. Then a knight looked on him, and came to him, and said:

"Aucassin, of that sickness of thine have I been sick, and good counsel will I give thee, if thou wilt hearken to me —"

"Sir," said Aucassin, "gramercy, good counsel would I fain hear."

"Mount thy horse," quoth he, "and go take thy pastime in yonder forest, there wilt thou see the good flowers and grass, and hear the sweet birds sing. Perchance thou shalt hear some word, whereby thou shalt be the better."

"Sir," quoth Aucassin, "gramercy, that will I do."

He passed out of the hall, and went down the stairs, and came to the stable where his horse was. He let saddle and bridle him, and mounted, and rode forth from the castle, and wandered till he came to the forest, so rode till he came to the fountain and found the shepherds at point of noon. And they had a mantle stretched on the grass, and were eating bread, and making great joy.

Here singeth one:

There were gathered shepherds all,
Martin, Esmeric, and Hal,

Aubrey, Robin, great and small.
Saith the one, "Good fellows all,
God keep Aucassin the fair,
And the maid with yellow hair,
Bright of brow and eyes of vair,
She that gave us gold to ware,
Cakes therewith to buy ye know,
Goodly knives and sheaths also,
Flutes to play, and pipes to blow,
May God him heal!"

* * *

The night was fair and still, and so long he went that he came to the lodge of boughs, that Nicolette had builded and woven within and without, over and under, with flowers, and it was the fairest lodge that might be seen. When Aucassin was ware of it, he stopped suddenly, and the light of the moon fell therein.

"God!" quoth Aucassin, "here was Nicolette, my sweet lady, and this lodge builded she with her fair hands. For the sweetness of it, and for love of her, will I alight, and rest here this night long."

He drew forth his foot from the stirrup to alight, and the steed was great and tall. He dreamed so much on Nicolette his right sweet lady, that he slipped on a stone, and drave his shoulder out of its place. Then knew he that he was hurt sore, nathless he bore him with what force he might, and fastened with the other hand the mare's son to a thorn. Then turned he on his side, and crept backwise into the lodge of boughs. And he looked through a gap in the lodge and saw the stars in heaven, and one that was brighter than the rest; so began he to say:

Here one singeth:

"Star, that I from far behold,
Star, the Moon calls to her fold,
Nicolette with thee doth dwell,
My sweet love with locks of gold,
God would have her dwell afar,
Dwell with him for evening star.
Would to God, whate'er befell,
Would that with her I might dwell.
I would clip her close and strait,
Nay, were I of much estate,
Some king's son desirable,
Worthy she to be my mate,
Me to kiss and clip me well,
Sister, sweet friend!"

So speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Nicolette heard Aucassin, right so came she unto him, for she was not far away. She passed within the lodge, and threw her arms about his neck, and clipped¹ and kissed him.

"Fair sweet friend, welcome be thou."

"And thou, fair sweet love, be thou welcome."

So either kissed and clipped the other,
and fair joy was them between.

"Ha! sweet love," quoth Aucassin,
"but now was I sore hurt, and my shoulder wried, but I take no force of it, nor have no hurt therefrom since I have thee."

Right so felt she his shoulder and found it was wried from its place. And she so handled it with her white hands, and so wrought in her surgery, that, by God's will who loveth lovers, it went back into its place. Then took she flowers, and fresh grass, and leaves green, and bound these herbs on the hurt with a strip of her smock, and he was all healed.

"Aucassin," saith she, "fair sweet love, take counsel what thou wilt do. If thy father let search this forest to-morrow, and men find me here, they will slay me, come to thee what will."

5 "Certes, fair sweet love, therefore should I sorrow heavily, but, an if I may, never shall they take thee."

Anon gat he on his horse, and his lady before him, kissing and clipping her, and so rode they at adventure.

Here one singeth:

Aucassin the frank, the fair,
Aucassin of the yellow hair,
Gentle knight, and true lover,
From the forest doth he fare,
Holds his love before him there,
Kissing cheek, and chin, and eyes,
But she spaké in sober wise,
"Aucassin, true love and fair,
To what land do we repair?"
"Sweet my love, I take no care, Thou art with me everywhere!"
So they pass the woods and downs,
Pass the villages and towns,
Hills and dales and open land,
Came at dawn to the sea sand,
Lighted down upon the strand,
Beside the sea.

TALES

ORIENTAL

THE THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS

The Thousand and One Nights is a collection of stories in the Arabic language which comes, in approximately its present form, from the middle of the tenth century. When it is first heard of, however, it is already a compilation of stories of various origins — Egyptian, Persian, Arabian, etc. — some of which undoubtedly come from remote antiquity. The stories are set in a framework, as are the stories of the Canterbury Tales, the Decameron, the Seven Wise Masters, and others. The tradition is that a certain Persian king was accustomed to marry a woman on one day and kill her the next. A beautiful princess named Sharazad (Scheherazade), who was married to the king, saved her life by a clever plan. On her wedding night she began a story of such great interest that the king was determined to hear the end. She left the story unfinished, promising the remainder on the next night. She kept this plan going for a thousand and one nights, and by that time the king had become so attached to her that he spared her life.

The Thousand and One Nights is significant in European literary history because it provides the originals of certain Oriental tales which have been incorporated into Western literature. Since their first translation (the French translation by Galland was made 1704-1712), they have been enjoyed almost as much as any piece of European origin. The story of Sinbad the Sailor is a travel yarn which occupies in Oriental literature a place analogous to that of St. Brandon in Europe. The adventure printed in this volume tells of Sinbad's visit to the Earthly Paradise, an imaginary Happy Land that has caught the imagination of many writers from Homer to William Morris.

This selection is from Fairy Tales from the Arabian Nights, Everyman's, 1907.

THE SECOND VOYAGE OF SINBAD THE SAILOR

I designed, after my first voyage, to spend the rest of my days at Bagdad; but it was not long ere I grew weary of a quiet life. My inclination to trade revived. I bought goods suited to the commerce I intended, and put to sea a second time, with merchants of known probity. We embarked on board a good ship, and, after recommending ourselves to God, set sail. We traded from island to island, and exchanged commodities with great profit. One day we landed on an island covered with several sorts of fruit trees, but so unpeopled, that we could see neither man nor beast upon it. We went to take a little fresh air in the meadows, and along the streams that watered them. Whilst some diverted themselves with gathering flowers, and others with gathering fruits, I took my wine and provisions and sat down by a stream betwixt two great trees, which formed a curious shape. I made a very good meal, and afterwards fell asleep. I cannot tell how long I slept, but when I awoke the ship was gone.

I was very much surprised to find the ship gone. I got up and looked about everywhere, and could not see one of the merchants who landed with me. At last I perceived the ship under sail, but at such a distance that I lost sight of her in a very little time.

I leave you to guess at my melancholy reflections in this sad condition. I was ready to die with grief: I cried out sadly, beat my head and breast, and threw myself down upon the ground, where I lay some time in a terrible agony. I upbraided myself a hundred times for not being content with the produce of my first voyage, that might well have served me all my life.

But all this was in vain, and my repentance out of season.

At last I resigned myself to the will of God; and not knowing what to do, I climbed up to the top of a great tree, from whence I looked about on all sides to see if there was anything that could give me hope. When I looked towards the sea, I could see nothing but sky and water, but looking towards the land I saw something white; and, coming down from the tree, I took up what provision I had left and went towards it, the distance being so great that I could not distinguish what it was.

When I came nearer, I thought it to be a white bowl of a prodigious height and bigness; and when I came up to it I touched it, and found it to be very smooth. I went around to see if it was open on any side, but saw it was not, and that there was no climbing up to the top of it, it was so smooth. It was at least fifty paces round.

By this time the sun was ready to set, and all of a sudden the sky became as dark as if it had been covered with a thick cloud. I was much astonished at this sudden darkness, but much more when I found it was occasioned by a bird, of a monstrous size, that came flying toward me. I remember a fowl, called roc, that I had often heard mariners speak of, and conceived that the great bowl, which I so much admired, must needs be its egg. In short, the bird lighted, and sat over the egg to hatch it. As I perceived her coming, I crept close to the egg, so that I had before me one of the legs of the bird, which was as big as the trunk of a tree. I tied myself strongly to it with the cloth that went round my turban, in hopes that when the roc flew away next morning she would carry me with her out of this desert island. And, after having passed the night in this condition, the bird really flew away next morning, as soon as it was day, and carried me so high that I could not see the earth. Then she descended all of a sudden, with so much rapidity that I lost my senses; but when the roc was settled, and I found myself upon the ground, I speedily untied the knot, and had scarcely done so when the bird, having taken up a serpent of a monstrous length in her bill, flew away.

The place where she left me was a very deep valley, encompassed on all sides with mountains, so high that they seemed to reach above the clouds, and so full of steep rocks that there was no possibility of getting out of the valley. This was a new perplexity, so that when I compared this place with the desert island from which the roc brought me, I found that I had gained nothing by the change.

As I walked through this valley I perceived it was strewn with diamonds, some of which were of surprising bigness. I took a great deal of pleasure in looking at them; but speedily I saw at a distance such objects as very much diminished my satisfaction, and which I could not look upon without terror; they were a great number of serpents, so big and so long that the least of them was capable of swallowing an elephant. They retired in the day-time to their dens, where they hid themselves from the roc, their enemy, and did not come out but in the night-time.

I spent the day in walking about the valley, resting myself at times in such places as I thought most suitable. When night came on I went into a cave, where I thought I might be in safety. I stopped the mouth of it, which was low and straight, with a great stone, to preserve me from the serpents, but not so exactly fitted as to hinder light from coming in. I supped on part of my provisions, but the serpents, which began to appear, hissing about in the meantime, put me into such extreme fear that you may easily imagine I did not sleep. When day appeared the serpents retired, and I came out of the cave trembling. I can justly say that I walked a long time upon diamonds without feeling an inclination to touch any of them. At last I sat down, and notwithstanding my uneasiness, not having shut my eyes during the night, I fell asleep, after having eaten a little more of my provisions; but I had scarcely shut my eyes, when something that fell by me with great noise awakened me. This was a great piece of fresh meat, and at the same time I saw several others fall down from the rocks in different places.

I had always looked upon it as a fable when I heard mariners and others discourse of the valley of diamonds, and of the stratagems made use of by some merchants to get jewels from thence; but now I found it to be true. For, in reality, those merchants come to the neighbourhood of this valley when the eagles have young ones, and, throwing great joints of meat into the valley, the diamonds, upon whose points they fall, stick to them; the eagles, which are stronger in this country than anywhere else, pounce with great force upon those pieces of meat, and carry them to their nests upon the top of the rocks to feed their young with, at which time the merchants, running to their nests, frighten the eagles by their noise, and take the diamonds that stick to the meat. And this stratagem they make use of to get the diamonds out of the valley, which is surrounded with such precipices that nobody can enter it.

I believed till then that it was not possible for me to get out of this abyss, which I looked upon as my grave; but now I changed my mind, for the falling in of those pieces of meat put me in hopes of a way of saving my life.

I began to gather together the largest diamonds that I could see, and put them into the leather bag in which I used to carry my provisions. I afterwards took the largest piece of meat I could find, tied it close round me with the cloth of my turban, and then laid myself upon the ground, with my face downward, the bag of diamonds being tied fast to my girdle, so that it could not possibly drop off.

I had scarcely laid me down before the eagles came. Each of them seized a piece of meat, and one of the strongest having taken me up, with a piece of meat on my back, carried me to his nest on the top of the mountain. The merchants fell straightway to shouting, to frighten the eagles; and, when they had obliged them to quit their prey, one of them came to the nest where I was. He was very much afraid when he saw me, but, recovering himself, instead of inquiring how I came thither, he began to quarrel with me, and asked why I stole his goods. "You will treat me," replied I, "with more civility when you know me better. Do not trouble yourself; I have diamonds enough for you and myself too, more than all the other merchants together. If they have any, it is by chance; but I chose myself in the bottom of the valley all those which you see in this bag"; and, having spoken those words, I showed them to him. I had scarcely done speaking, when the other merchants came trooping about us, much astonished to see me; but they were much more surprised when I told them my story. Yet they did not so much admire my stratagem to save myself as my courage to attempt it.

They took me to the place where they were staying all together, and there, having opened my bag, they were surprised at the largeness of my diamonds, and confessed that in all the courts where they had been they had never seen any that came near them. I prayed the merchant to whom the nest belonged (for every merchant had his own) to take as many for his share as he pleased. He contented himself with one, and that too the least of them; and when I pressed him to take more, without fear of doing me any injury, "No," said he, "I am very well satisfied with this, which is valuable enough to save me the trouble of making any more voyages to raise as great a fortune as I desire."

I spent the night with those merchants, to whom I told my story a second time, for the satisfaction of those who had not heard it. I could not moderate my joy when I found myself delivered from the danger I have mentioned. I thought I was in a dream, and could scarcely believe myself to be out of danger.

The merchants had thrown their pieces of meat into the valley for several days, and, each of them being satisfied with the diamonds that had fallen to his lot, we left the place next morning all together, and traveled near high mountains, where there were serpents of a prodigious length, which we had the good fortune to escape. We took ship at the nearest port and came to the Isle of Roha, where the trees grow that yield camphor.

Here I exchanged some of my diamonds for good merchandise. From thence we went to other isles, and at last, having touched at several trading towns of the main land, we landed at Balsora, from whence I went to Bagdad. There I immediately gave great alms to the poor, and lived honourably upon the vast riches I had gained with so much fatigue.

ITALIAN BOCCACCIO

Although he cannot be compared with Dante for elevation and dignity nor with Petrarch for elegance, Giovanni Boccaccio deserves a high place for his contributions to Italian prose. He was born in a small Tuscan town, the son of a Florentine merchant. Neither business nor law appealed to the young Boccaccio. His chief delight was in poetry and in the study of the ancients. He fixed his residence at Naples and gave himself up to literature and study. In 1341 he assisted in the examination preceding the public coronation of Petrarch, and the two became very close friends. During his earlier years Boccaccio became enamored of a lady of noble family, possibly the daughter of King Robert of Sicily, whom he celebrated in his writings as Fiammetta. It was largely for her amusement that he composed that famous collection of stories known as the Decameron. In 1350 he returned to Florence and devoted himself to public services and the advancement of letters. He assumed the habit in 1361 and died in 1375. As a scholar he is famous as a commentator upon Dante, as a compiler of ancient traditions, as a student of Greek, and as a transcriber of Latin manuscripts. As an author he is memorable chiefly for the Teseide, an epic poem dealing with the career of Theseus, which forms the basis for Chaucer's Knight's Tale; the Filocolo, a modernized version of the mediæval romance Florice and Blancheflour; the Filostrato, used by Chaucer as the basis for his Troilus and Criseyde; and the famous Decameron.

The Decameron was written sometime about the middle of the fourteenth century. During the plague of 1348 a party of cavaliers and ladies, ten in number, retired to a pleasant part of the country for safety. In order that the time might pass more quickly, each person told a story each day for ten days. These hundred stories are of every imaginable kind, and are introduced by a vivid description of the plague in all its terrors. The contrast between the horror without and the courtly care-free life of the story-tellers within never quite leaves the reader's consciousness. The work illustrates Boccaccio's remarkable discrimination in selection; it contains the best there is in the domain of mediæval story; and it is a masterpiece in grace and beauty of prose style. The Decameron established a type of fiction known as the novella, a short narrative which, realistic in setting and detail and romantic in general effect, foreshadowed the novel.

The translation here given is based on that published, with an introduction by Thomas Wright, by Chatto & Windus, London.

THE DECAMERON

THE TALE OF THE FALCON

There dwelt at Florence a young gentleman named Federigo, son of Filippo Alberighi, who in feats of arms and gentility surpassed all the youth in Tuscany: this gentleman was in love with a lady called Madame Giovanna, one of the most agreeable women in Florence, and, to gain her affection, he used to be continually making tilts, balls, and such diversions; lavishing away his money in rich presents, and everything that was extravagant. But she, as just and reputable as she was fair, made no account either of what he did for her sake, or of himself. Living in this manner, his wealth soon began to waste, till at last he had nothing left but a very small farm, the income of which was a most slender maintenance, and a single hawk, one of the best in the world. Yet loving still more than ever, and finding that he could subsist no longer in the city in the manner he would choose to live, he retired to his farm, where he went out a-fowling as often as the weather would permit, and bore his distress patiently, and without ever making his necessity known to anybody. Now, one day it happened that, as he was reduced to the last extremity, the husband of this lady chanced to fall sick, who, being very rich, left all his substance to an only son, who was almost grown up, and, if the son should die without issue, he then ordered that it should revert to his lady, whom he was extremely fond of; and, when he had disposed thus of his fortune, he died. She now, being left a widow, retired, as our ladies usually do during the summer season, to a house of hers in the country, near to that of Federigo: whence it happened that her son soon became acquainted with him, and they used to divert themselves together with dogs and hawks; when he, having often seen Federigo's hawk fly, and being strangely taken with it, was desirous of having it, though the other valued it to that degree, that the youth knew not how to ask for it. This being so, the young spark soon fell sick, which gave his mother great concern, as he was her only child: and she ceased not to attend on and comfort him, often requesting, if there was any particular thing which he fancied, to let her know it, and promising to procure it for him if it were possible. The young gentleman, after many offers of this kind, at last said, "Madam, if you could contrive for me to have Federigo's hawk, I should soon be well." She was in some suspense at this, and began to consider how best to act. She knew that Federigo had long entertained a liking for her, without the least encouragement on her part; therefore she said to herself, "How can I send or go to ask for this hawk, which I hear is the very best of its kind, and which alone maintains him in the world? Or how can I offer to take away from a gentleman all the pleasure that he has in life?" Being in this perplexity, though she was very sure of having it for a word, she stood without making any reply, till at last the love of her son so far prevailed, that she resolved at all events to make him easy, and not send, but go herself, to bring it. She then replied, "Son, set your heart at rest, and think only of your recovery, for I promise you that I will go to-morrow for it the first thing I do." This afforded him such joy, that he immediately showed signs of amendment. The next morning she went, by way of a walk, with another lady in company, to his little cottage to inquire for him. At that time, as it was too early to go out upon his diversion, he was at work in his garden. Hearing, therefore, that his mistress inquired for him at the door, he ran thither, surprised and full of joy; whilst she, with a great deal of complaisance, went to meet him; and after the usual compliments, she said, "Good morning to you, sir; I am come to make you some amends for what you have formerly done on my account; what I mean is, that I have brought a companion to take a neighbourly dinner with you to-day." He replied, with a great deal of humility, "Madam, I do not remember ever to have received any harm by your means, but rather so much good that, if I was worth anything at any time, it was due to your singular merit, and the love I had for you: and most assuredly this courteous visit is more welcome to me than if I had all that I have wasted returned to me to spend over again; but you are come to a very poor host." With these words he shewed her into his house, seeming much out of countenance, and from thence they went into the garden, when, having no company for her, he said, "Madam, as I have nobody else, please to admit this honest woman, a labourer's wife, to be with you, whilst I set forth the table." He, although his poverty was extreme, was never so sensible of his having been extravagant as now; but finding nothing to entertain the lady with, for whose sake he had treated thousands, he was in the utmost perplexity, cursing his evil fortune, and running up and down like one out of his wits. At length, having neither money nor anything he could pawn, and wishing to give her something, at the same time that he would not make his case known, even so much as to his own labourer, he espied his hawk upon the perch, which he seized, and, finding it very fat, judged it might make a dish not unworthy of such a lady. Without farther thought, then, he pulled the hawk's head off, and gave it to a girl to truss and roast carefully, whilst he laid the cloth, having a small quantity of linen yet left; and then he returned, with a smile on his countenance, into the garden to her, telling her that what little dinner he was able to provide was now ready. She and her friend, therefore, entered and sat down with him, he serving them all the time with great respect, when they ate the hawk. After dinner was over, and they had sat chatting a little together, she thought it a fit time to tell her errand, and she spoke to him courteously in this manner: —

"Sir, if you call to mind your past life, and my resolution, which perhaps you may call cruelty, I doubt not but you will wonder at my presumption, when you know what I am come for: but if you had children of your own, to know how strong our natural affection is towards them, I am very sure you would excuse me. Now, my having a son forces me, against my own inclinations and all reason whatsoever, to request a thing of you, which I know you value extremely, as you have no other comfort or diversion left in your small circumstances; I mean your hawk, which my son has taken such a fancy to that, unless I bring him back with me, I very much fear that he will die of his disorder. Therefore I entreat you, not for any regard you have for me (for in that respect you are no way obliged to me), but for that generosity with which you have always distinguished yourself, that you would please to let me have him; by which means you will save my child's life, and lay him under perpetual obligations." Federigo, hearing the lady's request, and knowing it was out of his power to serve her, began to weep before he was able to make a word of reply. This she first thought was his great concern to part with his favourite bird, and that he was going to give her a flat denial; but, after she had waited a little for his answer, he said, "Madam, ever since I have fixed my affections upon you, fortune has still been contrary to me in many things; but all the rest is nothing to what has now come to pass. You are here to visit me in this my poor mansion, and whither in my prosperity you would never deign to come; you also entreat a small present from me, which it is no way in my power to give, as I am going briefly to tell you. As soon as I was acquainted with the great favour you intended to do me, I thought it proper, considering your superior merit and excellency, to treat you, according to my ability, with something more nice and valuable than is usually given to other persons, when, calling to mind my hawk, which you now request, and its goodness, I judged it a fit repast for you, and you have had it roasted. Nor could I have thought it better bestowed, had you not now desired it in a different manner, which is such a grief to me, that I shall never be at peace as long as I live"; and upon saying this, he produced its feathers, feet, and talons. She began now to blame him for killing such a bird to entertain any woman with; secretly praising the greatness of his soul, which poverty had no power to abase. Thus, having no farther hopes of obtaining the hawk, she thanked him for the respect and good-will he had shewed toward her, and returned full of concern to her son; who, either out of grief for the disappointment, or through the violence of his disorder, died in a few days. She continued sorrowful for some time; but, being left rich, and young, her brothers were very pressing with her to marry again, which, though against her inclinations, yet finding them still importunate, and remembering Federigo's great worth, and the late instance of his generosity, in killing such a bird for her entertainment, she said, "I should rather choose to continue as I am; but since it is your desire that I take a husband, I will have only Federigo de gli Alberighi." They smiled contemptuously at this, and said, "You simple woman! what are you talking of? He is not worth one farthing in the world." She replied, "I believe it, brothers, to be as you say: but know, that I would sooner have a man that stands in need of riches, than riches without a man."

They, hearing her resolution and well knowing his generous temper, gave her to him with all her wealth; and he, seeing himself possessed of a lady whom he had so dearly loved, and such a vast fortune, lived in all true happiness with her, and was a better manager of his affairs for the time to come.

WISDOM AND MEDITATION

LATIN

ST. AUGUSTINE

(354-430 A.D.)

Augustine's father was a pagan who was converted only shortly before his death; his mother was a woman of great piety. Because of his precocity as a child, his parents had great expectations of him and hoped to train him for a forensic career. Instead of applying himself, however, he plunged into dissipation. In 373 his reading of Cicero drew his attention to the study of philosophy, but he followed this pursuit only a short time. About 374 he attached himself to the sect of the Manicheans, whose belief was a blending of the teachings of Christ with the religion of Old Persia. Here again he was dissatisfied, and became hopeless of finding the true faith. Coming to Milan in 384 as a teacher of oratory, he discovered the famous Ambrosius, and experienced an entire reorganization of his life and thought. He accepted the Christian faith, was baptized in 387, disposed of all his worldly goods, and retired to Africa to lead a secluded life. In 391 he was ordained priest and sent to Hippo, and about 396 he was made Bishop of Hippo, a title by which he is often designated in modern times. He died in 430.

Augustine was the most important and the most versatile of the early Church Fathers, and his influence has been felt in ecclesiastical matters down to the present day. The penetration of his mind, the depth of his spirit, the force of his speculation, and the scope of his thought made him the spiritual patron not only of mediæval scholasticism but of the Reformation as well. He discussed the most fundamental spiritual questions of all time — the relation of Man to God, of Man's power to exert his own will, and of his responsibility for his actions. His secular training, moreover, enabled him to combat the enemies of the new Christian religion on their own ground. Next to the Confessions his best known work is The City of God, a noble defense of the purpose of God in history.

The Confessions are an intimate record of the spiritual life of a great and holy man. The Christian literature of meditation grew to tremendous proportions during the Middle Ages, but in it there is nothing to surpass this work; indeed there is little in any age to equal it for sheer religious exaltation.

The selection comes from The Confessions of St. Augustine, translated by Edward B. Pusey.

CONFESSIONS

ON THE DEATH OF HIS MOTHER

This great gift also Thou bestowedst, O my God, my mercy, upon that good handmaid of Thine, in whose womb Thou createdst me, that, between any disagreeing and discordant parties where she was able, she showed herself such a peacemaker, that hearing on both sides most bitter things, such as swelling and indigested choler use to break out into, when the crudities of enmities are breathed out in sour discourses to a present friend against an absent enemy, she never would disclose aught of the one unto the other, but what might tend to their reconciliation. A small good this might appear to me, did I not to my grief know numberless persons who, through some horrible and widespread contagion of sin, not only disclose to persons mutually angered things said in anger, but add withal things never spoken, whereas to humane humanity it ought to seem a light thing, not to foment or increase ill will by ill words, unless one study withal by good words to quench it. Such was she, Thyself, her most inward Instructor, teaching her in the school of the heart. Finally, her own husband, towards the very end of his earthly life, did she gain unto Thee; nor had she to complain of that in him as a believer, which before he was a believer she had borne from him. She was also the servant of Thy servants; whosoever of them knew her did in her much praise and honor and love Thee; for the witness of the fruits of a holy conversation they perceived Thy presence in her heart. For she had been the wife of one man, had requited her parents, had governed her house piously, was well reported of for good works, had brought up children, so often travailing in birth of them, as she saw them swerving from Thee. Lastly, of all of us Thy servants, O Lord (whom on occasion of Thy own gift Thou sufferest to speak), us, who before her sleeping in Thee lived united together, having received the grace of Thy baptism, did she so take care of, as though she had been mother of us all; so served us, as though she had been child to us all.

The day now approaching whereon she was to depart this life (which day Thou well knewest, we knew not), it came to pass, Thyself, as I believe, by Thy secret ways so ordering it, that she and I stood alone; leaning in a certain window, which looked into the garden of the house where we now lay, at Ostia; where, removed from the din of men, we were recruiting from the fatigues of a long journey, for the voyage. We were discoursing then together, alone, very sweetly; and forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, we were inquiring between ourselves in the presence of the Truth, which Thou art, of what sort the eternal life of the saints was to be, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man. But yet we gasped with the mouth of our heart, after those heavenly streams of Thy fountain, the fountain of life, which is with Thee; that, being bedewed thence according to our capacity, we might in some sort meditate upon so high a mystery.

And when our discourse was brought to that point, that the very highest delight of the earthly senses, in the very purest material light, was, in respect of the sweetness of that life, not only not worthy of comparison, but not even of mention; we, raising up ourselves with a more glowing affection towards the "Self-same," did by degrees pass through all things bodily, even the very heaven, when sun and moon, and stars shine upon the earth; yea, we were soaring higher yet, by inward musing, and discourse, and admiring of Thy works; and we came to our own minds, and went beyond them, that we might arrive at that region of never-failing plenty, where Thou feedest Israel forever with the food of truth, and where life is the Wisdom by whom all these things are made, and what have been, and what shall be, and she is not made, but is, as she hath been, and so shall she be ever; yea rather, to "have been," and "hereafter to be," are not in her, but only "to be," seeing she is eternal. For to "have been," and "to be hereafter," are not eternal. And while we were discoursing and panting after her, we slightly touched on her with the whole effort of our heart; and we sighed, and there we leave bound the first fruits of the Spirit; and returned to vocal expressions of our mouth, where the word spoken was beginning and end. And what is like unto Thy Word, our Lord, who endureth in Himself without becoming old, and maketh all things new?

We were saying then: If to any the tumult of the flesh were hushed, hushed the images of earth, and waters, and air, hushed also the poles of heaven, yea the very soul be hushed to herself, and by not thinking on self surmount self, hushed all dreams and imaginary revelations, every tongue and every sign, and whatsoever exists only in transition, since if any could hear, all these say, We made not ourselves, but He made us that abideth forever — If then, having uttered this, they too should be hushed, having roused only our ears to Him who made them, and He alone speak, not by them, but by Himself, that we may hear His Word, not through any tongue of flesh, nor Angel's voice, nor sound of thunder, nor in the dark riddle of similitude, but, might hear Whom in these things we love, might hear His Very Self without these (as we two now strained ourselves, and in swift thought touched on that Eternal Wisdom, which abideth over all); — could this be continued on, and other visions of kind far unlike be withdrawn, and this one ravish, and absorb, and wrap up its beholder amid these inward joys, so that life might be forever like that one moment of understanding which now we sighed after; were not this, Enter into thy Master's joy? And when shall that be? When we shall all rise again, though we shall not all be changed?

Such things was I speaking, and even if not in this very manner, and these same words, yet, Lord, Thou knowest, that in that day when we were speaking of these things, and this world with all its delights became, as we spake, contemptible to us, my mother said, "Son, for mine own part I have no further delight in anything in this life. What I do here any longer, and to what end I am here, I know not, now that my hopes in this world are accomplished. One thing there was for which I desired to linger for a while in this life, that I might see thee a Catholic Christian before I died. My God hath done this for me more abundantly, that I should now see thee withal, despising earthly happiness, also become His servant: what do I here?"

What answer I made her unto these things, I remember not. For scarce five days after, or not much more, she fell sick of a fever; and in that sickness one day she fell into a swoon, and was for a while withdrawn from these visible things. We hastened round her; but she was soon brought back to her senses; and, looking on me and my brother standing by her, said to us inquiringly, "Where was I?" And then looking fixedly on us, with grief amazed; "Here," saith she, "shall you bury your mother." I held my peace and refrained weeping; but my brother spake something, wishing for her, as the happier lot, that she might die, not in a strange place, but in her own land. Whereat, she with anxious look, checking him with her eyes, for that he still savored such things, and then looking upon me; "Behold," saith she, "what he saith": and soon after to us both, "Lay," she saith, "this body anywhere; let not the care for that any way disquiet you: this only I request, that you would remember me at the Lord's altar, wherever you be." And having delivered this sentiment in what words she could, she held her peace, being exercised by her growing sickness.

But I, considering Thy gifts, Thou unseen God, which Thou instillest into the hearts of Thy faithful ones, whence wondrous fruits do spring, did rejoice and give thanks to Thee, recalling what I before knew, how careful and anxious she had ever been, as to her place of burial, which she had provided and prepared for herself by the body of her husband. For because they had lived in great harmony together, she also wished (so little can the human mind embrace things divine) to have this addition to that happiness, and to have it remembered among men, that, after her pilgrimage beyond the seas, what was earthly of this united pair had been permitted to be united beneath the same earth. But when this emptiness had through the fullness of Thy goodness begun to cease in her heart, I knew not, and rejoiced admiring what she had so disclosed to me; though indeed in that our discourse also in the window, when she said, "What do I here any longer?" there appeared no desire of dying in her own country. I heard afterwards also, that when we were now at Ostia, she with a mother's confidence, when I was absent, one day discoursed with certain of my friends about the contempt of this life, and the blessing of death: and when they were amazed at such courage which Thou hadst given to a woman, and asked, "Whether she were not afraid to leave her body so far from her own city?" she replied, "Nothing is far to God; nor was it to be feared lest, at the end of the world, He should not recognize whence He were to raise me up." On the ninth day then of her sickness, and the fifty-sixth year of her age, and the three and thirtieth of mine, was that religious and holy soul freed from the body.

I closed her eyes; and there flowed withal a mighty sorrow into my heart, which was overflowing into tears; mine eyes at the same time, by the violent command of my mind, drank up their fountain wholly dry; and woe was me in such a strife! But when she breathed her last, a boy burst out into a loud lament; then, checked by us all, held his peace. In like manner also a childish feeling in me, which was, through my heart's youthful voice, finding its vent in weeping, was checked and silenced. For we thought it not fitting to solemnize that funeral with tearful lament, and groanings: for thereby do they for the most part express grief for the departed, as though unhappy, or altogether dead; whereas she was neither unhappy in her death, nor altogether dead. Of this we were assured on good grounds, the testimony of her good conversation and her faith unfeigned.

What then was it which did grievously pain me within, but a fresh wound wrought through the sudden wrench of that most sweet and dear custom of living together? I joyed indeed in her testimony, when, in that her last sickness, mingling her endearments with my acts of duty, she called me "dutiful," and mentioned, with great affection of love, that she never had heard any harsh or reproachful sound uttered by my mouth against her. But yet, O my God, Who madest us, what comparison is there betwixt that honor that I paid to her, and her slavery for me? Being then forsaken of so great comfort in her, my soul was wounded, and that life rent asunder as it were, which, of hers and mine together, had been made but one.

The boy then being stifled from weeping, Euodius took up the Psalter, and began to sing, our whole house answering him, the Psalm, I will sing of mercy and judgment to Thee, O Lord. But hearing what we were doing, many brethren and religious women came together; and whilst they (whose office it was) made ready for the burial, as the manner is, I (in a part of the house where I might properly), together with those who thought not fit to leave me, discoursed upon something fitting the time; and by this balm of truth assuaged that torment, known to Thee, they unknowing and listening intently, and conceiving me to be without all sense of sorrow. But in Thy ears, where none of them heard, I blamed the weakness of my feelings, and refrained my flood of grief, which gave way a little unto me; but again came, as with a tide, yet not so as to burst out into tears, nor to a change of countenance; still I knew what I was keeping down in my heart. And being very much displeased that these human things had such power over me, which in the due order and appointment of our natural condition must needs come to pass, with a new grief I grieved for my grief, and was thus worn by a double sorrow.

And behold, the corpse was carried to the burial; we went and returned without tears. For neither in those prayers which we poured forth unto Thee, when the sacrifice of our ransom was offered for her, when now the corpse was by the grave's side, as the manner there is, previous to its being laid therein, did I weep even during those prayers; yet was I the whole day in secret heavily sad, and with troubled mind prayed Thee, as I could, to heal my sorrow, yet Thou didst not; impressing, I believe, upon my memory by this one instance, how strong is the bond of all habit, even upon a soul which now feeds upon no deceiving Word. It seemed also good to me to go and bathe, having heard that the bath had its name balneum from the Greek word balaneion for that it drives sadness from the mind. And this also I confess unto Thy mercy, Father of the fatherless, that I bathe, and was the same as before I bathed. For the bitterness of sorrow could not exude out of my heart. Then I slept, and woke up again, and found my grief not a little softened; and, as I was alone in my bed, I remembered those true verses of Thy Ambrose. For Thou art the

"Maker of all, the Lord,
And Ruler of the height,
Who, robing day in light, hast poured
Soft slumbers o'er the night,
That to our limbs the power
Of toil may be renew'd,
And hearts be rais'd that sink and cower,
And sorrows be subdu'd."

And then by little and little I recovered my former thoughts of Thy handmaid, her holy conversation towards Thee, her holy tenderness and observance toward us, whereof I was suddenly deprived: and I was minded to weep in Thy sight, for her and for myself, in her behalf and in my own. And I gave way to the tears which

I before restrained, to overflow as much as they desired; reposing my heart upon them; and it found rest in them, for it was in Thy ears, not in those of man, who would have interpreted my weeping scornfully. And now, Lord, in writing I confess it unto Thee. Read it, who will, and interpret it, how he will: and if he finds sin therein, that I wept my mother for a small portion of an hour (the mother who for the time was dead to mine eyes, who had for many years wept for me, that I might live in Thine eyes), let him not deride me; but rather, if he be one of large charity, let him weep himself for my sins unto Thee, the Father of all the brethren of Thy Christ.

BOËTHIUS

Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus Boëthius, celebrated philosopher and statesman, was born of a family of high rank and educated at Rome and at Athens. Early in life he made the acquaintance of the Greek classics, many of which he translated. His abilities as a scholar and politician rapidly brought him into public prominence, and in 510 he was selected by King Theodoric¹ as his counsellor. Boëthius carried on his work with great success and was granted all possible honor by Theodoric. He used his influence over the ruler to bring about many reforms and corrections. At length as Theodoric became old and infirm, the enemies of Boëthius succeeded in having the great philosopher accused of treason and thrown into prison, where he died without ever regaining his liberty.

Boëthius forms an important connecting link between pagan and Christian learning. Although there is no evidence that he actually embraced the new faith, his writings are full of the tender and forbearing spirit that characterized the philosophy of Christianity. He translated some of the writings of Aristotle and Nichomachus,² and produced numerous works on mathematics. His most famous work is The Consolation of Philosophy, which he composed in prison (ca. 500 A.D.). It is written as a dialogue between Boëthius and Philosophy, which comes to him in prison in the form of a woman. The lofty strains of his discourse echoed down through the whole course of the Middle Ages. Almost all readers felt his influence, and many wrote commentaries upon him, translated him, or imitated him. Perhaps the two greatest English writers thus to show his influence were Alfred the Great and Chaucer, both of whom translated extensively from his works.

The following excerpt from The Consolation of Philosophy is translated by W. V. Cooper, London, G. M. Dent & Co. (Temple Classics), 1902.

THE CONSOLATION OF PHILOSOPHY

BOOK III

When she finished her lay, its soothing tones left me spellbound with my ears alert in my eagerness to listen. So a while afterwards I said, 'Greatest comforter of weary minds, how have you cheered me with your deep thoughts and sweet singing too! No more shall I doubt my power to meet the blows of Fortune. So far am I from terror at the remedies which you did lately tell me were sharper, that I am longing to hear them, and eagerly I beg you for them.'

Then said she, 'I knew it when you laid hold upon my words in silent attention, and I was waiting for that frame of mind in you, or more truly, I brought it about in you. They that remain are indeed bitter to the tongue, but sweet to the inner man. But as you say you are eager to hear, how ardently you would be burning, if you knew whither I am attempting to lead you!'

'Whither is that?' I asked.

'To the true happiness, of which your soul too dreams; but your sight is taken up in imaginary views thereof, so that you cannot look upon itself.'

Then said I, 'I pray you shew me what that truly is, and quickly.'

'I will do so,' she said, 'for your sake willingly. But first I will try to picture in words and give you the form of the cause, which is already better known to you, that so, when that picture is perfect and you turn your eyes to the other side, you may recognise the form of true happiness.'

'When a man would sow in virgin soil, first he clears away the bushes, cuts the brambles and the ferns, that the corn-goddess may go forth laden with her new fruit. The honey, that the bee has toiled to give us, is sweeter when the mouth has tasted bitter things. The stars shine with more pleasing grace when a storm has ceased to roar and pour down rain. After the morning star has dispersed the shades of night, the day in all its beauty drives its rosy chariot forth. So thou hast looked upon false happiness first; now draw thy neck from under her yoke: so shall true happiness now come into thy soul.'

She lowered her eyes for a little while as though searching the innermost recesses of her mind; and then she continued: — 'The trouble of the many and various aims of mortal men brings them much care, and herein they go forward by different paths but strive to reach one end, which is happiness. And that good is that, to which if any man attain, he can desire nothing further. It is that highest of all good things, and it embraces in itself all good things: if any good is lacking, it cannot be the highest good, since then there is left outside it something which can be desired. Wherefore happiness is a state which is made perfect by the union of all good things. This end all men seek to reach, as I said, though by different paths. For there is implanted by nature in the minds of men a desire for the true good; but error leads them astray towards false goods by wrong paths.'

'Some men believe that the highest good is to lack nothing, and so they are at pains to possess abundant riches. Others consider the true good to be that which is most worthy of admiration, and so they strive to attain to places of honour, and to be held by their fellow-citizens in honour thereby. Some determine that the highest good lies in the highest power; and so they either desire to reign themselves, or try to cleave to those who do reign. Others think that renown is the greatest good, and they therefore hasten to make a famous name by the arts of peace or of war. But more than all measure the fruit of good by pleasure and enjoyment, and these think that the happiest man is abandoned to pleasure.

'Further, there are those who confuse the aims and the causes of these good things: as those who desire riches for the sake of power or of pleasure, or those who seek power for the sake of money or celebrity. In these, then, and other things like to them, lies the aim of men's actions and prayers, such as renown and popularity, which seem to afford some fame, or wife and children, which are sought for the pleasure they give. On the other hand, the good of friends, which is the most honourable and holy of all, lies not in Fortune's but in Virtue's realm. All others are adopted for the sake of power or enjoyment.

'Again, it is plain that the good things of the body must be accounted to those false causes which we have mentioned; for bodily strength and stature seem to make men more able and strong; beauty and swiftness seem to give renown; health seems to give pleasure. By all these happiness alone is plainly desired. For each man holds that to be the highest good, which he seeks before all others. But we have defined the highest good to be happiness. Wherefore what each man desires above all others he holds to be a state of happiness.

'Wherefore you have each of these placed before you as the form of human happiness: wealth, honours, power, glory, and pleasure. Epicurus¹ considered these forms alone, and accordingly determined upon pleasure as the highest good, because all the others seemed but to join with it in bringing enjoyment to the mind.

'But to return to the aims of men: their minds seem to seek to regain the highest good, and their memories seem to dull their powers. It is as though a drunken man were seeking his home, but could not remember the way thither. Can those 10 people be altogether wrong whose aim it is to lack nothing? No, there is nothing which can make happiness so perfect as an abundant possession of good things, needing naught that belongs to others, but in all ways sufficing for itself. Surely those others too are not mistaken who think that what is best is also most worthy of reverence and respect. It cannot be any cheap or base thing, to attain which almost all 20 men aim and strive. And is power not to be accounted a good thing? Surely it is: can that be a weak thing or forceless, which is allowed in all cases to excel? Is renown of no value? We cannot sur- 25 render this; that whatever is most excellent has also great renown. It is hardly worth saying that happiness has no torturing cares or gloom, and is not subject to grief and trouble; for even in small 30 things, the aim is to find that which it is a delight to have and to enjoy. These, then, are the desires of men: they long for riches, places of honour, kingdoms, glory, and pleasure; and they long for them because 35 they think that thereby they will find satisfaction, veneration, power, renown, and happiness. It is the good then which men seek by their different desires; and it is easy to shew how great a force nature 40 has put therein, since, in spite of such varying and discordant opinions, they are all agreed in the goal they seek, that of the highest good.

'I would to pliant strings set forth a song 45 of how almighty Nature turns her guiding reins, telling with what laws her providence keeps safe this boundless universe, binding and tying each and all with cords that never shall be loosed. The lions of 50 Carthage, though they bear the gorgeous bonds and trappings of captivity, and eat the food that is given them by hand, and though they fear their harsh master with his lash they know so well; yet if once blood has touched their bristling jaws, their old, their latent wills return; with deep roaring they remember their old 5 selves; they loose their bands and free their necks, and their tamer is the first torn by their cruel teeth, and his blood is poured out by their rage and wrath.

'If the bird who sings so lustily upon the high tree-top be caught and caged, men may minister to him with dainty care, may give him cups of liquid honey and feed him with all gentleness on plenteous food; 15 yet, if he fly to the roof of his cage and see the shady trees he loves, he spurns with his foot the food they have put before him; the woods are all his sorrow calls for, for the woods he sings with his sweet tones.

'The bough which has been downward thrust by force of strength to bend its top to earth, so soon as the pressing hand is gone, looks up again straight to the sky 20 above.

'Phœbus sinks into the western waves, but by his unknown track he turns his car once more to his rising in the east.

'All things must find their own peculiar course again, and each rejoices in his own 30 return. Not one can keep the order handed down to it, unless in some way it unites its rising to its end, and so makes firm, immutable, its own encircling course.

'And you too, creatures of the earth, do 35 dream of your first state, though with a dim idea. With whatsoever thinking it may be, you look to that goal of happiness, though never so obscure your thoughts: thither, to true happiness, your natural course does guide you, and from the same 40 your various errors lead you. For I would have you consider whether men can reach the end they have resolved upon, namely happiness, by these ways by which they think to attain thereto. If money and 45 places of honour and such-like do bring anything of that sort to a man who seems to lack no good thing, then let us acknowledge with them that men do become 50 happy by the possession of these things. But if they cannot perform their promises, and there is still lack of further good things, surely it is plain that a false appearance of happiness is there discovered. You, therefore, who had lately abundant riches, shall first answer me. With all that great wealth, was your mind never perturbed by torturing care arising from some sense of injustice?

'Yes,' I said; 'I cannot remember that my mind was ever free from some such care.'

'Was it not because something was lacking, which you missed, or because something was present to you which you did not like to have?'

'Yes,' I answered.

'You desired, then, the presence of the one, and the absence of the other?'

'I acknowledge it.'

'Then,' said she, 'such a man lacks what he desires.'

'He does.'

'But while a man lacks anything, can he possibly satisfy himself?'

'No,' said I.

'Then, while you were bountifully supplied with wealth, you felt that you did not satisfy yourself?'

'I did indeed.'

'Then,' said she, 'wealth cannot prevent a man from lacking or make him satisfied. And this is what it apparently professed to do. And this point too I feel is most important: money has in itself, by its own nature, nothing which can prevent its being carried off from those, who possess it, against their will.'

'It has not,' I said.

'No, you cannot deny that any stronger man may any day snatch it from them. For how come about the quarrels of the law-courts? Is it not because people try to regain money that has been by force or by fraud taken from them?'

'Yes,' I answered.

'Then,' said she, 'a man will need to seek from the outside help to guard his own money.'

'That cannot be denied,' I said.

'And a man will not need that unless he possesses money which he can lose.'

'Undoubtedly he will not.'

'Then the argument turns round the other way,' she said. 'The riches which were thought to make a man all-sufficient for himself do really put him in need of other people's help. Then how can need be separated from wealth? Do the rich never feel hunger nor thirst? Do the limbs of moneyed men never feel the cold of winter? You will say, "Yes, but the rich have the wherewithal to satisfy hunger and thirst, and drive away cold." But though riches may thus console wants, they cannot entirely take them away. For, though these ever crying wants, these continual requests, are satisfied, yet there must exist that which is to be satisfied. I need not say that nature is satisfied with little, greed is never satisfied. Wherefore, I ask you, if wealth cannot remove want, and even creates its own wants, what reason is there that you should think it affords satisfaction to a man?'

'Though the rich man with greed heap up from ever-flowing streams the wealth that cannot satisfy, though he deck himself with pearls from the Red Sea's shore, and plough his fertile field with oxen by the score, yet gnawing care will never in his lifetime leave him, and at his death his wealth will not go with him, but leave him faithlessly.'

'But,' I urged, 'places of honour make the man, to whom they fall, honoured and venerated.'

'Ah!' she answered, 'have those offices their force in truth that they may instil virtues into the minds of those that hold them, and drive out vices therefrom? And yet we are too well accustomed to see them making wickedness conspicuous rather than avoiding it. Wherefore we are displeased to see such places often falling to the most wicked of men, so that Catullus called Nonius¹ "a diseased growth," though he sat in the highest chair of office. Do you see how great a disgrace high honours can add to evil men? Their unworthiness is less conspicuous if they are not made famous by honours. Could you yourself have been induced by any dangers to think of being a colleague with Decoratus,¹ when you saw that he had the mind of an unscrupulous buffoon, and a base informer? We cannot consider men worthy of veneration on account of their high places, when we hold them to be unworthy of those high places. But if you see a man endowed with wisdom, you cannot but consider him worthy of veneration, or at least of the wisdom with which he is endowed. For such a man has the worth peculiar to virtue, which it transmits directly to those in whom it is found. But since honours from the vulgar crowd cannot create merit, it is plain that they have not the peculiar beauty of this worth. And here is a particular point to be noticed: if men are the more worthless as they are despised by more people, high position makes them all the worse because it cannot make venerable those whom it shews to so many people to be contemptible. And this brings its penalty with it: wicked people bring a like quality into their positions, and stain them with their infection.

Now I would have you consider the matter thus, that you may recognise that true veneration cannot be won through these shadowy honours. If a man who had filled the office of consul many times in Rome came by chance into a country of barbarians, would his high position make him venerated by the barbarians? Yet if this were a natural quality in such dignities, they would never lose their effective function in any land, just as fire is never aught but hot in all countries. But since they do not receive this quality of veneration from any force peculiar to themselves, but only from a connexion in the unworthy opinions of men, they become as nothing as soon as they are among those who do not consider these dignities as such.

But that is only in the case of foreign peoples. Among the very peoples where they had their beginnings, do these dignities last for ever? Consider how great was the power in Rome of old of the office of Præfect: now it is an empty name and a heavy burden upon the income of any man of Senator's rank. The præfect then, who was commissioner of the corn-market, was held to be a great man. Now there is no office more despised. For, as I said before, that which has no intrinsic beauty sometimes receives a certain glory, sometimes loses it, according to the opinion of those who are concerned with it. If then high offices cannot make men venerated, if furthermore they grow vile by the infection of bad men, if changes of time can end their glory, and, lastly, if they are held cheaply in the estimation of whole peoples, I ask you, so far from affording true beauty to men, what beauty have they in themselves which men can desire?

Though Nero decked himself proudly with purple of Tyre and snow-white gems, none the less that man of rage and luxury lived ever hated of all. Yet would that evil man at times give his dishonoured offices to men who were revered. Who then could count men blessed, who to such a villain owed their high estate?

Can kingdoms and intimacies with kings make people powerful? "Certainly," some may answer, "in so far as their happiness is lasting." But antiquity and our times too are full of examples of the contrary; examples of men whose happiness as kings has been exchanged for disaster. What wonderful power, which is found to be powerless even for its own preservation! But if this kingly power is really a source of happiness, surely then, if it fail in any way, it lessens the happiness it brings, and equally causes unhappiness. However widely human empires may extend, there must be still more nations left, over whom each king does not reign. And so, in whatever direction this power ceases to make happy, thereby comes in powerlessness, which makes men unhappy; thus therefore there must be a greater part of unhappiness in every king's estate. That tyrant² had learnt well the dangers of his lot, who likened the fear which goes with kingship to the terror

² Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, showed his flattering courtier Damocles what it was to be a tyrant, by setting him in his own seat at a sumptuous banquet, and hanging a sword above him by a hair.

inspired by a sword ever hanging overhead. What then is such a power, which cannot drive away the bite of cares, nor escape the stings of fear?

'Yet these all would willingly live without fear, but they cannot, and yet they boast of their power. Think you a man is powerful when you see that he longs for that which he cannot bring to pass? Do you reckon a man powerful who walks abroad with dignity and attended by servants? A man who strikes fear into his subjects, yet fears them more himself? A man who must be at the mercy of those that serve him, in order that he may seem to have power?

'Need I speak of intimacies with kings when kingship itself is shewn to be full of weakness? Not only when kings' powers fall are their friends laid low, but often even when their powers are intact. Nero compelled his friend and tutor, Seneca,¹ to choose how he would die. Papinianus,² for a long while a powerful courtier, was handed over to the soldiers' swords by the Emperor Antoninus. Yet each of these was willing to surrender all his power. Seneca even tried to give up all his wealth to Nero, and to seek retirement. But the very weight of their wealth and power dragged them down to ruin, and neither could do what he wished.

'What then is that power, whose possessors fear it? in desiring to possess which, you are not safe, and from which you cannot escape, even though you try to lay it down? What help are friends, made not by virtue but by fortune? The friend gained by good fortune becomes an enemy in ill fortune. And what plague can more effectually injure than an intimate enemy?

'The man who would true power gain must needs subdue his own wild thoughts; never must he let his passions triumph and yoke his neck by their foul bonds. For though the earth, as far as India's shore, tremble before the laws you give, though Thule³ bow to your service on earth's farthest bounds, yet if thou canst not drive away black cares, if thou canst not put to flight complaints, then is no true power thine.

5 'How deceitful is fame often, and how base a thing it is! Justly did the tragic poet cry out, "O Fame, Fame, how many lives of men of naught hast thou puffed up!" For many men have got a great name from the false opinions of the crowd. And what could be baser than such a thing? For those who are falsely praised must blush to hear their praises. And if they are justly won by merits, what can they add to the pleasure of a wise man's conscience? For he measures his happiness not by popular talk, but by the truth of his conscience. If it attracts a man to make his name widely known, he must equally think it a shame if it be not made known. But I have already said that there must be yet more lands into which the renown of a single man can never come; wherefore it follows that the man, whom you think famous, will seem to have no such fame in the next quarter of the earth.

'Popular favour seems to me to be unworthy even of mention under this head, for it comes not by any judgment, and is never constant.

'Again, who can but see how empty a name, and how futile, is noble birth? For, if its glory is due to renown, it belongs not to the man. For the glory of noble birth seems to be praise for the merits of a man's forefathers. But if praise creates the renown, it is the renowned who are praised. Wherefore, if you have no renown of your own, that of others cannot glorify you. But if there is any good in noble birth, I conceive it to be this, and this alone, that the highborn seem to be bound in honour not to show any degeneracy from their fathers' virtue.

45 'From like beginning rise all men on earth, for there is one Father of all things; one is the guide of everything. 'Tis He who gave the sun his rays, and horns unto the moon. 'Tis He who set mankind on earth, and in the heavens the stars. He put within our bodies spirits which were born in heaven. And thus a highborn race has He set forth in man. Why do ye men rail on your forefathers? If ye look to your beginning and your author, which is God, is any man degenerate or base but him who by his own vices cherishes base things and leaves that beginning which 10 was his?

'And now what am I to say of the pleasures of the body? The desires of the flesh are full of cares, their fulfilment is full of remorse. What terrible diseases, what 15 unbearable griefs, truly the fruits of sin, do they bring upon the bodies of those who enjoy them! I know not what pleasure their impulse affords, but any who cares to recall his indulgences of his passions will know that the results of such pleasures are indeed gloomy.* If any can shew that those results are blest with happiness, then may the beasts of the field be justly called blessed, for all their aims are urged toward 25 the satisfying of their bodies' wants. The pleasures of wife and children may be most honourable; but nature makes it all too plain that some have found torment in their children. How bitter is any such 30 kind of suffering, I need not tell you now, for you have never known it, nor have any such anxiety now. Yet in this matter I would hold with my philosopher Euripides, that he who has no children is happy in his 35 misfortune.

'All pleasures have this way: those who enjoy them they drive on with stings. Pleasure, like the winged bee, scatters its honey sweet, then flies away, and with a 40 clinging sting it strikes the hearts it touches.

'There is then no doubt that these roads to happiness are no roads, and they cannot lead any man to any end whither they pro- 45 fess to take him. I would shew you shortly with what great evils they are bound up. Would you heap up money? You will need to tear it from its owner. Would you seem brilliant by the glory of great honours? You must kneel before their dispenser, and, in your desire to surpass other 5 men in honour, you must debase yourself by setting aside all pride. Do you long for power? You will be subject to the wiles of all over whom you have power, you will be at the mercy of many dangers. You seek fame? You will be drawn to and fro among rough paths, and lose all freedom from care. Would you spend a life of pleasure? Who would not despise and cast 10 off such servitude to so vile and brittle a thing as your body? How petty are all the aims of those who put before themselves the pleasures of the body, how uncertain is the possession of such? In bodily size will you ever surpass the elephant? In strength will you ever lead the bull, or in speed the tiger? Look upon the expanse of heaven, the strength with which it stands, the rapidity with which it moves, and cease for a while to wonder at base things. 15 This heaven is not more wonderful for those things than for the design which guides it. How sweeping is the brightness of outward form, how swift its movement, yet more fleeting than the passing of the flowers of spring. But if, as Aristotle says, many could use the eyes of lynxes to see through that which meets the eye, then if they saw into the organs within, would not that body, though it had the most fair out- 20 side of Alcibiades,¹ seem most vile within? Wherefore it is not your own nature, but the weakness of the eyes of them that see you, which makes you seem beautiful. But consider how in excess you desire the pleasures of the body, when you know that, howsoever you admire it, it can be reduced to nothing by a three-days' fever. To put 25 all these points then in a word: these things cannot grant the good which they promise; they are not made perfect by the union of all good things in them; they do not lead to happiness as a path thither; they do not make men blessed.'

ST. FRANCIS

(1182-1226)

St. Francis of Assisi, founder of the Franciscan order, was the son of a rich merchant named Bernardone de Mariconi. His early life gave no indication of his later calling, for he took an active part in all the worldly amusements of his friends. His expenses were so lavish as to cause some alarm to his parsimonious father. It happened at one time that Francis was made prisoner in a foray against the citizens of a neighboring town. In prison he got his first close glimpse of the miseries of mankind. Always sensitive to the sufferings of others, he was awakened by this incident to a powerful desire to devote his life to the alleviation of pain. In 1206, at the age of twenty-four, he renounced the world and took a vow of poverty. Adopting the garb of a hermit, he began his ministry with the care of the lepers. He returned to Assisi to direct the building of a church, an undertaking in which he, though naturally frail and small, participated as a common laborer. Once his church was built, he threw himself into the preaching of humility—especially of poverty. It is virtually on the doctrine of poverty that the Franciscan order of friars was founded (1208).

The present selection, although not from the pen of St. Francis, is an embodiment of his ideals. The fine sentiment of self-abnegation and altruism that dominated his monastic reformation here shines forth in the utterances of one of his followers. To the reader who has come to think of the Franciscans as they appear in the satirical writings of Chaucer and Wyclif, this record of the sincere and humble beginnings of the order brings the knowledge that, whatever evils may have crept into the life of the Franciscans during the fourteenth century, their founder was a man whose actions and thoughts make him in the truest sense an embodiment of the mediæval ideal of the saint.

The selection is taken from The Little Flowers and The Mirror of Perfection, Everyman's Library.

THE MIRROR OF PERFECTION

CHAPTER III

How he answered a minister who wished to have books with his leave; and how the ministers without his knowledge caused the chapter of the prohibitions of the Gospel to be removed from the rule

But on a time, when blessed Francis was returned from oversea, a certain Minister was speaking with him of the Chapter of Poverty, wishing to know his will and understanding thereon, — for at that time a certain chapter of the Prohibitions of the Holy Gospel was written in the Rule, namely, "Take nothing with ye in the way." And the blessed Father answered, "I understand it thus, that friars should possess naught save a robe with a cord and breeches, as says the Rule, and if they are forced by necessity they may wear sandals." And the Minister said to him, "What shall I do, who have so many books that they be worth more than fifty pounds?" (but this he said for that he would have them with a good conscience, since against it he had owned so many books, knowing that blessed Francis understood the Chapter of Poverty so strictly). And blessed Francis said to him, "I neither will, nor ought, nor can, go against my conscience and the perfection of the Holy Gospel which we have professed." Hearing these things the Minister became sad. But the blessed one, seeing him thus troubled, with great fervour of spirit said to him in the presence of all the brethren, "You would be seen of men as Friars Minor, and be called observants of the Holy Gospel, but for your works you wish to have store-chests!"

Yet though the Ministers knew that according to the Rule friars were bound to observe the Holy Gospel, nevertheless they caused that chapter to be removed from the Rule, "Take nothing with you in the way," believing that therefor they would not be held to the observance of the perfection of the Gospel. Knowing which by the Holy Spirit, blessed Francis said therefore before certain brethren, "The brothers Ministers think to deceive God and me;

though they know that all friars are bound to observe the perfection of the Holy Gospel. I will that it be written in the beginning and in the end of the Rule that friars are bound to strictly observe the Holy Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that the brethren be for ever without excuse, since I have announced and do announce to them those things which the Lord for their and my salvation placed in my mouth. I wish to show it by my works in the presence of God, and with His aid to observe it for ever." Whence he observed to the letter all the Holy Gospel from the first time when brethren began to join themselves to him unto the day of his death.

CHAPTER IV

Of the novice who would fain have a psalter with his leave

On another time a certain brother novice who knew how to read the psalter, though not well, obtained from the Minister-General leave to have one; yet, because he heard that blessed Francis wished his brethren not to desire knowledge and books, he was not content to have it without the leave of blessed Francis. When therefore blessed Francis had come to the place where that novice was, the novice said, "Father, it would be a great solace to me to have a psalter, but though the General has conceded it to me, yet I wish to have it, Father, with thy knowledge." To whom the blessed Francis answered, "Charles the Emperor, Roland and Oliver,¹ and all the Paladins and strong men, being mighty in war, chasing the infidels with much travail and sweat to the death, had over them notable victory, and at the last themselves did die in battle, holy martyrs for the faith of Christ; but now there are many who would fain receive honours and human praise for the mere telling of the things which those others did. So also amongst ourselves are many who would fain receive honours and praise by reciting and preaching only the works which the saints did." (As if he would say, "Books and science should not be esteemed, but rather vir-tuous labours, since knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.") But after a few days, when blessed Francis was sitting at the fire, the same novice spoke to him again of the psalter. And blessed Francis said to him, "After you have a psalter, you will desire and wish to have a breviary. Then you will sit in your chair, like a great prelate, and say to your brother, 'Bring me the breviary?'" So saying, blessed Francis with great fervour of spirit took up some ashes and put them on his head, and, drawing his hand over his head in a compass like one who washes the head, said, "I, a breviary, I, a breviary!" And he repeated it thus many times, drawing his hand over his head. And that brother was amazed and ashamed. Afterwards blessed Francis said to him, "Brother, I likewise was tempted to have books, but, when I might not know the will of the Lord concerning this, I took up a book wherein the Gospels of the Lord were written, and I prayed the Lord that in the first opening of the book He would show me His will concerning this thing. And when the prayer was finished in the first opening of the book I lighted on that saying of the Holy Gospel: Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of God, but unto others in parables." And he said, "There are so many who willingly rise unto knowledge, that he shall be blessed who makes himself barren for the love of God." But many months having passed, when blessed Francis was at the dwelling of St. Mary of the Portiuncula, near the cell beyond the house in the street, the aforesaid brother spoke again to him of the psalter. To whom blessed Francis said, "Go and do concerning this what thy Minister tells thee." And when he heard this, that brother began to return by the road whence he had come. And blessed Francis remaining in the street began to consider what he had said to that brother, and immediately called after him, saying, "Wait for me, brother, wait!" And he came up to him, and said to him, "Turn back with me, brother, and show me the place where I said unto thee that thou shouldst do in the matter of the psalter as thy Minister should say." When therefore they had arrived at the place, blessed Francis kneeled before that brother, and said, "Mea culpa, brother, mea culpa, for whosoever will be a Friar Minor should have nothing except a tunic, as the Rule concedes to him, and a cord and breeches, and those who are forced by manifest necessity, sandals." Whence as often as friars came to him to have his counsel on these matters, he used to answer them on this wise, because, as he often used to say, "As much knowledge hath a man as he doth work, and a Religious is as good a speaker as his works proclaim, for the worker is known by his fruit."

CHAPTER V

Of keeping poverty in books and beds and utensils

The most blessed Father used to say that we should look for proof and not price in books, edification not ornament. He wished that few be owned and those in common, befitting the poverty and necessity of friars. In beds and bedding so great poverty abounded, that he who had half-worn-out rags over his chaff reputed them mattresses.

He hated further his friars to make their huts poor and their little cabins of wood, not of stone, and he would have them be constructed and built of mean appearance, and not only did he hate pride in dwellings, but also he did much abhor many or choice utensils. He loved that they should preserve in their tables or in their vessels nothing of worldly seeming, by which they should recall the world, so that all things should end in poverty, should sing out to them of their pilgrimage and exile.

CHAPTER VI

How he made all the friars depart from a certain house which was called the House of the Friars

When he was passing through Bologna he heard that a House of Friars had been newly builded there. And immediately when he had heard that house called the House of the Friars, he turned on his steps and went out of the city, and ordered most strictly that all the friars should depart in haste, and no longer dwell therein. Therefore all the friars went out, so that even the sick did not remain there, but were turned out with the others, until Dom Hugo, Bishop of Ostia, and Legate in Lombardy, publicly announced that the said house belonged to him. And a sick friar who was turned out from that same house bears witness to these things and wrote these words.

CHAPTER VII

How he would fain destroy a certain house which the folk of Assisi had made at St. Mary of the Portiuncula

When the Chapter-General was drawing near which took place each year at St. Mary of the Portiuncula, the people of Assisi, considering that the friars were daily multiplying, and that every year all were used to assemble together there, although they had but one small cell thatched with straw whose walls were of wattle¹ and mud, having held their council, did in a few days with very great devotion and respect build there a great house of stone and lime, without the consent of blessed Francis, and in his absence. And when the blessed Father returned from a certain province and came thither for the Chapter, he marvelled greatly at that house constructed there, and fearing lest by occasion of that house other friars would cause to be made likewise great houses in the places in which they dwelt and should dwell, and because he wished that place to be the form and example of all other places of the Order, before the Chapter was finished he went up on the roof of that house, and ordered the friars to come up with him, and together with those friars he began to throw down on the ground the laths with which the house had been covered, being fain to destroy it even to the foundations. But certain men-at-arms of Assisi who were there to guard the place on account of the crowds of rabble who had come together to see the Chapter of the Friars, seeing that blessed Francis with other friars wished to pull the house to pieces, forthwith went to him and said, "Brother, this house belongs to the Commune of Assisi, and we be here on the part of that Commune. Whence we forbid thee to destroy our house." Hearing this, blessed Francis said to them, "Therefore if it be yours, I will not touch it." And straightway he and the friars came down from it. (For which cause the folk of the City of Assisi made a law that from that time forth their Podestà,¹ whoever he should be, should cause that house to be repaired. And every year for a long time this law was observed.)

¹ Twisted twigs and the like.

CHAPTER VIII

How he blamed his vicar because he was making a little house to be built for saying the office

On another time the Vicar of blessed Francis began to have built in that place a little house where the friars might rest and say their Hours, since for the multitude of friars who came to that place they had no place wherein to say the Office. For all the brethren of the Order came together there, because no one was received into the Order save only there. And now, when the house was complete, blessed Francis returned to that place, and being in that cell heard the noises of those labouring there, and calling to him his companion he asked him what those brethren were doing. To whom his companion told all things as they were. Then forthwith he caused the Vicar to be called, and said to him, "Brother, this place is the form and example of the whole Order, and I would therefore rather that the friars of this place should bear tribulation and inconveniences for the love of the Lord God, and that other friars who come hither should carry away with them a good example of poverty to their own place, than that they should have their consolations fully, and that others should take an example of building in their own places, saying, 'In this place of Blessed Mary of the Portiuncula, which is the chief place of the Order, there are such and so great buildings; we also may well build in our own places.'"

ORIENTAL

OMAR KHAYYĀM

(ca. 1050-1125)

According to the traditional account of his life, Omar was born in the Persian village of Naishāpur, formerly one of the four great cities of Khorassan, and was educated at the school of the famous sage Imām Mowaffak. One of his schoolmates was Nizām-ul-Mulk, who later became Vizier to the Sultan Alp Arslan. In accordance with a pledge that the schoolmates should share whatever fortune befell them, the Vizier granted to Omar the shelter of the court and a yearly pension, so that he might pursue his studies unhindered. He achieved great distinction in the study of astronomy and mathematics, and was one of the eight men selected by Malik Shah to revise the calendar. His professional poetical name Khayyām means a "tent-maker," and it may be that he followed the trade during the years before he was made independent by the generosity of Nizām-ul-Mulk.

Omar's fame rests on his Rubāiyāt, a collection of epigrammatic verses written in quatrains (rubāi), of which the first, second, and the fourth lines bear the same rhyme. He belonged to a pantheistic sect of Mohammedanism, called the Sufis, whose custom it was to disguise their mystic beliefs under a cloak of apparent epicureanism. It is with this in mind that Omar's praise of earthly joys should be read and interpreted. His philosophy of life is at once meditative, melancholy, and pessimistic.

⁷ Founder of the Kaianian dynasty, the most celebrated of all the dynasties of ancient Persia. According to legend he was placed on the throne by the help of Rustum.

That just divides the desert from the sown,
 Where name of Slave and Sultan is forgot —
 And Peace to Mahmúd¹ on his golden Throne!

A Book of Verses underneath the Bough,
 A Jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread — and Thou Beside me singing in the Wilderness —
 Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow!

Some for the Glories of This World; and some Sigh for the Prophet's Paradise to come;
 Ah, take the Cash, and let the Credit¹⁵ go,
 Nor heed the rumble of a distant Drum!

Look to the blowing Rose about us — 'Lo,
 Laughing,' she says, 'into the world I blow,
 At once the silken tassel of my Purse²⁰
 Tear, and its Treasure on the Garden throw.'

And those who husbanded the Golden grain,
 And those who flung it to the winds like Rain,
 Alike to no such aureate Earth are turned
 As, buried once, Men want dug up again.³⁰

The Worldly Hope men set their Hearts upon Turns Ashes — or it prospers; and anon,
 Like Snow upon the Desert's dusty³⁵ Face,
 Lighting a little hour or two — is gone.

Think, in this battered Caravanserai²
 Whose Portals are alternate Night and Day,⁴⁰
 How Sultán after Sultán with his Pomp
 Abode his destined Hour, and went his way.

They say the Lion and the Lizard keep

The Courts³ where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep:
 And Bahrá⁴, that great Hunter — the Wild Ass
 Stamps o'er his Head, but cannot break his Sleep.

I sometimes think that never blows so red
 The Rose as where some buried Cæsar bled;
 That every Hyacinth the Garden wears
 Dropt in her Lap from some once lovely Head.

And this reviving Herb whose tender Green
 Fledges the River-Lip on which we lean —
 Ah, lean upon it lightly! for who knows
 From what once lovely Lip it springs unseen!

Ah, my Belovèd, fill the Cup that clears
 To-day of past Regret and future Fears:
 To-morrow! — Why, To-morrow I may²⁰
 be Myself with Yesterday's Sev'n thousand Years.

For some we loved, the loveliest and the best²⁵
 That from his Vintage rolling Time hath prest,
 Have drunk their Cup a Round or two before,
 And one by one crept silently to rest.

And we, that now make merry in the Room
 They left, and Summer dresses in new bloom, Ourselves must we beneath the Couch of Earth Descend — ourselves to make a Couch — for whom?

Ah, make the most of what we yet may spend,
 Before we too into the Dust descend;
 Dust into Dust, and under Dust to lie,
 Sans Wine, sans Song, sans Singer, and —⁴⁵
 sans End!

Alike for those who for TO-DAY prepare,
And those that after some TO-MORROW stare,

A Muezzin¹ from the Tower of Darkness cries,
'Fools, your Reward is neither Here nor
There.'

Why, all the Saints and Sages who discussed

Of the Two Worlds so wisely — they are thrust

Like foolish Prophets forth; their Words to Scorn

Are scattered, and their Mouths are stopt 15 with Dust.

Myself when young did eagerly frequent Doctor and Saint, and heard great argument

About it and about: but evermore Came out by the same Door where in I went.

With them the seed of Wisdom did I sow, 25
And with mine own hand wrought to make it grow;

And this was all the Harvest that I
reaped —

'I came like Water, and like Wind I go.' 30

Into this Universe, and Why not knowing Nor Whence, like Water willy-nilly flow-
ing;

And out of it, as Wind along the Waste, 35
I know not Whither, willy-nilly blowing.

What, without asking, hither hurried Whence?

And, without asking, Whither hurried 40
hence!

Oh, many a Cup of this forbidden Wine Must drown the memory of that insolence!

Up from Earth's Centre through the Seventh Gate

I rose, and on the Throne of Saturn²
sate,

And many a Knot unraveled by the 50
Road;

But not the Master-knot of Human
Fate.

There was the Door to which I found no
5 Key;

There was the Veil through which I might not see:

Some little talk awhile of ME and THEE
There was — and then no more of THEE
10 and ME.

Earth could not answer; nor the Seas that mourn

In flowing Purple, of their Lord forlorn;
Nor rolling Heaven, with all his Signs revealed

And hidden by the sleeve of Night and Morn.

20 Then of the THEE IN ME who works behind
The Veil, I lifted up my hands to find

A Lamp amid the Darkness; and I
heard,

As from Without — 'THE ME WITHIN THEE BLIND!'

Then to the Lip of this poor earthen Urn
I leaned, the Secret of my Life to learn:

And Lip to Lip it murmured — 'While you live,

Drink! — for, once dead, you never shall return.'

I think the Vessel, that with fugitive

35 Articulation answered, once did live,

And drink; and Ah! the passive Lip I kissed,

How many Kisses might it take — and
give!

For I remember stopping by the way

To watch a Potter thumping his wet Clay:

And with its all-obliterated Tongue

It murmured — 'Gently, Brother, gently, 45 pray!'

And has not such a Story from of Old

Down Man's successive generations rolled

Of such a clod of saturated Earth

Cast by the Maker into Human mould?

And not a drop¹ that from our Cups we throw
 For Earth to drink of, but may steal below
 To quench the fire of Anguish in some 5
 Eye
 There hidden — far beneath, and long ago.

As then the Tulip for her morning sup
 Of Heav'nly Vintage from the soil looks up, 10
 Do you devoutly do the like, till Heav'n
 To Earth invert you — like an empty Cup.

Perplexed no more with Human or Divine, 15
 To-morrow's tangle to the winds resign,
 And lose your fingers in the tresses of
 The Cypress-slender Minister of Wine.

And if the Wine you drink, the Lip you 20
 Press,
 End in what All begins and ends in —
 Yes;
 Think then you are TO-DAY what
 YESTERDAY 25
 You were — TO-MORROW you shall not be less.

So when the Angel² of the darker 'Drink
 At last shall find you by the river- 30
 brink,
 And, offering his Cup, invite your Soul Forth to your Lips to quaff — you shall not shrink.

Why, if the Soul can fling the Dust aside, 35
 And naked on the Air of Heaven ride, Were't not a Shame — were't not a Shame for him
 In his clay carcase crippled to abide?

'Tis but a Tent where takes his one day's 40
 rest
 A Sultán to the realm of Death address;
 The Sultán rises, and the dark Ferrásh³
 Strikes, and prepares it for another Guest. 45

And fear not lest Existence closing your Account, and mine, should know the like
 no more;
 The Eternal Sáki⁴ from the Bowl has poured
 Millions of Bubbles like us, and will pour.

When You and I behind the Veil are
 past,
 Oh, but the long, long while the World shall
 last,
 Which of our Coming and Departure
 heeds
 As the Sea's self should heed a pebble-cast.

A Moment's Halt — a momentary taste
 Of BEING from the Well amid the Waste — And Lo! — the phantom Caravan has reached
 The NOTHING it set out from — Oh, make
 haste!

Would you that spangle of Existence spend
 About THE SECRET — quick about it, Friend! 25

Drink! for you know not why you go, nor where.

I tell you this — When, started from the Goal,

Over the flaming shoulders of the Foal,
Of Heav'n Parwin and Mushtari² they
flung,

In my predestined Plot of Dust and Soul

The Vine had struck a fibre: which about
If clings my Being — let the Dervish³

Of my Base metal may be filed a Key That shall unlock the Door he howls without.

As under cover of departing Day
Slunk hunger-stricken Rāmazān¹ away,
Once more within the Potter's house
alone
I stood, surrounded by the Shapes of Clay. 20

Shapes of all Sorts and Sizes, great and small,
That stood along the floor and by the wall;
And some loquacious Vessels were; and 25
some Listened perhaps, but never talked at all.

Said one among them — 'Surely not in
vain
My substance of the common Earth was ta'en

And to this Figure moulded, to be broke,
Or trampled back to shapeless Earth
again.'

Then said a Second — 'Ne'er a peevish
Boy
Would break the Bowl from which he drank in joy;
And He that with his hand the Vessel
made
Will surely not in after Wrath destroy.'

After a momentary silence spake
Some Vessel of a more ungainly Make;
'They sneer at me for leaning all awry:
What! did the Hand then of the Potter shake?'

Whereat someone of the loquacious Lot —
I think a Sūfi² pipkin³ — waxing hot —
'All this of Pot and Potter — Tell me
then,

5 Who is the Potter, pray, and who the Pot?'

'Why,' said another, 'some there are who tell

Of one who threatens he will toss to Hell
The luckless Pots he marred in making — Pish!

He's a Good Fellow, and 'twill all be
well.'

15 'Well,' murmured one, 'Let whoso make or buy,

My Clay with long Oblivion is gone dry:
But fill me with the old familiar Juice,
Methinks I might recover by and by.'

So while the Vessels one by one were speak-
ing,

The little Moon³ looked in that all were seeking:

And then they jogged each other,
'Brother! Brother!

Now for the Porter's shoulder-knot⁴
a-creaking!'

And wash the Body whence the Life has

And lay me, shrouded in the living Leaf,

Of Vintage shall fling up into the Air
As not a True believer passing by But shall be overtaken unaware.

Very few facts have come down to us regarding the activities of Walter Map. Undoubtedly he was of Welsh blood, but of Norman training and sympathies. He spent much time at the court of Henry II of England, and was a friend of such twelfth-century notables as Thomas à Becket and Giraldus Cambrensis. He held numerous important secular and ecclesiastical offices. Walter Map was a man of prodigious reading and of mercurial vivacity in writing. His omnivorous mind grasped at all things, and his free-flowing pen let his thoughts forth in a tumbling stream of folk-lore, anecdote, moralizing, court gossip, erudition, and satire. His style, in spite of the rapidity of his thought, is adorned with all the graces and extravagances that we have been taught to call euphuism, and yet one feels that his use of this style is prompted less by an urge for ostentation than by a desire to be in keeping with current practice.

Map's prediction that his tract Valerius to Ruffinus would be attributed to a Roman Valerius, was fulfilled. It is only in comparatively recent times that Map has been properly credited with this piece and relieved of the responsibility for the roistering Goliardic lyrics that for so many years bore his name. The tract, in which Valerius advises Ruffinus not to marry, is found in the fourth division of Courtiers' Trifles, a commonplace book or miscellany written by Map in Latin during a period of a dozen years. Valerius to Ruffinus could have been written in almost any period; but, knowing its true source, we are inclined to see in it the typical mediæval satire on women. Perhaps the most truly mediæval part of the tract is its collection of famous "examples," a feature of which writers in the Middle Ages were excessively fond.

This following selection is translated by Frederick Tupper and Marbury B. Ogle in Master Walter Map's Book De Nugis Curialium, London, 1924.

• VALERIUS TO RUFFINUS

I am forbidden to speak and yet I cannot be silent. I hate cranes and the voice of the owl, the bubo,¹ and other birds who forbode with doleful cries the bitterness of a muddy winter, and so dost thou deride the prophecies of the loss to come — true prophecies, too, if thou continuest in thy course.

I love the nightingale and the merle,² that herald with gentle harmony the delight of the soft air, and I love above all the swallow that filleteth to the brim the season of coveted joy with a rich plenty of pleasures — nor am I wrong.

Thou lovest parasites and players who whisper of sugared baits to come, and especially Circe, who doth cheat thee by pouring profusely sensual delights that are redolent of the aroma of sweetness long drawn out. For fear that thou be made swine or ass, I cannot hold my peace.

Ministering Babel pledgeth thee in the honeyed poison; it moveth itself aright, and awakeneth delight in thee and leadeth thy spirit's force whither it will. Hence I am forbidden to speak.

I know that 'at the last, it will bite as a serpent,' and will make a wound which will defy every antidote (treacle). Hence I cannot keep silent.

Thou hast many advocates of thy pleasures, most practised in pleading against thy well-being. Shall I be the only one to hold the tongue — I, who alone proclaim the bitter truth which thou loathest? Hence I am forbidden to speak.

The foolish 'voice of the goose among swans,' which are trained only to give pleasure, hath been blamed, yet the voice of the goose taught the senators to save the city¹ from burning, their treasures from theft, themselves from the enemy's weapons. Perchance thou, too, wilt understand, with the senators, because thou art wise, that the swans chant death to you and the goose hisseth safety. Hence I cannot keep silent.

Thou art all aflame with thy desires, and, being ensnared by the beauty of a lovely person, thou knowest not, poor wretch, that what thou seekest is a chimera. But thou art doomed to know that this triform monster, although it is beautified with the face of a noble lion, yet is blemished with the belly of a reeking kid and is beweaponed with the virulent tail of a viper. Therefore I am forbidden to speak.

Ulysses was enticed by the song of the sirens, but because 'he knew the voices of the sirens and the cups of Circe,' he won for himself, by the fetters of virtue, the power of shunning the abyss. Moreover, I, trusting in the Lord, predict that thou wilt be the imitator of Ulysses, not of Empedocles,² who, under the power of his philosophy, to say nothing of his melancholy, chose Etna as his tomb, and that thou wilt hearken to the parable which thou hearest; but of this I am afraid. Hence I cannot keep silent.

Finally, stronger is that flame of thine by which a part of thee hath become the foe of thyself, than that flame in thee by which thou art kindled into love of me. Lest the greater draw the lesser to itself and I die, therefore I am forbidden to speak.

That I may speak with the spirit in which I am thine, let the fires be weighed in any scale, equal or unequal, and let whatever thou mayst do or decide result in the danger of my life. Thou must indulge me who, out of the impatience of my love, cannot keep silent.

The first wife of the first man (Adam) after the first creation of man, by the first sin, relieved her first hunger against God's

¹ A Roman tradition has it that the cackling of geese aroused the guard and saved the city from a surprise attack.

² Empedocles was a Greek philosopher, who, the legends claim, wishing to have it believed that he had been caught up to heaven, threw himself into the crater of Mount Aetna.

³ The wife of Uriah the Hittite. David, because of his love for her, brought about the death of her husband and married her.

direct command. Great hath been the spawn of Disobedience, which until the end of the world will never cease from assailing women and rendering them ever unwearied in carrying to the fell consequences their chief inheritance from their mother. O friend, a man's highest reproach is a disobedient wife. Beware!

The truth of God, which cannot err, saith of the blessed David: 'I have found a man after mine own heart.' Yet even he is a signal instance of descent, through the love of woman, from adultery to homicide, that 'offences may never come singly.' For every sin is rich in abundant company and surrendereth whatever home it entereth to the pollution of its fellow vices. O friend, Bathsheba³ spake not a word and maligned no man, yet she became the instigation of the overthrow of the perfect man and the dart of death to her innocent mate. Shall she be held guiltless who shall battle by her charm of speech as Samson's Delilah, and by her grace of form as Bathsheba, although her beauty alone may have triumphed without her will? If thou art not more after God's heart than David, doubt not that thou too mayst fall.

That sun of men, Solomon, treasure-house of the Lord's delights, chief dwelling-place of wisdom, was darkened by the inky blackness of shadows and lost the light of his soul, the fragrance of his fame, the glory of his home, by the witchery of women. At the last, having bowed his knee to Baal, he was degraded from a priest of the Lord to a limb of the devil, so that he seemed to be thrust over a yet greater precipice than Phœbus, who, after Phæton's fall, was changed from the Apollo of Jove into the shepherd of Admetus. Friend, if thou art not wiser than Solomon — and no man is that — thou art not greater than he who can be bewitched by woman. 'Open thine eyes and see.'

Even the very good woman, who is rarer

than the phoenix, cannot be loved without the loathsome bitterness of fear and worry and constant unhappiness. But bad women, of whom the swarm is so large that no spot is without their malice, punish bitterly the bestowal of love, and devote themselves utterly to dealing distress, 'to the division of soul and body.' O friend, a trite moral is, 'Look to whom thou givest.' True morality is, 'Look to whom thou givest thyself.'

Lucretia and Penelope, as well as the Sabine women,¹ have borne aloft the banners of modesty and they have brought back trophies with but few in their following. Friend, there is now no Lucretia, no Penelope, no Sabine woman. Fear all the sex.

Scylla,² the daughter of Nisos, and Myrrha,³ the daughter of Cinyras, have opposed the Sabine battle-lines, and have led in their train great throngs attended by an army of all the vices, so that they dispense to their captives groanings and sighs, and, in the end, hell itself. My friend, lest thou become the prey of merciless pillages, thou must not slumber while their army is passing.

Jupiter, king of earth, who was also called king of heaven on account of his matchless might of body and his peerless excellence of mind, compelled himself to bellow for Europa.⁴ My friend, lo, him whom worth lifted above the heavens, a woman hath lowered to the level of brutes! A woman will have the power to compel thee to bellow unless thou art greater than Jupiter, to whose greatness no one else was equal.

Phoebus, who first environed the round of the whole world with the rays of his wisdom, so that he might rightly win the sole honour of the name of Sol, was infatuated with the love of Leucothoe,⁵ to his own disgrace and her destruction; and, through the repeated change of the eclipse, he frequently came to lack his own light, of which the whole world felt the loss. My friend, 'lest the light which is in thee be turned to darkness,' flee Leucothoe.

Then there was Mars, who attained the name of 'God of Battles' through the well-known number of victories, in which his ready valour stood him greatly in stead. Although he knew no fear for himself, he was bound with Venus by Vulcan⁶ in chains, invisible, to be sure, but tangible — this too amid the mocking applause and the derision of the heavenly court. My friend, meditate at least upon the chains which thou dost not see and yet already in part feel, and snatch thyself away while they are still breakable, lest that lame and loathsome smith whom 'no god ever honoured at his board nor goddess with her bed' shall chain thee in his fashion to his Venus and shall make thee like unto himself, lame and loathsome, or, what I fear more, shall render thee club-footed; in such wise that thou canst not have the saving grace of a cloven hoof, but, bound to Venus, thou wilt become the distress and laughing-stock of onlookers, while the blind applaud thee and those with sight threaten.

Pallas was condemned by a false judge⁶ of goddesses, since she promised to bestow not pleasure but profit. Friend, dost thou, too, ever judge in this wise?

I mark that thou, in growing disgust of spirit, art turning very rapidly the leaves before thee and art not attending to the meaning, but art awaiting the figures of rhetoric. In vain 'thou waitest for this muddy river' to flow out or for these noisome floods to pass and to yield to currents of pure water; since all streams must be like their source, either muddy or clear. Thus the weakness of my speech expresseth

the ignorance of my heart, and the swelling unevenness of my diction offendeth a delicate spirit. Conscious as I am of this weakness, I should have abandoned gladly this task of dissuasion; but, because I could not hold my peace, therefore I spake as well as I could. But, if I possessed as much merit of style as zest of writing, I should send thee such fine words, mated in such noble union, that each of them apart and all of them together would seem to bless the author. But because thou owest to me everything that a lover as yet bare and unfruitful — I do not say barren — can deserve from all men, lend me meantime thine ear in patience while I unfold what I have enfolded. And do not exact from me the rouge and white lead of the orator, my ignorance of which I confess and bemourn, but accept the will of the writer and the truth of his page.

Julius Cæsar, 'for whose greatness the world was too narrow,' on the day that too cruel Atropos¹ dared to break the thread of his noble life, bent his ear humbly, at the doors of the Capitol, to Tongillus — a poor man, indeed, but a prophet — when he offered him tablets (of writing). Had he, instead, bent his mind to the warning, his murderers and not he would have paid the penalty. Thou indeed inclinest thine ear to me, the sender of this writing, as the asp to charmers; but thou offerest thy mind as a boar to dogs. Thou art as soothed as the serpent dipsas,² upon which the sun shone with equatorial rays. Thou art as thoughtful for thyself as was the betrayed Medea. Thou pitiest thyself as the sea the shipwrecked. In that thou restrainest thy hand, it is out of reverence to the king's peace. O my friend, the conqueror of the world, although nearly perfect, bent himself humbly to his faithful servant, and he almost escaped because he almost obeyed; and he yielded to punishment because he did not yield full obedience. Much humility availed him naught, because it was not full humility. What will thy wild savagery and thy inflexible vigour and thy dreaded haughtiness avail thee, if thou voluntarily rushest unarmed into the snares of robbers? Humble thyself, prithee, to the measure of his humility, who humbled under himself the whole world, and listen to thy friend. And if thou thinkest that Cæsar erred, not hearkening to counsel, listen and mark what hath happened to others, that their injury may be to thy profit. Without hurt is the chastening to which these patterns persuade thee. Thou art safe in some sanctuary or other, or thou languishest in some asylum. Cæsar looked upon the merciless traitors and did not turn back. If thou hast always evaded such self-discipline, thou hast found the pious impious (i.e. thou hast not been able to distinguish the pious from the impious).

King Phoroneus, who did not begrudge the transmission of treasures of law to his people, but was the first of the Greeks to make such studies precious, on the day when he entered upon the way of all flesh, said to Leontius his brother: 'I should have lacked naught that tendeth to the highest happiness had I always lacked a wife.' Leontius asked, 'And how did a wife stand in your way?' And he replied, 'All husbands know how.' My friend, would that thou hadst marriage behind thee and not before, that thou mightest know what hindereth happiness.

Pray what woman among thousands ever hath saddened with perpetual repulse the persistently solicitous suitor? What woman doth repeatedly reject the prayer of the petitioner? Her response hath a savour of favour, and, however hard she seemeth, she will always have in some corner or other of her words some hidden kindling for thy craving. However much she may deny, she denieth not altogether.

ginity of Danæ,¹ which was guarded by many a rampart. My friend, thus the unchaste raineth from heaven upon the maiden whose chastity hath triumphed over earth; thus he from heaven overcometh her whom the lowly enticeth not, thus the north wind overturneth the tree which the west wind doth not budge.

Perictione (Pennutia), a virgin verging on old age, and renowned for her chastity, at length conceived 'under the pressure of Apollo's phantom,' and bore Plato. My friend, lo, an apparition in sleep hath deflowered her whom many watchings have preserved undefiled, as every rose garden is always robbed of its crimson by a whirlwind. But to a good purpose — if anything of the sort can be called good — because Plato waxed like unto his father in wisdom, and became the heir of both the name and fame of his mighty sire.

My friend, are you amazed or are you, the rather, affronted, because in my parallels I point out heathen as worthy of your imitation, idolatries to a Christian, wolves to a lamb, evil men to a good. I wish you to be like unto the fruitful bee, which draweth honey from the nettle, 'so that you may suck honey from the stone and oil from the hardest rock.' I know the superstition of the heathen; but every one of God's creatures furnisheth some honourable illustration, whence He himself is called lion, or serpent, or ram. The unbelieving perform very many things perversely; nevertheless they do some things which, although barren in their case, would in ours bring forth fruit abundantly. But if those who lived without hope, without faith, without charity, indeed without a preacher, made coats of skins (in human wise), and, if we should become asses or sows or brutes in some inhuman form, of what reward of faith, of charity, of hope should we be deemed worthy, although we might behold prophets, apostles, and, chief of all, Him, the Lord of the pure heart, whom only pure eyes are permitted to perceive? Or if they have wearied themselves in the pursuit of their own designs with no perception of future bliss, but only with the hope of avoiding ignorant minds, what shall we have in return for our neglect of the sacred page, whose end is truth and whose illumination is 'a lamp unto the feet' and 'a light unto the path' to eternal light? Would that thou mayst select this sacred page, would that thou mayst peruse this, would that 'thou mayst bring this into thy chamber,' that 'the king may bring thee unto his'! Thou hast already ploughed closely this field of Holy Writ for the flowers of thy spring, in this thy summer 'He expecteth thee to make grapes'; to the hurt of this do not marry another lest, in the time of harvest, 'thou wilt make wild grapes.' I do not wish thee to be the bridegroom of Venus, but of Pallas. She will adorn thee with precious jewels; she will clothe thee in a marriage garment. These nuptials will boast Apollo as the attendant; the Fescennine² verses chanted there will be taught by the married Stilbon to the cedars of Lebanon. Devoutly but fearfully have I conceived the hope of this solemn union, which I so greatly desire; for this reason have I planned this whole reading; to this end, the whole discourse, albeit slowly, will hasten. With the firmness of this dissuasion is armed the whole man of me, whose dart, hardened with many a point of steel, thou dost now feel.

Hard is the hand of the surgeon, but healing. 'Hard is this speech also,' but healthy; and may thou find it useful as it is devoted. My friend, thou protestest that I inflict upon thee a narrow rule of living. So be it! For 'narrow is the way which leadeth to life,' nor is the path plain by which men proceed to a plenitude of joys. Nay, even to attain to moderate pleasures we must pass through rough places. Jason heard that he must voyage through a sea that up to this time had not been deflowered by ships or oars and must take his way by sulphur-breathing bulls and by the post of a poisonous serpent to the golden fleece. Employing a counsel that was sound but not sweet, he departed, and returned bringing the desired treasure. This humility of mind accepteth the worm-wood of surly truth; dutiful care doth fertilize it, and persistent service bringeth it to fruit. TRAVEL

MARCO POLO

(1254-1324)

Marco Polo, the Venetian, was son of Nicolo Polo, himself a notable traveller in the Orient. At the age of seventeen Marco was taken by his father to the court of the grand khan of Tartary. He received a position in the khan's household, and soon became a great favorite. Having learned the language and customs of the Tartars, he was frequently entrusted by the grand khan with diplomatic missions of the utmost importance. It was on these missions that he gathered most of the materials for his book of travels. After about seventeen years of service, Marco, his father, and his uncle received the reluctant consent of the grand khan to return for a visit to their own country. Loaded with presents of almost indescribable value, they departed, and, after a long and eventful journey, reached their home in Venice in 1295. Not long after their return, Marco was captured in a naval battle against the Genoese and was taken to Genoa to be imprisoned. During his captivity he dictated, from notes he had gathered on his travels, the material for the book now known as The Travels of Marco Polo. The book was originally written in French, and was later translated into all the principal languages of western Europe. The Travels of Marco Polo is not only the earliest authentic European account of China and the Far East, but it is also one of the most famous travel books ever written.

The present translation is that of Maraden, The Travels of Marco Polo the Venetian, revised and edited by Thomas Wright, London, Henry G. Bohn, 1854.

THE TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO

THE PALACE OF KUBLA KHAN

The grand khan usually resides during three months of the year, namely, December, January, and February, in the great city of Kanbalu, situated toward the northeastern extremity of the province of Cathay; and here, on the southern side of the new city, is the site of his vast palace, the form and dimensions of which are as follows. In the first place is a square enclosed with a wall and deep ditch; each side of the square being eight miles in length, and having at an equal distance from each extremity an entrance gate, for the concourse of people resorting thither from all quarters. Within this enclosure there is, on the four sides, an open space one mile in breadth, where the troops are stationed: and this is bounded by a second wall, enclosing a square of six miles, having three gates on the south side, and three on the north, the middle portal of each being larger than the other two, and always kept shut, excepting on occasions of the emperor's entrance or departure. Those on each side always remain open for the use of common passengers. In the middle of each division of these walls is a handsome and spacious building, and consequently within the enclosure there are eight such buildings, in which are deposited the royal military stores; one building being appropriated to the reception of each class of stores. Thus, for instance, the bridles, saddles, stirrups, and other furniture serving for the equipment of cavalry, occupy one storehouse; the bows, strings, quivers, arrows, and other articles belonging to archery, occupy another; cuirasses, corselets, and other armor formed of leather, a third storehouse; and so of the rest. Within this walled enclosure there is still another, of great thickness, and its height is full twenty-five feet. The battlements or crenated parapets are all white. This also forms a square four miles in extent, each side being one mile, and it has six gates, disposed like those of the former enclosure. It contains in like manner eight large buildings.

The spaces between the one wall and the other are ornamented with many handsome trees, and contain meadows in which are kept various kinds of beasts, such as stags, the animals that yield the musk, roebucks, fallow deer, and others of the same class. Every interval between the walls, not occupied by buildings, is stocked in this manner. The pastures have abundant herbage. The roads across them being raised three feet above their level, and paved, no mud collects upon them, nor rain-water settles, but on the contrary runs off, and contributes to improve the vegetation. Within these walls, which constitute the boundary of four miles, stands the palace of the grand khan, the most extensive that has ever yet been known. It reaches from the northern to the southern wall, leaving only a vacant space (or court), where persons of rank and the military guards pass and repass. It has no upper floor, but the roof is very lofty. The paved foundation or platform on which it stands is raised ten spans above the level of the ground, and a wall of marble, two paces wide, is built on all sides, to the level of this pavement, within the line of which the palace is erected; so that the wall, extending beyond the ground plan of the building, and encompassing the whole, serves as a terrace, where those who walk on it are visible from without. Along the exterior edge of the wall is a handsome balustrade, with pillars, which the people are allowed to approach. The sides of the great halls and the apartments are ornamented with dragons in carved work and gilt, figures of warriors, of birds, and of beasts, with representations of battles. The inside of the roof is contrived in such a manner that nothing besides gilding and painting presents itself to the eye. On each of the four sides of the palace there is a grand flight of marble steps, by which you ascend from the level of the ground to the wall of marble which surrounds the building, and which constitute the approach to the palace itself. The grand hall is extremely long and wide, and admits of dinners being served there to great multitudes of people. The palace contains a number of separate chambers, all highly beautiful, and so admirably disposed that it seems impossible to suggest any improvement to the system of their arrangement. The exterior of the roof is adorned with a variety of colors, red, green, azure, and violet, and the sort of covering is so strong as to last for many years. The glazing of the windows is so well wrought and so delicate as to have the transparency of crystal. In the rear of the body of the palace there are large buildings containing several apartments, where there is deposited the private property of the monarch, or his treasure in gold and silver bullion, precious stones, and pearls, and also his vessels of gold and silver plate. Here are likewise the apartments of his wives and concubines; and in this retired situation he dispatches business with convenience, being free from every kind of interruption.

On the other side of the grand palace, and opposite to that in which the emperor resides, is another palace, in every respect similar, appropriated to the residence of Chingis, his eldest son, at whose court are observed all the ceremonials belonging to that of his father, as the prince who is to succeed to the government of the empire. Not far from the palace, on the northern side, and about a bow-shot distance from the surrounding wall, is an artificial mount of earth, the height of which is a full hundred paces, and the circuit at the base about a mile. It is clothed with the most beautiful evergreen trees; for, whenever his majesty receives information of a handsome tree growing in any place, he causes it to be dug up, with all its roots and the earth about them, and, however large and heavy it may be, he has it transported by means of elephants to this mount, and adds it to the verdant collection. From this perpetual verdure it has acquired the appellation of the Green Mount. On its summit is erected an ornamental pavilion, which is likewise entirely green. The view of this altogether,—the mount itself, the trees, and the building form a delightful and at the same time a wonderful scene. In the northern quarter also, and equally within the precincts of the city, there is a large and deep excavation, judiciously formed, the earth from which supplied the material for raising the mount. It is furnished with water by a small rivulet, and has the appearance of a fish-pond, but its use is for watering the cattle. The stream passing from thence along an aqueduct, at the foot of the Green Mount, proceeds to fill another great and very deep excavation formed between the private palace of the emperor and that of his son Chingis; and the earth from hence equally served to increase the elevation of the mount. In this latter basin there is great store and variety of fish, from which the table of his majesty is supplied with any quantity that may be wanted. The stream discharges itself at the opposite extremity of the piece of water, and precautions are taken to prevent the escape of fish by placing gratings of copper or iron at the places of its entrance and exit. It is stocked also with swans and other aquatic birds. From one palace to the other there is a communication by means of a bridge thrown across the water. Such is the description of this great palace.

THE COURT OF KUBLA KHAN

When his majesty holds a grand and public court, those who attend it are seated in the following order. The table of the sovereign is placed before his elevated throne, and he takes his seat on the northern side, with his face turned toward the south; and next to him, on his left hand, sits the empress. On his right hand, on seats somewhat lower, are placed his sons, grandsons, and other persons connected with him by blood, that is to say, who are descended from the imperial stock. The seat, however, of Chingis, his eldest son, is raised a little above those of his other sons, whose heads are nearly on a level with the feet of the grand khan. The other princes and the nobility have their places at still lower tables, and the same rules are observed with respect to the females, the wives of the sons, grandsons, and other relatives of the grand khan being seated on the left hand, at tables in like manner gradually lower; . . . The tables are arranged in such a manner that the grand khan, sitting on his elevated throne, can overlook the whole. It is not, however, to be understood that all who assemble on such occasions can be accommodated at tables. The greater part of the officers, and even of the nobles, on the contrary, eat, sitting upon carpets, in the hall; and on the outside stand a great multitude of persons who come from different countries, and bring with them many rare and curious articles. Some of these are feudatories, who desire to be reinstated in possessions that have been taken from them, and who always make their appearance upon the appointed days of public festivity, or occasions of royal marriages.

In the middle of the hall, where the grand khan sits at table, there is a magnificent piece of furniture, made in the form of a square coffer, each side of which is three paces in length, exquisitely carved in figures of animals, and gilt. It is hollow within, for the purpose of receiving a precious vase, shaped like a jar, and of precious materials, calculated to hold about a tun, and filled with wine. On each of its four sides stands a smaller vessel, containing about a hogshead, one of which is filled with mare's milk, another with that of the camel, and so of the others, according to the kinds of beverage in use. Within this buffet are also the cups or flagons belonging to his majesty for serving the liquors. Some of them are of beautiful gilt plate. Their size is such that, when filled with wine or other liquor, the quantity would be sufficient for eight or ten men. Before every two persons who have seats at the tables, one of these flagons is placed, together with a kind of ladle, in the form of a cup with a handle, also of plate; to be used not only for taking the wine out of the flagon, but for lifting it to the head. This is observed as well with respect to the women as the men. The quantity and richness of the plate belonging to his majesty are quite incredible. Officers of rank are likewise appointed, whose duty it is to see that all strangers who happen to arrive at the time of the festival, and are unacquainted with the etiquette of the court, are suitably accommodated with places; and these stewards are continually visiting every part of the hall, inquiring of the guests if there is anything with which they are unprovided, or whether any of them wish for wine, milk, meat, or other articles, in which case it is immediately brought to them by the attendants.

At each door of the grand hall, or whatever part the grand khan happens to be in, stand two officers, of a gigantic figure, one on each side, with staves in their hands, for the purpose of preventing persons from touching the threshold with their feet, and obliging them to step beyond it. If by any chance one is guilty of this offence, these janitors take from him his garment, which he must redeem for money; or, when they do not take the garment, they inflict on him such number of blows as they have authority for doing. But, as strangers may be unacquainted with the prohibition, officers are appointed to introduce them, by whom they are warned of it; and this precaution is used because touching the threshold is there regarded as a bad omen. In departing from the hall, as some of the company may be affected by liquor, it is impossible to guard against the accident, and the order is not then strictly enforced. The numerous persons who attend at the sideboard of his majesty, and who serve him with victuals and drink, are all obliged to cover their noses and mouths with handsome veils or cloths of worked silk, in order that his victuals or his wine may not be affected by their breath. When drink is called for by him, and the page in waiting has presented it, he retires three paces and kneels down, upon which the courtiers, and all who are present, in like manner make their prostration. At the same moment all the musical instruments, of which there is a numerous band, begin to play, and continue to do so until he has ceased drinking, when all the company recover their posture; and this reverential salutation is made so often as his majesty drinks.

It is unnecessary to say anything of the victuals, because it may well be imagined that their abundance is excessive. When the repast is finished, and the tables have been removed, persons of various descriptions enter the hall, and amongst these a troop of comedians and performers on different instruments, as also tumblers and jugglers, who exhibit their skill in the presence of the grand khan, to the high amusement and gratification of all the spectators.

KUBLA KHAN'S HUNTING

When his majesty makes his progress in this manner, towards the shores of the ocean, many interesting occurrences attend the sport, and it may be truly said that it is unrivalled by any other amusement of the world. On account of the narrowness of the passes in some parts of the country where the grand khan follows the chase, he is borne upon two elephants, or sometimes a single one, being more convenient than a greater number; but under other circumstances he makes use of four, upon the backs of which is placed a pavilion of wood, handsomely carved, the inside being lined with cloth of gold, and the outside covered with the skins of lions, a mode of conveyance which is rendered necessary to him during his hunting excursions, in consequence of the gout, with which he is troubled.

In the pavilion he always carries with him twelve of his best gerfalcons, with twelve officers, from amongst his favorites, to bear him company and amuse him. Those who are on horseback by his side give him notice of the approach of cranes or other birds, upon which he raises the curtain of the pavilion, and, when he espies the game, gives directions for letting fly the gerfalcons, which seize the cranes and overpower them after a long struggle. The view of this sport, as he lies upon his couch, affords extreme satisfaction to his majesty, as well as to the officers who attend him, and to the horsemen by whom he is surrounded. After having thus enjoyed the amusement for some hours, he repairs to a place named Kakzarmodin, where are pitched the pavilions and tents of his sons, and also of the nobles, the life-guards, and the falconers; exceeding ten thousand in number, and making a handsome appearance. The tent of his majesty, in which he gives his audiences, is so long and wide that under it ten thousand soldiers might be drawn up, leaving room for the superior officers and other persons of rank. Its entrance fronts the south, and on the eastern side it has another tent connected with it, forming a capacious saloon, which the emperor usually occupies, with a few of his nobility, and, when he thinks proper to speak to any other persons, they are introduced to him in that apartment. In the rear of this there is a large and handsome chamber, where he sleeps; and there are many other tents and apartments (for the different branches of the household), but which are not immediately connected with the great tent. These halls and chambers are all constructed and fitted up in the following manner. Each of them is supported by three pillars of wood, richly carved and gilt. The tents are covered on the outside with the skins of lions, streaked white, black, and red, and so well joined together that neither wind nor rain can penetrate. Withinside they are lined with the skins of ermines and sables, which are the most costly of all furs; for the latter, if of a size to trim a dress, is valued at two thousand besants¹ of gold, provided it be perfect; but if otherwise, only one thousand. It is esteemed by Tartars the queen of furs. The animal, which in their language is named rondes, is about the size of a polecat. With these two kinds of skin, the halls as well as the sleeping-rooms are handsomely fitted up in compartments, arranged with much taste and skill. The tent-ropes, or cords by which they stretch the tents, are all of silk. Near to the grand tent of his majesty are situated those of his ladies, also very handsome and splendid. They have in like manner their gerfalcons, their hawks, and other birds and beasts, with which they partake in the amusement. The number of persons collected in these encampments is quite incredible, and a spectator might conceive himself to be in the midst of a populous city, so great is the assemblage from every part of the empire.

LYRIC POETRY

LATIN

To the reader who is inclined to think of the Latin literature of the Middle Ages as limited to edification and instruction, these lyrics may come as a pleasant surprise. They illustrate a phase of mediæval Latin literary activity that is far too little known. The rollicking boisterous spirit of the Glutton's Confession, though perhaps not entirely in consonance with modern taste, offers an entertaining contrast to the severely scholastic air that we have grown to think of as mediæval. On the other hand, the freshness and charm of the two love lyrics, The Nightingale and Sofly Blows the Wind of Summer, might come from any of the great lyric periods of modern literature.

The Glutton's Confession and Gaudeamus Igitur come from Wine, Women and Song, translation by J. A. Symonds, Oxford University Press, 1907. The other poems are translated by Howard Mumford Jones in The Romanesque Lyric by Philip Schuyler Allen, University of North Carolina Press, 1928.

•THE GLUTTON'S CONFESSION

In the public-house to die
Is my resolution;
Let wine to my lips be nigh
At life's dissolution:
That will make the angels cry,
With glad elocution,
'Grant this toper, God on high,
Grace and absolution!'

With the cup the soul lights up,
Inspirations flicker;
Nectar lifts the soul on high
With its heavenly ichor¹:
To my lips a sounder taste
Hath the tavern's liquor
Than the wine a village clerk
Waters for the vicar.

Nature gives to every man
Some gift serviceable;
Write I never could nor can Hungry at the table;
Fasting, any strippling to Vanquish me is able;
Hunger, thirst, I liken to Death that ends the fable.

Nature gives to every man
Gifts as she is willing;

I compose my verses when Good wine I am swilling,
Wine the best for jolly guest Jolly hosts are filling;
5 From such wine rare fancies fine
Flow like dews distilling.

Such my verse is wont to be
As the wine I swallow;
10 No ripe thoughts enliven me
While my stomach's hollow;
Hungry wits on hungry lips
Like a shadow follow,
But when once I'm in my cups,
15 I can beat Apollo.

GAUDEAMUS IGITUR

Let us live, then, and be glad

After youthful pastime had,
After old age hard and sad,
Earth will slumber o'er us.

Ere we kept, were keeping?
Go ye to the gods above;
Go to hell; inquire thereof:
They are not; they're sleeping.

O ROMA NOBILIS

Rome, thou imperial queen of the universe,
 Over all cities thou regent most excellent;
 Martyrdom's blood is thy roseate curse,
 The virgins' white lives are thy lilies all redolent!

With blessing and benison thee do we hail,
 Through the long centuries thou shalt
 prevail.

Thou, the omnipotent porter of paradise,
 Take, O thou Peter, the voice of our prayer;

From Israel's judging when thou shalt
 arise,

Be not irate nor implacable there —
 From temporal troubles to thee do we cry —

Hear thou our suffrages mercifully!

Sinners, we pray to thee, Paul, and petition thee;

• THE NIGHTINGALE

When spring leads out new buds across the wold,
 15 And leaves on greening branches swell,
 Sweet odors burn, and flowery seeds unfold,
 Then laugheth Philomel.

20 Her own sweet voice she knows, and from her throat
 With measured pause she stops and sings,
 And pausing, sings again her liquid note
 25 Of idle, summery things.

All day and night she singeth, giving sleep
 Amid melodious intervals,
 And lovelier solace shall no wanderer reap
 30 Than her sweet-throated calls.

Her voice is clearer than the zither's note
 When, grove and forest glade along,
 Her measured music stops such tunes as float
 35 From birds of lowlier song.

Then, soaring to the high tops of the trees
 Which she makes glorious with her
 wings,

40 Because of all the springtime joy she sees,
 She gladly sits and sings.

45•LIGHTLY BLOWS THE WIND OF SUMMER

Lightly blows the wind of summer,
 And the sun, the warm new-comer,
 50 Shines on earth, whose bosom bare Melts in that dissolving air.

Now the ruddy spring goes out
With her festal robes about,
Shaking o'er the world her flowers
And her leaves on forest bowers.

Now the beasts their lairs are finding,
And sweet birds their nests are binding,
Singing in the greenwood trees
Of the joys of marriages.

Why must I behold this mirth,
Hear this rapture in the earth —

Why, when sound and sight denying,
All my heart is given to sighing?

For, alas, alone I sit,
5 Thinking wanly over it;
If my head lifts from my knee,
Then I neither hear nor see.

O thou spirit of the spring,
10 Hear me, help me — everything,
Flower and seed and frond are there —
But my soul is sick with care.

GERMAN

WALTHER VON DER VOGELWEIDE

(ca. 1165-1230)

Walther von der Vogelweide was born between the years 1165 and 1168, probably in Southern Tyrol. He spent his youth in Austria, where he learned the art of the minnesinger. He belonged to the knightly class, but he was poor and had to earn his own living as a wandering minstrel. After a time Frederick II granted his request for a small pension. He lived for some time at the courts of Thuringia and Austria and died in 1230 in Würzburg. Walther, the most important of the minnesingers, is regarded by some as the greatest lyric poet before Goethe. His themes included love, nature, patriotism, and religion. He was held in high esteem by his contemporaries. Gottfried von Strassburg called him "the worthiest poet and the leader of all the singers."

•LOVE'S DREAM

I

Take, maid, this wreath from me —
So spake I once to a maiden sweet and fair,
Star of the dance you'll be,
If these flowers sweet thereto ye will but
wear.
If I rare jewels had, believe me,
In your hair I'd place them,
And joy to see you grace them;
Truth is't I tell, I'd not deceive ye.

II

So pleasing, maid, are ye
That gladly on ye would I this wreath bestow
As fair as it may be,
But so many bright-hued flowers still I
know
Which blossom in that meadow yonder:

From the ground they're springing 15 And the birds are singing,

III

She took the wreath from me
As a modest maiden overcome with shame;
Her cheek was red to see, 20 As the rose that 'neath white lilies is aflake.
And downward then her bright eyes turn-
ing,
Gracious bow she made me,
25 Kindly to repay me;
If more — from me ye'll not be learning.

IV

Methought that ne'er again
30 Joy so great as mine could anywhere I find.
There fell the flowers rain
From the trees on us who in the grass reclined.

Ah! see with joy my heart was leaping,
 Joyous was my dreaming,
 Blissful life was seeming, — Came day — and I awoke from sleeping.

v

Therefore constrained am I,

When fair maids I in summertime do see,
 In their eyes to spy,
 If I found her my pain might ended be.
 Oh! were she 'mongst these maids here
 5 dancing?

Ladies now aside lay
 Hats that your faces hide may, —
 See I my wreath-bound maid advancing?

MORNING PRAYER

Dear Lord, my Shepherd, I arise:
 Bless my footsteps and advise What course my wanderings shall lead
 me.
 Your strength and goodness shall display,
 Dear Lord, the splendor of your way.
 In your Mother's name preserve me!
 The angels faithfully did serve thee

As thou humble lay'st in sleep
 10 Among the cattle and the sheep:
 As child so young, as God so old.
 Joseph did with tender care
 Guard above thy manger there;
 So care for me that I may sense
 15 Within the shelter of thy fold
 My Saviour's omnipotence.

• A SONG AT DAYBREAK

Lovingly caresses
 A warrior well-bedight
 The lady in his arms:
 They view with love's alarms
 The sun's first feeble light.
 The lady thus addresses
 The day that draweth nigh, "Ah, woe unto the day
 That cometh once again.
 It bringeth only pain
 And takes my love away:
 Each kiss becomes a sigh."

"Beloved," said the knight,
 "Cease your sighs of woe;
 It behooves me to 20 Bid farewell to you,
 For I see the glow
 Of the morning light."
 "Lover, do not leave me
 Or speak of it again,
 25 My heart was filled with gladness
 Which now hath turned to sadness.
 Your haste to go brings pain
 And sorely doth grieve me."

FRENCH

ALAIN CHARTIER

(ca. 1386-1440)

Alain Chartier, a Norman poet of the fifteenth century, was born at Bayeux and received his education at the University of Paris. He was a general favorite, both as a poet and as a man. He held important positions at the French court and was so highly regarded in literary circles that he has been called the Father of French Eloquence.

His La Belle Dame Sans Mercy, of which the following selection is a part, has nothing in common with the famous poem of Keats except the title. It is a charming and graceful narrative of chivalric love and mediæval courtesy. The epithet sans merci was frequently applied to high-born ladies reluctant to yield to the importunities of sighing lovers. The total subjection of the suitor in this poem is fairly representative of the mediæval lover's suffering from the "malady of love," an ailment with a full list of symptoms and complications playfully elaborated by sophisticated wits.

The translation is that of the Middle English poet Sir Richard Ros.

LA BELLE DAME SANS MERCY

The bordes¹ were spred in right little space,

The ladies sat each as hem² seemed best,
There were no deadly seruants in the place,

But chosen men, right of the goodliest:
And some there were, peraventure most freshest,

That saw their judges full demure,
Without semblaunt, either to most or lest,
Notwithstanding they had hem vnder cure.³

Emong all other, one I gan espy,⁴

Which in great thought ful often came and went,

As one that had been rauished⁵ vtterly:

In his language not greatly dilligent,²⁰
His countenance he kept with great turment,

But his desire farre passed his reason,
For euer his eye went after his entent,

Full many a time, when it was no season.²⁵

To make chere sore himselfe he pained,

And outwardly he fained great gladnesse,

To sing also by force he was constrained,³⁰
For no pleasance, but very shamefastnesse⁶:

For the complaint of his most heauinesse⁷

Came to his voice, alway without request,³⁵

Like as⁸ the soun of birdes doth expresse,

When they sing loud in frithe⁹ or in forrest.

Other there were that serued in the hall,⁴⁰

But none like him, as after mine aduise,¹⁰

For he was pale, and somewhat lean withall,

His speech also trembled in fearfull wise,

And euer alone, but whan he did seruise,

⁵ All blacke he ware, and no deuise¹¹ but plain:

Me thought by him, as my wit could suffice,

¹⁰ His herte was nothing¹² in his own demain.

To feast hem all he did his dilligence,

And well he coud, right as¹³ it seemed me,

¹⁵ But euermore, whan he was in presence,¹⁴

His chere was done, it nolde none other be:

His schoolmaster had such auctorite,

That, all the while he bode still in the place,

Speake coud he not, but upon her beautie

He looked still with a right pitous¹⁵ face.

With that his head he tourned at the last

For to behold the ladies euerichone,¹⁶

But euer in one¹⁷ he set his eye stedfast

On her which his thought was most vpon,

³⁰ For of his eyen the shot I knew anone,

Which fearful was, with right humble requests:

Than to my self I said, by God alone,

Such one was I, or that I saw these jests.

³⁵ Out of the prease¹⁸ he went full easly

To make stable his heauie countenance,

And wote¹⁹ ye well, he sighed wonderly²⁰

For his sorrowes and wofull remembrance:

¹ Tables.

² To them.

³ Charge, care, attention.

⁴ Observed.

⁵ Stricken (by love).

⁶ Sense of shame.

⁷ Great burden.

⁸ Such as.

⁹ Copse.

¹⁰ According to my knowledge, as far as I know.

¹¹ Device worn upon the clothing.

¹² Not at all.

¹³ So.

¹⁴ In a large assembly.

¹⁵ Pitiful, mournful.

¹⁶ Each one.

¹⁷ Unchangeably.

¹⁸ Crowd.

¹⁹ Know.

²⁰ Wondrously.

Than in himsef he made his ordinance,
 And forthwithal came to bring in the messe,
 But for to judge his most wofull pennance,
 God wote it was a pitous entremesse.¹

After dinner anon they hem auanced
 To daunce aboue the folke euerichone,
 And forthwithall, this heuy mane he danced,
 Somtime with twain, and sometime with one:
 Unto hem all his chere was after one,²
 Now here, now there, as fell by auen-ture,³
 But euer among he drew to her alone
 Which he most dread of liuing creature.

To mine aduise good was his purueiance,⁴ Whan he her chose to⁵ his maistresse
 alone,
 If that her herte were set to his pleasance,⁶
 As much as was her beauteous person:
 For who so euer setteth his trust vpon
 The report of the eyen, withouten more,
 He might be dead, and grauen⁷ vnder
 stone,
 Or euer⁸ he should his hertes ease restore.

In her failed nothing that I coud gesse,
 One wise nor other, priuie nor apert,⁹
 A garrison she was of all goodlinesse,
 To make a frontier for a louers herte:
 Right yong and fresh, a woman full couert,
 Assured wele of port,¹⁰ and eke of chere,
 Wele at her ease withouten wo or smert,¹¹
 All vnderneath the standerd of dangers.¹²

To see the feast it wearied me full sore

For heauy joy doth sore the herte trauaile:

Out of the prease I me withdrow therefore,
 And set me downe alone behind a traile,
 5 Full of leaues, to see a great meruaile,
 With greene wreaths ybounden wonderly,
 The leaues were so thicke withouten faile,
 That throughout no man might me espy.

10 To this lady he came full courtesly, Whan he thought time to dance with her a trace,¹³
 Set in an herber, made full pleasantly, 15 They rested hem fro thens but a little space:
 Nigh hem were none of a certain compace,
 But onely they, as farre as I coud see:
 Saue the traile, there I had chose my place, 20 There was no more between hem two
 and me.

I heard the louter sighing wonder sore,
 For aye the more the sorer it him sought, 25 His inward paine he coud not keepe in
 store,
 Nor for to speake so hardie¹⁴ was he
 nought,
 His leech¹⁵ was nere, the greater was his thoght,
 30 He mused sore to conquer his desire:
 For no man may to more pennance be broght
 Than in his heat to bring him to the fire.

35 The herte began to swell within his chest,
 So sore strained for anguish and for paine,
 That all to peeces almost it to brest,¹⁶
 40 Whan both at ones so sore it did con-straine,
 Desire was bold, but shame it gan refraine,

¹ Appetizer.

² Equally good.

³ Chance.

⁴ Foresight, provision.

⁵ To be.

⁶ Pleasure.

¹² The quality known to the Middle Ages as "danger," meaning disdain, comprised one of the well-known conventions of ladylike behavior.

¹³ Step.

¹⁴ Bold.

¹⁵ Physician, another term common to the conventional vocabulary of chivalry, or "courtesy."

¹⁶ Broke, burst.

⁷ Buried.

⁸ Before.

⁹ Secret or manifest.

¹⁰ Bearing, deportment.

¹¹ Pain.

That one was large, the other was full
close:
No little charge was laid on him, certaine,
To keepe such werre,¹ and haue so many fose.

Full oftentimes to speak himself he pained,
But shamefastnesse and drede said euer
nay,

Yet at the last, so sore he was constrained,
Whan he full long had put it in delay,
To his lady right thus than gan² he say,
With dredeful³ voice, weeping, half in a
5 rage:
"For me was purueyed⁴ an vnhappy
day,
Whan I first had a sight of your vis-
age!"

GEOFFREY RUDEL

(12TH CENTURY)

The facts of the life of the famous troubadour, Rudel, are little known. The traditions connected with him are drawn chiefly from his Life, written in ancient Provençal, according to which he loved (though he had not seen), the Countess of Tripoli, for her great excellence and virtue. "And he made of her fair songs, with fair melodies, and with short verses, till he longed so greatly to see her, that he took the Cross and embarked upon the sea to gain sight of her." He fell ill and died in the arms of the Countess, who, on that self-same day, became a nun, for loss of him, and for grief at his death.

The tradition of Geoffrey has inspired many subsequent poets. It was used as the basis of Leopardi's Consalvo, of Carducci's Geoffrey Rudel, of a poem in Heine's Romanzero, of a ballad of Uhland, of Rostand's play The Faraway Princess, of Browning's Rudel to the Lady of Tripoli, and of Swinburne's The Triumph of Time.

The first poem following is the one he is supposed to have composed for the Countess on his deathbed. It is taken from The Lives of the Troubadours, translated by Ida Farnell, London: David Nutt, 1896.

• GEOFFREY RUDEL TO HIS FAR-OFF LADY

When May-days come, full tunefully
The birds do carol from afar,
Yet when I needs from there must be,
Where dwelleth my sweet love afar,
As drear to me as winter's snow
Are songs, or fairest flowers that blow,
So sad the heart within my breast.

No happiness I hope to see,
Fail I to win that love afar;
I know of none so fair as she
In any country near or far.
Her worth above all worth doth stand,
And captive in the Paynim's land
I'd gladly die at her behest.

10 Ah me! What joy, what ecstasy
To seek of her a refuge far!
Mayhap too she will shelter me
Beneath the roof, thus come from far;
Then there will be full many a kiss,
15 When far-off love in perfect bliss
Doth gaily reach the long-sought rest.

The God that made all things to be,
And formed for me this love afar,
Give me ere long the power to see 20 With such great joy my love afar,
That the gay bower or garden sweet,
Where first my Lady I may greet,
For aye may seem a palace blest.

• WHY SHOULD I LIVE?

Around, above, on every spray,
Enough instructors do I see,

² Did.

To guide my unaccustomed lay,
25 And make my numbers worthy thee:

³ Timid.
⁴ Provided.

Each field and wood and flower and tree,
Each bird whose notes with pleasure thrill,

As, warbling wild at liberty,
The air with melody they fill.

How sweet to listen to each strain!
But, without love, how cold, how vain!

The shepherds love the flocks they tend,
Their rosy children sporting near;
For them is joy that knows no end,
And, O, to me such life were dear!

To live for her I love so well,
To seek her praise, her smile to win, —
But still my heart with sighs must swell,
My heart has still a void within!

5 Far off those towers and castles frown
Where she resides in regal state,
And I, at weary distance thrown,
Can find no solace in my fate.

10 Why should I live, since hope alone
Is all to my experience known?

EUSTACHE DESCHAMPS

(ca. 1340-1415)

Eustache Deschamps (or, as sometimes called, Morel) held various official positions under Charles V in the latter part of the fourteenth century. He was a rude, rough, and apparently honest man, with a great capacity for drinking and grumbling. There is a certain material vigor in his poetry, however, that makes even his grumbling good entertainment.

The late Middle Ages are famous for their adulation of women and their abuse of marriage. Deschamps' Advice to a Friend is a fair sample. In the light of the fact that Deschamps had a wife and two children, who seem not to have suffered greatly, one may be justified in regarding this piece as purely literary ranting. The Ballad shows a different side of Deschamps' literary character. Elaborating on the age-old theme, the evanescence of earthly pleasures, he reveals a sort of bitter and harsh disillusion that contrasts rather unfavorably with the mock dismay of the writers in the Greek Anthology, the urbane and gentle cynicism of Horace, or the tender, romantic reminiscence of Villon's "Where are the snows of yesteryear?"

Both selections are from the translation of Henry Carrington in the Anthology of French Poetry.

ADVICE TO A FRIEND ON MARRIAGE

Ope! Who? A friend! What wouldst obtain?

Advice! Whereof? Is't well to wed? 15

I wish to marry. What's your pain?

No wife have I for board and bed,

By whom my house is wisely led.

One meek and fair I wish to gain,

Young, wealthy too, and nobly bred; 20

You're crazy — batter out your brain.

Consider! Grief can you sustain?

Women have tempers bold and dread;

When for a dish of eggs you're fain, 25

Broth, cheese, you'll have before you
spread:

Now free, you'll be a slave instead —

When married, you yourself have slain.

Think well. My first resolve is said;
You're crazy — batter out your brain.

No wife will be like her you feign;

On angry words you shall be fed,

So shall you bitterly complain,

With woes too hard to bear, bested:

Better a life in forest led

Than of such beast to bear the strain.

No! The sweet fancy fills my head;

You're crazy — batter out your brain.

ENVOY

Soon you will long that you were dead

When married; seek in street or lane

Some love. No! Passion bids me wed;

You're crazy — batter out your brain.

• BALLAD

- There is no flower, no violet e'er so sweet,
 Nor tree, nor brier; whatever charms
 they show,
 Beauty nor worth where all perfections
 meet,
 No man, nor woman, though her face bestow
 Bright locks, fair skin, cheeks that like roses glow,
 Or wise or foolish nought by nature made, 10
 Which length of time shall age not, and degrade,
 But the fierce hunter death shall hold in
 chase,
 And which, when old, the world will not 15
 upbraid:
 Old age ends all, in youth alone is
 grace.
- Age comes, th' allotted span can none extend:
 Old age ends all, in youth alone is grace.
- 5 Why then do blooming dame and youthful maids
 Such danger see in love and being loved?
 Like trampled grass, youth soon dries up and fades;
 'Tis folly, then, if pity be not proved
 For one another, for from life removed Both those who love and those who love defy,
 The latter pitiless shall blame descry;
 While kindly lovers shall renown embrace,
 And all the world shall prize and glorify,
 Old age ends all, in youth alone is grace.
- ENVOY
- Spring flowers that perfumes yield most exquisite,
 To charm our senses, last but for a day;
 Comes the rough wind and does the blossom smite,
 And lays it low or tears the leaves away:
 Thus trees and mortals hasten to decay. 25
 Nought Nature rules can against change contend:
 Whate'er on earth is born fell death shall
 end;
 E'en a small fever can man's life efface. 30
- 20 Prince, each one ought in youth's delightful prime
 To enjoy and snatch his fate-allotted time;
 Age shall our youth with other cares re-
 place:
 Thus from both periods shall we profit
 take.
 Let none through pride love unattempted
 make;
 Old age ends all, in youth alone is
 grace.

CHARLES D'ORLÉANS

(1391-1465)

Prince Charles D'Orléans was half Italian, the son of Valentine of Milan. He was captured at the Battle of Agincourt and was held prisoner in England for twenty-five years. Most of his poetry was written during his captivity. The scope of his poetry is not great. He seldom attempted anything ambitious, or if he did he soon tired of it. His touch was light and sure, and he knew how to adapt the phrase to the thought. His themes were not new, but he clothed old themes in fresh and attractive imagery. Gracefulness and good taste were his chief qualities as a poet. His "rondels" are especially graceful. A rondel is a poem running on two rhymes and having commonly fourteen lines. In the poetry of Charles d'Orléans we get a brief but splendid afterglow of French mediæval lyric poetry at its best. He has been called the "last of the trouvères."

The following poems are translated by Harry Carrington, in the Anthology of French Poetry.

• RONDEL

Hence away, begone, begone,
 Carking¹ care and melancholy!
 Think ye thus to govern me
 All my life long, as ye have done?
 That shall ye not, I promise ye:
 Reason shall have the mastery.
 So hence away, begone, begone,
 Carking care and melancholy!

If ever ye return this way,
 With your mournful company,
 A curse be on ye, and the day
 That brings ye moping back to me!
 Hence away, begone, I say,
 Carking care and melancholy!

RENOUVEAU

Now Time throws off his cloak again
 Of ermined frost, and cold and rain,
 And clothes him in the embroidery
 Of glittering sun and clear blue sky.
 5 With beast and bird the forest rings,
 Each in his jargon cries or sings;
 And Time throws off his cloak again
 Of ermined frost, and cold and rain.

River, and fount, and tinkling brook
 10 Wear in their dainty livery
 Drops of silver jewelry;
 In new-made suit they merry look;
 And Time throws off his cloak again
 Of ermined frost, and cold and rain.

FRANÇOIS VILLON

(1431- ?)

François de Moncorbier was a pupil of Guillaume de Villon, a chaplain whose name he later took. In 1449 he received the degree of bachelor of arts, and in 1452 became master of arts. His early life was spent in the quiet environment of his adoptive father's home, in the society of clerics and lawyers. He was not long content with this sedate circle, and gave himself over to the riotous pastimes of the turbulent University population. His first escapades seem to have been concerned mainly with dissipation and practical joking, but matters took a serious turn in 1455, when he killed a monk in a disgraceful brawl. He was forced to flee from Paris and to seek refuge among friends in Burgundy. In 1456 he received pardon for killing the priest and returned to Paris, but in the same year he and some companions robbed the college of Navarre. His consequent hasty departure from the city was the occasion for the composition of the Little Testament, a sardonic poem in which he bequeaths to his friends and enemies imaginary gifts of no value. When Villon heard that his companions in the robbery had been captured, he went to Poitou and joined the train of Charles d'Orléans. He is next heard of in 1461, when he had been released from prison at Meung-sur-Loire. Some time during this interval he composed the Great Testament, for he had it when he returned to Paris. This poem, drawn up in the jargon of legal procedure, is likewise ironical in tenor, but it bodies forth the sincere feelings and remorse of this derelict genius and contains several short lyrics of great beauty. In 1463 Villon was involved in another fatal brawl, was taken, tried, and condemned to death. The sentence was later commuted to banishment. This is the last detail known of his life.

Like Chaucer in England and Boccaccio in Italy, Villon as a poet was a pioneer of Renaissance individualism. A contemporary of troubadours and trouvères (Charles d'Orléans, his protector, was the last of the trouvères), he broke away utterly, in spirit and subject, from the traditions and conventions of mediæval poetry and attempted to picture the real life of his own day, particularly the life of the lower classes and the unclassed. In his representations of the everyday life of the poor and wretched, there is a lively personal note, a strong realization of the importance of the individual, a reflection of the turbulent love of life that characterizes the dawning Renaissance. Villon's expression of the evanescence of beauty is especially poignant. His Ballad of Dead Ladies, his best-known poem, is rather romantic than mediæval in tone. Although he lived in a society whose institutions were still mainly mediæval, Villon was so strongly imbued with the spirit of the new age that he saw the traditions of the Middle Ages through a rosy mist of illusion. Already he is sighing for the good old times. It is a very charming piece of sentimentality — perhaps the best we possess of its kind, although there are some who would award first place to Browning's A Toccata of Galuppi's. Although Chaucer in his Legend of Good Women and Tennyson in his Dream of Fair Women have dealt, externally at least, with the same subject, neither has quite caught the spirit of playful sadness which enriches Villon's poem and Browning's.

✓THE BALLAD OF DEAD LADIES

Tell me now in what hidden way is Lady Flora ¹ the lovely Roman?
 Where's Hipparchia,¹ and where is Thais,¹
 Neither of them the fairer woman?
 Where is Echo, beheld of no man,
 Only heard on river and mere, — She whose beauty was more than human? . . .
 But where are the snows of yesteryear?

Where's Héloïse, the learned nun,
 For whose sake Abeillard,² I ween,
 Lost manhood and put priesthood on?
 (From Love he won such dule and teen!)³
 And where, I pray you, is the Queen ⁴
 Who willed that Buridan should steer Sewed in a sack's mouth down the Seine? . . .
 But where are the snows of yesteryear?

White Queen Blanche,⁵ like a queen of
 lilies,
 With a voice like any mermaid —
 Bertha Broadfoot, Beatrice, Alice,⁶
 5 And Ermengarde the lady of Maine, —
 And that good Joan ⁷ whom Englishmen
 At Rouen doomed and burned her there, — Mother of God, where are they
 then? . . .
 10 But where are the snows of yesteryear?

ENVOI

Nay, never ask this week, fair lord, 15 Where they are gone, nor yet this
 year,
 Except with this for an overword, —
 But where are the snows of yester-
 year?

(Translated by Dante Gabriel Rossetti)

-A DOUBLE BALLAD OF GOOD COUNSEL

Now take your fill of life and glee,
 And after balls and banquets hie;
 In the end ye'll get no good for fee,
 But just heads broken by and by;
 Light loves make beasts of men that sigh;
 They changed the faith of Solomon
 And left not Samson lights to spy;
 Good luck has he that deals with none!
 Sweet Orpheus,⁸ lord of minstrelsy,

20 For this with flute and pipe came nigh
 The danger of the dog's heads three
 That ravening at hell's door doth lie;
 Fain was Narcissus, fair and sly,
 For love's love lightly lost and won,
 25 In a deep well to drown and die;
 Good luck has he that deals with none!

Sardana,⁹ flower of chivalry,
 Who conquered Crete with horn and cry,
 30 For this was fain a maid to be

² A great scholastic philosopher (1079–1142). He fell in love with Héloïse, one of his pupils, and secretly married her. She wished to retire to a convent to avoid injuring his career. When she departed, her relatives, enraged by what they thought was Abelard's desertion of her, attacked and mutilated him.

³ Grief and affliction.

⁴ There is a tradition that a certain queen of France used to lure students to the Tour de Nesle for her pleasure, and, when she had tired of them, order them thrown into the Seine. Buridan, a famous fourteenth-century teacher, is supposed to have had such an adventure and to have escaped with his life.

⁵ Blanche of Castile, mother of St. Louis (Louis IX).

⁶ Famous ladies of royal lineage.

⁷ Jeanne d'Arc.

⁸ When Orpheus went to Hell in search of his wife Eurydice, he had to pass by Cerberus, the three-headed dog who guarded the entrance.

⁹ Possibly Sardanapalus, although no such tale is told of that monarch.

And learn with girls the thread to
ply;
King David, wise in prophecy,
Forgot the fear of God for one Seen washing either shapely thigh¹;
Good luck has he that deals with none!

For this did Ammon,² craftily
Feigning to eat of cakes of rye,
Deflower his sister fair to see,
Which was foul incest; and hereby
Was Herod³ moved, it is no lie,
To lop the head of Baptist John
For dance and jig and psaltery;
Good luck has he that deals with none!

Next of myself I tell, poor me,

How thrashed like clothes at wash was I
Stark naked, I must needs agree;
Who made me eat so sour a pie
But Katherine of Vaucelles? thereby 5 Noé took third part of that fun;
Such wedding-gloves are ill to buy,
Good luck has he that deals with none!

But for that young man fair and free
10 To pass those young maids lightly by,
Nay, would you burn him quick, not he;
Like broom-horsed witches though he fry,
They are sweet as civet in his eye;
15 But trust them, and you're fooled anon;
For white or brown, and low or high,
Good luck has he that deals with none!

•HIS MOTHER'S SERVICE TO OUR LADY

Lady of Heaven and earth, and therewithal Crowned Empress of the nether clefts of Hell, —

I, thy poor Christian, on thy name do call, Commending me to thee, with thee to
dwell,

Albeit in nought I be commendable.
But all mine undeserving may not mar
Such mercies as thy sovereign mercies are;
Without the which (as true words testify)
No soul can reach thy Heaven so fair and far.

Even in this faith I choose to live and 30
die.

Unto thy Son say thou that I am His,
And to me graceless make Him gracious.
Sad Mary of Egypt⁴ lacked not of that 35
bliss,

Nor yet the sorrowful clerk Theophilus,⁵ Whose bitter sins were set aside even
thus

Though to the Fiend his bounden service 40
was.

Oh, help me, lest in vain for me should pass (Sweet Virgin that shalt have no loss thereby!)

20 The blessed Host and sacring of the Mass.
Even in this faith I choose to live and
die.

25 A pitiful poor woman, shrunk and old,
I am, and nothing learn'd in letter-lore.
Within my parish-cloister I behold
A painted Heaven where harps and lutes
adore,
And eke an Hell whose damned folk
seethe full sore;

One bringeth fear, the other joy to me,
That joy, great Goddess, make thou mine to be, —

Thou of whom all must ask it even as I;
And that which faith desires, that let it see.
For in this faith I choose to live and die.

² Reference is here made to the story of Ammon (Amnon) and Tamar (II Sam. xiii).

³ Herod, king of the Jews, who was moved by the dancing of the daughter of his wife, Herodias, to grant her request for the head of John the Baptist.

⁴ A famous Egyptian courtesan who was converted to Christianity and went to live the life of a hermit in the territory beyond the Jordan.

⁵ An early Egyptian martyr, whose deeds formed the basis of one of the popular Miracles of Our Lady in fourteenth-century France.

Who even of this our weakness craved a share
 And for our sake stooped to us from on high,
 Offering to death His young life sweet, and fair.
 Such as He is, Our Lord, I Him declare,
 And in this faith I choose to live and die.

✓BALLAD OF THE WOMEN OF PARIS

Albeit the Venice girls get praise
 For their sweet speech and tender air,
 And tho' the old women have wise ways
 Of chaffering for amorous ware,
 Yet at my peril dare I swear,
 Search Rome, where God's grace mainly 10
 tarries,
 Florence and Savoy, everywhere,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.
 5 Breton and Swiss know nought of the matter,
 Gascony girls or girls of Toulouse;
 Two fishwomen with a half hour's chatter
 Would shut them up by threes and twos;
 Calais, Lorraine, and all their crews (Names enow the mad song marries), England and Picardy, search them and choose,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.

The Naples women, as folk prattle, 15
 Are sweetly spoken and subtle enough:
 German girls are good at tattle,
 And Prussians make their boast thereof;
 Take Egypt for the next remove,
 Or that waste land the Tartar harries, 20
 Spain or Greece, for the matter of love,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.
 Prince, give praise to our French ladies
 For the sweet sound their speaking carries;
 'Twixt Rome and Cadiz many a maid is,
 But no good girl's lip out of Paris.

SPANISH

JORGE MANRIQUE

(1440?-1479)

Coming from a family prominent alike for culture and for military talent, Jorge Manrique occupies the front rank among Spanish poets of the fifteenth century. He distinguished himself both as a poet and as a soldier, and fell heroically in battle in the very prime of life.

It is because of the merits of the poem here printed that Manrique's name is immortal. The poem was written on the death of the author's father, which occurred in 1476. It is an elegy, a form which is almost sure to produce great artificiality of style and conventionality of content; and yet this poem stands as one of the most direct and sincere expressions of personal grief in the literature of Europe. Without making any attempt to moralize, the poet through his strong feeling of personal loss expresses sorrow for all the joy and glory that have vanished from the world, and achieves something of the same atmosphere of melancholy over the departure of earthly beauties that marks other famous poems on the same subject: Villon's Ballad of Dead Ladies, Du Bellay's Ruins of Time, Browning's Toccata, etc.

The translation is by Thomas Walsh in the Hispanic Anthology.

✓COPLAS

I turn me from the praise and singing
 Of panegyrists, and the proud Old poets' stories;
 I would not have them hither bringing
 Their artful potions that but cloud
 25 His honest glories;

On Him alone I lay my burden —
 Him only do I now implore
 In my distress, —

Who came on earth and had for guerdon
 The scorn of man that did ignore
 His Godliness.

This world is but a highway going
 Unto that other, the abode
 Without a sorrow;

The wise are they who gird them, knowing
 The guideposts set along that road
 Unto tomorrow.

We start with birth upon that questing;
 We journey all the while we live,
 Our goal attaining
 The day alone that brings us resting,
 When Death shall last quietus give
 To all complaining.

This were a hallowed world indeed,
 Did we but give it the employ
 That was intended;

For by the precepts of our Creed
 We earn hereby a life of joy
 When this is ended.

The Son of God Himself on earth
 Came down to raise our lowly race
 Unto the sky;
 Here took upon Him human birth;
 Here lived among us for a space;
 And here did die.

Behold what miserable prize —
 What futile task we set upon,
 Whilst greed awakes us!
 And what a traitor world of lies
 Is this, whose very gifts are gone
 Ere Death o'ertakes us!

Some through increasing age deprived,
 Some by unhappy turn of fate
 Destroyed and banished,
 Some, as with blight inherent rived
 At topmost of their branching state,
 Have failed and vanished.

Yea, tell me, shall the lovely blason,
 The gentle freshness and contour
 Of smiling faces, —
 The blush and pallor's sweet occasion, —

Of all — shall one a truce secure
 From Time's grim traces?

The flowing tress, the stature slender,
 5 The corporal liness, and the strength
 Of gallant youth, —
 All, all, — to weariness surrender
 As o'er them falls the shadow's length
 Of age in truth.

10 The Visigoths whose lineage kingly,
 Whose feats of war and mighty reign
 Were so exalted, —
 What divers ways did all and singly
 15 Drop down to the obscure again
 And were defaulted!

Some through their worthlessness (How lowly 20 And base among the rabble came
 Their estimation!),
 Whilst others as a refuge solely
 In offices they only shame,
 Maintain their station.
 25 Estate and luxury's providing Can leave us pauper — who may doubt? —
 Within an hour;

30 Let us not count on their abiding,
 Since there is nothing sure about Dame Fortune's dower.

Hers are the gifts of one unstable
 35 Upon her globe as swift as light
 Revolving ever;
 Who to be constant is unable,
 Who cannot stay nor rest from flight
 On aught soever.

40 And though, say I, her highest favor
 Should follow to the tomb and heap
 With wreaths her master;
 Let not our solid judgment waver
 45 Since life is like a dream and sleep
 Flies nothing faster.

The soft occasions of today
 Wherein we find our joy and ease
 50 Are but diurnal;
 Whilst the dread torments that must pay
 The cost of our iniquities
 Shall be eternal.

The pleasures light, the fond evasions
That life on troubled earth deploys
For eyes of mortals,
What are they but the fair persuasions
Of labyrinths where Death decoys
To trap-like portals?

Where heedless of the doom ensuing
We hasten laughing to the snare
Without suspicion.
Until, aghast at our undoing,
We turn to find the bolt is there,
And our perdition.

Could we but have procured the power
To make our faded youth anew
Both fresh and whole,
As now through life's probation hour
'Tis ours to give angelic hue
Unto the soul, —

What ceaseless care we then had taken,
What pains had welcomed, so to bring A health but human, —
Our summer bloom to re-awaken,
Our stains to clear, — outrivalling
The arts of woman!

The kings whose mighty deeds are spacious Upon the parchments of the years,
Alas! — the weeping
That overtook their boast audacious,
And swept their thrones to grime and tears
And sorrow's keeping!

Naught else proves any more enduring;
Nor are the popes, nor emperors,
Nor prelaties
A longer stay or truce securing
Than the poor herdsman of the moors
From Death's decrees.

Recount no more of Troy, or foeman,
The echo of whose wars is now
But far tradition;
Recount no more how fared the Roman (His scroll of glories we allow)
Nor his perdition;

Nor here rehearse the homely fable
Of such as yielded up their sway

These decades gone;
But let us say what lamentable
Fate the lords of yesterday
Have fallen upon.

5 Of fair Don Juan the king that ruled us, —
Of those hight heirs of Aragon, —
What are the tidings?
Of him whose courtly graces schooled us,
10 Whom song and wisdom smiled upon,
Where the abidings?

The jousts and tourneys where they vaunted
15 With trappings, and caparison,
And armor sheathing, —
Were they but phantasies that taunted, —
But blades of grass that vanished on A summer's breathing?

20 What of the dames of birth and station,
Their head-attire, their sweeping trains,
Their vesture scented?
What of that gallant conflagration
25 They made of lovers' hearts whose pains
Were uncontented?

And what of him, that troubadour
Whose melting lutany and rime
30 Was all their pleasure?
Ah, what of her who danced demure,
And trailed her robes of olden time
So fair a measure?

35 Then Don Enriqu  , in succession,
His brother's heir, — think, to what height
Was he anointed!
What blandishment and sweet possession
40 The world prepared for his delight,
As seemed appointed!

Yet see what unrelenting foeman,
What cruel adversary, Fate
45 To him became;
A friend befriended as was no man —
How brief for him endured the state
His birth might claim.

50 The golden bounties without stinting,
The strongholds and the lairs of kings
With treasure glutted;
The flagons of their wassail glinting,

The sceptres, orbes, and crowns, and rings
With which they strutted;

The steeds, the spurs, and bits to rein
them,
The pillions draped unto the ground
Beneath their paces, —
Ah, whither must we fare to gain them? —
That were but as the dews around
The meadow places.

His brother then, the unoffending,
Who was intruded on his reign
To act as heir, —
What gallant court was round him bend- 15
ing,
How many a haughty lord was fain
To tend him there!

Yet as but mortal was his station,
Death for his goblet soon distilled
A draught for draining;
O Thou Divine Predestination! —
When most his blaze the world had filled
Thou sent'st the raining!

And then, Don Alvaro, Grand-Master
And Constable, whom we have known
When loved and dreaded, —
What need to tell of his disaster,
Since we behold him overthrown
And swift beheaded!

His treasures that defied accounting,
His manors and his feudal lands,
His boundless power, —
What more than tears were their amount- 35
ing?
What more than bonds to tie his hands
At life's last hour?

That other twain, Grand-Masters solely,
Yet with the fortunes as of kings
Fraternal reigning, —
Who brought the high as well as lowly Submissive to their challengings
And laws' ordaining.

And what of all their power and prize
That touched the very peaks of fame
That none could limit? —

A conflagration 'gainst the skies,
Till at its brightest ruthless came Death's hand to dim it.

The dukes so many and excelling,
5 The marquises, and counts, the throng
Of barons splendid,
Speak, Death, where hast thou hid their dwelling?
The sway we saw them wield so 10 strong —
How was it ended?

What fields upon were they engaging, —
What prowess showing us in war
Or its cessation,
When thou, O Death, didst come outrag-
ing
Both one and all, and swept them o'er
With desolation.

20 Their warriors' unnumbered hosting,
The pennon, and the battle-flag,
And bannered splendor, —
The castles with their turrets boasting,
25 Their walls and barricades to brag
And mock surrender, —

The cavern's ancient crypt of hiding,
Or secret passage, vault, or stair, —
What use affords it?
30 Since thou upon thy onslaught striding Canst send a shaft unerring where No buckler wards it!

* * *

Speaketh Death

"Good Cavalier," — he cried, — "divest
you
Of all this hollow world of lies 40 And soft devices;
Let your old courage now attest you,
And show a breast of steel that vies
In this hard crisis!

45 "And since of life and fortune's prizes
You ever made so small account
For sake of honor,
Array your soul in virtue's guises
To undergo this paramount
50 Assault upon her!

"For you, are only half its terrors
And half the battles and the pains
Your heart perceiveth;
Since here a life devoid of errors
And glorious for noble pains
Today it leaveth;

"A life for such as bravely bear it
And make its fleeting breath sublime
In right pursuing,
Untainted, as is theirs who share it
And put their pleasure in the grime
Of their undoing;

"The life that is The Everlasting
Was never yet by aught attained
Save meed eternal;
And ne'er through soft indulgence casting
The shadow of its solace stained
With guilt infernal;

"But in the cloister holy brothers
Besiege it with unceasing prayer
And hard denial;
And faithful paladins are others
Who 'gainst the Moors to win it bear
With wound and trial.

"And since, O noble and undaunted,
Your hands the paynim's blood have shed
In war and tourney, —
Make ready now to take the vaunted
High guerdon you have merited
For this great journey!

"Upon this holy trust confiding,
And in the faith entire and pure
You e'er commended,
Away, — unto your new abiding,
Take up the Life that shall endure
When this is ended!"

Respondeth the Grand-Master

"Waste we not here the final hours

This puny life can now afford
My mortal being;
But let my will in all its powers
Conformable approach the Lord
5 And His decreeing.

"Unto my death I yield, contenting
My soul to put the body by
In peace and gladness;
10 The thought of man to live, prevent-
ing
God's loving will that he should die,
Is only madness."

The Supplication

15 O Thou who for our weight of sin
Descended to a place on earth
And human feature;
Thou who didst join Thy Godhead in 20 A being of such lowly worth
As man Thy creature;

Thou who amid Thy dire tormenting
Didst unresistingly endure
25 Such pangs to ease us;
Not for my mean deserts relenting,
But only on a sinner poor,
Have mercy, Jesus!

The Codicil

And thus, his hopes so nobly founded,
His senses clear and unimpaired
So none could doubt him, — 35 With spouse and offspring fond surrounded,
His kinsmen and his servants bared
And knelt around him, —
40 He gave his soul to Him who gave it (May God in heaven ordain it place
And share of glory!),
And left our life as balm to save it,
And dry the tears upon our face!
His deathless story.

ITALIAN

DANTE

Next to The Divine Comedy, the best known of Dante's works is the Vita Nuova. This is a series of sonnets accompanied by cold and analytical prose passages which contrast strangely with the deep fervor of the poems, written under the influence of Dante's Platonic love for Beatrice. Although this love was wholly ideal, the death of Beatrice in 1290 came as a devastating blow from which Dante never recovered. The canzone given here interprets his vision of Beatrice in Paradise. The Vita Nuova is interesting not only as a personal document but also as an example of the kind of love poetry that grew out of the rhapsodies of the troubadours, refined by a strong admixture of Platonic idealism. The devotion of the lover did not grow less by reason of its being analyzed and refined; and, while the sentiment which resulted from all this extreme analysis may be somewhat of a curiosity to the modern reader, he may find in it the same spirit that dominated the rhapsodic phrases of Shelley's Epipsychidion. For Dante's life, see p. 391.

The following selections were translated by Lorna de' Lucchi in the Minor Poems of Dante.

VITA NUOVA

SONNET I

To captured soul and gentle heart I bring
 A greeting fair in Love the master's name,
 That peradventure, happening on this 10
 thing,
 Each may discover meaning in the same.
 It was of time almost the hour of three,
 When every star shines brightly overhead,
 That Love appeared before me suddenly, 15
 To think of it still filleth me with dread.
 Gleeful Love seemed and in his hand was laid
 My heart and in his arms my lady sweet Lay, with a mantle wrapt about her, sleep- 20
 ing;
 He wakened her and humbly she did eat
 That burning heart of mine and looked afraid;
 Then I beheld him turn and go thence 25
 weeping.

✓ SONNET VIII

With other ladies you make mock of me, 30
 And heed not, lady mine, the reason why
 So strange a look upon my face you see
 Whenever I your loveliness descry.
 Were you informed of it, Pity would be 35
 In her defence less stubborn than of yore,

For Love, whenever he discovers me
 Beside you, grows so eager and so sure,
 That all my tim'rous spirits he doth
 smite,

5 This one he chaseth, that one layeth low,
 Till he alone remaineth in your sight:
 Whence I am so distraught I seem to be Another, yet even thus hear constantly
 My outcast and tormented spirits' woe.

• SONNET IX

That which befalls me fades from memory
 Whene'er I look upon you, lovely joy,
 And if I bide with you Love warneth me:
 'Flee, flee if haply death cause thee annoy!'

My face betrays the colour of my heart,
 That, fainting, where it may doth lean and
 lie,

While, by a frenzy shaken, the stones start
 Wailing aloud, or so it seems: 'Die, die!'

Truly he sinneth who, beholding me,
 Comfort to the affrighted soul denies, 25
 Not even showing that he sorroweth
 Through pity, slain by your own mockery
 And born of the distressful look in eyes
 That have so great a yearning after death.

SONNET X

Often returneth to my memory
 The quality of anguish Love makes
 mine,
 So that, o'ercome by pity, constantly:

'Befalls it thus to others?' I repine;
For Love assaileth me so suddenly,
That of my life scarce anything remains,
Except one thought alone which speaks of thee,

And so may tarry with me for his pains.

Then unto mine own aid I ply the spur;
And come with pallid features and spent strength

To see thee, thinking to be healed at 10
length:

But, when I lift mine eyes towards their goal,

A trembling in my heart begins to stir,
That from my pulses driveth forth my soul. 15

✓CANZONE VI

Mine eyes that grieve for pity of the heart

Have suffered such an agony of weeping,

That now in sooth their tears have all been spent;

Hence, would I find some healing for the 25
smart

That brings me ever nearer to Death's keeping,

I needs must tune my words to a lament.

Remembering, gentle ladies, how I went 30

Speaking about my lady gladsomely,

When she still dwelt among us here, to you,
I will not speak save to

The gentle heart that in a woman may be;

And I will tell of her, wailing for rue,

Since she hath gone to heaven suddenly

And left Love sorrowing behind with me.

Beatrice hath risen up into high heaven,

Into the realm where angels are at peace,

And bides with them and hath⁴ forsaken 40
you;

Not frost, sweet ladies, bore her hence, nor even

Such summer-heats as oftwhiles bring release,

But only her great goodness did so do;

For the light of her humility shone through

The very heaven with a ray so bright

That it astonished the Eternal Sire,

Who, moved by a fond desire

To summon to Himself so much delight,

Bade her from here below to Him aspire,

Because He knew this life of weariness

To be unworthy of her gentleness.

Her gentle soul hath doffed the lovely veil

Of flesh it wore so graciously awhile,

5 And dwells in glory in a worthy place.

Whoso in speaking of her doth not wail

Hath but a heart of stone, morose and vile,

That never could receive a spirit of grace.

However dowered with wit, a heart that's base

Could not imagine her in any wise,

And from the like no tears could ever flow;

But he indeed hath woe,

Would die of weeping, is in love with sighs,

And with a soul all comfortless doth go,

Who in his mind considereth how she

Was reft from us and what she used to be.

I feel the bitter agony of sighs

When to sad memory my thoughts recall

20 The lady who hath cleft my heart in twain;

Thus oftentimes when death is my surmise,

Such a sweet longing comes to me that all

The colour in my countenance doth wane;

25 And when this fancy holds me fast, then pain

Assaileth me with pangs so sharp and rude

That swiftly to my senses I am brought,

But looking so distraught

30 That shame constraineth me to solitude.

Then weeping in the loneliness I sought,

I call on Beatrice, saying: 'Now art thou dead?'

And as I call her I am comforted.

35 By sighs of anguish and by tears of sorrow

The heart, Love left to loneliness, is spent.

And piteous thing, methinks, to contemplate;

40 And what hath been the burden of each morrow

Since into the new world my lady went

No mortal tongue could fittingly relate;

Most bitter is my life, most desolate,

45 Yea, even if I would I could not tell

You, ladies, how it happeneth to me;

Such is my misery,

That all men seem to say: 'So fare thee well!'

50 When they my wan and woful aspect see:

But what I am my lady can divine,

And I still hope her blessing may be mine.

My piteous Song, go weeping on thy way,
 And seek out every dame and damozel
 To whom, thus it befell,
 Thy sister-songs sang sweetly many a day;
 And thou who art the daughter of dismay, Betake thee mournfully with them to

ANGELO POLIZIANO

(1454-1494)

Angelo Poliziano, better known as Politian, Italian humanist and poet, was born in Tuscany. He studied classical languages in Florence and was selected by Lorenzo de' Medici to undertake the education of his two sons Piero and Giovanni. In 1480 he took the chair of Greek and Roman literature in the University of Florence. His principal service to literature was his study of classical texts. By 1472 he had already translated Books II to V of the Iliad. In his original work he was notable for his use of the ottava rima. His pastoral drama Orfeo is also noteworthy as a contribution to the development of European drama. His prose and verse were both distinguished for taste and elegance.

The following selections were written in approximately 1480. The translation is that of the Rev. W. Parr Greswell in Simonde de Sismondi, Historical View of the Literature of the South of Europe, London, 1853.

· THE RAPE OF EUROPA¹

Beneath a snow-white bull's majestic guise,
 Here Jove, conceal'd by love's transforming power,
 Exulting bears his peerless, blooming prize:
 With wild affright she views the parting
 shore;
 Her golden locks, the winds that adverse
 rise,
 In loose disorder spread her bosom o'er;
 Light floats her vest, by the same gales
 upborne:
 One hand the chine, one grasps the circling horn.
 5 Her naked feet, as of the waves afraid,
 With shrinking effort, seem to avoid the
 main;
 Terror and grief in every act — for aid
 Her cries invoke the fair attendant
 10 train:
 They, seated distant on the flow'ry mead,
 Frantic, recall their mistress loved, in
 vain —
 15 Return, Europa; far resounds the cry:
 On sails the God, intent on amorous joy.

¹ Her beauty charmed Zeus, who assumed the form of a bull and mingled with the herd as Europa and her maidens were sporting on the sea-shore. Encouraged by the tameness of the animal, Europa ventured to mount his back, whereupon the god rushed into the sea and swam with her to Crete. Here she became by Zeus the mother of Minos, Radamanthys, and Sarpedon.

BALLADS

SPANISH

It has been customary to divide the Spanish ballads into three classes, historic, romantic, and Moorish. The historic ballads deal with the adventures of the early heroes of Spain, the romantic with the Twelve Peers of Charlemagne (cf. the Song of Roland), and the Moorish with the dazzling splendor of Saracen civilization. The ones printed in this volume are presumably from the fifteenth century. Regarded as the oldest of the Spanish ballads, they treat of characters whose exploits were recounted at greater length in the romances of chivalry. They are of great variety in subject and scope; some are very short, others are of almost epic proportions. The same variety is to be noted in their literary quality.

The translation of the following selections is that of Lockhart in Longfellow's Poets and Poetry of Europe, Philadelphia, 1849.

COUNT ARNALDOS

Who had ever such adventure,
Holy priest, or virgin nun,
As befell the Count Arnaldos
At the rising of the sun?

On his wrist the hawk was hooded, Forth with horn and hound went he,
When he saw a stately galley
Sailing on the silent sea.

Sail of satin, mast of cedar,
Burnished poop of beaten gold, —
Many a morn you'll hood your falcon,
Ere you such a bark behold.

Sails of satin, masts of cedar,
Golden poops may come again;
But mortal ear no more shall listen
To yon gray-haired sailor's strain.

Heart may beat, and eye may glisten,
Faith is strong, and Hope is free;
But mortal ear no more shall listen
To the song that rules the sea.

When the gray-haired sailor chanted,
Every wind was hushed to sleep, —

Like a virgin's bosom panted
All the wide reposing deep.

Bright in beauty rose the starfish
5 From her green cave down below,
Right above the eagle poised him, —
Holy music charmed them so.

"Stately galley! glorious galley!
10 God hath poured his grace on thee!
Thou alone may'st scorn the perils
Of the dread, devouring sea!

"False Almeria's reefs and shallows,
15 Black Gibraltar's giant rocks,
Sound and sandbank, gulf and whirlpool,
All, — my glorious galley mocks!"

"For the sake of God, our Maker!" — 20 Count Arnaldos' cry was strong, —
"Old man, let me be partaker
In the secret of thy song!"

"Count Arnaldos! Count Arnaldos!
25 Hearts I read, and thoughts I know; —
Wouldst thou learn the ocean secret,
In our galley thou must go."

THE ADMIRAL¹ GUARINOS

The day of Roncesvalles was a dismal day
for you,
Ye men of France! for there the lance of King Charles was broke in two:
Ye well may curse that rueful field; for 5
many a noble peer,
In fray or fight, the dust did bite, beneath Bernardo's spear.

There captured was Guarinos, King 10
Charles's admiral;
Seven Moorish kings surrounded him, and seized him for their thrall:
Seven times, when all the chase was o'er,
for Guarinos lots they cast; Seven times Marlotes won the throw, and the knight was his at last.

Much joy had then Marlotes, and his captive much did prize;
Above all the wealth of Araby, he was precious in his eyes.
Within his tent at evening he made the best of cheer,
And thus, the banquet done, he spake unto 25
his prisoner: —

"Now, for the sake of Alla, Lord Admiral Guarinos,
Be thou a Moslem, and much love shall 30
ever rest between us:
Two daughters have I; — all the day thy handmaid one shall be;
The other — and the fairest far — by night shall cherish thee.

"The one shall be thy waiting-maid, thy weary feet to lave,
To scatter perfumes on thy head, and fetch thee garments brave;
The other — she the pretty — shall deck
her bridal bower,
And my field and my city they both shall be her dower.

"If more thou wishest, more I'll give;
speak boldly what thy thought is."
Thus earnestly and kindly to Guarinos said Marlotes.

But not a moment did he take to ponder or to pause;
Thus clear and quick the answer of the Christian captain was: —
"Now, God forbid, Marlotes, — and Mary, his dear Mother, —
That I should leave the faith of Christ and bind me to another!
For women, — I've one wife in France, and I'll wed no more in Spain:
I change not faith, I break not vow, for courtesy or gain."

Wroth waxed King Marlotes, when thus he heard him say,
And all for ire commanded he should be led away, —
Away unto the dungeon-keep, beneath its vaults to lie,
With fetters bound in darkness deep, far off from sun and sky.

With iron bands they bound his hands;
that sore, unworthy plight Might well express his helplessness, doomed never more to fight.
Again, from cincture down to knee, long bolts of iron he bore,
When signified the knight should ride on charger never more.

Three times alone, in all the year, it is the captive's doom
To see God's daylight bright and clear,
instead of dungeon-gloom;
Three times alone they bring him out, like Samson long ago,
Before the Moorish rabble-rout to be a sport and show.

On three high feasts they bring him forth, a spectacle to be, —
The feast of Pasque, and the great day of the Nativity,
And on that morn, more solemn yet, when maidens strip the bowers,
And gladden mosque and minaret with the firstlings of the flowers.

¹ Leader.

- Days come and go of gloom and show;
 seven years are come and gone;
 And now doth fall the festival of the holy Baptist John;
 Christian and Moslem tilts and jousts, to give it homage due,
 And rushes on the paths to spread they force the sulky Jew.
- Marlotes, in his joy and pride, a target
 high doth rear, —
 Below the Moorish knights must ride and pierce it with the spear;
 But 'tis so high up in the sky, albeit much they strain,
 No Moorish lance so far may fly, Marlotes' ¹⁵ prize to gain.
- Wroth waxed King Marlotes, when he beheld them fail;
 The whisker trembled on his lip, — his cheek for ire was pale;
 And heralds proclamation made, with trumpets, through the town, —
 "Nor child shall suck, nor man shall eat, till the mark be tumbled down."
- The cry of proclamation, and the trumpet's ²⁵
 haughty sound,
 Did send an echo to the vault where the admiral was bound:
 "Now help me, God!" the captive cries;
 "what means this din so loud?" ³⁰
 O Queen of Heaven, be vengeance given on these thy haters proud!
- "O, is it that some pagan gay doth Mar-
 lotes' daughter wed,
 And that they bear my scorned fair in ³⁵ triumph to his bed?
 Or is it that the day is come, — one of the hateful three, —
 When they, with trumpet, fife, and drum, make heathen game of me?" ⁴⁰
- These words the jailer chanced to hear,
 and thus to him he said:
 "These tabours, Lord, and trumpets clear,
 conduct no bride to bed;
 Nor has the feast come round again, when ⁴⁵
 he that has the right Commands thee forth, thou foe of Spain,
 to glad the people's sight!
- "This is the joyful morning of John the Baptist's day,
 When Moor and Christian feast at home,
 each in his nation's way;
 But now our king commands that none
 his banquet shall begin,
 Until some knight, by strength or sleight,
 the spearsman's prize do win."
- Then out and spake Guarinos: "Oh, soon
 each man should feed,
 Were I but mounted once again on my own gallant steed!
 Oh, were I mounted as of old, and harnessed cap-a-pie,
 Full soon Marlotes' prize I'd hold, whate'er its price may be!
- "Give me my horse, mine old gray horse,
 — so be he is not dead, —
 All gallantly caparisoned, with plate on breast and head;
 And give the lance I brought from France;
 and if I win it not,
 My life shall be the forfeiture. — I'll yield it on the spot."
- The jailer wondered at his words: thus to the knight said he:
 "Seven weary years of chains and gloom
 have little humbled thee;
 There's never a man in Spain, I trow, the like so well might bear;
 And if thou will, I with thy vow will to the king repair."
- The jailer put his mantle on, and came unto the king;
 He found him sitting on the throne, within his listed ring:
 Close to his ear he planted him, and the story did begin,
 How bold Guarinos vaunted him the spearman's prize to win:
- That, were he mounted but once more on his own gallant gray,
 And armed with the lance he bore on Roncesvalles' day,
 What never Moorish knight could pierce,
 he would pierce it at a blow,
 Or give with joy his life-blood fierce at Marlotes' feet to flow.

Much marvelling, then said the king:
 "Bring Sir Guarinos forth,
 And in the grange go seek ye for his gray
 steed of worth;
 His arms are rusty on the wall; — seven 5
 years have gone, I judge, Since that strong horse has bent his force to be a carrion drudge.

"Now this will be a sight indeed, to see the 10
 enfeebled lord
 Essay to mount that ragged steed and draw that rusty sword;
 And for the vaunting of his phrase he well deserves to die:
 So, jailer, gird his harness on, and bring your champion nigh."

They have girded on his shirt of mail, his cuisses well they've clasped,
 And they've barred the helm on his visage pale, and his hand the lance hath grasped;
 And they have caught the old gray horse,
 the horse he loved of yore,
 And he stands pawing at the gate, caparisoned once more.

When the knight came out, the Moors did shout, and loudly laughed the
 king,
 For the horse he pranced and capered and furiously did fling:
 But Guarinos whispered in his ear, and looked into his face;
 Then stood the old charger like a lamb,
 with a calm and gentle grace.

Oh, lightly did Guarinos vault into the saddle-tree,
 And, slowly riding down, made halt before Marlotes' knee:
 15 Again the heathen laughed aloud: "All hail, Sir Knight!" quoth he;
 "Now do thy best, thou champion proud!
 thy blood I look to see!"

20 With that, Guarinos, lance in rest, against the scoffer rode.
 Pierced at one thrust his envious breast,
 and down his turban trode.
 Now ride, now ride, Guarinos, — nor lance 25 nor rowel spare, — Slay, slay, and gallop for thy life: the land of France lies there!

GERMAN

As in the case of the ballads of Spain, here too we have a body of poems by authors of whom we know nothing. Our German ballads were handed down from one generation to another before they were recorded in writing, perhaps in the fifteenth century or thereafter. According to some theories, the ballads are the result of gradually developing communal authorship, as in England and Scotland; others are of the opinion that each ballad is the work of an individual, if anonymous, poet. Whatever we may think of the origin and authorship of these ballads, their materials are deeply rooted in folklore, and their unspoiled art has ever been a source of delight to modern readers.

THE LAY OF THE YOUNG COUNT

I stood on a high mountain
 And looked on the Rhine so wide;
 A little skiff came swimming,
 A little skiff came swimming,
 Wherein three knights did ride.

And of these knights, the youngest
 He was the count his heir;
 He promised he would marry me,
 He promised he would marry me,
 Although so young he were.

He took from off his finger
 A ring of gold so red;
 30 "Thou fairest, finest, take it,
 My own heart's dearest, take it,
 And wear it when I'm dead."

"What shall I do with the ringlet,
 If I dare not wear it before?"
 35 "Say only thou hast found it,
 Say only thou hast found it,
 In the grass before the door."

"Nay, why should I be lying?
It would not behoove me well;
The young count he is my husband,
The young count he is my husband,
Much rather I would tell."

"Wert thou but richer, maiden,
Hadst thou but a little gear,
In sooth I then would take thee,
In sooth I then would take thee,
For then we equals were."

"And though I have not riches,
Yet of honor I have some;
That honor I will keep it,
That honor I will keep it,
Until my equal come."

"But if there come no equal,
What then wilt thou begin?"
"Then I will seek a cloister,
Then I will seek a cloister,
To live as a nun therein."

'Twas after three months' time had passed,
The count dreamed heavily;
As if his own heart's dearest,
As if his own heart's dearest,
In a cloister he did see.

"Arise, my groom, and hasten,
Saddle mine and saddle thy steed;

We'll ride o'er hill and valley,
We'll ride o'er hill and valley;
The maiden is worth all speed."

5 And when they came to the cloister,
They gently knocked at the door:
"Come out, thou fairest, thou fine,
Come out, thou heart's dearest mine,
Come forth to thy lover once more!"

10 "But wherefore should I hasten
To thee before the door?
My hair is clipped and veiled,
My hair is clipped and veiled,
15 Thou'lt have me never more."

The count with fright is silent,
Sits down upon a stone;
The bitter tears he's weeping,
20 The bitter tears he's weeping,
Till life and joy are gone.

With her snow-white hands the maiden
She digs the count his grave;
From her dark-brown eyes so lovely,
From her dark-brown eyes so lovely,
The holy water she gave.

Thus to all young lads 'twill happen,
30 Who for riches covet sore;
Fair wives they all are wishing,
Fair wives they all are wishing,
But for gold and silver more.

THE DEAD BRIDEGROOM

There went a boy so stilly,
To the window small went he:
"Art thou within, my fair sweetheart?
Rise up and open to me."

"We well may speak together,
But I may not open to thee;
For I have plighted my faith to one,
And want no other but he."

"The one to whom thou'rt plighted, Fair sweetheart, I am he;

Reach me thy snow-white little hand,
35 And then perhaps thou'lt see."

"But nay! thou smelllest of the earth;
And thou art Death, I ween!"
"Why should I not smell of the earth, 40 When I have lain therein?"

"Wake up thy father and mother,
Wake up thy friends so dear;
The chaplet green shalt thou ever wear,
45 Till thou in heaven appear."

DRAMA

The play of Adam was written about 1160 in the Anglo-Norman French of England. It illustrates the state of the drama at the time when it was emerging from the purely religious form known as the liturgical play. The earliest plays were introduced into the liturgy of the Church, and usually grew out of some very essential part of it. The next step in the development of the drama was to present incidents from Bible narrative or from the lives of the saints. The material of Adam, although it comes ultimately from the Old Testament, seems to be taken more immediately from a well-known sixth-century sermon. The structure of the play shows some knowledge of dramatic technique and considerable interest in purely theatrical effects. The play is further noteworthy in the history of the drama as an example of the transition from Latin to the vernacular. This change shows clearly that the drama at this time, in spite of its still vital preoccupation with religious subjects, is aiming at general theatrical effectiveness rather than strictly religious appeal.

The play is divided into three parts, which we might call "acts." Only the first one is printed in this volume. It is taken from Antichrist and Adam, translated by Sarah F. Barrow and William H. Hulme, Western Reserve Bulletin, XXVIII (1925).

THE PLAY OF ADAM

ORDO REPRESENTACIONIS ADE

Paradise must be built on a more elevated spot, surrounded by curtains and cloths of silk to such a height that persons in Paradise may be visible as far down as the shoulders. Fragrant flowers and foliage are to be strewn round about the spot, and in it are to be put trees of various kinds with hanging fruits, so that the place may seem very delightful. Then let the Savior (Salvator) appear clothed in a dalmatic¹ and Adam and Eve be brought before him. Adam must wear a red tunic and Eve the white robe of a woman, with a white silk cloak. And they must both stand before the Figura, Adam the closer, with composed countenance, while Eve is a little more modest. The Adam must be well trained when to answer: he must be neither too quick nor too slow in replying. And not only he but all the persons shall be instructed to speak deliberately, making gestures appropriate to the thing they are speaking about; and, in rhythms, they shall not put in an extra syllable, nor omit one, but all must enunciate clearly and speak in an orderly manner what they have to say. Whoever names Paradise shall look and point towards it. Then the lectio shall begin:

IN THE BEGINNING GOD CREATED HEAVEN AND EARTH

*When this is finished the choir must sing:
God therefore created, etc.*

After this the Figura shall say:

Adam! and Adam shall reply: Lord!

FIGURA. I have formed thee
From clay of the earth.

5 ADAM. I know it well.

FIGURA. I have given thee a living soul,
So have I formed thee in my semblance,
In my image have I made thee of earth,
Thou must never strive against me.

10 ADAM. So shall I not do, but I shall trust
thee,

I shall obey my creator.

FIGURA. I have given thee a good companion:

15 This is thy wife, Eve by name,
This is thy wife and thy mate,
Thou must be very faithful to her.
Thou shalt love her, she shall love
thee,

So shall you both have my favor.

She shall be at thy command,
And you both according to my will.

From thy rib have I formed her,
She is not alien, she is born of thee.

25 I have created her straight from thy body;

From thee she came, not from without,
Govern her justly;

Let there be no strife between you,

But great love, great mutual service,

Let such be the law of marriage.

FIGURA to Eve. Now I shall speak to thee, Eve.

This heed thou, nor consider it lightly:
If thou wouldst do my will,
Preserve righteousness in thy heart.

Honor me, thy creator,
And acknowledge me as lord.
Put thy mind on serving me,
All thy might and all thy intelligence.
Love Adam, and cherish him,
He is thy husband, thou his wife;
Be always obedient to him,
Deviate not from his instruction;
Serve and honor him with good intent;
For that is the law of marriage.
If thou be a good helpmeet to him,
I shall put thee with him in glory.

EVA. I shall act, lord, according to thy pleasure,

I will not deviate at all;
Thee shall I acknowledge as my lord,
Him as mate and superior;
I shall always be faithful to him,
From me he will have much good counsel;

Thy pleasure, thy service
I shall do, lord, in every way.

Then the Figura shall call Adam nearer and speak to him more earnestly.

FIGURA. Listen, Adam, and hear my
words!

I have made thee, now I shall endow thee thus:

Thou mayest live forever if thou obey
my word,
And thou shalt be well and feel no illness.

Never shalt thou hunger or need to drink,

Never shalt thou be cold or feel heat.
Thou shalt be ever joyous, never weary;
And in pleasure shalt thou never know
pain.

All thy life shalt thou spend in joy;
Thy life shall not be short, thou shalt always be.

I tell thee so, and wish Eve to hear,
If she heeds not, then she is foolish.
You have dominion over all the earth,
Over birds, beasts, and other possessions.

Of little importance be he who envies
you,

For all the world shall be in thy dominion.

I give you choice of both good and evil,
Whoever is so endowed is not tethered to a stake.

Now you are quite evenly balanced.

Trust counsel, be loyal to me,
Eschew evil and adhere to good.

Love thy lord and abide with him,
For no other counsel forsake mine,
If thou do as I bid, thou wilt sin in no
way.

ADAM. Great is my gratitude for thy benignity,

For thou hast made me and art so kind
to me,

Putting good and evil in my power.

Into thy service shall I put my will,

Thou art my lord, I am thy creature;

Thou didst create me, I am thy work.

My will shall never be so bad

That my whole care shall not be in serving thee.

Then let the Figura point out Paradise to Adam, 25 saying:

Adam!

ADAM. Lord!

FIGURA. I shall tell thee my design,
Dost thou see this garden?

ADAM. What is its name?

FIGURA. Paradise.

ADAM. It is very beautiful.

FIGURA. I have planted it and laid it out,
He shall be my friend who shall stay
there,

I intrust it to thee: stay there and care
for it.

Then he shall send them into Paradise, saying:
I put you inside.

ADAM. May we continue there?

FIGURA. Always, and you need fear
nothing there;

You can never die there nor be ill.

Let the Choir sing:

Therefore the Lord created man.

Then the Figura shall stretch his hand toward Paradise saying:

I shall tell you the nature of the garden:

You will find there no lack of any delight;

There is no good thing in the world,
desired by any creature,

Which each one may not find there in full measure, —

Woman shall have there no anger from man,

Nor man shame or fear from woman.

There a man sins not by begetting,

And there a woman does not suffer in childbirth.

Thou shalt live always, the life there is so good,

Thine age shall never change there.

Thou shalt not fear death there, harm shall not strike thee,

I do not wish thee to go hence, here shalt thou dwell.

The Choir shall sing:

The Lord said to Adam.

Then let the Figura show Adam the trees of Paradise, saying:

Of all this fruit thou mayest eat for pleasure.

Then he shall show him the forbidden tree and its fruit, saying:

I forbid thee all enjoyment of this;

If thou eat of it, thou shalt forthwith taste death;

Thou shalt lose my love, thou shalt mar thy lot.

ADAM. I shall keep all thy commandment, Neither I nor Eve shall deviate from it at all;

If for one fruit only I lose such an abode, I ought to be thrown out to the wind.

If for an apple I forsake thy love, I shall never in my life pay for my folly.

He ought to be judged by the law of the traitor

Who perjures himself and betrays his lord.

Then shall the Figura go into the church, and Adam and Eve shall walk about in Paradise with true delight. Meanwhile devils shall run about the stage, making appropriate gestures; and they shall approach Paradise from time to time and show Eve the forbidden fruit as if persuading her to eat it. Then Diabolus shall approach Adam and say to him:

What art thou doing, Adam?

ADAM. I am living here in great delight.

DIABOLUS. Is it well with thee?

ADAM. I am aware of no annoyance.

DIABOLUS. You might be better off.

ADAM. I cannot imagine how.

DIABOLUS. I know how.

ADAM. And what does it matter to me?

DIABOLUS. And why not?

ADAM. It is of no value to me.

DIABOLUS. It will be worth something.

ADAM. I do not know how much.

DIABOLUS. I am in no hurry to tell thee.

ADAM. Now tell me.

DIABOLUS. I shall not,

I had rather see thee tired of entreating.

ADAM. I do not need to know it.

DIABOLUS. Then thou dost not deserve good fortune,

Thou hast good fortune but canst not enjoy it.

ADAM. Why?

DIABOLUS. Dost thou care to hear?

I will tell thee privately.

ADAM. To be sure, I should like it.

DIABOLUS. Listen, Adam, hear what I have to say,

It will be to thy advantage.

ADAM. I grant it.

DIABOLUS. Wilt thou trust me?

ADAM. Yes indeed.

DIABOLUS. Wholly?

ADAM. Except for one thing.

DIABOLUS. For what thing?

ADAM. I shall tell you,

I will not offend my creator.

DIABOLUS. Dost thou fear him so much?

ADAM. Yes, truly.

I love and fear him.

DIABOLUS. Thou art ignorant,

What can he do to thee?

ADAM. Both good and evil.

DIABOLUS. Thou art doing very foolishly, If thou believest that evil can come to thee.

Art thou not in glory? Thou canst not die.

ADAM. God has told me that I shall die, If I violate his commandment.

DIABOLUS. What is this great transgression?

I would hear it without delay.

ADAM. I shall tell thee all truly.

He has given a command to me:

Of all the fruits of Paradise

I may eat, that he has told me,

Except of one only; that is forbidden me,

That I shall not touch with my hands.

DIABOLUS. Which is that?

Then shall Adam point toward the forbidden fruit, saying:

ADAM. Dost thou see it there?

That he has expressly forbidden me. 5

DIABOLUS. Dost thou know why?

ADAM. Certainly not.

DIABOLUS. I shall tell thee the reason:

He is not at all concerned about the other fruit, 10

And he shows him the forbidden fruit with his hand, and says to Adam:

Only that which hangs above:

That is the fruit of wisdom,

It gives the science of knowing every- 15 thing.

If thou eat it, thou shalt do well.

ADAM. In what way?

DIABOLUS. Thou shalt see,

Whatever is to be will be apparent,

Whatever thou wilt thou shalt be able to perform,

It has much good in store for thee.

Thou wilt do well to eat it,

For then thou shalt not fear thy lord at 25 all;

Rather thou shalt be quite his peer then,

For this reason he forbid it thee.

Wilt thou believe me? Taste of the fruit!

ADAM. I shall not do it.

DIABOLUS. You must be jesting!

You will not do it?

ADAM. No.

DIABOLUS. Then thou art foolish; 35

Another time thou wilt remember these words.

Then Diabolus shall withdraw and go to the other devils, and he shall make a sally about the stage; and after a short while he shall return merry and rejoicing to the temptation of Adam, and say to him:

Adam, what art thou doing? Wilt thou change thy mind?

Art thou still of foolish opinion?

I was on the point of saying to thee the other day,

God makes thee his pensioner here,

Has put thee here to eat this fruit.

Hast thou other pleasures besides?

ADAM. Yes, I lack nothing at all.

DIABOLUS. Wilt thou never rise higher?

You may think yourself of great value,

Since God has made thee his gardener.

God has made thee keeper of his garden,

Shalt thou never seek other pleasure?

Did he create thee for thy belly?

He will bestow upon thee other honor.

Listen, Adam, give heed unto me,

I shall counsel thee in good faith,

So that thou shalt be without a master,

And shalt be the peer of thy creator.

I shall tell you the whole matter: 10

If thou eat of the apple,

Then he must point toward Paradise:

Thou shalt reign in majesty,

Mayst share the power of God.

ADAM. Get thee hence! 15

DIABOLUS. What sayest thou, Adam?

ADAM. Get thee hence! thou art Satan;

Thou givest bad counsel.

DIABOLUS. How? I ask.

ADAM. Thou wilt deliver me to torment, 20

Wilt involve me with my lord,

Take me out of bliss and put me into misery,

I shall not trust thee, get thee hence.

Be thou never so bold

As to come into my presence,

Thou art a faithless traitor.

Then with a sad and downcast expression, he shall leave Adam and go to the gates of hell, and shall converse with other devils. But after this he shall make a sally among the audience; and then he shall approach Paradise on Eve's side, and, flattering Eve with a joyous expression, he shall address her thus:

Eve, I have come here to thee. 35

EVA. Tell me, Satan, what for?

DIABOLUS. I seek thy profit, thy honor.

EVA. God grant it!

DIABOLUS. Be not afraid;

For a long time I have known

All the counsels of Paradise;

I shall tell thee a part of them.

EVA. Now commence, and I shall listen.

DIABOLUS. Wilt thou listen to me? 45

EVA. Certainly I shall,

I shall offend thee in no way.

DIABOLUS. Wilt thou keep secret what I tell thee?

EVA. Yes, faithfully.

DIABOLUS. Will it be revealed? 50

EVA. Not by me.

DIABOLUS. Now I shall trust thee,

I desire of thee no other assurance.

EVA. Thou canst indeed trust my word.

DIABOLUS. Thou has been in a good school;

I have seen Adam, but he is very unreasonable.

EVA. He is a little hard.

DIABOLUS. He will be mild; He is harder than hell.

EVA. He is very noble-minded.

DIABOLUS. But he is very servile. 10

If he will not take care of himself,

Let him at least take care of thee.

Thou art a delicate and tender thing,

And thou art fresher than the rose;

Thou art whiter than crystal, 15

Than snow which falls on ice in the valley;

The creator has made a bad match,

Thou art too tender and he too hard;

And yet thou art wiser,

Thou hast set thy heart on wisdom;

This attracts to thee good fortune.

I will speak to thee, be it in confidence,

Let no one know about it.

EVA. Who should know it? 25

DIABOLUS. Not Adam.

EVA. No indeed.

DIABOLUS. Now I shall tell thee, and do thou hearken!

There are only the two of us in this path, 30

And Adam there, who hears us not.

EVA. Speak aloud, he will not understand a word of it.

DIABOLUS. I warn you of a great deceit, Which goes on at your expense in this 35 garden.

The fruit which God has given you

Has in it no virtue whatsoever;

That which he has forbidden you

Has within it great merit.

In that is the gift of life,

Of power, of dominion,

Of all knowledge, both good and evil.

EVA. How does it taste?

DIABOLUS. It has a celestial flavor. 45

With thy fair person, and thy countenance,

Very fitting would be such a chance

As thy being lady of the world,

Of the highest and of the lowest, 50

And knowing whatsoever is to be,

As thy being good mistress of everything.

EVA. Has the fruit such virtue as that?

DIABOLUS. Yes, truly.

Then Eve, after looking long and earnestly at the forbidden fruit, shall say:

5 It does me good even to look at it.

DIABOLUS. If thou eatest it, what wilt thou do?

EVA. How do I know?

DIABOLUS. Wilt thou not trust me?

Take it first and give it to Adam.

You shall at once have the crown of heaven,

You shall be equal to the creator,

He can not conceal knowledge from you;

15 When you have eaten the fruit,

Your heart shall be changed forever;

You shall be with God, without fail,

Of equal virtue, of equal power.

Taste the fruit!

20 EVA. I should like it.

DIABOLUS. Do not fear Adam.

EVA. I shall do it later.

DIABOLUS. When will you do it?

EVA. Allow me

Until Adam retires.

DIABOLUS. Eat it, do not hesitate,

Delay would be childish.

Then Diabolus shall depart from Eve and go to hell. But Adam, being angry because she has spoken with Diabolus, shall go to Eve and say to her:

Tell me, woman, what did he desire of thee,

The evil Satan? what did he want of thee?

EVA. He spoke to me of our honor.

ADAM. Do not trust the traitor!

Know well he is a traitor.

EVA. How do you know?

40 ADAM. For I have tested him.

EVA. How does that concern this matter?

ADAM. I am going to see.

EVA. He will make you change your opinion.

ADAM. He will not, for I shall not believe him

On any point, until I have tried him.

Never allow him to come to you,

50 For he is very evil and untrustworthy.

He wishes to betray his lord,

And put himself in opposition to the most high;

Such a wretch as that

I do not wish with us.

Then an artificially made serpent shall ascend close to the trunk of the forbidden tree; Eve drawing nearer shall lend her ear to him as if receiving his counsel; then Eve shall accept an apple and reach it to Adam. But he will not yet receive it, and Eve shall say to him:

Eat, Adam! thou knowest not what it is,

Let us take the good that is at hand. 10

ADAM. Is it so good?

EVA. Thou mayst know;

But thou canst not know without tasting it.

ADAM. I fear it. 15

EVA. Well, leave it then!

ADAM. I shan't.

EVA. Hesitation makes thee seem cowardly.

ADAM. I shall take it. 20

EVA. Come, eat it!

Thereafter thou wilt know both evil and good,

I will eat first.

ADAM. And I afterward. 25

EVA. Certainly.

Then, after eating a piece of the apple, Eve shall say to Adam:

I have tasted it; God! what a flavor!

Never have I tasted such sweetness! 30

This apple is of a flavor like . . .

ADAM. Like what?

EVA. Like nothing man ever tasted.

Now my eyes are so clear-seeing,

I am like God the Almighty; 35

Whatever has been and whatever is to be

I know fully, I am indeed mistress of it.

Eat, Adam, delay not,

Thou wilt take it in very good season. 40

Then Adam shall receive the apple from Eve's hand, saying:

I shall trust thee, thou art my peer.

EVA. Eat! Come, thou canst not hesitate.

Then Adam shall eat a piece of the apple; immediately after eating it he recognizes his sin and humiliates himself. He may not now be seen by the audience; and he shall cast off his festive garments and put on wretched clothes made of fig-leaves, and, simulating deep grief, he shall begin his lamentation: 45

ADAM. Alas! sinful one, what have I done?

Now am I dead without any escape.

Beyond rescue I am dead,

Such evil has come upon me.

My lot is changed for the worse;

It was very good, now it is very hard.

I have forsaken my creator

At the counsel of a wicked woman.

Alas! sinful one, what shall I do?

How shall I await my creator?

How shall I await my creator,

Whom I have forsaken in my folly? 5

Never did I make so bad a bargain;

Now I know what sin is.

Ah death! why dost thou let me live?

Why is the world not rid of me?

Why do I encumber the world?

I must sound the depth of hell;

In hell will be my dwelling,

Until he come who may deliver me.

If I shall live in hell,

Whence will aid come to me there?

Whence will succor come to me there?

Who will rescue me from such anguish?

Why have I transgressed against my lord?

I deserve to have no friend,

No one will be of much avail,

I am certainly lost.

I have so transgressed against my lord,

I cannot enter into any plea with him;

For I am wrong and he is right.

Lord! how cursed shall I be here!

Who will ever remember me?

For I have transgressed against the king of glory!

Against the king of glory I have transgressed,

I have not a trace of claim on him.

Nor have I friend or neighbor,

Who may get me out of this trouble finally.

On whom shall I call for aid,

When my wife has so betrayed me,

She whom God gave me for my mate?

She gave me bad counsel.

Ah! Eve!

Then he shall look at his wife Eve and say:

Foolish woman!

At an evil hour wast thou born of me!

Oh, that the rib had been burned,

Which has put me into such a plight!

Oh, that the rib had been burned in fire,

Which has caused me strife so great!

When (God) took that rib from me,

Why didn't he burn it and kill me?
 The rib has betrayed the whole body,
 And injured and put it in evil plight.
 I know not what to say nor what to do;
 Without grace from heaven,
 I may not be rescued from pain;
 Such is the evil that torments me.
 Ah, Eve! what a misfortune,
 What great trouble overwhelms me,
 That ever thou didst become my mate!
 Now am I lost by thy counsel,
 By thy counsel am I brought to pain,
 From great height brought low.
 I shall not be delivered by any human,
 If not by the God of Majesty.
 What did I say, alas? Why did I name
 him?

Will he aid me? I have angered him.
 No one will aid me,
 Except the son who shall be born of 20
 Mary.

I know not how to get help from any one,
 Now that we have been faithless to God,
 Now be it as God may will,
 There is no counsel but to die!

Then let the choir begin the anthem:

"While he was walking forth."

After this has been chanted, the Figura shall appear clad in a stole and shall enter Paradise and look around, as if seeking where Adam might be. But Adam and Eve shall conceal themselves in a corner of Paradise, as if confessing their wretchedness, and the Figura shall say:

Adam, where art thou?

Then both shall rise and stand before the Figura, 35 though not entirely erect, but a little bent and very sad with shame on account of their sins, and Adam shall reply:

Here I am, gracious lord,
 I have hidden myself for fear of thy 40
 wrath,
 And because I am all naked,
 I have run here to hide.

FIGURA. What hast thou done? How hast thou erred? 45

What has taken thy virtue from thee?
 What hast thou done? What art thou ashamed of?

How shall I settle accounts with thee?
 There was nothing amiss with thee 50
 yesterday,

Of which thou shouldest be ashamed,
 But now I see thee sad and troubled:

He is far from happy who is in that state.

ADAM. Such shame I have, lord, on thy account,

5 [That I conceal myself.]

FIGURA. And why?

ADAM. Such shame entwines my body,
 That I dare not look thee, lord, in the face.

10 FIGURA. Why didst thou violate my prohibition?

Hast thou gained anything by it?
 Thou art my servant, and I thy lord.

ADAM. I cannot contradict thee.

15 FIGURA. I have made thee in my like-
 ness;

Why hast thou transgressed my law?
 I created thee exactly in mine image;
 For that didst thou affront me?
 Thou didst not regard my prohibition,
 Freely thou didst transgress it.
 The fruit thou didst eat, of which I said
 to thee,

25 That I had forbidden it thee.
 Didst thou think thereby to be mine equal?

I know not if thou wilt be pleased to jest.

Then Adam shall stretch his hand first towards the Figura and then towards Eve, saying:

30 ADAM. The woman whom thou gavest me,
 She first did commit this offense;
 She gave it to me and I did eat,
 Now life for me has turned to woe.
 Bad was my meddling with this eating,
 I have done wrong because of my wife.

FIGURA. Thy wife thou didst believe rather than me,

Thou didst eat the fruit without my consent;

Now I shall render thee this in return:
 The land shall be under a curse

Where thou shalt sow thy corn,
 And shall fail to bear thee fruit;

It shall be cursed under thy hand,
 Thou shalt cultivate it in vain,

Its fruit it shall refuse thee,
 It shall produce thee thorns and thistles,

It shall change thy seed for thee,
 Cursed shall it be as a judgment on thee.

With great labor, with great hardship,
 Thou must eat thy bread;

With great pain and much sweat,
 Shalt thou live always, night and day.

Then the Figura shall turn to Eve and say to her with a threatening mien:

And thou, Eve, bad woman,
Soon didst thou begin opposition,
Little didst thou keep my command- 5
ments!

EVA. The serpent did trick me.

FIGURA. By him didst thou think to be my peer?

Didst thou indeed know how to proph- 10
esy?

Before thou didst have control
Of whatsoever is necessary in life:
How soon thou hast lost it!

Now I see thee sad and dejected; 15
Hast thou gained or lost?

I shall render thee well thy deserts,
I shall give thee what thy service merits;

Evil shall come to thee in every guise. 20

In pain thou shalt bear children
And in pain they shall live their years.
Thy children shall be born in sorrow,
In anguish they shall end.

In such distress, in such harm, 25
Hast thou put both thyself and thy lineage;

All those who shall be descended of thee,
They shall deplore thy sin.

And Eve shall reply, saying:

I have done wrong in my madness,
For the sake of an apple I have suffered great hurt;

For in pain it puts both me and my lineage; 35

A small gain yields me a heavy toll.
If I did wrong, it was no great marvel, Inasmuch as the serpent seduced my foolish ear;

Much he knows of evil, he resembles no 40
lamb;

He is put in an evil plight who follows
his advice.

I took the apple, foolishly, I now know,
Contrary to thy command; by that I 45 committed treason!

Wrongly I tasted it; now am I hated
by thee:

For the sake of a little fruit I must lose
life.

Then the Figura shall threateningly say to the serpent:

And thou, serpent, cursed be thou!

On thy account I shall resume my law
again.

On thy breast shalt thou drag thyself
All the days of thy life.

The dust shall always be thy food,
In wood and on plain and on heath.

The woman shall bear thee hate,

Ever shall be a bad neighbor to thee.

Thou shalt be on the watch for her heel,
She will deprive thee of thy sting;

Thy head shall she strike with such a mallet

As will cause thee great pain;

Ever she will take good care

How she may be revenged upon thee.

Evilly you meddled with her society,

And she shall make thy head bow;

Hereafter shall issue from her

One who shall destroy all thy power.

*Then the Figura shall expel them from Paradise,
saying:*

Now go out of Paradise,

A bad change of residence have you
made.

On the earth you shall make a dwelling
place;

You have no right in Paradise;

You can claim nothing there.

You shall go out never to return;

According to your sentence, you have nothing there,

Take up now your abode elsewhere.

You go forth from happiness;

Never shall you be without hunger or fatigue, 35

Never shall you be without grief or pain
For all the days of the week.

On earth shall you have a poor abode,

Then finally you shall die;

After you have tasted death,

You shall pass into hell without delay;

There your bodies shall have torment,

Your souls infernal peril;

Satan shall have possession of you.

There is no one to aid you,

By whom you may ever be rescued,

Unless I take pity on you.

Then the choir shall sing: "In the sweat of thy face." Meanwhile an angel, clothed in white 50 garments, shall come, bearing a flaming sword in his hand, and the Figura shall place him at the gate of Paradise and shall say to him:

Guard well my paradise,

That this outlaw enter not there,
That he never have the power
To touch the fruit of life;
With that flaming sword,
Thus forbid him well the way.

When they are outside Paradise, they shall appear sad and confused, and shall be bowed down to the ground on their ankles, and the Figura shall point to them with his hand while his face is turned towards Paradise; and the choir shall strike up: 10
"Behold Adam as one." After this is finished the Figura shall return to the church. Then Adam with a spade and Eve with a hoe shall begin to till the soil and sow wheat in it. After they have finished sowing, they shall go and sit down for some time, as if wearied with labor, and they shall often look mournfully at Paradise, beating their breasts at the same time. Meanwhile Diabolus shall come and plant thorns and thistles in their garden, and withdraw. Then when Adam and Eve come to their garden and see the growing thorns and thistles, they shall be overcome by powerful grief and prostrate themselves on the ground and lie there beating their breasts and thighs, thus showing their sorrow by gestures. Then Adam shall begin his lamentation:

Oh, woe is me! never saw I so evil an 25
hour,

For my sins have so overwhelmed me,
That I forsook the lord whom man wor-
ships;

Whom shall I ask to succor me? 30

Here Adam must look back at Paradise and lift both hands towards it, and with his head humbly bent forward he shall say:

O Paradise! how fair a dwelling place
art thou! 35

Glorious garden so fair to see!
For my sin forsooth I have been thrown out of it;

I have lost the hope of recovery.

I was within, I could not enjoy much of 40
it,

I trusted counsel which caused me to go away soon;

Now I repent, rightly am angry at it,
It is too late, my sighing avails me noth- 45
ing.

Where was my good sense, what became of my memory,

When I forsook the God of glory for Satan? 50

Now I am grieved, but it avails not;
My sin will be written in history.

Then he shall lift his hand towards Eve, who shall be removed by a little elevation, and, shaking his head with great indignation, he shall say to her:

Oh! evil woman full of treason!

How soon didst thou bring me to perdi-
tion, 5

Didst take away from me good sense and reason!

Now I repent, but I cannot have pardon.
Wretched Eve, how I was betrayed to evil,

When thou didst trust the counsel of the serpent!

Because of thee am I dead, have thus lost life;

Thy sin will be written in a book.

Dost thou see the signs of great confusion?

The earth feels our curse;

We sowed corn, now thistles are brought forth there;

We toiled hard and evil is the reward.

See the beginning of our trouble:

This is great affliction, but greater awaits us;

We shall be led into hell without delay;
We shall lack no pain nor torture.

Wretched Eve! what is thy opinion of
it?

Thou hast gained this, it is given thee as dowry.

Never wilt thou be able to benefit man,
But with reason thou shalt always be harmful.

All those descended from us

Will feel the punishment of thy mis-
deed, 35

By thy wrong-doing are they all condemned,

Late will he be who will change it.

EVA. Adam, fair sir, thou hast blamed me
much,

Blamed and rebuked my villainy.

If I have done wrong, I suffer punishment for it;

Guilty, I shall be judged by God.

I have sinned greatly against God and against thee,

Long shall I be reproached for my wickedness.

My guilt is great, my sin afflicts me,

I am wretched, I am devoid of all good,
I have no argument to offer God in my defense,

That he pronounce me not a guilty sinner.

Pardon me, for I cannot make amends;
If I could, I would by sacrifice.

Sinful, unhappy, wretched one that I 5 am!

For my misdeed I am thus ashamed
before God;

Death take me! Suffer me not to live!

I am in peril, I cannot come to shore,
The wicked serpent, the viper of evil
nature,

Made me eat the apple of misfortune.

I gave some of it to thee, thinking thus 15
to do good;

With thy sin never may I reproach thee;
Why was I not obedient to the creator?

Why, lord, did I not keep thy law? 20

Thou didst wrong, but I am the root [of it];

Far away is the remedy of our trouble.

My misdeed, my great misfortune,

Our offspring will expiate dearly.

The fruit was sweet, the pain is great and
hard;

It was eaten at an evil hour, ours was the guilt.

Yet nevertheless in God is my hope;

For soon will be reconciliation about that misdeed,

God will restore to me his grace and his favor,

10 He will rescue us from hell by his power.

*Then Diabolus shall come and three or four devils with him, bearing chains and iron fellers in their hands, which they shall put on the necks of Adam and Eve. And some push and others drag them to hell; and still other devils shall meet them near hell as they approach, and they shall make great revel among themselves on account of their damnation; and certain other devils shall point them out as they come, and shall pick them up and toss them into hell; and they shall make a great smoke rise up from it and shall shout loudly, rejoicing in their hell, and they shall strike their pots and kettles together, so that they can be heard outside.
Then after considerable delay the devils shall go out and run about the stage, but some of them shall 25 remain in hell.*

THE RENAISSANCE

Columbus's discovery of the New World, although spectacular, was only one of dozens of bold excursions into the unknown which were made during that period of awakening which we have come to call the Renaissance. Voyagers, moreover, brought back something more important than spices, silks, and ivory; they brought back ideas of strange worlds, of infinities of space. The compact and almost homogeneous little world that had grown up in the heart of Europe was shocked out of its complacent sleep and made to face new facts of awesome proportions. Along with the discovery of new geographical worlds came the discovery of new worlds of thought. Sciences, arts, industries, politics — all became aware of the fact that the limits which they had imposed upon themselves were illusory. • In this new age of enthusiasm the trend was all toward experiment. Minds hitherto held in check by devotion to what seemed thoroughly proved now ventured forth upon unknown ground searching for new truths. They reached not only into the unknown before them but into the unknown behind them. The treasures of Greek and Latin literature, mostly neglected and many hitherto lost, were dug out, edited, translated, and read, not as infallible authority on ethics and history but, according to the principles of Humanism, as enjoyable pieces of imaginative literature.

In literature, as in many other departments of activity, the leaders were the Italians. The ancient culture of Greece and Rome was their natural heritage, and, though they had allowed it to fall into disuse, they were best situated to pick up the threads again. Their geographical location furthermore in the Mediterranean, the very heart of European commerce, put them in position to serve as disseminators of the revived culture. The great figures of early Italian literature, Dante and Boccaccio, who belong primarily to the Middle Ages, played an important part in the new movement. Dante established the vernacular language of Italy as a dignified medium of discourse, and Boccaccio in the Decameron set the fashion which was later developed by a succession of writers, such as Bandello, Cinthio, and Masuccio, whose collections furnished plots to the authors of France, Spain, and England.

We see in Italy, too, the rise of a new attitude toward life, — the attitude of self-reliance, of individual independence, of a certain hard and naïve disregard for the long-established laws of society. Cellini (p. 566), the great metal-worker, was as joyously mercurial as a child, with no more self-discipline than a child, and yet was endowed with a mature intelligence that made him a supreme artist and a dangerous citizen. • In fact we might almost say that it was an age of dangerous men, when rewards were made for individual achievement rather than for social service, — a keen, laughing, adventurous, blood-spilling age.

The high-flown, serious epic themes of the Middle Ages became in the hands of Ariosto (p. 537) an extravagant mélange of frankly incredible wonders, of flights, wooings, and killings piled up in almost contemptuous profusion, and yet endowed with flashing and unexpected beauty. Machiavelli (p. 551) writes a book about tyrants and their methods, in which he tosses about the wisdom of the ancients — with all the facility and grace of a juggler. The refinement of thought which appears in the poetry of Petrarch (p. 510) and his followers is not an invention of the Renaissance; the thought of the Middle Ages was even more fine and accurate. Even the freedom of this thought — the extension of its boundaries, the opening of its doors to the enthusiasm of the new age — is due very largely to the discovery of a philosophical heritage from the ancient world, — in short to Platonism.

The influences of this age swept upward into France and England and there awoke the same swift enthusiastic spirit that had pervaded the work of the Italians. Rabelais' (p. 557) incredible virtuosity of thought and language, and Montaigne's (p. 573) astounding range of interest and information would be enough by themselves to reveal to us the temper of the Renaissance if everything else were lost. Although they are far from being what we should call kindred spirits, we see in both that same rapidity of association, the same interest in all human knowledge and all people. Even the more severe and restrained temper of Luther and Erasmus (p. 548) embodies a potential turbulence of thought and expression that may burst out, and frequently does, almost without warning. We never know, as we follow the thought of even their most serious discourses, when we shall encounter a quite untrammelled and thoroughly enjoyable rhetorical cadenza. And yet these men knew their facts. They sought eagerly for learning and succeeded in finding it. Jugglers they may have been, but even in their fantastic moments they show a firm command of their materials. When Bacon composed his Novum Organum, taking all knowledge as his province, he was doing only what should be expected of a scholar in the Renaissance. Just as the ideal aristocrat must be able to serve as diplomat, soldier, courtier, or musician, so the writer must be philosopher, scientist, historian, poet, and teacher.

This remarkable diffusion of interest and activity does not imply that Renaissance writers could not stick to their subjects; they wrote all around their subjects, their minds playing over them like fire, rapid, shifting, but penetrating.

In considering the more formal types of literary expression, especially the drama, there is good reason for us to be thankful for the restraint exerted upon them by classical models. With the rambling and disorganized Western European drama of the Middle Ages before our eyes, we can hardly help shuddering when we stop to think of what might have become of it without the restraining influence of Seneca (p. 116). The formality of the Senecan type, plus the enthusiasm of newly awakened native genius, finally resulted in the flashing but controlled brilliance of Marlowe and Shakespeare.

•There was much in this age, of course, that was formal and uninspired, but the general temper of mind was toward expansion; the spirit of man was outward bound, bold, eager for knowledge, and happy to be living in an age that everybody knew to be great and productive.

POETRY

ITALIAN

PETRARCH

(1304-1374)

Francisco Petrarch, successor to Dante, and first modern poet, was born at Arezzo in Tuscany. His father, like Dante, had been a resident of Florence but had been exiled for political reasons. In 1313 the family removed to Avignon, at that time the residence of the Pope. Petrarch studied law but was predominantly attracted by the Greek and Latin classics. He was quickly accepted by the Papal court at Avignon and was fortunate enough to interest powerful patrons, who enabled him to spend much time in the study of the classics and to perform the great service of rescuing from obscurity numerous important monuments of classical literature. About 1336 he retired to Vaucluse, a beautiful valley near Avignon, to work on a Latin epic poem, Africa, of which Scipio Africanus was the hero. Although he based on this ambitious work his hope of immortality, the poem is almost forgotten, while his Italian love poems are known to every educated person. In 1341 Petrarch was honored by the Roman Senate for his literary achievements and was acclaimed the literary leader of the Renaissance. During the remainder of his life he continued to write and to serve Visconti, Lord of Milan, in diplomatic missions. In 1370 he retired to the Euganean hills south of Padua and died in 1374. In addition to the epic Africa and three hundred sonnets to Laura, Petrarch composed fifty canzoni to Laura, a Latin discourse entitled On Contempt of the World, and many other Italian poems, shorter Latin tracts, and letters.

It is to Petrarch that we owe the popularity of the sonnet as a verse form in Europe. The first sonnets written in England were Petrarchan not only in form but in matter. One of Petrarch's sonnets is printed in this volume, in the translation both of Wyatt and of Surrey. The Italian sonnet is divided into octave and sestet, the relation between the two parts being roughly analogous to the strophe and antistrophe of the Pindaric ode. (See introductory note on Pindar.) The style of setting forth in sonnets a sort of history of the poet's love was another of Petrarch's inventions, and was the model for the sonnet cycles of Spenser, Sidney, Shakespeare, Drayton, Daniel, and others. The lady to whom Petrarch addressed his poems, probably Laura de Sade, wife of Hugh de Sade, was a woman well known for her beauty, wisdom, and modesty. Like Dante's Beatrice, Petrarch's Laura was to the poet not a mortal woman, but a creature of superhuman goodness and beauty, an embodiment of a great poetic ideal.

SONNET II

HOW HE BECAME THE VICTIM OF LOVE

For many a crime at once to make me smart,
And a delicious vengeance to obtain,
Love secretly took up his bow again,
As one who acts the cunning coward's part;
My courage had retired within my heart, 10
There to defend the pass bright eyes might gain;

When his dread archery was pour'd amain
Where blunted erst had fallen every dart.

Scared at the sudden brisk attack, I found
Nor time, nor vigour to repel the foe
With weapons suited to the direful need;
No kind protection of rough rising ground,
Where from defeat I might securely speed,
Which fain I would e'en now, but ah, no method know!

(Translated by Nott in The Sonnets, Triumphs, and other Poems by Petrarch)

SONNET XIX

HIS HEART, REJECTED BY LAURA, WILL PERISH, UNLESS SHE RELENT

A thousand times, sweet warrior, to obtain Peace with those beauteous eyes I've vainly tried,
Proffering my heart; but with that lofty pride
To bend your looks so lowly you refrain:
Expects a stranger fair that heart to gain,
In frail, fallacious hopes will she confide¹:
It never more to me can be allied;
Since what you scorn, dear lady, I disdain
In its sad exile if no aid you lend,
Banish'd by me; and it can neither stay
Alone, nor yet another's call obey;
Its vital course must hasten to its end:
Ah me, how guilty then we both should prove,
But guilty you the most, for you it most doth love!

(Translated by Nott in The Sonnets, Triumphs, and other Poems by Petrarch)

SONNET LXI

UNLESS LAURA RELENT, HE IS RESOLVED TO ABANDON HER

Yet was I never of your love aggrieved,
Nor never shall while that my life doth last:
But of hating myself, that date is past;
And tears continued sore have me wearied:
I will not yet in my grave be buried;
Nor on my tomb your name have fixèd
fast,
As cruel cause, that did the spirit soon
haste
From the unhappy bones, by great sighs
stirr'd.
Then if a heart of amorous faith and will Content your mind withouten doing grief;
Please it you so to this to do relief:
If otherwise you seek for to fulfil
Your wrath, you err, and shall not as you
ween;
And you yourself the cause thereof have been.

(Translated by Wyatt in *The Sonnets, Triumphs,
and other Poems by Petrarch*)

¹ If any other woman hopes to gain my heart, her efforts will prove vain.

SONNET CIX

THE COURAGE AND TIMIDITY OF LOVE

The long Love that in my thought I harbour,
And in my heart doth keep his residence,
Into my face pressèth with bold pretence,
And there campèth displaying his bannèr.
She that me learns to love and to suffèr,
And wills that my trust, and lust's negligence
Be rein'd by reason, shame, and reverence,
With his hardness takes displeasure.
Wherewith Love to the heart's forest he fleeth,
Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry,
And there him hideth, and not appearèth.*
What may I do, when my master fearèth,
But in the field with him to live and
die?
For good is the life, ending faithfully.

(Translated by Wyatt in The Sonnets, Triumphs, and other Poems by Petrarch)

SONNET CIX

Love, that liveth and reigneth in my thought,
That built its seat within my captive
breast;
Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought,
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
She, that me taught to love, and suffer pain;
My doubtful hope, and eke my hot desire With shamefaced cloak to shadow and restrain,
Hersmiling grace converteth straight to ire.
And coward love then to the heart apace Taketh his flight; whereas he lurks, and plains
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face.
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide I
pains.
Yet from my lord shall not my foot remove:
Sweet is his death, that takes his end by
love.

(Translated by Surrey in The Sonnets, Triumphs, and other Poems by Petrarch)

SONNET CXIII

HIS INVINCIBLE CONSTANCY

Place me where angry Titan burns the Moor,
And thirsty Afric fiery monsters brings,
Or where the new-born phoenix spreads
her wings,
And troops of wond'ring birds her flight
adore:
Place me by Gange, or Ind's empamper'd
shore,
Where smiling heavens on earth cause 10
double springs:
Place me where Neptune's quire of Syrens
sings,
Or where, made hoarse through cold, he leaves to roar:
● Me place where Fortune doth her darlings
crown,
A wonder or a spark in Envy's eye,
Or late outrageous fates upon me frown,
And pity wailing, see disaster'd me,
Affection's print my mind so deep doth
prove,
I may forget myself, but not my love.

(Translated by Drummond in The Sonnets, Triumphs, and other Poems by Petrarch)

SONNET CXLVI

HE APPEASES HER BY HUMILITY, AND EXHORTS A FRIEND TO DO LIKEWISE

When my sweet foe, so haughty oft and
high,
Moved my brief ire no more my sight can thole, 5
One comfort is vouchsafed me lest I die,
Through whose sole strength survives my harass'd soul;
Where'er her eyes — all light which would deny
To my sad life — in scorn or anger roll,
Mine with such true humility reply,
Soon their meek glances all her rage control.
15 Were it not so, methinks I less could brook
To gaze on hers than on Medusa's mien,
Which turn'd to marble all who met her
look.
My friend, act thus with thine, for closed I
ween 20
All other aid, and nothing flight avails Against the wings on which our master
sails.

(Translated by MacGregor in The Sonnets, Triumphs, and other Poems by Petrarch)

FRENCH

RONSARD

(1524-1585)

The importance of Ronsard to literary history may possibly be best summarized by saying that he was a prominent member of the Pléiade, a literary group which took upon itself the task of reforming and ennobling the French language and literature by going back to classical models for forms, and by establishing for poetry a language separate from prose. Ronsard spent most of his earlier life in the service of various nobles. Following in their train, he travelled much in France and even went as far as Scotland. He became deaf early in life and retired to the College of Coqueret, where he was later joined by Du Bellay. Ronsard's first publications, the Odes and Amours, were received with great enthusiasm, and he was immediately taken under the protection of Margaret of Savoy, the king's sister. Charles IX is known to have visited him and to have endowed him with many abbeys and benefices. Under Henry III Ronsard belonged to that group of poets and scholars whom the king called the Academy of the Palace, and, although Des Portes was the court poet, Ronsard's glory shone undiminished in the public eye. Tasso read to him the first canto of his Jerusalem Delivered, and Mary Stuart sent him a gift from her prison. During his later years the poet lived mostly in his abbey of Croixval and in his priory of St. Cosmo. He is the greatest French poet of the sixteenth century.

The Pindaric odes and the epic fragment, Franciade, which made the deepest impression during the life of Ronsard, are scarcely read today except by students of literary history. It is his fragile, fugitive, amorous pieces, perfect in form and measure, that have come to represent to the modern reader the spirit of Ronsard. Of the selections printed in this book, two are from the Amours, and the third, See, Mignonne, is one of the Horatian odes. The selections, written between 1550 and 1555, are from The Poetical Works of Andrew Lang, edited by Mrs. Lang.

•THE ROSE

See, Mignonne, hath not the rose,
That this morning did unclothe
Her purple mantle to the light,
Lost, before the day be dead,
The glory of her raiment red,
Her colour, bright as yours is bright?

Ah, Mignonne, in how few hours,
The petals of her purple flowers
All have faded, fallen, died;
Sad Nature, mother ruinous,
That seest thy fair child perish thus
'Twixt matin song and even-tide.

Hear me, darling, speaking sooth,
Gather the fleet flower of your youth,
Take ye your pleasure at the best;
Be merry ere your beauty flit,
For length of days will tarnish it
Like roses that were loveliest.

•OF HIS LADY'S OLD AGE

When you are very old, at evening
You'll sit and spin beside the fire, and say, Humming my songs, 'Ah well — ah
well-a-day!
5 When I was young, of me did Ronsard sing.'
None of your maidens that doth hear the
thing,
Albeit with her weary task foredone,
10 But wakens at my name, and calls you
one
Blest, to be held in long remembering.

I shall be low beneath the earth, and laid 15 On sleep, a phantom in the myrtle shade, While you beside the fire, a grandame
gray,
My love — your pride — remember and regret;
20 Ah, love me, love! we may be happy yet,
And gather roses, while 'tis called

DRAMA

SPANISH

The real beginning of Spanish dramatic literature is the work of that most voluminous of writers, Lope de Vega Carpio, 1562-1635. He was born in Madrid and received his early education in the Imperial College. After an adventurous childhood he enlisted in the army and took part in the Portuguese and African campaigns, in the same regiment as Cervantes. He then returned to Madrid, where he entered service, first with Don Jerónimo Manrique, bishop of Cartagena, and then with the Duke of Alva. It was during this service that he brought out his first important work, the Arcadia, a pastoral novel. He married Doña Isabel de Urbina, but was forced to leave her shortly and go into retirement, in consequence of a duel in which he seriously wounded his adversary. While he was in hiding, his wife fell fatally ill, and he returned to Madrid. After her death he again entered military service, this time with the famous Invincible Armada. Upon his return he married again and lived a quiet and happy life until the death of his second wife, seven years later. During all this time he had been writing industriously, turning out large numbers of plays and poems. The public had received him well, and he had become prosperous and famous; but the loss of his second wife, and the breaking up of his family, left him dejected and lonely. He joined the order of St. Francis, but despite the gravity of his duties he continued to write for the stage almost to the time of his death. He is said to have written more than fifteen hundred plays besides many other pieces. He literally created a whole literature.

For many generations Lope de Vega dominated the dramatic traditions of Spain. He also found considerable favor with many writers of the English Renaissance. His whole purpose in writing for the stage was to amuse and to entertain, and the chief interest in his plays consists in intricacy of plot, judicious mingling of comic and tragic elements, and proper adjustment of meter to thought. The Star of Seville, though perhaps not by Lope, has long been accepted as his and is well worthy of his genius. It is selected for inclusion here both because of its popularity and influence, and because it is one of the finest examples of Spanish "heroic" comedy at its best.

The translation is that of Phillip M. Hayden in Chief European Dramatists, Houghton Mifflin, Boston, 1916.

THE STAR OF SEVILLE

ACT I

SCENE I. A room in the palace.

Enter the KING, DON ARIAS, DON PEDRO DE GUZMAN, and FARFAN DE RIVERA.

KING. My welcome in Seville has greatly pleased me, and I perceive I am indeed the sovereign monarch in Castile; my reign dates from this day, since this day Seville receives me and does me honor; for it is clear and evident, and an accepted law, that no man could be king in Castile who did not reign in Seville. I shall not be content if I do not reward the munificence of my reception, and the splendor of my entrance. My court shall have its seat within these walls, and marvel not that the Castilian court should make its seat in Seville, for I shall reign in Castile, while I reign in Seville.

DON PEDRO. We, the chief alcaldes¹ of the city, kiss your feet in gratitude, for we receive your favors in her name. Jurors and councilmen gladly offer you their wealth and loyalty, and the council is in accord, provided only that the chartered rights of this your city do not suffer.

KING. I am much pleased —

DON PEDRO. Grant us your hand to kiss.

KING. — that in receiving me you have

¹ Administrative officials, usually mayors or judges.

borne yourselves like the men you are, and I believe that with your support I shall make myself king of Gibraltar, which sleeps in fancied security upon the Columns,¹ and if fortune favors me I shall make myself remembered.

FARFAN. With loyalty the people of Seville will serve Your Highness in this lofty enterprise, offering their lives as one.

ARIAS. His Majesty feels it so, and is well pleased with you and your desire.

KING. Men of Seville, I believe you and so declare. Go with God.

(Exeunt the alcaides.)

ARIAS. My lord, how like you Seville?

KING. Much; for to-day I am truly king.

ARIAS. She will deserve your favor, Sire, and win it more from day to day.

KING. Surely; for so rich and fair a city, as I live longer in it, will be admired at leisure.

ARIAS. The beauty and the grandeur of its streets — I know not if Augustus saw the like in Rome, or had such wealth.

KING. And her ladies, divinely fair, why do you not mention them? How can you limit or describe their attributes and radiance? Tell me, why are you not aflame in the light of such glories?

ARIAS. Doña Leonor de Ribera seemed heaven itself, for in her countenance shone the light of the springtime sun.

KING. She is too pale. A sun with rays of ice is little worth, for it chills instead of warming. I want a burning sun, not freezing.

ARIAS. The one who threw you roses is Doña Mencía Coronel.

KING. A handsome dame, but I saw others lovelier.

ARIAS. The two lively damsels at the next window were Doña Ana and Doña Beatriz Megia, sisters through whom day gains fresh splendors.

KING. Ana is but a vulgar name for one, and Beatriz for the other, lonely like the phoenix, because unequalled.

ARIAS. Does good fortune or ill attend even upon a name?

KING. In love — and do not wonder at it — names unusual, and indicating quality and breeding, are a magnet to a man.

ARIAS. The pale, auburn-haired . . .

KING. Tell me not her name. The pale lady with auburn hair will be marble and bronze, and your descriptions weary me as you continue. One I saw there full of grace, whom you have left unmentioned; for you have noted only the blonde, and not the raven-haired. Who is she who on her balcony drew my attention, and to whom I doffed my hat? Who is she whose two eyes flash lightning like Jove's thunder-bolts, and sent their deadly rays into my heart, unknowing of their power? One who, though dark, outshone the sun? In tresses of night she eclipsed the orb of day; her beauty obscured its rays.

ARIAS. I have it, Sire.

KING. Choose the loveliest of them all, for that is she.

ARIAS. They call her the Star of Seville.

KING. If she is fairer than the sun, why slight her thus? But Seville does not esteem her, seeing her daily. Sun she shall be called, since she is a sun that revives and kindles.

ARIAS. Her name is Doña Stella Tabera, and Seville, in homage, calls her its star.

KING. And it might call her its sun.

ARIAS. Her brother hopes to marry her in Seville, as well he may.

KING. Her brother's name?

ARIAS. Bustos Tabera, and he is counselor in Seville, in saying which I bear tribute to his quality.

KING. And is he married?

ARIAS. He is not married, for in the Sevillian firmament he is the sun, if Stella is his sister, and Star and Sun are in conjunction.

KING. My guiding star brought me to Seville, and I find great joy in it, if it is as brilliant as I hope. All will go well with me, under such a star. What means, Don Arias, will you find, for me to see her and to speak with her?

ARIAS. You shall find her a friendly star, in spite of the Sun. Heap honors upon her brother, for the most rigid honor yields to honors. Favor him, for favors can overcome and conquer the impossible. If you give to him, and he receives, he binds himself, and sees himself obliged to requite what you have given; for he graves in bronze who accepts favors.

KING. Let him be summoned, and take measures likewise that the following night I may see Stella in her house. O vision that inflames my inmost soul.

(Exit ARIAS.)

Enter DON GONZALO, in mourning.

GONZALO. I kiss your highness' feet.

KING. Rise, Gonzalo. On this day of 15 joy, why do you come so sad?

GONZALO. My father is no more.

KING. I have lost a valiant captain.

GONZALO. And the frontier remains without defender.

KING. Yes, a heroic commander has departed. Grieving I listen to you.

GONZALO. Sire, the frontier of Archidona¹ has suffered a great loss, and since there can be found no equal to his valor, and since I have inherited the honored name of the great general, I implore your majesty not to permit another to receive the post now vacant.

KING. There is sufficient proof that his valor lives again in you. Lament your father's death, and, while you are in mourning and in sorrow, rest in my court.

GONZALO. Fernán Pérez de Medina 35 comes with the same request, and thinks his services may claim the baton, for in fact he has been ten years captain, and with his sword has stained with ruby hue the pearly walls of Granada. Hence my diligence.

KING. I will consider it; for, if I must make this decision, I wish to weigh the matter.

Enter FERNÁN PÉREZ DE MEDINA.

FERNÁN. I fear, O king, that I arrive too late. I kiss your feet, and then . . .

KING. You may present your homage, Fernán Pérez, with a tranquil mind. The office is still in my hands, and such a post 50 will not be given without consulting first yourself and others of high credit in the kingdom who being bulwarks in themselves will be advisers concerning Archidona. Go, and rest.

5 GONZALO. This memorial I leave with you, my lord.

FERNÁN. And I leave mine, which is the crystal mirror of my valor, in which my nature can be seen, pure, accomplished, 10 loyal.

GONZALO. Mine is crystal too, and shows the clearness of my claim.

(Exeunt FERNÁN and GONZALO.)

Enter ARIAS and BUSTOS.

ARIAS. Here, my lord, is Bustos Tabera.

BUSTOS. Perturbed you see me at your feet, my lord, for so it is natural for the vassal to be confused in presence of his king; I am for this reason and by the common lot perturbed, but twice perturbed, 20 because this undreamt-of favor hath further agitated me.

KING. Rise.

BUSTOS. Nay, this is my place. If kings should be adored like saints upon an altar, 25 my place is here.

KING. You are a gallant gentleman.

BUSTOS. Of that I have shown proof in Spain. But, Sire, I crave but such advancement as is due me.

KING. Then cannot I advance you?

BUSTOS. The laws of God and man give power to kings, but forbid the vassal to be presumptuous; for he, my lord, must keep his wishes within bounds. So I, seeing this law transgressed, limit my ambition to my lawful aspirations.

KING. What man ever did not desire to become greater?

BUSTOS. If I were greater, I should be covered now; but if I am Tabera, Tabera must stand uncovered.

KING (aside to ARIAS). A strange philosophy of honor!

45 ARIAS (aside to KING). A caprice novel and unexampled.

KING. I do not desire, Tabera, upon my life, that you stand covered before I have advanced you, and given you a proof of my affection. And thus it is my will that you cease to be Tabera, and become General of

Archidona, for your heroism shall be the defense of that frontier.

BUSTOS. But, Sire, in what war have I ever served you?

KING. Even in the occupations of peace, Bustos, I see you so capable of defending my lands, that I give you preference over these, whose memorials show such services. Here in my presence read and decide: the candidates are three — yourself and these two; see what competitors you have.

BUSTOS (reads): "Most noble king, Don Gonzalo de Ulloa entreats your majesty to grant him the post of captain general of the frontier of Archidona, inasmuch as my father died in battle, after serving you more than fourteen years, rendering notable services to God in behalf of your crown. I implore justice, etc." If Don Gonzalo has inherited the valor of his father, I name him for the place.

KING. Read the other memorial.

BUSTOS (reads): "Most noble king, Fernán Pérez de Medina has been a soldier twenty years in the service of your father, and desires to serve you with his arm and sword, on Spanish or on foreign soil. Ten years he has been captain in the plain of Granada, and three years a prisoner, in close confinement, for which reasons, and by his sword, in which he places all his claim, he by this memorial asks the baton of general of the fields of Archidona."

KING. Recite your claims.

BUSTOS. I have no service to relate to second a request, or justify a favor. I could recall the noble exploits of my ancestors, the banners captured, the castles conquered; but, Sire, they had their reward, and I cannot reap the glory for their services. Justice, to deserve the name, must be well ordered, for it is a sacred boon divine, suspended by a hair. Justice requires that this post be given to one of these two men, for, if you give it me, you do injustice. Here in Seville, my lord, I have no claim upon you, for in the wars I was a soldier, in peace, a councilor. In truth Fernán Pérez de Medina merits the honor, for his age is worthy of the frontier post; Don Gonzalo is young, and a nobleman of Cordova; him you can make a captain.

KING. Then it shall be as you desire.

BUSTOS. I desire only what is right and in accord with justice, to give to those who serve their due reward.

KING. Enough. You put me to shame with your good counsels.

BUSTOS. They are mirrors of truth, and so in them you see your true self.

KING. You are a noble gentleman, and I desire your attendance in my chamber and in my palace, for I wish to have you near me. Are you married?

BUSTOS. My lord, I am the protector of a sister, and will not marry, until I have given her a husband.

KING. I will give her a better one, Bustos. Her name?

BUSTOS. Doña Stella.

KING. To a star, if she be fair, I know not what husband to give, except the sun.

BUSTOS. I wish only a man, Sire, for Stella. She is not a heavenly star.

KING. I will unite her to one who is worthy of her.

BUSTOS. In her name I thank you, Sire.

KING. I will give her, Bustos, a husband suited to her rank. Inform your sister that her marriage is in my care, and that I shall dower her.

BUSTOS. Now, Sire, I pray you tell me on what business you have called me; for your summons agitated me.

KING. You are right, Tabera, I summoned you for an affair of Seville, and wished to talk with you first before discussing it. But peace and leisure are before us and we will treat it later. From to-day attend me in my chamber and my palace. Go with God.

BUSTOS. I kiss your feet.

KING. I embrace you, noble councilor.

BUSTOS (aside). Such favor passes my understanding, and I am filled with misgiving. To love me and to honor me without knowing me seems rather to attack my honor than to favor me. (Exit.)

KING. The man is keen of mind; as wise as he is honorable.

ARIAS. I have no patience with these men of honor. How many, Sire, have been so, until occasion meets them! Yes, all are occasionally wise, but not all, my lord, on all occasions. To-day the breath of slander reaches him who denounced another yesterday; and the law which he invoked is invoked anon on him. If he puts his honor in the balance, you can put in the other your favors and your gifts, your praises and your privacy.

KING. In secret I intend to see this woman in her house. For she is a sun, and has inflamed me, although she seems a star. Let Spain say what it will, a blinded king, I follow the Star of Seville.

(Exeunt the KING and ARIAS.)

SCENE II. A Room in TABERA's house.

Enter DON SANCHE, DOÑA STELLA, MATILDE, and CLARINDO.

SANCHE. Angel of heaven, when will you be mine, when will you free from this restraint the passion that I feel for you? Like a sun you rise, dispensing radiance from coral lips formed for love: — when will you turn the pale dew that drops from my eyes to pearls that may deck the peaceful joys of our souls?

STELLA. If time kept pace with my desires, its giant strides should outstrip the sun; Seville should celebrate my sweet submission, and your happy love should cease to envy the tender turtle dove, which, softly cooing, makes its nest amid a thousand favoring branches.

SANCHE. Ah, how gratefully my heart receives these sighings! My soul yearns for the noblest gifts of fame, to lay them at your feet.

STELLA. I ask only for life, to join it to yours.

SANCHE. Oh, sweet Stella, clothed in love and light!

STELLA. Ah! Can life endure such love?

SANCHE. Oh, charms divine, lodestar to my dazzled eyes!

CLARINDO (to MATILDE). Why should not we, like our masters, utter a few sweet sighs, soft as finest cambric?

SANCHE. Be quiet, knave!

CLARINDO. We're dumb. (To MATILDE.) Ah! Sleek filly! Despair of my existence!

MATILDE. Oh, low-born suitor! Your poetical smack of the currycomb.

CLARINDO. Oh, my love!

MATILDE. Oh, happy man!

CLARINDO. What leper ever heaved such sighs!

SANCHE. What does your brother say?

STELLA. That when the papers are made out and signed, the marriage may proceed; and that there shall be but a few days' delay, while he makes the arrangements.

SANCHE. He'll bring my love to desperation; delay is torment for it. Would we might wed to-day, lest fortune change before to-morrow!

STELLA. If delay continues, speak to my brother.

SANCHE. Speak I will, for I shall die if this persists.

CLARINDO. Bustos Tabera comes.

Enter BUSTOS.

BUSTOS. Sancho, my friend!

STELLA. Heavens! What is this?

SANCHE. Such sadness? You?

BUSTOS. Sadness and joy are cause of my dismay. Stella, leave us alone.

STELLA. God help me! Delay has turned against me. (Exit.)

BUSTOS. Sancho Ortiz de las Roelas, . . .

SANCHE. Do you no longer call me brother?

BUSTOS. A steed beyond control sweeps me on unspurred. Know that the king sent for me; God is my witness that I know not why, for though I asked him, yet he told me not. Unasked, he was about to make me general of Archidona, and indeed, had I not resisted, would have given me the royal commission. Finally he made me . . .

SANCHE. Proceed, for all of this is joy. Tell me your sadness, explain your grief.

BUSTOS. He attached me to his suite.

SANCHE. And he did well.

BUSTOS. We come now to the pain.

SANCHE (aside). I foresee sorrow here for me.

BUSTOS. He told me not to seek a match for Stella; that should be his care; and he preferred that he should dower her, not I, and give to her a husband of his choosing.

SANCHO. You said that you were sad and joyful too, but I alone am sad; for you attain to honors, and I reap only pains. Leave with me your grief, and keep your joy, for in the king's suite, and with a brilliant marriage for your sister, it is natural for you to be merry. But you break the law of friendship, for you should have told the king your sister was already promised.

BUSTOS. It was all so strange, and my head so troubled, that I did not find the chance to say it.

SANCHO. Being so, shall my marriage not take place?

BUSTOS. I will return and inform the king that the agreements and the writings are all made, and the contract will then stand, for his authority will not disregard your just claim.

SANCHO. But if the king should turn the law, who can constrain him if guided by self-interest or pleasure?

BUSTOS. I will speak to him, and you as well; for then, in my confusion, I did not tell him of our agreement.

SANCHO. Would that my griefs might kill me! I said indeed that fortune stands not a moment steadfast, and that sorrow and weeping cast their shadow on our joys. And if the king should wish to do us wrong?

BUSTOS. Sancho Ortiz, the king's the king. Be silent and have patience. (Exit.)

SANCHO. In such a plight, who can have patience, and forbear? Oh, tyrant, come to thwart my happy marriage, applauded though you be in Seville, may your people drive you from your kingdom of Castile! Well do you deserve the name of Sancho the Bold by the acts I learn of now, if you win the name by tyranny! But God will break your plans — may He drive you from your kingdom of Castile! I'll leave Seville, and go to Gibraltar, to seek death in the battle-front.

CLARINDO. Methinks we'll find it nearer than Gibraltar!

SANCHO. Loving Stella the fair, why is my love so ill-starred? But my star is unfavorable, and her influence works my unhappiness!

CLARINDO. A shooting star, mayhap.

SANCHO. May you be banished from your kingdom of Castile! (Exeunt.)

SCENE III. A street in Seville, showing entrance to TABERA'S house.

Enter the KING, DON ARIAS, and Suite.

5 KING. Announce that I am here.

ARIAS. They are informed, and Don Bustos Tabera is already at the door to greet you, Sire.

Enter BUSTOS.

BUSTOS. What an honor, and what condescension! Your highness in my house!

6 KING. I was strolling in disguise to see the city, and they told me, as we passed, this was your house; and I would see it, for they say it is most beautiful.

BUSTOS. It is the house of a simple esquire.

KING. Let us go in.

BUSTOS. Sire, 'tis fit for my humble station, but not for you; for so great a lord it is too small. And it will not be well received in Seville, when they know you came to visit me.

25 KING. I come not for your house, Tabera, but for you.

BUSTOS. My lord, you do me great honor. But if you come for me, it is not meet that I obey you; for it would be uncourtly, that the king should come to the vassal, and the vassal permit it and consent to it. I am your servant and your vassal, and it is fitting that I come to you in the palace, if you wish to honor me. For favors may become affronts, when open to suspicion.

KING. Suspicion? Of what?

BUSTOS. It will be said, though it be false, you came to my house to see my sister; and her good name, however well established, might come in question; for honor is a crystal clear — a breath may tarnish it.

KING. Since I am here, I wish to speak with you of matters of importance. Let us go in.

BUSTOS. It shall be upon the way, with your permission. My house is not in order.

KING (aside to ARIAS). He makes great opposition.

ARIAS (aside to the KING). Take him away, and I will stay behind and speak to her for you.

KING. Speak low, that he may not hear you. The fool puts all his honor in his ears.

ARIAS. The weight will break them.

KING (to BUSTOS). So be it; I would not see your house against your will.

BUSTOS. Sire, at Stella's marriage you shall see it suitably adorned.

ARIAS. Bring up the coach.

KING. Bustos, you'll ride upon the step.

BUSTOS. I'll go on foot, with your permission.

KING. The coach is mine, and I give orders here.

ARIAS. The carriage waits.

KING. Drive to the palace.

BUSTOS (aside). Great favors these! The king does me much honor: please God it be for good.

(Exeunt. Manet ARIAS.)

Enter STELLA and MATILDE.

STELLA. What do you say, Matilde?

MATILDE. It was the king, my lady.

ARIAS. It was he, and it is not the first time a king was guided by a star. He came to your house to do homage to your charms; for, if he is king of Castile, you are the queen of beauty. The King Don Sancho, whom, for his unconquered prowess, the public, and the Moors who tremble at his name, have called The Bold, saw at a balcony your divine beauty, which rivals Aurora in her palace, when, hailed by drowsy birds mid roses and lilies, and weeping at the wakening, she scatters garlands of pearls. He ordered me to offer you the riches of Castile, though riches be but little for such charms. Accept his will, for if you do accept it, and reward it, you shall be the Sun of Seville, where you have been the Star. He will give you towns and cities, whereof you shall be Duchess, and he will wed you to a Duke, whereby you will crown the glory of your ancestors, and bring honor to the name of Tabera. What say you?

STELLA. What do I say? See!

(She turns her back.)

ARIAS. Hold! Wait!

STELLA. To such ignoble message, my back gives a reply. (Exit.)

ARIAS. A noble pair! I marvel at them both. The austerity of Rome survives in them in Seville. It seems impossible for the king to outwit and conquer them, but strength and persistence level mountains and split rocks. I'll speak to his servant, for gifts are gates to favor with the Portias and Lucrecias.¹ Are you the servant of the house?

MATILDE. Servant I am, by force.

ARIAS. By force?

MATILDE. I am a slave.

ARIAS. A slave!

MATILDE. Deprived of blessed liberty, and subject both to prison and to death.

ARIAS. I'll have the king release you, and give you with your freedom a thousand ducats rent, if you will do his will.

MATILDE. For liberty and gold, there is no crime that I'll not undertake. What is there I can do? I'll do it if I can.

ARIAS. You'll give the king admittance to the house to-night.

MATILDE. He shall find the doors all open, if you but keep your promise.

ARIAS. Before he enters, I will give you a letter from the king, in his own hand and signed by him.

MATILDE. Then I'll put him in Stella's very bed to-night.

ARIAS. What time does Bustos come?

MATILDE. Each night he's out till dawn. He has a lady, and this distraction often costs men dear.

ARIAS. What time do you think the king should come?

MATILDE. Let him come at eleven, for then she will be in bed.

ARIAS. Take this emerald as pledge of the favors that await you. (Exeunt.)

SCENE IV. A room in the palace.

Enter INIGO OSORIO, BUSTOS TABERA, and DON MANUEL, with golden keys.

MANUEL. I congratulate your lordship on the key, and the dignity it represents. May you win the honors you desire.

¹ The names of prominent Roman women, — names often connected with intrigue and scandal among the Roman nobility, but themselves representing virtue and honor.

BUSTOS. Would I might repay his majesty the honor that he does me, undeserved.

INIGO. 'Tis not beyond your merit. Be assured, the king makes no mistake.

BUSTOS. The key he's given me admits me to his paradise; although thus elevated I fear a fall to earth; for he has granted me abruptly all these honors and I foresee that he who gives thus hastily may change suddenly.

10

Enter ARIAS.

ARIAS. You may retire, gentlemen. The king intends to write.

MANUEL. Let's go and seek amusement for the night. (Exeunt.)

Enter the KING.

KING. You say I shall enjoy her charms to-night, Don Arias?

20

ARIAS. The little slave is wholly won.

KING. Castile shall raise a statue to her.

ARIAS. You are to give her a document.

KING. Prepare it, Arias. I shall not hesitate to sign, for my love impels it.

25

ARIAS. In faith, the little slave is useful.

KING. 'Tis the sun in heaven she procures for me, in the Star of Seville.

(Exeunt KING and ARIAS.)

ACT II

SCENE I. Street before TABERA's house.

Enter the KING, DON ARIAS, and MATILDE.

MATILDE. Alone; it will be safer, for all are now at rest.

KING. And Stella?

MATILDE. She is sleeping, and the room is dark.

40

KING. Although my promise might suffice, here, woman, is the paper, with your liberty therein. I will give another slave to Bustos.

ARIAS. And the money and all is included in it.

MATILDE. I kiss your feet.

ARIAS. All alike, my lord, yield to their interest.

KING. What joy divine to be a king!

50

ARIAS. Who can resist it?

KING. To be more secret, I'll go up alone.

ARIAS. You risk yourself alone, my lord?

KING. Now, tell me: although I risk myself, and though it be not safe — is not the king at hand? Begone.

ARIAS. Where shall I wait?

KING. Not in the street; some nook where I can find you.

ARIAS. I'll enter in Saint Mark's.

(Exit.)

KING. What time will Bustos come?

MATILDE. He always comes when the birds salute the dawn. And till he comes, the door is open.

KING. My love impels me to this high adventure.

MATILDE. Follow me, your highness; the passage is in darkness. (Exeunt.)

Enter BUSTOS, DON MANUEL, and DON INIGO.

BUSTOS. Here is my house.

INIGO. Farewell.

BUSTOS. It is early for me.

MANUEL. You need not go farther.

BUSTOS. 'Tis well.

INIGO. We two have a certain visit still to make.

BUSTOS. Did Feliciana please your fancy?

30

MANUEL. To-morrow at the palace, my good friend, we will speak of her, for she is a figure worthy of all praise. (Exeunt.)

BUSTOS. I'm early home to bed. The house is dark. No page is at the door.

35

Ho! Lujan, Osorio, Juan, Andres! They're all asleep. Justine! Inés! The maids are sleeping too. Matilde! The slave also has surrendered. Sleep is the god and master of her senses.

(Exit BUSTOS.)

SCENE II. A room in the house.

Enter MATILDE and the KING.

MATILDE. I think that was my master calling. I am lost.

KING. Did you not say he came at dawn?

MATILDE. Woe is me!

Enter BUSTOS. The KING wraps himself in his cloak.

BUSTOS. Matilde!

MATILDE. O God! I cannot face him.

KING (aside to MATILDE). Have no fear.

(Exit MATILDE.)

BUSTOS. Who's there?

KING. A man.

BUSTOS. A man, at this hour? And in my house? His name!

KING. Stand back.

BUSTOS. You lack in courtesy, and, if you pass, it shall be by the point of this sword; for, although this house is sacred, I'll profane it.

KING. Lower your sword.

BUSTOS. What! Lower it, when my sister's room is thus profaned? Tell me your name, or I will kill you here.

KING. I am a person of importance. Let me pass.

BUSTOS. This house is mine, and I command in it.

KING. Let me pass; observe, I am a man of rank, and, though I have come to your house, my intent is not to attack your honor, but to increase it.

BUSTOS. Is honor thus increased?

KING. Your honor is in my care.

BUSTOS. A better defender is this sword. And if you seek my honor, why do you come disguised? Do you conceal yourself to honor me? Do you hide yourself to do me service? Let your fear convince you how true it is that no one who gives honor need bring shame with it. Draw, or, by Heaven, I'll kill you!

KING. Rash provocation!

BUSTOS. I'll kill you here and now, or you'll kill me.

KING. I'll tell him who I am. Hold! I am the king.

BUSTOS. You lie! The king, seeking my shame, alone, disguised, and unattended? It cannot be, and you insult your king, since you accuse him of a fault that is the depth of baseness. What? The king outrage his vassal? This angers me still more. For this I'll kill you, in spite of all resistance. Offending me, lay not such charges against His Majesty, for well you know the laws of God and man condemn to just chastisement him who fancies or suspects unworthy conduct in his king.

KING. What strange persistence! Man, I say I am the king.

BUSTOS. Still less do I believe it, for the name of king is here, but not the deeds. The king is he who seeks my honor, and you seek my dishonor.

KING (aside). He is both fool and boor. What shall I do?

BUSTOS (aside). It is the king, disguised. There is no doubt. I'll let him pass, and later learn if he has wronged me. My soul is roused to anger and to fury, for honor is a thing that he who gives may also take away. — Pass, whoever you may be, and next time do not defame the king, nor call yourself the king, wretch, when you have to blush for your acts. Know that the king is my master, the dread of Africa, is most Christian and most holy, and you insult his name. He has entrusted to me the key to his house, and could not come without a key to mine, when he has given me his.

And do not offend the law; remember that he is an honorable man. This I say to you, and I spare you because you feigned to be the king. Marvel not to see me loyal, though offended, for 'tis a vassal's obligation to respect the name. Thus will he learn to be ruler of the honor of his vassals, and cease to wrong them against God's law and man's.

KING. I can no more; I choke with shame and anger. Fool! You let me go because I feigned to be the king? Then let me tell you that, because I said so, I'll go out thus from here. (He draws.) For if I win to freedom because I called myself the king, and you respect the name, I'll act the king, and you'll respect his deeds. (They fight.) Die, villain, for here the name of king gives power to me; the king will kill you.

BUSTOS. My honor rules me more than any king.

Enter servants with lights.

SERVANT. What's this?

KING. I'll make escape before I'm recognized. I leave this offended ruffian, but I will have revenge. (Exit.)

SERVANT. Your enemy has fled.

BUSTOS. Follow him! Chastise him! . . . No, let him go, we'll give the enemy a bridge of silver. Give a light to Matilde, and do you withdraw.

(They give her one and exeunt.)

BUSTOS (aside). She has betrayed me, for she hangs her head in shame. I will obtain the truth with a cunning lie. — Close the door. I am about to kill you. The king has told me all.

MATILDE. If he has not kept the secret, how can I in my unhappy state do so, my lord? All the king has told you is the truth.

BUSTOS (aside). Now I shall learn the damage to my honor. — So then you gave the king admittance?

MATILDE. He promised me my freedom, and for that I brought him to this place, as you have seen.

BUSTOS. And does Stella know aught of this?

MATILDE. I think her wrath would have consumed me, had she heard my plot.

BUSTOS. That is certain, for, if her light were dimmed, she'd be no star.

MATILDE. Her radiance suffers neither shadow nor eclipse, and her light is clear and bright as of the sun. The king but reached her room, and entered, giving me this paper, and you behind him.

BUSTOS. What? The king gave you this paper?

MATILDE. With a thousand ducats rent, and liberty.

BUSTOS. A noble gift, at the expense of my honor! Well does he honor and advance me! Come with me.

MATILDE. Where do you take me?

BUSTOS. You are going where the king may see you, for thus I fulfill the law and obligation that rests upon me.

MATILDE. Ah, unhappy slave!

BUSTOS. Though the king sought to eclipse her, the fame shall not be lost in Spain of the Star of Seville.

(Exeunt BUSTOS and MATILDE.)

SCENE III. A street leading to the palace.

Enter the KING and ARIAS.

KING. And that is what befell me.

ARIAS. You would go in alone.

KING. He was so mad and bold as to insult me; for I know he recognized me. He drew upon me with equivocal words and, though I contained myself a time, the natural resentment born in every man broke down the dignity my rank demands. I attacked him, but they came with lights who would have told the truth that they imagined, had I not turned my back fearing to be recognized. And so I come; you see, Arias, what befell me with Bustos

5 Tabera.

ARIAS. Let him pay for his offense with death; behead him, let the rising sun shine on his just punishment, for in the boundaries of Spain there is no law but your de-

10 sire.

KING. To execute him publicly, Arias, is error great.

ARIAS. You will have sufficient pretext; for he is counselor of Seville, and the wisest and most prudent, Sire, still commits some crime, a prey to power and ambition.

KING. He is so circumspect and prudent, that he has no guilt.

ARIAS. Then have him killed in secret,

20 Sire.

KING. That might be done, but to whom can I entrust the secret?

ARIAS. To me.

KING. I do not wish to endanger you.

ARIAS. Then I will find you a man, courageous and valiant soldier, and distinguished nobleman as well, before whom the Moor has trembled in the strong fortress of Gibraltar, where he has been many times victorious captain, and was never conquered. To-day in Seville they give him first rank among the brave and gallant, for he is the glory of the soldier's trade.

35 KING. What is his name?

ARIAS. Sancho Ortiz de las Roelas, called besides the Cid of Andalusia.

KING. Summon him to me at once, for dawn approaches.

ARIAS. Come to bed.

KING. What bed can tempt him who is offended, and in love? Call the man at once.

ARIAS. What form is that, that hangs upon the palace, swinging in the wind?

KING. A form, you say? What can it be?

ARIAS. There must be reason for it.

KING. See what it is.

ARIAS. The little slave, with her paper in her hands.

KING. What cruelty!

ARIAS. And what a crime!

KING. I'll kill the brother and the sister, too, if Seville shows sedition.

ARIAS. Have her cut down at once, and secretly give her a decent burial. Such bold effrontery! Tabera must die.

(Exeunt the KING and ARIAS.)

SCENE IV. A room in TABERA'S house.

Enter BUSTOS and STELLA.

STELLA. What do I hear?

BUSTOS. Close the door.

STELLA. Hardly does the sleepy sun shod with sapphires, leave the palace of Aurora, and you rouse me from my bed, alone, troubled, and afflicted? You are agitated and perturbed! Tell me, have you seen some fault, in which I am concerned?

BUSTOS. You can tell me if there has been such.

STELLA. I? What do you say? Are you mad? Tell me, have you lost your mind? I, a fault? Nay, you have committed one in saying so, for only to question is a crime against me. Do you not know me? Know you not who I am? In my mouth have you ever heard words not in keeping with the honor with which I guard my tongue? And if you have seen nothing that can testify against me, what fault can I have done?

BUSTOS. I do not speak without occasion.

STELLA. Without occasion?

BUSTOS. Alas! Stella! . . . for this night and in this house . . .

STELLA. Speak, for, if I should be guilty, I offer myself at once for punishment. What happened in this house this night?

BUSTOS. This night was the epicycle of the sun, for this night my Stella's star declined.

STELLA. No astrologies in dealing with questions of honor! Speak plainly, and leave the sun in its five zones, for, though my name be Stella, the sun does not control me.

BUSTOS. When the discordant tones of the bell of Cuevas sounding in the sky marked the middle of the night, I entered the house, and found in it, and near your very room, the king alone and in disguise.

STELLA. What say you?

BUSTOS. I speak the truth. Ask yourself, Stella, why the king could have come to my house alone at such an hour, if he came not for Stella. Matilde was with him: I heard her step, for then my honor was alert and keen. I drew, and said: "Who's there?" "A man," he answered.

I advanced upon him, and he retreating said he was the king. And, although I recognized him at once, I pretended not to know him, for Heaven willed to give me torment. He attacked me like an angry and offended monarch, for a king who attacks in anger fails not in valor. Pages came with lights, and then he turned his back lest he be seen, and was not recognized by any. I questioned the slave, and she, without need of torture, confessed the truth. The king gave her her freedom, signed in a paper that he wrote, chief witness in the case, in which his guilt stood clear. I took her from the house at once, lest her infected breath sow dishonor within these walls. I seized her at the door, and, placing her upon my shoulders, made my way to the palace, and for her crime I hanged her from the railings; for I'd have the king know that, if he is a Tarquin, I will be a Brutus.¹ Now you know all, Stella. Our honor is in danger. I am forced to leave you, and must give you a husband. Sancho Ortiz it shall be, for in his care you will be delivered from the designs of the king, and I can go my way in peace.

STELLA. Oh, Bustos, give me your hand for the service you have done me.

BUSTOS. It must be to-day, and, till I see you wed to him, keep silence, for my honor is at stake.

STELLA. O joy, my love! Thou art mine at last, and shalt not escape again. And yet, who knows the end from the beginning, if between the cup and the lip the sage feared danger?

(Exeunt STELLA and BUSTOS.)

¹ In the midst of his prosperity Tarquinius, the last legendary king of Rome, fell, through a shameful outrage committed by his son Sextus on Lucretia, the wife of his cousin Tarquinius Collatinus. L. Brutus, friend of Collatinus, as well as Tribunus Celerum, established a decree deposing and banishing the king. Sextus was murdered shortly thereafter in his own principality.

SCENE V. A room in the palace.Enter ARIAS, and the KING, with two papers.

ARIAS. Sancho Ortiz de las Roelas is waiting in the antechamber.

KING. All of love is trickery, and pity takes hold upon me. In this paper I have sealed his name and fate, and in this I say that I command his death: in this fashion the killer will be safeguarded. Have him come in. Then draw the bolt and do you remain without.

ARIAS. Without?

KING. Yes; for I wish him to see that I alone am in the secret. Thus my desire conceives the vengeance more assured.

ARIAS. I'll call him. (Exit.)

KING. I fear this is no glorious or lofty token of my love.

Enter SANCHE ORTIZ.

SANCHO. I kiss your feet.

KING. Rise, I would not humble you, rise.

SANCHO. My lord.

KING (aside). A noble youth.

SANCHO. My lord, it is not strange that I should be confused, being no courtier, nor yet orator.

KING. Why, tell me: What see you in me?

SANCHO. Majesty and valor; and in fine I see in you God's image, since the king is his embodiment; and I believe in you, as I do in Him. I submit myself here, great king, to your imperial will.

KING. What is your state?

SANCHO. Never so honored as I am today.

KING. I applaud your wisdom and your zeal. Now, since you will be anxious, and eager to learn why I have summoned you, I'll tell you, and will see if I have in you as well a valiant soldier. My interest demands the killing of a man, in secret, and this task I mean to trust to you, for I prefer you to all others in the city.

SANCHO. Is he guilty?

KING. He is.

SANCHO. Then, why a secret murder for a culprit? You may, in justice, publicly effect his death, without killing him in secret; for thus you do accuse yourself, accusing him, since men will think you cause his death unjustly. If this poor man has but a slight offense, my lord, I ask you pardon him.

KING. Sancho Ortiz, you are not here as advocate for him, but executioner. And since I order it, hiding the hand that strikes, it must be that it interests my honor to kill him thus. Does he who has attacked my person merit death?

SANCHO. By fire.

KING. And if his crime was that?

SANCHO. My lord, I would demand his death at once, and if 'tis so, then I will give it, though he were my brother, and hesitate no more.

KING. Give me your hand upon it.

SANCHO. And with it my soul and faith.

KING. You can kill him, taking him unawares.

SANCHO. My lord, I am Roela and a soldier, would you make me a traitor? I, kill by treachery! Face to face I'll kill him, where Seville may see, in street or market-place. For none can excuse him who kills and does not fight; and he who dies by treachery fares better than the one who kills. He who lives thus proclaims his perfidy to all he meets.

KING. Kill him as you like. You bear this paper signed by me, as guarantee, in which it states that I have pardoned any crime you do. Read. (He gives him a paper.)

SANCHO. It reads thus (reads):

"Sancho Ortiz, At once for me and in my name give death to him this paper indicates. I act through you, and, if you be disturbed, I promise you hereby that I shall free you. "I the King."

I am amazed Your Majesty should think so meanly of me. I, a promise! a paper! My loyalty trusts more in you than it. If your words have effect to move the hills, and carry out whate'er they say, give me your promise, Sire, and then I need no paper. Destroy it, for without it death is better sought than with it, since to some degree the paper casts discredit on your word. (He tears it.) Without a paper, Sire, we'll pledge ourselves, and promise, I to avenge you, you to protect me. If so it be, we need no documents which are an obstacle. I go at once to execute your will, and only ask you, as reward, the woman whom I choose, as wife.

KING. Be she a duchess of Castile, I give her to you.

SANCHO. May you regain the Moorish throne! May your glorious possessions reach the sea, and even to the pole!

KING. Your excellent service, Sancho, 10 shall be rewarded. In this paper is the name of the man who is to die. (Gives him the paper.) And, when you open it, be not dismayed. I have heard it said in Seville, he is brave.

SANCHO. That we shall see hereafter.

KING. We two alone this secret know. I need not say, be prudent, act, and keep your counsel. (Exit.)

Enter CLARINDO.

CLARINDO. I have sought you, my lord, bearing good news. I ask a guerdon for your dearest wish fulfilled.

SANCHO. You come in good spirits.

CLARINDO. Does your heart not divine the guerdon? (Gives him a paper.)

SANCHO. From whom is this?

CLARINDO. From Stella, who was fairer and lovelier than the sun. She ordered me to give you this paper and ask a guerdon.

SANCHO. For what?

CLARINDO. For the marriage, which is to take place at once.

SANCHO. What do you say? This joy 35 will kill me. What! Stella will be mine? The glorious radiance of Aurora is for me? And I may hope that the sun's golden rays will bathe in floods of light our former griefs?

(Reads:) 40

"My husband: The happy day so long desired has arrived. My brother seeks you, to crown my life, and to reward you. If you accord, seek him at once and lose no time."

"Your Stella."

Oh, fairest maid! What height may I not reach with such a star! Advise my steward of the happy bond which I assume. Let him bring forth at once the liveries reserved for this event, and let my servants and pages put on their hats adorned with finest plumes. And if you claim a guerdon, take this hyacinth. I would give even the sun, if it were mounted in a ring.

CLARINDO. May you outlive the very stones, and cling like ivy to your bride! Nay, since I love you so, may you live longer than a fool! (Exit.)

SANCHO. I will seek Bustos, for I am tormented with hope and eagerness. But with this marriage and my joy, I had forgot the king. It was not right. The paper is unsealed; I'll see who is it must be killed. (Reads:)

"Sancho, he whom you must kill is Bustos Tabera."

15 Heaven help me! Is this his will? After joy, disaster! All this life is but a game of chance, the cards ill shuffled and leading to reverse and ruin, for it's all in gains and losses, like a game of cards. I won at first, but now my luck has changed, and turned the card to give me death. Did I read aright? But I should not have read it, if the paper said not so. I'll look again. (Reads.) "Sancho, he whom you must kill

25 is Bustos Tabera." I am undone. What shall I do? For I have given my promise to the king, and I shall lose his sister. . . . Sancho Ortiz, it must not be; Bustos shall live! — But it is not right that my desire constrain my honor. Bustos shall die! Bustos must die! — But hold, fierce hand! Bustos must live, shall live! — But I cannot obey my honor, if I yield to love. — But who can resist the force of love? —

'Tis better that I die or go away, so that I serve the king, and he may live. — But I must do the king's will. (Reads.) "Sancho, he whom you must kill is Bustos Tabera." — But if the king kills him because of Stella, and seeks to honor her? If for Stella he kills him! Then he shall not die because of her. I will offend him and defend her. — But I am a gentleman, and must not do that which I will, but what I ought. — What is my duty? To obey the law that takes precedence. — But there is no law that forces me to this — But yes, there is, for, though the king be wrong, he is accountable to God. My mad love must give way, for, though it cost me cruel grief, to obey the king is right: Bustos must die, shall die! None may rightly say: Bustos must live, shall live! Forgive me, beloved

Stella, but O the sacrifice, to renounce you and become your enemy. What shall I do? Can I do otherwise?

Enter BUSTOS TABERA.

BUSTOS. Brother, I am blessed by fate in finding you.

SANCHO (aside). And I am cursed by fate in meeting you, for you seek me to give me life, but I seek you to kill you.

BUSTOS. Brother, the hour has come for your desired marriage.

SANCHO (aside). The hour of all my grief, I'd better say. O God! Was ever man in such despair? That I should have 15 to kill the man I most have loved! to renounce his sister! to lose all that I hold dear!

BUSTOS. By contract you are already wed to Stella.

SANCHO. I meant to marry her, but now 20 it may not be, although you grant it.

BUSTOS. Do you know me, and address me thus?

SANCHO. Because I know you, I speak thus, Tabera.

BUSTOS. If you know me to be Tabera, how dare you use such words?

SANCHO. I speak because I know you.

BUSTOS. You know my birth, my blood, and valor; and virtue, which is honor, for 30 without it honor never was: and I am aggrieved, Sancho.

SANCHO. But less than I.

BUSTOS. How so?

SANCHO. To have to speak with you. 35

BUSTOS. If you cast reflection on my honor or my faith, you basely lie, and here I do maintain it. (He draws.)

SANCHO. What have you to maintain, villain? (Aside.) Forgive me, love; the 40 king's excess has made me mad, and none may resist me now. (They fight.)

BUSTOS. You've killed me; stay your hand.

SANCHO. Ah! I am beside myself and 45 wounded you unknowing. But now I beg you, brother, since I have regained my sense, to kill me. Sheathe your sword within my breast, and open passage for my soul.

BUSTOS. Brother, I leave my Stella in 50 your care. Farewell. (He dies.)

SANCHO. O cruel sword! O bloody, savage murder! Since thou hast taken half my life, complete thy work, that my soul may expiate this other wound.

Enter two alcaldes, PEDRO and FARFAN.

5 PEDRO. What's this? Hold your hand.
SANCHO. Why stay me if I've killed one dear to me?

FARFAN. O what confusion!

PEDRO. What is this?

10 SANCHO. I have killed my brother. I am a Cain in Seville, since in cruel vengeance I killed an innocent Abel. You see him; kill me here, for since he dies through me I seek to die through him.

Enter ARIAS.

ARIAS. What's this?

SANCHO. A cruel violence, for such is the effect in man of promises fulfilled, and purest loyalty. Tell the king my master that Sevillians keep their promises by acts, as you see here; and for them they offend the stars, and know no brother.

PEDRO. Has he killed Bustos Tabera?

25 ARIAS. O what a rash deed!

SANCHO. Seize me, take me prisoner, for it is right that he who kills should die. See what a cruel deed love made me undertake, for it has forced me to kill him, and has forced me to die. Now through him I come to ask the death he owes to me.

PEDRO. Take him a prisoner to Triana, for the city is in confusion.

SANCHO. O Bustos Tabera, my friend!

FARFAN. The man has lost his mind.

SANCHO. Gentlemen, let me bear away the cold form, bathed in its noble blood, for so I shall support him, and will give him for a space the life that I have taken.

PEDRO. He's mad.

SANCHO. If I have violated friendship, I have kept the law, and that, sir, is to be king; and that, sir, is not to be king. Understand me, or understand me not, for I'll be silent. I killed him, there is no denying, but I will not answer why; let another tell the reason, for I confess I killed him.

(They take him and exeunt.)

SCENE VI. A room in TABERA'S house.

Enter STELLA and TEODORA.

STELLA. I know not if I dressed me well, for I did dress in haste. Give me the mirror, Teodora.

TEODORA. You have but to regard within yourself, my lady, for there is no glass that tells such truths, nor shows the image of such beauty.

STELLA. My face is flushed, my color warm.

TEODORA. Your blood, my lady, has mounted to your cheek, 'twixt fear and modesty, to celebrate your joy.

STELLA. It seems to me already that I see my husband come, his face all wreathed in smiles, with soft caress to take my hand; — I seem to hear him utter a thousand tender words, and that my soul on hearing leaps into my eyes, and takes possession of them. O happy day! O my guiding star!

TEODORA. I hear a knock. (Drops mirror.) The envious mirror fell. (She picks it up.) The glass within the frame of one light made a thousand.

STELLA. Did it break?

TEODORA. Yes, my lady.

STELLA. 'Tis well, for I await the mirror, Teodora, in which my eyes will see another self, and, since I shall have such a mirror, let this one break, for I would not have this serve as mirror when he comes.

Enter CLARINDO in gala dress.

CLARINDO. This dress announces joy and happiness, for my plumes already proclaim the wedding. I gave the paper to my master, and he gave this ring for guerdon.

STELLA. Then I will change this guerdon for you. Give it me, and take this diamond.

CLARINDO. The stone is split in two; it is for melancholy; they say that hyacinths have this complaint, although they lose it. It's split in two.

STELLA. What matter that 'tis broken! The very jewels feel my joy and happiness. O happy day! O my guiding star!

TEODORA. I hear people in the courtyard.

CLARINDO. I think I hear the guests upon the stairs.

STELLA. How can I bear my joy? . . . But what is this?

Enter the two alcaldes with TABERA's body.

PEDRO. Disaster and sorrow are the lot of man; for life is a sea of tears. Don Bustos Tabera is dead.

STELLA. O hostile fate!

PEDRO. One consolation still remains to you, which is that the murderer, Sancho Ortiz de las Roelas, is a prisoner, and that he will suffer the penalty to-morrow without fail.

STELLA. Leave me, O cruel men, for in your words you bear the torments of hell. My brother dead, and killed by Sancho Ortiz! Can one pronounce these words, or listen to them, and not die? I must be stone, for I am still alive. O fateful day! O my guiding star! But if you have human pity, kill me.

PEDRO. Her grief dements her, and well may.

STELLA. Unhappy is my star! My brother is dead, and Sancho Ortiz killed him, and broke three hearts in one! Leave me, for I'm lost indeed. (Starts to go.)

PEDRO. She's desperate.

FARFAN. Unhappy maid!

PEDRO. Follow her.

CLARINDO. My lady . . .

STELLA. Leave me, wretch, henchman of that murderer! Now, since all is ended, I'll end my life as well. Unhappy day! O my guiding star! (Exeunt.)

ACT III

SCENE I. A room in the palace.

Enter the KING, the two alcaldes, DON ARIAS.

PEDRO. He confesses that he killed him, but he will not confess why.

KING. Does he not say what impelled him?

FARFAN. He only answers "I do not know."

ARIAS. Great mystery!

KING. Does he say whether there was provocation?

PEDRO. In no wise, my lord.

ARIAS. What obstinate temerity!

FARFAN. He says he killed him, but he knows not if 'twas right. He only confesses that he killed him, because he swore to kill him.

ARIAS. He must have given provocation.

PEDRO. He says not so.

KING. Go back and speak to him for me, and say that I demand his plea. Tell him I am his friend, but I will be his enemy in rigorous punishment. Let him declare on what provocation he killed Bustos Tabera, and give in summary phrase the reason for the crime, rather than meet death in obstinacy. Let him say who ordered him, or on whose account he killed him, or what incitement moved him to this act; that on this condition I will show him mercy, else he must prepare to die.

PEDRO. 'Tis that he most desires; his grief has made him mad: after a deed so odious, so barbarous and cruel, he is bereft of reason.

KING. Does he complain of any man?

FARFAN. No, Sire. He takes counsel only of his grief.

KING. Pare and noble courage.

FARFAN. He is silent on the crimes of others, and blames himself alone.

KING. Never in the world were two such men; as I perceive their valor, it astounds me more and more. Tell him from me to name who caused the death or urged him to it; and warn him that he should declare it, though 'twere the king. If he do not confess at once, to-morrow on the scaffold he shall serve as warning to Seville.

ARIAS. I go. (Exeunt alcaides and ARIAS.)

Enter DON MANUEL.

MANUEL. Doña Stella begs permission to kiss your hand.

KING. Who prevents her?

MANUEL. The citizens, my lord.

KING. She measures her act with reason. Give me a chair, and let her enter now.

MANUEL. I'll go for her. (Exit.)

KING. She will come radiant with beauty, like the star that appears in heaven after a storm.

Enter DON MANUEL, STELLA, and people.

MANUEL. She is here, beautiful as the sun, but a sun whose summer radiance has turned cold as stone.

STELLA. Don Sancho, most Christian and illustrious monarch of Castile, famous for your exploits, celebrated for virtue: an unhappy star, her bright rays veiled in mourning, in dark clouds gathered by weeping, comes to implore justice; not, however, that you administer it, but that you leave my vengeance in my hands. I would not dry my eyes, for, drowned in tears, my grief commands respect. I loved my brother Tabera, whose concerns are now of heaven, where he treads the starry streets of paradise. As a brother he protected me, and I obeyed him as a father, and respected his commands. I lived in happiness with him, and sheltered from the sun, though its beams but rarely assailed my window. Seville envied our mutual affection, and all believed we were twin stars reduced to one. A cruel hunter bends his bow upon my brother, and ends our happiness: I have lost my brother, I have lost my husband, I am left alone. And you do not hasten to your royal duty, from which none has released you! Justice, Sire! Give me the murderer, fulfill the law in this; let me pass judgment on him.

KING. Be comforted, and dry your eyes, else will my palace burst in flame, for stars are tears of the sun, as each of its rays is topaz. Let Aurora gather her riches in them, if the new-born sun gives her the time, and let heaven treasure them, for 'tis not right that they be squandered here. Take this ring, it will open the castle of Triana for you. Let them deliver him to you, and be to him the cruel tigress of Hircanian¹ cliffs: — although the storks in flight urge us to pity and to weak compassion, for it is true, surprising though it be, that birds and beasts confound man's savagery.

STELLA. In this case, Sire, severity's a virtue, for, if in me were silver and gold, I'd tear them from my head, and cover my face with ugliness, though 'twere by burning coals. If one Tabera's dead, another lives, and, if Tabera's shame is in my face, my hands shall tear my flesh till it strike terror to the hardest heart.

(Exeunt all but the KING.)

¹ Cliffs along the shore of Hyrcania, on the southern and southeastern borders of the Caspian. This land was noted for its tigers and for the savage nature of its inhabitants.

KING. If they deliver Sancho Ortiz to her, I believe she'll slay him with her own hands. Can God permit such cruelty to be in form so fair and wonderful! See what a deed mad passion doth commit: I did incite Sancho Ortiz, and now I give him up, for love treads under foot the royal purple and promulgates his decrees at his own pleasure. (Exit.)

SCENE II. A prison.

Enter SANCHO, CLARINDO, and musicians.

SANCHO. Have you not made some verses on my fate, Clarindo?

CLARINDO. Who would write verses, my lord, when poetry is so ill paid? At the festival in the market-place, many asked verses from me, and later, seeing me in the streets, would say to me, as if I were a tailor, or repairer, "Is not the compliment finished?" and urged me to more haste than for a mended doublet. And, had I not been hungry, I'd have excelled Anaxagoras¹ in silence, and would have made a jest of Greek and Latin genius.

Enter the alcaides and ARIAS.

PEDRO. Enter.

CLARINDO. I believe these men have come, my lord, to inform you of your sentence.

SANCHO (to musicians). Then quickly begin a song. Now is death welcome, and I wish by singing to give evidence of my content. Besides, I'd show them my fortitude, and that death itself has no power to move me.

CLARINDO. Admirable courage! What better could a drunken Teuton do, his soul steeped in oldest wine?

MUSICIANS (sing).

Since my unhappy fate
Consists in living,
So long as death delays,
It stays my dying.

CLARINDO. An excellent enigma that they sing!

SANCHO. A timely sentiment.

MUSICIANS.

There's naught in life like death
For one who lives a-dying.

PEDRO. Is this a time for music, sir?

SANCHO. Why, what better entertainment in their misery can prisoners have?

FARFAN. Can one be entertained by music when death threatens him hourly, and when he momentarily awaits the sentence of his harsh judgment?

SANCHO. I am a swan, and sing before I die.

FARFAN. The time has come.

SANCHO. I kiss your hands and feet, for the news you give me. O blessed day of my desire!

PEDRO. Sancho Ortiz de las Roelas, do you confess you killed Bustos Tabera?

SANCHO. Yes, I declare it here aloud. Seek barbarous punishments, invent new tortures, that shall make Spain forget Phalaris² and Maxentius.²

FARFAN. Then did you kill him unprovoked?

SANCHO. I killed him; that I do confess. The cause, since I have kept it secret, if there be any man who knows it, let him tell; for I know not why he died, I only know I killed him without knowing.

PEDRO. It seems a treachery to kill him without cause.

SANCHO. He certainly gave cause, since he is dead.

PEDRO. To whom?

SANCHO. To him who brought me where I am, to this extremity.

PEDRO. Who is it?

SANCHO. I cannot tell, because he charged me secrecy. And if I acted like a king, I will keep silence like one, and, to put me to death, you need but know that I have killed him, without demanding why.

ARIAS. Señor Sancho Ortiz, I come to you in the king's name, to ask that you confess, at his request, who caused this mad disorder. If you did it for friends, for women, or for relatives, or for some man in power, some grandee of this realm, and if you have from him some paper, safeguard, or agreement, written or signed by his hand, show it at once, and thereby do your duty.

SANCHO. If I do so, my lord, I shall not do my duty. Say to His Majesty, my friend, that I fulfill my promise, and if he is Don Sancho the Bold I bear the same name. Tell him that I may have had a paper, but he insults me when he asks for papers, having seen them torn. I killed Bustos Tabera, and, though I might free myself now, I will not, because I know I break a promise. I keep my promise like a king, and I have done that I did promise, and he should do the same who also promises. Let him now act whose obligation is to speak, for I fulfilled my obligation in action.

ARIAS. If you can justify yourself by a word, 'tis madness to refuse it.

SANCHO. I am who I am, and, being who I am, I avenge myself by my silence, and I defy one who keeps silence. And who is who he is, let him act as who he is, and so we shall both act as befits us.

ARIAS. I'll say that to His Majesty.

PEDRO. Sancho Ortiz, you have done a thing most ill advised, and you have acted rashly.

FARFAN. You have offended the municipality of Seville, and exposed your life to her severity, your neck to her just vengeance.

(Exeunt the alcaides and ARIAS.)

CLARINDO. Is it possible that you accept such insults?

SANCHO. I consent that men should punish me, and Heaven confound me: and already, Clarindo, it begins. Do you not hear a confused clamor? The air's aflame with thunder-bolts and lightning: one sweeps upon me like a serpent, describing swift curves of fire.

CLARINDO. I think that he has lost his wits. I'll follow his humor.

SANCHO. How I burn!

CLARINDO. How I broil!

SANCHO. Did the bolt strike you too?

CLARINDO. Do you not see me in ashes?

SANCHO. God save us!

CLARINDO. Yes, my lord, I am the ashes of a fagot.

SANCHO. We are now in the other world.

CLARINDO. In hell, I think.

SANCHO. In hell, Clarindo? Why say you so?

CLARINDO. Because I see in yonder castle, my lord, a thousand lying tailors.

SANCHO. You rightly say we're there; for Pride is burning upon yon tower formed of the arrogant and haughty; there I see Ambition drinking a river of fire.

CLARINDO. And farther on there is a legion of cabmen.

SANCHO. If coaches pass through here, they'll wreck the place. But if this is hell, why do we see no lawyers?

CLARINDO. They won't receive them, lest they bring lawsuits here.

SANCHO. If there are no lawsuits here, hell's not so bad.

CLARINDO. Aha! There is the tyrant Honor, bearing a crowd of fools, who suffer for honor.

SANCHO. I'll join them. — Honor, an honorable fool comes to be your servant, for not violating your laws. — Friend, you have done badly, for true honor consists to-day in having none. Dost seek me yonder, and for a thousand centuries I've been dead! Seek wealth, my friend, for wealth is honor. What did you do? — I sought to keep a promise. — You make me laugh. Do you keep promises? You seem a simpleton, for not to keep a promise is a noble act these days. — I promised to kill a man, and raging killed him, though he was my friend. — Bad!

CLARINDO. At least not good!

SANCHO. At least not good. Put him in prison, and condemn him for a fool. — Honor, I lost his sister, and now I suffer in that I did fight him. — No matter.

CLARINDO. God help me! If I let him continue further, he will be mad entirely. I will invent a trick. (He shouts.)

SANCHO. Who calls? Who calls?

CLARINDO. It is the dog Cerberus who calls, the porter of this palace. Do you not know me?

SANCHO. Methinks I do.

CLARINDO. And who are you?

SANCHO. A man of honor.

CLARINDO. What! In here! Begone.

SANCHO. What say you?

CLARINDO. Go out at once; this place is not for men of honor. Seize him, and take him bound to the other world, to the prison of Seville, on the wind, but bandage his eyes, that he may fly without fear. — Now his eyes are covered. — Now let the lame devil on his shoulders take him there at a leap. — At a leap? I am content. — Go, and take also his companion by the hand. (Gives him a whirl, and releases him.) — Now you are in the world, my friend. God be with you, as with me.

SANCHO. God, said he?

CLARINDO. Yes, my lord, for this devil, before he was one, was a baptized Christian, and is a Gallego of Caldefrancos.

SANCHO. It seems to me that I am waking from a trance. God help me! O Stella! How wretched is my fate without you! But, since I caused your grief, I deserve my punishment.

Enter the Governor of the prison and Stella, veiled.

STELLA. Deliver me the prisoner at once.

GOVERNOR. Here is the prisoner, my lady, and, as the king commands me, I deliver him to your hands. Señor Sancho Ortiz, His Majesty commands us to deliver you to this lady.

STELLA. Sir, come with me.

SANCHO. I welcome your compassion, if it is to kill me, for I desire death.

STELLA. Give me your hand and come.

CLARINDO. Does it not seem enchantment?

STELLA. Let no one follow us. (Exeunt.)

CLARINDO. 'Tis well. In faith, we're traveling well, from hell to Seville, and from Seville to hell! Please God this Star reveal herself as Venus!

(Exit.)

SCENE III. Outside the prison.

Enter STELLA, covered with her cloak, SANCHO.

STELLA. Now I have placed you at liberty. Go with God, Sancho Ortiz, and remember that I have been merciful and compassionate. Go with God! Go. You are free. Why do you linger? Why look you so? Why hesitate? He who delays is wasting time. Go, for a horse awaits you on which you can escape; the servant has money for the journey.

SANCHO. Madame, I kiss your feet.

STELLA. Go, for there is no time to lose.

SANCHO. With heavy heart I go. May I not know who has liberated me, that I may give thanks for such mercy?

STELLA. A woman; I wish you well, for I give you liberty, having it in my discretion. Go with God.

SANCHO. I will not pass from here, except you tell me who you are, or let me see your face.

STELLA. I cannot now.

SANCHO. I wish to repay you for my life, and freedom: I must know to whom I owe such obligation, acknowledging this debt.

STELLA. I am a woman of noble birth, and moreover, the one who loves you best, and whom you love least. Go with God.

SANCHO. I will not go if you do not uncover.

STELLA. That you may go, I am . . . (Uncovers.)

SANCHO. Stella, star of my soul!

STELLA. A star I am, that guides you, the omen of your life. Go, for thus does love o'ercome the force of sternness, for as I love you, so am I to you a favoring Star.

SANCHO. You! resplendent and fair, in presence of your mortal enemy! You! Such pity for me! Treat me more cruelly, for here pity is cruelty, for pity is punishment. Have me put to death, seek not so generously to do me harm with good, when good is to my harm. Give liberty to one who killed your brother! It is not right that I should live, since he met death through me. And it is right that one who thus lost a friend should lose you too. In freedom now I thus deliver myself to death, for, if I were a prisoner, how should I ask for death?

STELLA. My love is finer and stronger, and so I give you life.

SANCHO. Then I will go to death, since 'tis your will to free me, for if you act as who you are, I have to act my part.

STELLA. Why do you die?

SANCHO. To avenge you.

STELLA. For what?

SANCHO. For my treachery.

STELLA. 'Tis cruelty.

SANCHO. 'Tis justice.

STELLA. There is no plaintiff.

SANCHO. Love is plaintiff.

STELLA. 'Tis to offend me.

SANCHO. 'Tis to love you.

STELLA. How do you prove it?

SANCHO. By dying.

STELLA. Nay, you insult me.

SANCHO. By living.

STELLA. Hear me.

SANCHO. There is nothing to be said.

STELLA. Where are you going?

SANCHO. I go to die, since by my life I offend you.

STELLA. Go, and leave me.

SANCHO. It is not well.

STELLA. Live, and take your freedom. 15

SANCHO. It is not right.

STELLA. Why do you die?

SANCHO. It is my pleasure.

STELLA. 'Tis cruelty.

SANCHO. 'Tis honor, too.

STELLA. Who accuses you?

SANCHO. Your disdain.

STELLA. I have none.

SANCHO. I am unmoved.

STELLA. Are you in your senses? 25

SANCHO. I am in my honor, and I offend you by living.

STELLA. Then, madman, go and die, for I will also die. (Exeunt on opposite sides.)

SCENE IV. A room in the palace.

Enter the KING and ARIAS.

KING. And so he'll not confess that I commanded him to kill?

ARIAS. I ne'er saw bronze more firm. His whole intent is to deny. He said at last that he has fulfilled his obligation, and that it is right that he to whom he owed the obligation now keep his word.

KING. He hopes to force me by his silence.

ARIAS. Indeed he has constrained you.

KING. He has fulfilled his promise, and I am sore perplexed not to be able to keep 45 the word I gave him in a moment of anger.

ARIAS. You cannot evade a promise given, for, if an ordinary man must keep it, in a king's mouth it becomes law, and all 50 must bow before the law.

KING. 'Tis true, when the law is interpreted by natural right.

ARIAS. It is an obligation. The vassal does not question the law of the king; the vassal can only execute the law, blindly and unquestioning; and it is for the king to take thought. In this instance you did give it in a paper, and, since he executed it without the paper, you are bound to fulfill to him the law you made in ordering him to kill Bustos Tabera; for, had it not been by 10 your command, he had not killed him.

KING. Then must I say that I ordered his death, and used such cruelty to one who never offended me? What will the council of Seville say of me, Arias, when it sees I was the cause? And what will be said in Castille when Don Alonso there already calls me tyrant, and the Roman pontiff attacks me with his censure? Perchance he will take up my nephew's claims, and his 20 support assures them. I fail in my desires likewise, I see, if I let Sancho die, and that is baseness. What shall I do?

ARIAS. Your Highness may with flattery win the alcaldes, and ask them that by exile Sancho Ortiz pay for his crime and grievous fault, suppressing greater rigors; thus do you intercede for him. You may make him general on some frontier, and so you reward him with a laurel crown.

30 KING. You say well; but if Doña Stella, to whom I gave my ring, has already wreaked vengeance on him, what shall we do then?

ARIAS. All shall be put in order. I will 35 go in your name and seize her person alleging your order, and will bring her alone and secretly to the palace. Here you may win her to your design; and to persuade her, you may marry her to some grandee 40 of the court, for her virtue and her rank deserve a noble husband.

KING. How I repent my weakness, Arias! The sage well says that he alone is wise who is upon occasion prudent, as on occasion stern. Go now and take Stella, since by her capture you free me from my perplexity. And to placate her I will marry her to a Duke of Castile, and, could I give my throne, would put her in my place, 50 for such a brother and sister merit immortal glory.

ARIAS. The people of this city dim the glory of Rome. (Exit Arias.)

Enter the Governor of the prison.

GOVERNOR. I kiss Your Highness' feet.

KING. Pedro de Caus, what occasion brings you to my feet?

GOVERNOR. Sire, this ring, engraved with your arms, is it not Your Majesty's?

KING. Yes, this is pardon and safeguard for any crime you may have done.

GOVERNOR. O mighty king, there came with it to Triana a woman closely veiled, saying that Your Highness ordered Sancho Ortiz be delivered her. I referred your mandate to the guards, together with the ring, and all were of opinion that he be delivered. I released him, but shortly Sancho Ortiz, like a madman, with loud cries, begs that the castle gate be opened. "I will not do the king's command," he said, "and wish to die, for it is right that he who kills should die." I refused admittance, but he shouted so I was obliged to open. He entered, and in joy he waits for death.

KING. I never saw such noble or such Christian folk as in this city. Bronze, marble, statues, may be silent.

GOVERNOR. The woman says, my lord, she gave him freedom, and he would not accept it, when he knew she was the sister of Bustos Tabera, whom he put to death.

KING. What you say now astounds me all the more; their magnanimity passes nature. She, when she should be most vindictive, forgives, and frees him; and he, to reward her generous soul, returned to die. If their deeds go further, they will be immortalized in records of eternity. Do you, Pedro de Caus, bring me Don Sancho in my carriage to the palace, with strictest secrecy, avoiding noise or guards.

GOVERNOR. I go to do your bidding.

(Exit.)

Enter a servant.

SERVANT. The two chief alcaldes desire to see Your Majesty.

KING. Tell them to enter, with their wands of office. (Exit servant.) Now if I can I'll keep my word to Sancho Ortiz, without revealing my deed of cruelty.

Enter the alcaldes.

PEDRO. Sire, the guilt is proved; the case requires sentence.

KING. Pronounce it. I only beg you, since you are the guardians of the state, to consider justice, and clemency oft favors it. Sancho Ortiz is councilor of Seville, and, if he who is dead was also councilor, the one claims mercy, if the other calls for vengeance.

FARFAN. Sire, we are alcaldes of Seville, and her confidence and honor repose on us to-day. These staves represent your imperial authority, and, if they fail to honor your divine right, they offend your person. Held upright, they look to God, and, if they are bent or lowered, they look to man, and, deflecting, they lose their heavenly function.

KING. I ask not that you deflect them, but that equity be done in justice.

PEDRO. Sire, the source of our authority is Your Majesty. On your command depend our hopes. Spare his life; you may pardon him, since kings are accountable to none. God creates kings, and God transfers the crown of sovereignty from Saul to David.

KING. Go in, and weigh the sentence that you give for penalty, and let Sancho Ortiz go to execution as the laws require. (Aside.) You, Pedro de Guzman, listen to a word apart.

PEDRO. What is Your Highness' will?

KING. By putting Sancho to death, my dear Don Pedro, you do not restore life to the dead. May we not avoid the extreme penalty, and exile him to Gibraltar, or Granada, where in my service he may find a voluntary death? What say you?

PEDRO. That I am Don Pedro de Guzman, and I am at your feet. Yours is my life, and my possessions and my sword.

KING. Embrace me, Don Pedro de Guzman. I did expect no less from a noble heart. Go with God; send Farfan de Rivera to me. (Aside.) Flattery levels mountains.

FARFAN. You see me at your feet.

KING. Farfan de Rivera, it grieved me that Sancho Ortiz should die, but now it is proposed that death be changed to exile, and it will be longer, since it will be for life. I need your opinion to decide a matter of so great importance.

FARFAN. Your Highness may command Farfan de Rivera without reserve, for my loyalty has no reserve in serving you.

KING. In truth you are Rivera, in whom the flowers of virtue spring, to adorn and attend you. Go with God. (Exeunt alcaides.) Well have I labored. Now, 10 Sancho Ortiz escapes death, and my promise is saved without becoming known. I will have him go as general to some frontier, whereby I exile and reward him.

Reënter alcaides.

PEDRO. Now the sentence is signed, and it remains only to submit it to Your Majesty.

KING. Such noble lords as you will have 20 made it, I doubt not, as I desired.

FARFAN. Our boast is loyalty.

KING (reads the sentence): "Our finding and decision is that he be publicly beheaded." Is this the sentence that you 25 bring me signed? Thus, traitors, do you keep your promise to your king? Zounds!

FARFAN. When this wand is laid aside, the lowest of your subjects, as you see, will keep his promise with his life or arms. But 30 with it in hand, let none commit offense in act or words, for human empire, for earth or heaven.

PEDRO. Give us your orders as subjects, but, as chief alcaides, ask not unjust things, for then we bear our wands; as vassals we're without them. And the Council of Seville is what it is.

KING. Enough; 'tis well, for all of you put me to shame.

Enter ARIAS and STELLA.

ARIAS. Stella is now here.

KING. Don Arias, what shall I do? What is your counsel in such great con- 45 fusion?

Enter the Governor, SANCHE ORTIZ, and CLARINDO.

GOVERNOR. Sancho Ortiz is before you. 50

SANCHE. Great king, why do you not end my sufferings with death, my misfortunes with your condemnation? I killed Bustos Tabera, kill me; he who kills must die. Show mercy, Sire, by executing justice.

KING. Wait! Who ordered you to kill 5 him?

SANCHE. A paper.

KING. From whom?

SANCHE. Could the paper speak, 'twould tell; that is clear and evident; but papers torn give but confused reply. I only know I killed the man I most did love, because I promised. But here at your feet Stella awaits my death in atonement, and still is her vengeance incomplete.

15 KING. Stella, I have determined your marriage with a noble of my house, young, gallant, a prince of Castile, and lord of Salva. And in return for this, we ask his pardon, which may not justly be refused.

STELLA. Sire, if I am married, let Sancho Ortiz go free. I renounce my vengeance.

SANCHE. And so you give me pardon, because His Highness marries you?

STELLA. Yes, for that I pardon you.

SANCHE. And are you thus avenged for my offense?

STELLA. And satisfied.

30 SANCHE. Then that your hopes may be fulfilled, I consent to live, although I wished to die.

KING. Go with God.

FARFAN. Look what you do, my lord, 35 for this is to offend Seville, and he must die.

KING (to ARIAS). What shall I do? These people anger and dismay me.

ARIAS. Speak.

40 KING. Men of Seville, put me to death, for I was cause of this murder. I ordered him to kill, and this suffices to discharge him.

SANCHE. My honor awaited only this avowal, for the king ordered me to kill him, and I had not committed an act so cruel, had the king not ordered it.

KING. I declare that this is true.

FARFAN. Then is Seville content, for, since you ordered he be put to death, no doubt he gave you cause.

KING. The nobility of Seville leaves me in wonder.

SANCHO. I will depart to exile, when Your Majesty fulfills another promise that you gave me.

KING. I'll keep it.

SANCHO. I said that you should give to me for wife the woman I should ask.

KING. So it was.

SANCHO. I ask for Stella.

STELLA. Sancho Ortiz, I am promised.

SANCHO. Promised?

STELLA. Yes.

SANCHO. Woe is me.

KING. Stella, this was my promise; I am king and must fulfill it. What do you say?

STELLA. Your will be done. I am his.

SANCHO. I am hers.

KING. And now, what lacks?

SANCHO. Harmony.

STELLA. Which we shall never find in life together.

SANCHO. I say the same, and therefore I release you from your word.

STELLA. And I release your word; for always to see the murderer of my brother at my bed and board would give me too much pain.

SANCHO. And me too much, to be forever with the sister of him I killed unjustly, loving him like my soul.

STELLA. Then we are free?

SANCHO. Yes.

STELLA. So then farewell.

SANCHO. Farewell.

10 KING. Wait.

STELLA. Sire, I cannot take for husband a man who killed my brother, though I love him and adore him. (Exit.)

SANCHO. And I, Sire, because I love her, it is not just that I should marry her.

KING. What nobility!

ARIAS. What constancy!

CLARINDO. Madness it seems to me.

KING. I marvel at these people.

20 PEDRO. Such are the people of Seville.

KING. I intend to give her a husband, and such as she deserves.

CLARINDO. And now Lope consecrates to you this tragedy, giving eternal fame to the Star of Seville, whose marvelous history is writ on tablets of bronze.

ROMANTIC EPIC

ITALIAN

ARIOSTO

(1474-1533)

Lodovico Ariosto, celebrated Italian epic poet, was born at Reggio, near Modena. He attended the College of Ferrara and then began the study of law, in compliance with the desire of his father. He soon found that the legal profession was little in harmony with his poetic instinct. His early dramas attracted the attention of the Cardinal Ippolito d'Este, and he was taken into the cardinal's service in 1513. In 1505 he began the composition of the Orlando Furioso, which was finally published in 1516. Soon after the publication of the poem, Ariosto unfortunately offended the cardinal by refusing to accompany him on a mission to Hungary. The poet thereafter was obliged to take service with the cardinal's brother, the Duke Alfonso, under whom Ariosto became governor of Garfagnana and undertook the task of subjugating the bandits in that district. He executed his work well and resigned his post in 1524. In 1526 he retired to Ferrara and in 1532 brought out a new and improved edition of the Orlando Furioso. He died at Ferrara in 1533. Ariosto was a poet of considerable versatility and composed, in addition to his great epic poem, a number of comedies, elegies, sonnets, canzoni, etc.

In the hands of Italian writers, the epic heroes of France were made over into heroes of romance. Ariosto's Orlando Furioso deals ostensibly with the madness of Roland, a feature unknown to the French epic poets, and is intended to form a continuation of Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato (Roland Enamored). The poem presents, as well, the astounding adventures of Ruggero, Rodomonte, Angelica, Bradamonte, and others. The madness of Orlando does not appear until the twenty-third canto. The narrative is loose and wandering and follows no central plot, but makes frequent excursions into the most entertaining buffoonery, into pastoral passages of great delicacy and charm, and into episodes of the most extravagant fancy. Characters come and go without giving any particular account of themselves, some of them disappearing entirely during the course of the story. Yet the poem is a brilliant performance. It became enormously popular, not only in Italy but throughout western Europe, and it influenced many later poets, notably the English poet Spenser. It was familiar in Shakespeare's England through the translation of Sir John Harington (1591). In spite of its defects, it is a noble poem.

The selection printed in this volume tells the story of Medoro and Cloridano during the Saracens' siege of Paris, and forms an almost independent episode. The translation is Leigh Hunt's, in Poetical Works, ed. H. S. Milford, Oxford Press, 1923.

ORLANDO FURIOSO

CANTO XVIII

CLXIV

All night, the Saracens, in their battered stations,
Feeling but ill secure, and sore distressed,
Gave way to tears, and groans, and lamentations,

Only as hushed as might be, and suppressed;

Some for the loss of friends and of relations

5 Left on the field; others for want of rest,

Who had been wounded and were far from home;

But most for dread of what was yet to come.

CLXV

Among the rest two Moorish youths were there,
Born of a lowly stock in Ptolemais,
Whose story teems with evidence so rare
Of tried affection, it must here find place.
Their names Medoro and Cloridano were,
They had shown Dardinel the same true
face,
Whatever fortune waited on his lance,
And now had crossed the sea with him to France.

CLXVI

The one, a hunter, used to every sky,
Was of the rougher make, but prompt and fleet:
Medoro had a cheek of rosy dye,
Fair, and delightful for its youth complete:
Of all that came to that great chivalry,
None had a face more lively or more sweet.
Black eyes he had, and sunny curls of hair;
He seemed an angel, newly from the air.

CLXVII

These two, with others, where the ramparts lay,
Were keeping watch to guard against surprise,
What time the Night, in middle of its way,
Wonders at heaven with its drowsy eyes.
Medoro there, in all he had to say,
Could not but talk, with sadness and with
sighs,
Of Dardinel his lord; nay, feel remorse,
Though guiltless, for his yet unburied corse.

CLXVIII

'O Cloridan,' he said, 'I try in vain
To bear the thought; nor ought I, if I could.
Think of a man like that, left on the plain For wolves and crows! he, too, that was so good
To my poor self! How can he thus remain,
And I stand here, sparing my wretched
blood?
Which, for his sake, might twenty times
o'erflow,

And yet not pay him half the debt I owe.

CLXIX

5 'I will go forth, — I will, — and seek him yet,
That he may want not a grave's cover-
ing;
10 And God will grant, perhaps, that I may get E'en to the sleeping camp of the French
king.
Do thou remain; for if my name is set 15 For death in heaven, thou mayst relate the
thing;
So that if fate cut short the glorious part,
The world may know 'twas not for want of heart.'

CLXX

Struck with amaze was Cloridan to see Such heart, such love, such duty in a youth;
And laboured (for he loved him tenderly)
To turn a thought so dangerous to them
both;
But no — a sorrow of that high degree
30 Is no such thing to comfort or to soothe.
Medoro was disposed, either to die,
Or give his lord a grave wherein to lie.

CLXXI

Seeing that nothing bent him or could
move,
Cloridan cried, 'My road then shall be thine: —
40 I too will join in such a work of love;
I too would clasp a death-bed so divine.
Life — pleasure — glory — what would it behave
Remaining without thee, Medoro mine.
45 Such death with thee would better far become me,
Than die for grief, shouldst thou be taken from me.'

CLXXII

Thus both resolved, they put into their place

The next on guard, and slip from the redoubt.

They cross the ditch, and in a little space
Enter our quarters, looking round about.
So little dream we of a Moorish face,
Our camp is hushed, and every fire gone
out.

'Twixt heaps of arms and carriages they creep,
Up to the very eyes in wine and sleep.

CLXXIII

Cloridan stopped awhile, and said,
'Look here!
Occasions are not things to let go by.
Some of the race who cost our lord so dear,
Surely, Medoro, by this arm must die.
Do thou meanwhile keep watch, all eye
and ear,
Lest any one should come: — I'll push on,
I,

And lead the way, and make through bed
and board

An ample passage for thee with my sword.' 25

CLXXIV

He said; and entered without more ado
The tent where Alpheus lay, a learned 30
Mars,
Who had but lately come to court, and
knew

Physic, and magic, and a world of stars.
This was a cast they had not helped him 35
to;

Indeed their flatteries had been all a farce;
For he had found, that after a long life
He was to die, poor man, beside his wife.

CLXXV

And now the cautious Saracen has put
His sword, as true as lancet, in his weason.¹
Four mouths close by are equally well 45 shut,
Before they can find time to ask the reason.
Their names are not in Turpin *; and I cut
Their lives as short, not to be out of season.

Next Palidon died, a man of snug resources,

Who had made up his bed between two horses.

5

CLXXVI

They then arrived, where, pillowing his head

10 Upon a barrel, lay unhappy Grill.
Much vowed had he, and much believed,
indeed,

That he, that blessed night, would sleep his fill.

15 The reckless Moor beheads him on his bed,
And wastes his blood and wine at the same spill:

For he held quarts; and in his dreams that very

20 Moment had filled, but found his glass miscarry.

CLXXVII

Near Grill, a German and a Greek there
lay,

Andropono and Conrad, who had passed Much of the night al fresco,² in drink and
play;

30 A single stroke a-piece made it their last.
Happy, if they had thought to play away
Till daylight on their board his eye had cast!

But fate determines all these matters still,
35 Let us arrange them for her as we will.

CLXXVIII

Like as a lion in a fold of sheep, 40 Whom desperate hunger has made gaunt and spare,

Kills, bleeds, devours, and mangles in a heap

The feeble flock collected meekly there;
So the fierce Pagan bleeds us in our sleep,
And lays about, and butchers every where:
And now Medoro joins the dreadful sport,
But scorns to strike among the meaner
sort.

¹ Windpipe.

² Archbishop of Reims, ca. 800. He is celebrated in ancient tales of chivalry, and is supposed to have composed a Latin chronicle upon the life of Charlemagne and Roland.

* In the open, in the fresh air.

CLXXIX

Upon a duke he came, La Brett, who slept
Fast in his lady's arms, embraced and fixed;
So close they were, so fondly had they
kept,
That not the air itself could get betwixt.
O'er both their necks at once the falchion 10 swept.

O happy death! O cup too sweetly mixed!
For as their bosoms and affections were,
E'en so, I trust, their souls went clasped in air.

CLXXX

Ardalic and Malindo next are slain, Princes whose race the Flemish sceptre 20
wield;
They had been just made knights by Charlemagne,
And had the lilies added to their shield,
Because, the hardest day of the campaign, 25
He saw them both turn blood-red in the
field.
Lands, too, he said, he'd give; and would have done it,
Had not Medoro put his veto on it.

CLXXXI

The wily sword was reaching now the ring
Of the pavilions of the peers, — the fence
Of the more high pavilion of the king.
They were his guard by turns. The Sara-cens
Here make a halt, and think it fit to bring 40
Their slaughter to a close, and get them
hence;
Since it appears impossible to make
So wide a circuit, and find none awake.

CLXXXII

They might have got much booty if they chose,
But now to get clean off is their great good. 50

Cloridan leads as heretofore, and goes Picking the safest way out that he could.
At last they come, where, amidst shields and bows,
5 And swords, and spears, in one great plash
of blood,
Lie poor and rich, the monarch and the slave,
And men and horses, heaped without a grave.

CLXXXIII

The horrible mixture of the bodies there 15 (For all the field was reeking round about)
Would have made vain their melancholy
care
Till day-time, which 'twas best to do with-
out,
Had not the Moon, at poor Medoro's
prayer,
Put from a darksome cloud her bright horn
out.
Medoro to the beam devoutly raised His head, and thus petitioned as he gazed: —

CLXXXIV

30 'O holy queen, who by our ancestors
Justly wert worshipped by a triple name¹;
Who show'st in heav'n, and earth, and hell,
thy powers
And beauteous face, another and the same;
35 And who in forests, thy old favourite bowers,
Art the great huntress, following the game;
Show me, I pray thee, where my sovereign
lies,
40 Who while he lived found favour in thine
eyes.'

CLXXXV

45 At this, whether 'twas chance or faith, the moon
Parted the cloud, and issued with a stoop, Fair, as when first she kissed Endymion,²
50 And to his arms gave herself naked up.

² As he slept on Mt. Latmus, in Caria, Endymion's surprising beauty warmed the cold heart of Selene (the moon), who came down to him, kissed him, and lay by his side.

The city, at that light, burst forth and shone,
And both the camps, and all the plain and slope,
And the two hills that rose on either quar- 5
ter,
Far from the walls, Montlery and Montmartre.

CLXXXVI

Most brilliantly of all the lustre showered
Where lay the son of great Almontes, dead.
Medoro, weeping, went to his dear lord, Whom by his shield he knew, of white and red.
The bitter tears bathed all his face, and poured
From either eye, like founts along their 20
bed.

So sweet his ways, so sweet his sorrows
were,
They might have stopt the very winds to hear.

CLXXXVII

But low he wept, and scarcely audible;
Not that he cared what a surprise might 30
cost,
From any dread of dying; for he still Felt a contempt for life, and wished it lost;
But from the fear, lest ere he could fulfil
His pious business there, it might be crost. 35
Raised on their shoulders is the crown'd
load;
And, shared between them thus, they take their road.

CLXXXVIII

With the dear weight they make what speed they may,
Like an escaping mother to a birth;
And now comes he, the lord of life and day,
To take the stars from heav'n, the shade
from earth;
When the young Scottish prince, who never lay 50
Sleeping, when things were to be done of
worth,
After continuing the pursuit all night

Came to the field with the first morning light.

CLXXXIX

And with him came, about him and behind,
A troop of knights, whom they could see
from far,
10 All met upon the road, in the same mind
To search the field for precious spoils of
war.
'Brother,' said Cloridan, 'we must needs,
I find,
15 Lay down our load, and try how fleet we
are.
It would be hardly wise to have it said,
We lost two living bodies for a dead.'

CXC

And off he shook his burden, with that
word,
Fancying Medoro would do just the same;
25 But the poor boy, who better loved his
lord,
Took on his shoulders a'l the weight that came.
The other ran, as if with one accord,
30 Not guessing what had made his fellow lame.
Had he, he would have dared, not merely
one,
But heaps of deaths, rather than fled alone.

CXCI

The knights, who were determined that these two 40 Should either yield them prisoners or die, Dispersed themselves, and without more
ado
Seized every pass which they might issue by.
The chief himself rode on before, and drew 45 Nearer and nearer with a steadfast eye;
For seeing them betray such marks of fear,
'Twas plain that in those two no friends were near.

CXCII

There was an old forest there in those days,

Thick with o'ershadowing trees and underwood,

Which, like a labyrinth, ran into a maze
Of narrow paths, and made a solitude.
The fliers reckoned on its friendly ways,
For giving them close covert while pursued: —

But he that loves these chants of mine in rhyme,

May chuse to hear the rest another time. 10

CANTO XIX

I

None knows the heart in which he may confide,

As long as he sits high on Fortune's wheel;
For friends of all sorts then are by his side,
Who show him all the self-same face of 20
zeal:

But let the goddess roll him from his pride,
The flattering set are off upon their heel;
And he who loved him in his heart alone
Stands firm, and will, even when life is 25
gone.

II

If eyes could see the heart as well as face, 30
Many a great man at court would trample
others,

And many an humble one in little grace
Would change their destiny for one another's;

This would mount up into the highest
place —

That go and help the scullions and their mothers.

But turn we to Medoro, good and true, 40
Who loved his lord, whatever fate could do.

III

The unhappy youth, now in the thickest
way

Of all the wood, would fain have hidden
close;

But the dead weight that on his shoulders 50
lay

Hampers his path, whichever side he goes.
Strange to the country too, he goes astray,

And turns and tramples 'midst the brakes and boughs.

Meanwhile his friend, less burdened for the race,

5 Has got in safety to a distant place.

IV

Cloridan came to where he heard no
more

The hue and cry that sent him like a dart;
But when he turned about and missed
Medor,

He seemed to have deserted his own heart.
15 'Great God!' he cried; 'not to see this before!

How could I be so mad? How could I part
With thee, Medoro, and come driving here,
And never dream I left thee, how or where?'

V

So saying, he returns with bitter sighs
Into the tangled wood, by the same path,
And keeps it narrowly with yearning eyes,
And treads with zeal the track of his own
death.

And all the while, horses he hears, and cries,
And threatening voices that take short his
breath:

And last of all he hears, and now can see,
Medoro, pressed about with cavalry.

VI

They are a hundred, and all round him.
He,

While the chief cries to take him prisoner,
Turns like a wheel, and faces valiantly

40 All that would seize him, leaping here and
there,

Now to an elm, an oak, or other tree,
Nor ever parts he with his burden dear,
See! — he has laid it on the ground at last,

45 The better to control and keep it fast.

VII

Like as a bear, whom men in mountains start

In her old stony den, and dare, and goad, Stands o'er her children with uncertain
heart,

And roars for rage and sorrow in one mood:
Anger incites her, and her natural part,
To use her nails, and bathe her lips in
blood;
Love melts her, and for all her angry roar, Holds back her eyes to look on those she bore.

VIII

Cloridan knows not how to give his aid,
And yet he must, and die too: — that he knows:
But ere he changes from alive to dead,
He casts about to settle a few foes:
He takes an arrow, — one of his best
made, —
And works so well in secret, that it goes Into a Scotchman's head, right to the brains,
And jerks his lifeless fingers from the reins.

IX

The horsemen in confusion turn about,
To see by what strange hand their fellow
died,
When a new shaft's in middle of the rout,
And the man tumbles by his fellow's side.
He was just wondering, and calling out,
And asking questions, fuming as he cried;
The arrow comes, and dashes to his throat,
And cuts him short in middle of his note.

X

Zerbin, the leader of the troop, could hold
His rage no longer at this new surprise,
But darting on the boy, with eyes that rolled,
'You shall repent this insolence,' he cries;
Then twisting with his hand those locks of
gold,
He drags him back, to see him as he dies;
But when he sets his eyes on that sweet
face,
He could not do it, 'twas so hard a case.

XI

The youth betook him to his prayers,
and said,

'For God's sake, sir, be not so merciless
As to prevent my burying the dead:
'Tis a king's body that's in this distress:
Think not I ask from any other dread;
5 Life could give me but little happiness.
All the life now which I desire to have
Is just enough to give my lord a grave.

XII

'If you've a Theban heart, and birds of
prey
10 Must have their food before your rage can cool,
Feast them on me; only do let me lay
His limbs in earth, that has been used to rule.'
15 So spake the young Medoro, in a way
To turn a rock, it was so beautiful.
As for the prince, so deeply was he moved,
That all at once he pardoned and he loved.

XIII

A ruffian, at this juncture, of the band, 20 Little restrained by what restrained the
rest,
Thrust with his lance across the suppliant's
hand,
And pierced his delicate and faithful breast.
25 The act, — in one too under his command, —
Displeased the princely chief, and much distressed;
The more so, as the poor boy dropped his 30 head,
And fell so pale that all believed him dead.

XIV

35 Such was his grief, and such was his dis-
dain,
That crying out, 'The blood be on his
head!'
He turned in wrath, to give the thrust
again;
But the false villain, ere the words were
said,
Put spurs into his horse and fled amain,
Stooping his rascal shoulders, as he fled.
45 Cloridan, when he sees Medoro fall, Leaps from the wood, and comes defying
all;

XV

And casts away his bow, and, almost
mad,
Goes slashing round among his enemies,
Rather for death, than any hope he had
Of cutting his revenge to its fit size.
His blood soon coloured many a dripping blade,
And he perceives with pleasure that he dies;
And so, his strength being fairly at an end,
He lets himself fall down beside his friend.

XVI

The troop then followed where their chief had gone,
Pursuing his stern chase among the trees,
And leaves the two companions there
alone,
One surely dead, the other scarcely less.
Long time Medoro lay without a groan,
Losing his blood in such large quantities,
That life would surely have gone out at
last,
Had not a helping hand been coming past.

XVII

There came by chance a damsel passing
there,
Cloaked like a peasant, to eschew surprise,
But of a royal presence, and so fair,
As well behaved her keep grave maiden
eyes.
'Tis so long since I told you news of her,
Perhaps you know her not in this disguise.
This, you must know then, was Angelica,
Proud daughter of the Khan of great Cathay.

XVIII

You know the magic ring, and her distress?
Well, when she had recovered this same
ring,
It so increased her pride and haughti-
ness,
She seemed too high for any living thing.
She goes alone, desiring nothing less Than a companion, even though a king:

She even scorns to recollect the flame
Of one Orlando, or his very name.

XIX

But, above all, she hates to recollect
That she had taken to Rinaldo so;
She thinks it the last want of self-respect,
Pure degradation, to have looked so low.
'Such arrogance,' said Cupid, 'must be checked.'
The little God betook him with his bow,
To where Medoro lay, and, standing by,
Held the shaft ready with a lurking eye,

XX

Now when the princess saw the youth
all pale,
And found him grieving with his bitter
wound,
Not for what one so young might well bewail,
But that his king should not be laid in
ground,
She felt a something, strange and gentle,
steal
Into her heart by some new way it found,
Which touched its hardness, and turned
all to grace;
And more so, when he told her all his case.

XXI

And calling to her mind the little arts
Of healing, which she learnt in India
(For 'twas a study valued in those parts,
Even for those who were in sovereign
sway,
And yet so easy, too, that like the heart's,
'Twas more inherited than learnt, they
say),
She cast about, with herbs and balmy juices,
To save so fair a life for all its uses.

XXII

And thinking of an herb that caught her eye
As she was coming, in a pleasant plain (Whether 'twas panacea, dittany,
Or some such herb accounted sovereign

For staunching blood quickly and tenderly,
And winning out all spasm and bad pain),
She found it not far off, and, gathering
some,
Returned with it to save Medoro's bloom.

XXIII

In coming back she met upon the way
A shepherd, who was riding through the wood
To find a heifer that had gone astray,
And been two days about the solitude.
She took him with her where Medoro
lay,
Now feebler than he was, with loss of
blood:
So much he lost, and drew so hard a
breath,
That he was now fast fading to his death.

XXIV

Angelica got off her horse in haste,
And made the shepherd get as fast from his;
She ground the herbs with stones, and then expressed
With her white hands the balmy milki-
ness,
Then dropped it in the wound, and bathed
his breast,
His sides, and spine, and all that was amiss:
And of such virtue was it, that at length
The blood was stopped and he looked round with strength.

XXV

At last he got upon the shepherd's
horse,
But would not quit the place till he had seen
Laid in the ground his lord and master's corse;
And Cloridan lay with it, who had been Smitten so fatally with sweet remorse.
He then obeys the will of the fair queen;
And she, for very pity of his lot,
Goes and stays with him at the shepherd's cot.

XXVI

Nor would she leave him, she esteemed him so,
5 Till she had seen him well with her own
eye;
So full of pity did her bosom grow,
Since first she saw him faint and like to die.
Seeing his manners now, and beauty too,
10 She felt her heart yearn somehow inwardly;
She felt her heart yearn somehow, till at
last
'Twas all on fire, and burning warm and fast.

XXVII

The shepherd's house was good enough,
and neat,
20 A little shady cottage in a dell:
The man had just rebuilt it all complete,
With room to spare, in case more births
befel.
There with such knowledge did the lady treat
25 Her handsome patient, that he soon grew
well;
But not before she felt, on her own part,
A secret wound much greater in her heart.

XXVIII

Much greater was the wound, and deeper far, 35 The invisible arrow made in her heartstrings;
'Twas from Medoro's lovely eyes and hair;
'Twas from the naked archer with the wings.
40 She feels it now; she feels, and yet can
bear

Another's less than her own sufferings.
She thinks not of herself: she thinks alone
How to cure him, by whom she is undone.

XXIX

The more his wound recovers and gets
ease,
50 Her own grows worse, and widens day by
day.
The youth gets well; the lady languishes,
Now warm, now cold, as fitful fevers play.

His beauty heightens like the flowering
trees;

She, miserable creature, melts away
Like the weak snow, which some warm sun has found
Fall'n, out of season, on a rising ground.

XXX

And must she speak at last, rather than 10
die?

And must she plead without another's aid?
She must, she must; the vital moments
fly —

She lives — she dies, a passion-wasted 15
maid.

At length she burst all ties of modesty;
Her tongue explains her eyes; the words are said;

And she asks pity underneath that blow, 20
Which he perhaps that gave it did not know.

XXXI

O Count Orlando! O King Sacripant!¹
That fame of yours, say, what avails it ye?
That lofty honour, those great deeds ye vaunt,

Say, what's their value with the lovely she? 30
Show me — recall to memory (for I can't),
Show me, I beg, one single courtesy
That ever she vouchsafed ye, far or near,
For all ye've done and have endured for her.

XXXII

And you, if you could come to life again,
O Agrican,² how hard 'twould seem to you, 40
Whose love was met by nothing but dis-
dain,

And vile repulses, shocking to go through!
O Ferragus! O thousands, who in vain
Did all that loving and great hearts could 45
do,

How would ye feel to see, with all her charms,

This thankless creature in a stripling's arms!

XXXIII

The young Medoro had the gathering
Of the first kiss on lips untouched before, 5 For never, since her beauty blushed with
spring,

Had passion's self dared aught except
adore.

To render the fond step an honest thing,
The priest was called to read the service o'er

(For without marriage what can come but strife?),

And the bride-mother was the shepherd's wife.

XXXIV

All was performed, in short, that could be so

In such a place, to make the nuptials good;
Nor did the happy pair think fit to go,
But spent the month and more within the wood.

25 The lady to the stripling seemed to grow;
His step her step, his eyes her eyes pursued;
Nor did her love lose any of its zest,
Though she was always hanging on his breast.

XXXV

In doors, and out of doors, by night, by
day,

She had the charmer by her side for ever:
Morning and evening they would stroll
away,

Now by some field, or little tufted river;
They chose a cave in middle of the day,
Perhaps not less agreeable or clever
Than Dido and Æneas found to screen
them,

When storm and tempest would have rushed between them.

XXXVI

And all this while there was not a smooth tree,

² A fabulous king of Tartary, in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, who besieges Angelica in the castle of Albracca and is killed by Orlando.

That drew from stream or fount its gentle pith,

Nor stone less hard than stones are apt to
be,

But they would find a knife to carve it with. 5
And in a thousand places you might see,
And on the walls about you and beneath,
ANGELICA AND MEDORO, tied in one,
As many ways as lover's knots could run.

XXXVII

And when they thought they had outspent their time,
Angelica the royal took her way,
She and Medoro, to the Indian clime,
To crown him king of her fair realm,
Cathay.

PHILOSOPHY AND CRITICISM

DUTCH

ERASMUS

(1467-1536)

It would be hard to name a person to whom the Renaissance and the growth of Humanism owes a greater debt than to Erasmus. His birthplace, Rotterdam, was one of the important cultural centers of Holland. From his father, who was a highly trained student of Latin and Greek, the young Erasmus inherited a profound love of learning, as well as his name, Gerard, which, in a fashion characteristic of his age, he changed to Erasmus, the Greek equivalent, meaning amiable. Erasmus was first educated in the cathedral school of Utrecht, and was later instructed by the famous teacher Alexander Hegius. He was so proficient in Latin that, when still a child, he could recite all of Horace and Terence by heart. When he was about thirteen his parents died of the plague, and his subsequent education was entirely in the hands of guardians. At their suggestion, Erasmus entered a monastery, persuaded by the opportunities for study and learned conversation. Later he was taken into the family of the bishop of Cambrai. He left the bishop's household to study in the University of Paris, but an illness forced him to return. After his recovery he returned to the University, but was seriously hampered by poverty. His next venture was his famous visit to England, where he was received with great honor and became acquainted with the English humanists, Sir Thomas More, John Colet, Grocyn, Linacer, and Latimer. Because of this sojourn Erasmus is more important in the written social and literary history of England than many of his English-born contemporaries. Returning to France, he found circumstances still unfavorable to a substantial career, and went on to Italy. He took the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Turin, and, after visiting Bologna and Padua, finally arrived in Rome, where he was welcomed with great enthusiasm. He left almost immediately for England, however, for he had been offered a comfortable position in the church. He seemed to be launched upon a quiet and profitable scholarly life, when he became involved in the political rivalry between Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, and Cardinal Wolsey. Finding it best to give up his position, Erasmus left the country and returned to the continent, where he became counsellor to Charles of Austria, and established himself in Basel. Here he remained, except for a seven-year interval, until his death.

Erasmus carried on a reformation not only in learning but also in the church. He was the keenest critic of society of his times, and utterly unsparing in his condemnation of things that he deemed wrong; yet he had many friends, and his writings were widely read and admired. The Praise of Folly, written in 1508, received in the English translation the following subheading: "An oration, of feigned matter, spoken by Folly in her own person." The discourse is written in a light satirical vein which enables the author so "to treat of trifles, as to make them seem nothing less than what their name imports." The part here printed is directed against the pedantic tendency among grammarians. We must remember that Erasmus was a profound student of Latin and Greek, as was Sir Thomas More, to whom the book is dedicated.

THE PRAISE OF FOLLY

But hold; I should but expose myself too far, and incur the guilt of being roundly laughed at, if I proceed to enumerate the several kinds of the folly of the vulgar. I shall confine therefore my following discourse only to such as challenge the repute of wisdom, and seemingly pass for men of the soundest intellectuals. Among whom the Grammarians present themselves in the front, a sort of men who would be the most miserable, the most slavish, and the most hateful of all persons,

if I did not some way alleviate the pressures and miseries of their professions by blessing them with a bewitching sort of madness: for they are not only liable to those five curses, which they so oft recite from the first five verses of Homer, but to five hundred more of a worse nature; as always damned to thirst and hunger, to be choked with dust in their unswept schools (schools shall I term them, or rather 10 laboratories, nay, bridewells, and houses of correction?) to wear out themselves in fret and drudgery; to be deafened with the noise of gaping boys; and, in short, to be stifled with heat and stench; and yet they 15 cheerfully dispense with all these inconveniences, and, by the help of a fond conceit, think themselves as happy as any then living: taking a great pride and delight in frowning and looking big upon the trembling urchins, in boxing, slashing, striking with the ferula, and in the exercise of all their other methods of tyranny; while thus lording it over a parcel of young, weak chits, they imitate the Cuman ass,¹ 25 and think themselves as stately as a lion, that domineers over all the inferior herd. Elevated with this conceit, they can hold filth and nastiness to be an ornament; can reconcile their nose to the most intolerable smells; and, finally, think their wretched slavery the most arbitrary kingdom, which they would not exchange for the jurisdiction of the most sovereign potentate: and they are yet more happy 35 by a strong persuasion of their own parts and abilities; for thus when their employment is only to rehearse silly stories, and poetical fictions, they will yet think themselves wiser than the best experienced 40 philosopher; nay, they have an art of making ordinary people, such as their school boys' fond parents, to think them as considerable as their own pride has made them. Add hereunto this other sort of ravishing pleasure: when any of them 45 has found out who was the mother of Anchises, or has lighted upon some old unusual word, such as bubsequa, bovinator, manticulator, or other like obsolete cramp terms; or can, after a great deal of poring, spell out the inscription of some battered monument, Lord! what joy, what triumph, what congratulating their success, as if they had conquered Africa, or taken Babylon the Great! When they recite some of their frothy, bombast verses, if any happen to admire them, they are presently flushed with the least hint of commendation, and devoutly thank Pythagoras for his grateful hypothesis,² whereby they are now become actuated with a descent of Vergil's poetic soul. Nor 5 is any divertisement more pleasant, than when they meet to flatter and curry one another; yet they are so critical, that if any one hap to be guilty of the least slip, or seeming blunder, another shall presently correct him for it, and then to it they go in a tongue-combat, with all the fervour, spleen, and eagerness imaginable. May Priscian³ himself be my enemy if what I am now going to say be not exactly true. I knew an old Sophister, that was a Grecian, a Latinist, a mathematician, a philosopher, a musician, and all to the utmost perfection, who, after threescore years' experience in the world, had spent the last twenty of them only in drudging to conquer the criticisms of grammar, and made it the chief part of his prayers, that his life might be so long spared till he had learned how rightly to distinguish betwixt the eight parts of speech, which no grammarian, whether Greek or Latin, had yet accurately done. If any chance to have placed that as a conjunction which ought to have been used as an adverb, it is a sufficient alarm to raise a war for the doing justice to the injured word. And since there have been as many several grammars as particular grammarians (nay, more, for Aldus⁴ alone wrote five distinct grammars for his own share), the school-master must be obliged to consult them all, sparing for no time nor trouble, though never so great, lest he should be otherwise posed in any unobserved criticism, and so by an irreparable disgrace lose the reward of all his toil. It is indifferent to me whether you call this folly or madness, since you must needs confess that it is by my influence these school-tyrants, though in never so despicable a condition, are so happy in their own thoughts, that they would not change fortunes with the most illustrious Sophi¹ of Persia.

The Poets, however, somewhat less beholden to me,² own a professed dependance on me, being a sort of lawless blades, that by prescription claim a license to a proverb, while the whole intent of their profession is only to smooth up and tickle the ears of fools, that by mere toys and fabulous shams, with which (however ridiculous) they are so bolstered up in an airy imagination, as to promise themselves an everlasting name, and promise, by their balderdash, at the same time to celebrate the never-dying memory of others. To these rapturous wits self-love and flattery are never-failing attendants; nor do any prove more zealous or constant devotees to folly.

The Rhetoricians likewise, though they are ambitious of being ranked among the Philosophers, yet are apparently of my faction, as appears among other arguments, by this more especially; in that among their several topics, of completing the art of oratory, they all particularly insist upon the knack of jesting, which is one species of folly; as is evident from the books of oratory wrote to Herennius,³ put among Cicero's works, but done by some other unknown author; and in Quintillian,⁴ that great master of eloquence, there is one large chapter spent in prescribing the methods of raising laughter: in short, they may well attribute a great efficacy to folly, since on any argument they can many times by a slight laugh overcome what they could never seriously confute.

Of the same gang are those scribbling

fops, who think to eternize their memory by setting up for authors: among which, though they are all some way indebted to me, yet are those more especially so, who spoil paper in blotting it with mere trifles and impertinences. For as to those graver drudgers to the press, that write learnedly, beyond the reach of an ordinary reader, who durst submit their labours to the review of the most severe critic, these are not so liable to be envied for their honour, as to be pitied for their sweat and slavery. They make additions, alterations, blot out, write anew, amend, interline, turn it upside down, and yet can never please their fickle judgment, but that they shall dislike the next hour what they penn'd the former; and all this to purchase the airy commendations of a few understanding readers, which at most is but a poor reward for all their fastings, watchings, confinements, and brain-breaking tortures of invention. Add to this the impairing of their health, the weakening of their constitution, their contracting sore eyes, or perhaps turning stark blind; their poverty, their envy, their debarment from all pleasures, their hastening on old age, their untimely death, and what other inconveniences of a like or worse nature can be thought upon: and yet the recompence for all this severe penance is at best no more than a mouthful or two of frothy praise. These, as they are more laborious, so are they less happy than those other hackney scribblers which I first mentioned, who never stand much to consider, but write what comes next at a venture, knowing that the more silly their composures are, the more they will be bought up by the greater number of readers, who are fools and blockheads: and, if they hap to be condemned by some few judicious persons, it is an easy matter by clamour to drown their censure, and to silence them by urging the more numerous commendations of others. They are yet the wisest who transcribe whole discourses from others, and then reprint them as their own. By doing so they make a cheap and easy seizure to themselves of that reputation, which cost the first author so much time and trouble to procure. If they are at any time pricked a little in conscience for fear of discovery, they feed themselves however with this hope, that if they be at last found 10 plagiaries, yet at least for some time they shall have the credit of passing for the genuine authors. It is pleasant to see how all these several writers are puffed up with the least blast of applause, especially if 15 they come to the honour of being pointed at as they walk along the streets, when their several pieces are laid open upon every bookseller's stall, when their names are embossed in a different character upon 20 the title-page, sometime only with the two first letters, and sometime with fictitious cramp terms, which few shall understand the meaning of; and of those that do, all shall not agree in their verdict of the per- 25 formance; some censuring, others approving it, men's judgments being as different as their palates; that being toothsome to one which is unsavoury and nauseous to another: though it is a sneaking 30 piece of cowardice for authors to put feigned names to their works, as if, like bastards of their brain, they were afraid to own them. Thus one styles himself Telemachus, another Stelenus, a third 35 Polycrates, another Thrasy-machus, and so on. By the same liberty we may ransack the whole alphabet, and jumble together any letters that come next to hand. It is farther very pleasant when these coxcombs employ their pens in writing congratulatory epistles, poems, and panegyrics, upon each other, wherein one shall be complimented with the title of Alcæus,¹ another shall be charactered for the incomparable Callimachus¹; this shall be commended for a completer orator than Tully² himself; a fourth shall be told by his fellow-fool that the divine Plato comes short of him for a philosophic soul. Sometime again they take up the cudgels, and challenge out an antagonist, and so get a name by a combat at dispute and controversy, while the unwary readers draw sides according to their different judgments: the longer the quarrel holds the more irreconcilable it grows; and, when both parties are weary, they each pretend themselves the conquerors, and both lay claim to the credit of coming off with victory. These fooleries make sport for wise men, as being highly absurd, ridiculous and extravagant. True, but yet these paper-combatants, by my assistance, are so flushed with a conceit of their own greatness, that they prefer the solving of a syllogism before the sacking of Carthage; and upon the defeat of a poor objection carry themselves more triumphant than the most victorious Scipio.

ITALIAN MACHIAVELLI

(1469-1527)

Niccolo Machiavelli was born in Florence of a good family, and lost his father while he was still a boy. His public career began in 1494, with a post as secretary to Marcello Virgilio. In 1500 he was sent on a diplomatic mission to France, and the next year he began his two-year sojourn at the court of the notorious Cæsar Borgia. He was employed in various missions until 1512, when, with the fall of the republic and the restoration of the Medicis, he was deprived of his position and thrown into prison. He was released by Pope Leo X, however, in 1513. The next six years he spent in retirement, studying and composing his famous tract The Prince. In 1519 he was asked to prepare a memoir setting forth the best method of governing Florence.

² Cicero, his full name being Marcus Tullius Cicero.

He prepared the memoir, but it was ignored. He also wrote at this time his famous History of Florence. In spite of his secret sympathy with the republic, the fall of the Medicis brought him no benefits; for the republicans had been suspicious of his apparent acquiescence in the rule of the Medicis. He died in 1527 while occupied with the fortification of Rome under the direction of the Pope.

Many views have been expressed regarding the purpose and effect of The Prince. It is a tract written by a clear-headed and widely-read political historian explaining how a prince gets and keeps his power. Coming as it did after a long succession of books aimed at the moral instruction of princes, this tract gives a curiously non-moral effect. The fact is, however, that Machiavelli merely described, without exclamations either of admiration or horror, the methods used by princes at various periods of the world's history to get and hold their power. If most actions of princes in the book seem to be lacking in those finer altruistic qualities recommended by Xenophon and Cicero, one can but reflect that they are pretty fairly representative of actual practice. The book is a thorough condemnation of absolute government, and was written by a man who was first and foremost an historian — and a good one. But because of the nature of his disclosures the name of Machiavelli, almost from the first generation after his death, became synonymous with all that is diabolical in statecraft.

The present selection is translated by W. K. Marriott in The Prince, E. P. Dutton, London.

THE PRINCE

CONCERNING THOSE WHO HAVE OBTAINED A PRINCIPALITY BY WICKEDNESS

Although a prince may rise from a private station in two ways, neither of which can be entirely attributed to fortune or genius, yet it is manifest to me that I must not be silent on them — although one could be more copiously treated when I discuss republics.

These methods are when, either by some wicked or nefarious ways, one ascends to the principality, or when by the favor of his fellow citizens a private person becomes the prince of his country.

And, speaking of the first method, it will be illustrated by two examples — one ancient, the other modern — and, without entering further into the subject, I consider these two examples will suffice those who may be compelled to follow them.

Agathocles, the Sicilian, became King of Syracuse not only from a private but from a low and abject position. This man, the son of a potter, through all the changes in his fortunes always led an infamous life. Nevertheless, he accompanied his infamies with so much ability of mind and body that, having devoted himself to the military profession, he rose through the ranks to be Prætor of Syracuse. Being established in that position, and having deliberately resolved to make himself prince and to seize by violence, without obligation to others, that which had been conceded to him by assent, he came to an understanding for this purpose with Amilcar, the Carthaginian, who, with his army, was fighting in Sicily.

One morning he assembled the people and Senate of Syracuse, as if he had to discuss with them things relating to the Republic, and at a given signal the soldiers killed all the senators and the richest of the people; these dead, he seized and held the principedom of that city without any civil commotion. And although he was twice routed by the Carthaginians, and ultimately besieged, yet not only was he able to defend his city, but, leaving part of his men for its defense, with the others he attacked Africa, and in a short time raised the siege of Syracuse. The Carthaginians, reduced to extreme necessity, were compelled to come to terms with Agathocles, and, leaving Sicily to him, had to be content with the possessions of Africa.

Therefore, he who considers the actions and the genius of this man will see nothing, or little, which can be attributed to fortune, inasmuch as he attained pre-eminence, not by the favor of any one, but step by step in the military profession, which steps were gained with a thousand troubles and perils, and were afterwards boldly held by him with many hazards and dangers.

Yet it cannot be called talent to slay fellow citizens, to deceive friends, to be without faith, without mercy, without religion; such methods may gain empires, but not glory. Still, if the courage of Agathocles in entering into and extricating himself from dangers be considered, together with his greatness of mind in enduring and overcoming hardships, it cannot be seen why he should be esteemed less than the most notable captain.

Nevertheless, his barbarous cruelty and inhumanity with infinite wickednesses do not permit him to be celebrated among the most excellent men. What he achieved cannot be attributed either to fortune or to genius.

In our times, during the rule of Pope Alexander VI, Oliverotto da Fermo, having been left an orphan many years before, was brought up by his maternal uncle, Giovanni Fogliani; and in the early days of his youth was sent to fight under Pagolo Vitelli, that, being trained under his discipline, he might attain some high position in the military profession. After Pagolo died, he fought under his brother Vitellozzo; and, in a very short time, being endowed with wit and a vigorous body and mind, he became the first man in his profession.

But, it appearing to him a paltry thing to serve under others, he resolved, with the aid of some citizens of Fermo, to whom the slavery of their country was dearer than its liberty, and with the help of the Vitelleschi, to seize Fermo. So he wrote to Giovanni Fogliani that, having been away from home for many years, he wished to visit him and his city, and in some measure to look into his patrimony; and although he had not labored to acquire anything except honor, yet, in order that the citizens should see he had not spent his time in vain, he desired to come honorably, so would be accompanied by one hundred horsemen, his friends and retainers; and he entreated Giovanni to arrange that he should be received honorably by the Fermanese, all of which would be not only to his honor, but also to that of Giovanni himself, who had brought him up.

Giovanni, therefore, did not fail in any attention due to his nephew, and he caused him to be honorably received by the Fermanese, and he lodged him in his own house, where, having passed some days, and having arranged what was necessary for his wicked designs, Oliverotto gave a solemn banquet to which he invited Giovanni Fogliani and the chiefs of Fermo.

When the viands and all the other entertainments that are usual in such banquets were finished, Oliverotto artfully began certain grave discourses, speaking of the greatness of Pope Alexander and his son Cæsare, and of their enterprises, to which discourse Giovanni and others answered; but he rose at once, saying that such matters ought to be discussed in a more private place, and he betook himself to a chamber, whither Giovanni and the rest of the citizens followed.

No sooner were they seated than soldiers issued from secret places and slaughtered Giovanni and the rest.

After these murders Oliverotto, mounted on horseback, rode up and down the town, and besieged the chief magistrate in the palace, so that in fear the people were forced to obey him, and to form a government of which he made himself the prince. He killed all the malcontents who were able to injure him, and strengthened himself with new civil and military ordinances in such a way that, in the year during which he held the principality, not only was he secure in the city of Fermo, but he had become formidable to all his neighbors. And his destruction would have been as difficult as that of Agathocles if he had not allowed himself to be overreached by Cæsare Borgia, who took him with the Orsini and Vitelli at Sinigalia. Thus one year after he had committed this parricide he was strangled, together with Vitellozzo, whom he had made his leader in valor and wickedness.

Some may wonder how it can happen that Agathocles, and his like, after infinite treacheries and cruelties, should live so long secure in his country, and defend himself from external enemies, and never be conspired against by his own citizens; seeing that many others, by means of cruelty, have never been able even in peaceful times to hold the state, still less in the doubtful times of war. I believe that this follows from severities being badly or properly used. Those may be called properly used, if of evil it is lawful to speak well, that are applied at one blow and are necessary to one's security, and that are not persisted in afterwards unless they can be turned to the advantage of the subjects. The badly employed are those which, notwithstanding they may be few in the commencement, multiply with time rather than decrease. Those who practise the first system are able, by aid of God or man, to mitigate in some degree their rule, as Agathocles did. It is impossible for those who follow the other to maintain themselves.

Hence it is to be remarked that, in seizing a state, the usurper ought to examine closely into all those injuries which it is necessary for him to inflict, and to do them all at one stroke so as not to have to repeat them daily; and thus by not unsettling men he will be able to reassure them, and win them to himself by benefits. He who does otherwise, either from timidity or evil advice, is always compelled to keep the knife in his hand; neither can he rely on his subjects, nor can they attach themselves to him, owing to their continued and repeated wrongs. For injuries ought to be done all at one time, so that, being tasted less, they offend less; benefits ought to be given little by little, so that the flavor of them may last longer.

And above all things, a prince ought to live amongst his people in such a way that no unexpected circumstances, whether of good or evil, shall make him change; because, if the necessity of this comes in troubled times, you are too late for harsh measures; and mild ones will not help you, for they will be considered as forced from you, and no one will be under any obligation to you for them.

CONCERNING THINGS FOR WHICH MEN, AND ESPECIALLY PRINCES, ARE PRAISED OR BLAMED

It remains now to see what ought to be the rules of conduct for a prince towards subject and friends. And, as I know that many have written on this point, I expect I shall be considered presumptuous in mentioning it again, especially as in discussing it I shall depart from the methods of other people. But, it being my intention to write a thing which shall be useful to him who apprehends it, it appears to me more appropriate to follow up the real truth of a matter than the imagination of it; for many have pictured republics and principalities which in fact have never been known or seen, because the manner in which one lives is so far distant from the manner in which one ought to live, that he who neglects what is done for what ought to be done sooner effects his ruin than his preservation; for a man who wishes to act entirely up to his professions of virtue soon meets with what destroys him among so much that is evil.

Hence it is necessary for a prince wishing to hold his own to know how to do wrong, and to make use of it or not according to necessity. Therefore, putting on one side imaginary things concerning a prince, and discussing those which are real, I say that all men when they are spoken of, and chiefly princes for being more highly placed, are remarkable for some of those qualities which bring them either blame or praise; and thus it is that one is reputed liberal, another miserly, using a Tuscan term (because an avaricious person in our language is still he who desires to possess by robbery, whilst we call one miserly who deprives himself too much of the use of his own); one is reputed generous, one rapacious; one cruel, one compassionate; one faithless, another faithful; one effeminate and cowardly, another bold and brave; one affable, another haughty; one lascivious, another chaste; one sincere, another cunning; one hard, another easy; one grave, another frivolous; one religious, another unbelieving, and the like.

And I know that every one will confess that it would be most praiseworthy in a prince to exhibit all the above qualities that are considered good; but because they can neither be entirely possessed nor observed, for human conditions do not permit it, it is necessary for him to be sufficiently prudent that he may know how to avoid the reproach of those vices which would lose him his state; and also to keep himself, if it be possible, from those which would not lose him it; but, this not being possible, he may with less hesitation abandon himself to them.

And again, he need not make himself uneasy at incurring a reproach for those vices without which the state can only be saved with difficulty, for, if everything is considered carefully, it will be found that something which looks like virtue, if followed, would be his ruin; whilst something else, which looks like vice, yet followed brings him security and prosperity.

CONCERNING LIBERALITY AND MEANNESS

Commencing then with the first of the above-named characteristics, I say that it would be well to be reputed liberal. Nevertheless, liberality, exercised in a way that does not bring you the reputation for it, injures you; for, if one exercises it honestly and as it should be exercised, it may not become known, and you will not avoid the reproach of its opposite. Therefore, any one wishing to maintain among men the name of liberal is obliged to avoid no attribute of magnificence; so that a prince thus inclined will consume in such acts all his property, and will be compelled in the end, if he wish to maintain the name of liberal, to unduly weigh down his people, and tax them, and do everything he can to get money. This will soon make him odious to his subjects, and becoming poor he will be little valued by any one; thus, with his liberality, having offended many and rewarded few, he is affected by the very first trouble and imperiled by whatever may be the first danger; recognizing this himself, and wishing to draw back from it, he runs at once into the reproach of being miserly.

Therefore a prince, not being able to exercise this virtue of liberty in such a way that it is recognized, except to his cost, if he is wise he ought not to fear the reputation of being mean, for in time he will come to be more considered than if liberal, seeing that with his economy his revenues are enough that he can defend himself against all attacks, and is able to engage in enterprises without burdening his people; thus it comes to pass that he exercises liberality towards all from whom he does not take, who are numberless, and meanness towards those to whom he does not give, who are few.

We have not seen great things done in our time except by those who have been considered mean; the rest have failed. Pope Julius the Second was assisted in reaching the papacy by a reputation for liberality, yet he did not strive afterward to keep it up, when he made war on the King of France; and he made many wars without imposing any extraordinary tax on his subjects, for he supplied his additional expenses out of his thriftiness. The present King of Spain would not have undertaken or conquered in so many enterprises if he had been reputed liberal. A prince, therefore, provided that he has not to rob his subjects, that he can defend himself, that he does not become poor and abject, that he is not forced to become rapacious, ought to hold of little account a reputation for being mean, for it is one of those vices which will enable him to govern.

And if any one should say: Cæsar obtained empire by liberality, and many others have reached the highest positions by having been liberal, and by being considered so, I answer: Either you are a prince in fact, or in a way to become one. In the first case this liberality is dangerous, in the second it is very necessary to be considered liberal; and Cæsar was one of those who wished to become pre-eminent in Rome; but if he had survived after becoming so, and had not moderated his expenses, he would have destroyed his government. And if any one should reply: Many have been princes, and have done great things with armies, who have been considered very liberal, I reply: Either a prince spends that which is his own or his subjects' or else that of others. In the first case he ought to be sparing, in the second he ought not to neglect any opportunity for liberality. And to the prince who goes forth with his army, supporting it by pillage, sack, and extortion, handling that which belongs to others, liberality is necessary, otherwise he would not be followed by his soldiers. And of that which is neither yours nor your subjects' you can be a ready giver, as were Cyrus, Cæsar, and Alexander; because it does not take away your reputation if you squander that of others, but adds to it; it is only squandering your own that injures you.

There is nothing wasted so rapidly as liberality, for even whilst you exercise it you lose the power to do so, and so become either poor or despised, or else, in avoiding poverty, rapacious and hated. And a prince should guard himself, above all things, against being despised and hated; and liberality leads you to both.

Therefore it is better to have a reputation for meanness which brings reproach without hatred, than to be compelled through seeking a reputation for liberality to incur a name for rapacity which begets reproach with hatred.

CONCERNING THE SECRETARIES OF PRINCES

The choice of servants is of no little importance and consideration to a prince, and they are good or not according to the discrimination of the prince. And the first opinion which one forms of a prince, and of his understanding, is by observing the men he has around him; and when they are capable and faithful he may always be considered wise, because he has known how to recognize the capable and to keep them faithful. But when they are otherwise one cannot form a good opinion of him, for the prime error which he has made was in choosing them.

There was none who knew Messer Antonio de Venafo as the servant of Pandolfo Petrucci, Prince of Siena, who would not consider Pandolfo to be a very clever man in having Venafo for his servant. Because there are three classes of intellects: One which comprehends itself, another which appreciates what others comprehend, and a third which comprehends neither by itself nor by the showing of others; the first is the most excellent, the second is good, the third is useless. Therefore, it follows necessarily that, if Pandolfo was not in the first rank, he was in the second, for whenever one has judgment to know good or bad when it is said and done, although he himself may not have the initiative, yet he can recognize the good and the bad in his servant, and the one he can praise and the other correct; thus the servant cannot hope to deceive him, and is kept honest.

But to enable a prince to form an opinion of his servant there is one test which never fails; when you see the servant thinking more of his own interests than of yours, and seeking inwardly his own profit in everything, such a man will never make a good servant, nor will you ever be able to trust him; because he who has the state of another in his hands ought never to think of himself, but always of his prince, and never pay any attention to matters in which the prince is not concerned.

On the other hand, to keep his servant honest the prince ought to study him, honoring him, enriching him, doing him kindnesses, sharing with him the honors and cares; and at the same time let him see that he cannot stand alone, so that many honors may not make him desire more, many riches make him wish for more, and that many cares may make him dread changes. When, therefore, servants, and princes towards servants, are thus disposed, they can trust each other, but, when it is otherwise, the end will always be disastrous for either one or the other.

SATIRE

FRENCH

(1495-1553)

François Rabelais, one of the most vigorous and striking figures of the French Renaissance, was a physician and a churchman. He was one of the outstanding men of learning of his time, a leader in the medical profession (he is credited with being the first in France to make a dissection), a remarkable master of language, and a political and social satirist. He received his early training from the Franciscans and the Benedictines; but he never learned to reconcile himself to the restrictions of monastic life. In fact, he shows throughout his writings a strong anti-clerical bias.

His main work consists of two books, now usually thought of as one, Pantagruel and Gargantua. These were translated into English by Sir Thomas Urquhart (1611-1660) and Peter Anthony Motteux (1660-1718). The complete work consists of the education and adventures of Gargantua the father (one book) and the adventures of Pantagruel the son (four books). The literary form is unlike any other in the whole history of literature and defies classification. Starting with a background of popular tales, Rabelais builds up a grotesque satire of gigantic proportions, which reflects, as in a concave mirror, the follies of the world. A gross materialism of expression cloaks an essentially intellectual purpose; and the whole is a fantastic combination of satire, dialectic, and reflection.

Rabelais's style is breath-taking. An inexhaustible supply of epithets, an abundance of quotations from the most austere masters of antiquity and a knowledge of minute anatomical detail combine with telling humorous effect, as, half-seriously and half-jestingly, he administers resounding blows to the manners and ideas of the Middle Ages and describes with apparent gusto the new humanistic trends in education and government.

Although Rabelais occupies a unique position in the literary world, he is not without literary kindred. Something of a similar vein is to be found in Cervantes's Don Quixote; the description of the country of the Thelemites has in it something of the spirit which animated Sir Thomas More's Utopia; and it is thought that Swift, in his Gulliver's Travels, owes to Rabelais a direct debt.

The passages here printed are selected from the Gargantua, which Rabelais completed in 1534. The first selection is especially interesting as an exaggerated but basically true account of the ideal humanistic education. The translation is that of Urquhart and Motteux, London, Lawrence and Bullen, 1892.

GARGANTUA

HOW GARGANTUA WAS INSTRUCTED BY PONOCRATES, AND IN SUCH SORT DISCIPLINATED, THAT HE LOST
NOT ONE HOUR OF THE DAY

When Ponocrates knew Gargantua's vicious manner of living, he resolved to bring him up in another kind; but for a 10 bore,¹ by which medicine he cleansed all while he bore with him, considering that nature cannot endure a sudden change, without great violence. Therefore, to begin his work the better, he requested a learned physician of that time, called Master Theodorus, seriously to perpend, if it were possible, how to bring Gargantua into a better course. The said physician purged him canonically with Anticyrian helle-

the alteration and perverse habitude of his brain. By this means also Ponocrates made him forget all that he had learned under his ancient perceptors, as Timotheus¹ did to his disciples, who had been instructed under other musicians. To do this the better, they brought him into the company of learned men, which were there, in whose imitation he had a great desire and affectation to study otherwise, and to improve his parts. Afterwards he put himself into such a road and way of studying that he lost not any one hour of the day, but employed all his time in learning and honest knowledge. Gargantua awakened, then, about four o'clock in the morning. Whilst they were in rubbing of him, there was read unto him some chapter of the Holy Scripture aloud and clearly, with a pronunciation fit for the matter, and hereunto was appointed a young page born in Basché, named Anagnostes. According to the purpose and argument of that lesson, he oftentimes gave himself to worship, adore, pray, and send up his supplication to that good God, whose word did show his majesty and marvelous judgment. Then went he into the secret places. . . . There his master repeated what had been read, expounding unto him the most obscure and difficult points. In returning, they considered the face of the sky, if it was such as they had observed it the night before, and into what signs the sun was entering, as also the moon for that day. This done, he was appareled, combed, curled, trimmed, and perfumed, during which time they repeated to him the lessons of the day before. He himself said them by heart, and upon them would ground some practical cases concerning the estate of man, which he would prosecute sometimes two or three hours, but ordinarily they ceased as soon as he was fully clothed. Then for three good hours he had a lecture read unto him. This done, they went forth, still conferring of the substance of the lecture, either unto a field near the university called the Brack, or unto the meadows where they played at the ball, the long-tennis, and at the piletrigone, . . .

most gallantly exercising their bodies, as formerly they had done their minds. All their play was but in liberty, for they left off when they pleased, and that was commonly when they did sweat over all their body, or were otherwise weary. Then were they very well wiped and rubbed, shifted their shirts, and, walking soberly, went to see if dinner was ready. Whilst they stayed for that, they did clearly and eloquently pronounce some sentences that they had retained of the lecture. In the meantime Master Appetite came, and then very orderly sat they down at table. At the beginning of the meal, there was read some pleasant history of the warlike actions of former times, until he had taken a glass of wine. Then, if they thought good, they continued reading, or began to discourse merrily together; speaking first of the virtue, propriety, efficacy and nature of all that was served in at the table; of bread, of wine, of salt, of fleshs, fishes, fruits, herbs, roots, and of their dressing. By means whereof he learned in a little time all the passages competent for this that were to be found in Pliny, Athanasius, Dioscorides, Julius Pollux, Galen, Porphyry, Oppian, Polybius, Heliodore, Aristotle, Ælian, and others. Whilst they talked of these things, many times, to be the more certain, they caused the very books to be brought to the table, and so well and perfectly did he in his memory retain the things above said, that in that time there was not a physician that knew half so much as he did. Afterwards they conferred of the lessons read in the morning, and, ending their repast with some conserve or marmalade of quinces, he picked his teeth with mastic toothpickers, washed his hands and eyes with fair fresh water, and gave thanks unto God in some fine cantiques, made in praise of the divine bounty and munificence. This done, they brought in cards, not to play, but to learn a thousand pretty tricks and new inventions, which were all grounded upon arithmetic. By this means he fell in love with that numerical science, and every day after dinner and supper he passed his time in it as pleasantly as he was wont to do at cards and dice; so that at last he understood so well both the theory and practical part thereof, that Tunstall¹ the Englishman, who had written very largely of that purpose, confessed that verily in comparison with him he had no skill at all. And not only in that, but in the other mathematic sciences, as geometry, astronomy, music, &c. For in waiting on the concoction, and attending the digestion of his food, they made a thousand pretty instruments and geometrical figures, and did in some measure practice the astronomical canons.

After this they recreated themselves with singing musically, in four or five parts, or upon a set theme or ground at random, as it best pleased them. In matter of musical instruments, he learned to play upon the lute, the virginals, the harp, the Almain flute² with nine holes, the viol, and the sackbut.³ This hour thus spent, and digestion finished, . . . he then betook himself to his principal study for three hours together, or more, as well to repeat his matutinal lectures, as to proceed in the book wherein he was, as also to write handsomely, to draw and form the antique and Roman letters. This being done, they went out of their house, and with them a young gentleman of Touraine, named the Esquire Gymnast, who taught him the art of riding. Changing then his clothes, he rode a Naples courser, a Dutch roussin, a Spanish jennet, a barded or trapped steed, then a light fleet horse, unto whom he gave a hundred carieres, made him go to the high saults, bounding in the air, free a ditch with a skip, leap over a stile or pale, turn short in a ring both to the right and left hand. There he broke not his lance; for it is the greatest foolery in the world to say, I have broken ten lances at tilts or in fight. A carpenter can do even as much. But it is a glorious and praiseworthy action, with one lance to break and overthrow ten enemies. Therefore, with a sharp, stiff, strong and well-steeled lance, would he usually force up a door, pierce a harness, beat down a tree, carry away the ring, lift up a cuirasser saddle, with the mail-coat and gauntlet. All this he did in complete arms from head to foot. As for the prancing flourishes, and smacking popisms, for the better cherishing of the horse, commonly used in riding, none did them better than he. The voltigier⁴ of Ferrara was but as an ape compared to him. He was singularly skillful in leaping nimbly from one horse to another without putting foot to ground, and these horses were called desultories. He could likewise from either side, with a lance in his hand, leap on horseback without stirrups, and rule the horse at his pleasure without a bridle, for such things are useful in military engagements. Another day he exercised the battleaxe, which he so dexterously wielded, both in the nimble, strong and smooth management of that weapon, and that in all feats practiceable by it, that he passed knights of arms in the field, and at all essays.

Then tossed he the pike, played with the two-handed sword, with the backsword, with the Spanish tuck, the dagger, poniard, armed, unarmed, with a buckler, with a cloak, with a target. Then would he hunt the hart, the roebuck, the bear, the fallow deer, the wild boar, the hare, the pheasant, the partridge, and the bustard. He played at the balloon, and made it bound in the air, both fist and foot. He wrestled, ran, jumped, not at three steps and a leap, called the hops, nor at cloche-pied, called the hare's leap, nor yet at the Almain's; for, said Gymnast, these jumps are for the wars altogether unprofitable, and of no use; but at one leap he would skip over a ditch, spring over a hedge, mount six paces upon a wall, ramp and grapple after this fashion up against a window the full length of a lance. He did swim in deep waters on his belly, on his back, sideways, with all his body, with his feet only, with one hand in the air, wherein he held a book, crossing thus the breadth of the river Seine, without wetting it and dragging along his cloak with his teeth, as did Julius Cæsar; then with the help of one hand he entered forcibly into a boat, from whence he cast himself again headlong into the water, sounded the depths, hollowed the rocks, and plunged into the pits and gulfs. Then turned he the boat about, governed it, led it swiftly or slowly with the stream and against the stream, stopped it in its course, guided it with one hand, and with the other laid hard about him with a huge great oar, hoisted the sail, hied up along the mast by the shrouds, ran upon the edge of the decks, set the compass in order, tackled the bowlines, and steered the helm. Coming out of the water, he ran furiously up against a hill, and with the same alacrity and swiftness ran down again. He climbed up at trees like a cat, leaped from the one to the other like a squirrel. He did pull down the great boughs and branches, like another Milo¹; then with two sharp and well-steeled daggers, and two tried bodkins, he would run up by the wall to the very top of a house like a rat; then suddenly came down from the top to the bottom, with such an even composition of members, that by the fall he would catch no harm.

He did cast the dart, throw the bar, put the stone, practice the javelin, the boarspear or partisan, and the halbert. He broke the strongest bows in drawing, bending against his breast the greatest cross-bows of steel, took his aim by the eye with the hand-gun, and shot well, traversed and planted the cannon, shot at butt-marks, at the paggay from below upwards, or to a height, from above downwards, or to a descent; then before him, sidewise, and behind him, like the Parthians. They tied a cable rope to the top of a high tower, by one end whereof hanging near the ground he wrought himself with his hands to the very top; then upon the same tract came down so sturdily and firm that you could not on a plain meadow have run with more assurance. They set up a great pole fixed upon two trees. There would he hang by his hands, and with them alone, his feet touching at nothing, would go back and fore along the aforesaid pole with so great swiftness, that hardly could one overtake him with running; and then, to exercise his breast and lungs he would shout like all the devils in hell. I heard him once call Eudemon from St. Victor's gate to Montmartre.² Stentor³ never had such a voice at the siege of Troy. Then, for the strengthening of his nerves or sinews, they made him two great sows of lead, each of them weighing eight thousand and seven hundred quintals,⁴ which they called alteres. Those he took up from the ground, in each hand one, then lifted them up over his head, and held them so without stirring three quarters of an hour or more, which was an imitable force. He fought at barriers with the stoutest and most vigorous champions; and, when it came to the cope, he stood so sturdily on his feet, that he abandoned himself unto the strongest, in case they could remove him from his place, as Milo was wont to do of old. In whose imitation likewise he held a pomegranate in his hand, to give it unto him that could take it from him. The time being thus bestowed, and himself rubbed, cleansed, wiped, and freshed with other clothes, he returned fair and softly; and passing through certain meadows, or other grassy places, beheld the trees and plants, comparing them with what is written of them in the books of the ancients, such as Theophrast, Dioscorides, Marinus, Pliny, Nicander, Macer, and Galen, and carried home to the house great handfuls of them, whereof a young page called Rizotomos had charge; together with little mattocks, pickaxes, grubbing hooks, cabbies, pruning knives, and other instruments requisite for herboring. Being come to their lodging, whilst supper was making ready, they repeated certain passages of that which hath been read, and sat down at table. Here remark, that his dinner was sober and thrifty, for he did then eat only to prevent the gnawings of his stomach, but his supper was copious and large; for he took then as much as was fit to maintain and nourish him; which indeed is the true diet prescribed by the art of good and sound physic, although a rabble of loggerheaded physicians, nuzzled in the brabbling shop of sophisters, counsel the contrary. During that repast was continued the lesson read at dinner as long as they thought good: the rest was spent in good discourse, learned and profitable. After that they had given thanks, he set himself to sing vocally, and play upon harmonious instruments, or otherwise passed his time at some pretty sports, made with cards or dice, or in practising the feats of legerdemain, with cups and balls. There they stayed some nights in frolicking thus, and making themselves merry till it was time to go to bed; and on other nights they would go make visits unto learned men, or to such as had been travelers in strange and remote countries. When it was full night before they retired themselves, they went unto the most open place of the house to see the face of the sky, and there beheld the comets, if any were, as likewise the figures, situations, aspects, oppositions, and conjunctions of the both fixed stars and planets.

HOW THERE WAS A GREAT STRIFE AND DEBATE RAISED BETWIXT THE CAKE-BAKERS OF LERNÉ, AND THOSE OF GARGANTUA'S COUNTRY, WHERE-UPON WERE WAGED GREAT WARS

At that time, which was the season of vintage, in the beginning of harvest, when the country shepherds were set to keep the vines, and hinder the starlings from eating up the grapes, as some cake-bakers of Lerné happened to pass along in the broad highway, driving into the city ten or twelve horses loaded with cakes, the said shepherds courteously entreated them to give them some for their money, as the price then ruled in the market. . . . The bunsellers or cake-makers were in nothing inclinable to their request; but (which was worse) did injure them most outrageously, calling them prattling gabblers, lickorous gluttons, freckled bittors, mangy rascals, drunken roysters, sly knaves, drowsy loiterers, slapsauce fellows, slabberdegullion druggels, lubbardly louts, cozening foxes, ruffian rogues, paltry customers, sycophant-varlets, drawlatch hoydons, flouting milksops, jeering companions, staring clowns, forlorn snakes, ninny lob-cocks, scurvy sneaksbies, idle lusks, fondling fops, base loons, saucy coxcombs, scoffing braggards, noddie meacocks, blockish grutnols, doddipol joltheads, jobbernel goosecaps, foolish loggerheads, flutch calf-lollies, grouthead gnat-snappers, lob-dotterels, gaping changelings, codshead loobies, woodcock slangams, minnie-hammer flycatchers, noddypeak simpletons, and other such like defamatory epithets; saying further that it was not for them to eat of these dainty cakes, but might very well content themselves with the coarse unranged bread, or to eat of the great brown household loaf. To which provoking words, one amongst them, called For-gier, an honest fellow of his person, and a notable springal,¹ made answer very calmly thus: How long is it since you have got horns, that you are become so proud? Indeed, formerly you were wont to give us some freely, and will you not now let us have any for our money. This is not the part of good neighbors, neither do we serve you thus, when you come thither to buy our good corn, whereof you make your cakes and buns. Besides that, we would have given you to the bargain some of our grapes, but, by his wounds, you may chance to repent it, and possibly have need of us at another time, when we shall use you after the like manner, and therefore remember it. Then Marquet, a prime man in the confraternity of the cake-bakers, said unto him, Yea, sir, thou art pretty well crest-risen this morning, thou didst eat yesternight too much millet and bolymong. Come hither, sirrah, I will give thee some cakes. Whereupon For-gier, dreading no harm, in all simplicity went towards him, and drew a sixpence out of his leather satchel, thinking that Marquet would have sold him some of his cakes. But instead of cakes, he gave him with his whip such a rude lash overthwart the legs, that the marks of the whiplash knots were apparent in them, then would have fled away; but Forgier cried out as loud as he could, Oh, murder, murder, help, help, help! and in the meantime threw a great cudgel after him, which he carried under his arm, wherewith he hit him in the coronal joint of his head, upon the crotaphic artery of the right side thereof, so forcibly, that Marquet fell down from his mare, more like a dead than a living man. Meanwhile the farmers and country swains, that were watching their walnuts near to that place, came running with their great poles and long staves, and laid such a load on these cake-bakers, as if they had been to thrash upon green rye. The other shepherds and shepherdesses, hearing the lamentable shout of Forgier, came with their slings and slackies following them, and throwing great stones at them, as thick as if it had been hail. At last they overtook them, and took from them about four or five dozen of their cakes. Nevertheless they paid for them the ordinary price, and gave them over and above one hundred eggs, and three baskets full of mulberries. Then did the cake-bakers help to get up to his mare Marquet, who was most shrewdly wounded, and forthwith returned to Lerné, changing the resolution they had to go to Pareillé, threatening very sharp and boisterously the cowherds, shepherds and farmers of Seville and Sinays. This done, the shepherds and shepherdesses made merry with these cakes and fine grapes, and sported themselves together at the sound of the pretty small pipe, scoffing and laughing at those vainglorious cake-bakers, who had that day met with mischief for want of crossing themselves with a good hand in the morning. Nor did they forget to apply to Forgier's leg some fair great red medicinal grapes, and so handsomely dressed it and bound it up, that he was quickly cured.

HOW A MONK OF SEVILLÉ SAVED THE CLOSE OF THE ABBEY FROM BEING RANSACKED BY THE ENEMY

5 So much they did, and so far they went pillaging and stealing, that at last they came to Seville, where they robbed both men and women, and took all they could catch: nothing was either too hot or too heavy for them. Although the plague was there in the most part of all the houses, they nevertheless entered everywhere, then plundered and carried away all that was within, and yet for all this not one of them took any hurt, which is a most wonderful case. For the curates, physicians, surgeons and apothecaries, who went to visit, to dress, to cure, to heal, to preach unto, and admonish those that were sick, were all dead of the infection, and these devilish robbers and murderers caught never any harm at all. Whence comes this to pass, my masters? I beseech you think upon it. The town being thus pillaged, they went 10 unto the abbey with a horrible noise and tumult, but they found it shut and made fast against them. Whereupon the body of the army marched forward towards a pass or ford called the Gué de Véde, except seven companies of foot, and two hundred lancers, who, staying there, broke down the walls of the close, to waste, spoil, and make havoc of all the vines and vintage within that place. The monks (poor devils) knew not in that extremity to which of all their sancts they should vow themselves. Nevertheless, at all adventures, they rang the bells ad capitulum capitulantes.¹ There it was decreed, that they should make a fair procession, stuffed with good lectures, prayers, and litanies contra hostium insidias,² and jolly responses pro pace.

There was then in the abbey a claustral monk, called Friar John of the funnels and gobbets, in French, des entoumeures young, gallant, frisk, lusty, nimble, quick, active, bold, adventurous, resolute, tall, lean, wide-mouthed, long-nosed, a fair despatcher of morning prayers, unbridler of masses, and runner over of vigils; and, to conclude summarily in a word, a right monk, if ever there was any, since the monking world monk'd a monkery: for the rest, a clerk even to the teeth in the matter of breviary. This monk, hearing the noise that the enemy made within the inclosure of the vineyard, went out to see what they were doing; and perceiving that they were cutting and gathering the grapes, whereon was grounded the foundation of all their next year's wine, returned unto the choir of the church where the other monks were, all amazed and astonished like so many bell-melters. Whom when he heard sing, im, im, pe, ne, ne, ne, nene, tum, ne, num, num, ini, i mi, co, o, no, o, o, neno, ne, no, no, no, rum, nenum, num: It is well sung, said he. By the virtue of God, why do you not sing, Panniers farewell, vintage is done. The devil snatch me, if they do not already within the middle of our close, and cut so well both vines and grapes that, by cod's body, there will not be found for these four years to come so much as a glean in it. By the belly of Sanct James, what shall we poor devils drink the while? Lord God! da mihi potum.¹ Then said the prior of the convent: What should this drunken fellow do here? let him be carried to prison for troubling the divine service. Nay, said the monk, the wine service, let us behave ourselves so that it be not troubled; for you, yourself, my lord prior, love to drink of the best, and so doth every honest man. Never yet did a man of worth dislike good wine, it is a monastical apothegm. But these responses that you chant here, by g—, are not in season. Wherefore is it, that our devotions were instituted to be short in the time of harvest and vintage, and long in the advent and all the winter? The late friar, Massepelosse, of good memory, a true zealous man (or else I give myself to the devil), of our religion, told me, and I remember it well, how the reason was, that in this season we might press and make the wine, and in the winter whiff it up. Hark you, my masters, you that love the wine, Cop's body, follow me; for Sanct Anthony burn me as freely as a faggot, if they get leave to taste one drop of the liquor, that will not now come and fight for relief of the vine. Hog's belly, the goods of the church! Ha, no no. What the devil, Sanct Thomas of England² was well content to die for them; if I died in the same cause, should not I be a sanct likewise? Yes. Yet shall not I die there for all this, for it is I that must do it to others and send them a-packing.

As he spake thus, he threw off his great monk's habit, and laid hold upon the staff of the cross, which was made of the heart of a sorbapple tree, it being of the length of a lance, round, of a full gripe, and a little powdered with lilies called flower de luce, the workmanship whereof was almost all defaced and worn out. Thus went he out in a fair long-skirted jacket, putting his frock scarfwise athwart his breast, and this equipage, with the staff, shaft, or truncheon of the cross, laid on so lustily, brisk, and fiercely upon his enemies, who without any order, or ensign, or trumpet, or drum, were busied in gathering the grapes out of the vineyard. For the cornets, guidons, and ensign bearers had laid down their standards, banners, and colors by the wallsides: the drummers had knocked out the heads of their drums on one end, to fill them with grapes: the trumpeters were loaded with great bundles of bunches, and huge knots of clusters: in sum, every one of them was out of array, and all in disorder. He hurried, therefore, upon them so rudely, without crying gare or beware, that he overthrew them like hogs, tumbled them over like swine, striking athwart and alongst, and by one means or other laid so about him, after the old fashion of fencing, that to some he beat out their brains, to others he crushed their arms, battered their legs, and bethwacked their sides till their ribs cracked with it. To others again he unjointed the spondyles or knuckles of the neck, disfigured their chaps, gashed their faces, made their cheeks hang flapping on their chin, and so swunged and belammed them, that they fell down before him like hay before a mower. To some others he spoiled the frame of their kidneys, marred their backs, broke their thigh-bones, pashed in their noses, poached out their eyes, cleft their mandibles, tore their jaws, dashed in their teeth into their throat, shook asunder their omoplates or shoulder blades, sphacelated their shins, mortified their shanks, inflamed their ankles, heaved-off-of-the-hinges their ishies, their sciatica or hip-gout, dislocated the joints of their knees, squattered into pieces the boughts or pestles of their thighs, and so thumped, mauled, and belabored them everywhere, that never was corn so thick and threefold thrashed upon by plowmen's flails, as were the pitifully disjoined members of their mangled bodies, under the merciless baton of the cross. If any offered to hide himself among the thickest of the vines, he laid him squat as a flounder, bruised the ridge of his back, and dashed his reins like a dog. If any thought by flight to escape, he made his head to fly in pieces by the lambdoidal commissure, which is a seam in the hinder part of the skull. If anyone did scramble up into a tree, thinking there to be safe, he rent up his perinee and impaled him in the fundament. If any of his old acquaintance happened to cry out, Ha, Friar John, my friend Friar John, quarter, quarter, I yield myself to you, to you I render myself! So thou shalt, said he, and must, whether thou wouldst or no, and withal render and yield up thy soul to all the devils in hell; then suddenly gave them dronos — that is, so many knocks, thumps, raps, dints, thwacks, and bangs, as sufficed to warn Pluto of their coming, and despatch them a going. If any was so rash and full of temerity as to resist him to his face, then was it he did show the strength of his muscles, for without more ado he did transpierce him, by running him in at the breast, through the mediastine¹ and the heart. Others, again, he so quashed and bebumped, that, with a sound bounce under the hollow of their short ribs, he overturned their stomachs so that they died immediately. To some, with a smart souse on the epigaster,² he would make their midriff swag, then, redoubling with the blow, gave them such a home-push on the navel, that he made their puddings to gush out. To others through their ballocks he pierced their bumgut, and left no bowel, tripe, nor entrail in their body, that had not felt the impetuosity, fierceness, and fury of his violence. Believe, that it was the most horrible spectacle that ever one was. Some cried unto Sanct Barbe, others to St. George. O the holy Lady Nytouch, said one, the good Sanctess! O our Lady of Succours, said another, help help! Others cried, Our Lady of Cunaut, of Loretto, of Good Tidings, on the other side of the water St. Mary Over. Some vowed a pilgrimage to St. James, and others to the holy handkerchief at Chamberry, which three months after that burnt so well in the fire, that they could not get one thread of it saved. Others sent up their vows to St. Cadouin, others to St. John d'Angely, and to St. Eutropius of Xaintes. Others again invoked St. Mesmes of Chinon, St. Martin of Candes, St. Clôaud of Sinays, the holy relics of Laurezey, with a thousand other jolly little sancts and santrels. Some died without speaking, others spoke without dying; some died in speaking, others spoke in dying. Others shouted as loud as they could, Confession, Confession! Confiteor, Miserere, In manus! So great was the cry of the wounded, that the Prior of the Abbey with all his monks came forth, who, when they saw these poor wretches so slain amongst the vines, and wounded to death, confessed some of them. But whilst the priests were busied in confessing them, the little monkees ran all to the place where Friar John was, and asked him, wherein he would be pleased to require their assistance! To which he answered that they should cut the throats of those he had thrown down upon the ground. They presently, leaving their outer habits, and cowls, upon the rails, began to throttle and make an end of those whom he had already crushed. Can you tell with what instruments they did it? With fair gullies, which are little haulch-backed demi-knives, the iron tool whereof is two meantime Friar John, with his formidable baton of the cross, got to the breach which the enemies had made, and there stood to snatch up those who endeavored to escape.

 Some of the monkitos carried the standards, banners, ensigns, guidons, and colors into their cells and chambers, to make garters of them. But when those that had been shriven would have gone out at the gap of the said breach, the sturdy monk quashed and felled them down with blows, saying, These men have had confession and are penitent souls, they have got their absolution and gained the pardons: they and valor were discomfited all those of the

ITALIAN

CELLINI

(1500-1571)

Benvenuto Cellini, celebrated sculptor and artist, was born in Florence. He learned music in obedience to his father's will; but he preferred the arts of the gold-worker, engraver, and sculptor, in which he excelled. Having wounded a man in a quarrel, he fled from Florence to Rome. He fought in defence of that city in 1527, when it was stormed by Constable Bourbon, whom Cellini boasted of having killed on that occasion. Employed by Pope Clement VII as engraver to the mint, he engraved medals with great success, and afterwards worked in Paris for Francis I, and in Florence for Cosimo de' Medici. Among his masterpieces is a bronze group of Perseus and Medusa. Cellini's Autobiography is a careless, disorganized document, which, because of its extraordinary vitality, continues to be one of the most highly prized and widely read Italian pieces of the sixteenth century. Proceeding from a character of the most curious contradictions, — a delicate taste and a ferocious and boastful disposition, the highest enthusiasm for beauty and the most abysmal ignorance and superstition, a total lack of ethical scruples, and a whole-hearted devotion to art — it delights the reader by its very paradoxes.

The following selections are from the translation of J. Addington Symonds, New York, P. F. Collier and Sons, 1910.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

LII

The Pope had sent me all those precious stones, except the diamond, which was pawned to certain Genoese bankers for some pressing need he had of money. The rest were in my custody, together with a model of the diamond. I had five excellent journeymen, and, in addition to the great piece, I was engaged on several jobs; so that my shop contained property of much value in jewels, gems, and gold and silver. I kept a shaggy dog, very big and handsome, which Duke Alessandro gave me; the beast was capital as a retriever, since he brought me every sort of birds and game I shot, but he also served most admirably for a watchdog.

It chanced one night: for I must say that a thief, under the pretext of being a goldsmith, had spied on me, and cast his eyes upon the precious stones, and made a plan to steal them. Well, then, this fellow broke into the shop, where he found a quantity of little things in gold and silver. He was engaged in bursting open certain boxes to get at the jewels he had noticed, when my dog jumped upon him, and put him to much trouble to defend himself with his sword. The dog, unable to grapple with an armed man, ran several times through the house, and rushed into the rooms of the journeymen, which had been left open because of the great heat. When he found they paid no heed to his loud barking, he dragged their bed-clothes off; and when they still heard nothing, he pulled first one and then another by the arm till he roused them, and, barking furiously, ran before to show them where he wanted them to go. At last it became clear that they refused to follow; for the traitors, cross at being disturbed, threw stones and sticks at him; and this they could well do, for I had ordered them to keep all night a lamp alight there; and in the end they shut their rooms tight; so the dog, abandoning all hope of aid from such rascals, set out alone again on his adventure. He ran down, and not finding the thief in the shop, flew after him. When he got at him, he tore the cape off his back. It would have gone hard with the fellow had he not called for help to certain tailors, praying them for God's sake to save him from a mad dog; and they, believing what he said, jumped out and drove the dog off with much trouble.

After sunrise my workmen went into the shop, and saw that it had been broken open and all the boxes smashed. They began to scream at the top of their voices: "Ah, woe is me! Ah, woe is me!" The clamour woke me, and I rushed out in a panic. Appearing thus before them, they cried out: "Alas to us! for we have been robbed by some one, who has broken and borne everything away!" These words wrought so forcibly upon my mind that I dared not go to my big chest and look if it still held the jewels of the Pope. So intense was the anxiety, that I seemed to lose my eyesight, and told them they themselves must unlock the chest, and see how many of the Pope's gems were missing. The fellows were all of them in their shirts; and when, on opening the chest, they saw the precious stones and my work with them, they took heart of joy and shouted: "There is no harm done; your piece and all the stones are here; but the thief has left us naked to the shirt, because last night, by reason of the burning heat, we took our clothes off in the shop and left them here." Recovering my senses, I thanked God, and said: "Go and get yourselves new suits of clothes; I will pay when I have at leisure how the whole thing happened." What caused me the most pain, and made me lose my senses, and take fright — so contrary to my real nature — was the dread lest peradventure folk should fancy I had trumped a story of the robber up to steal the jewels. It had already been said to Pope Clement by one of his most trusted servants, and by others, that is, by Francesco del Nero, Zana de' Biliotti his accountant, the Bishop of Vasona, and several such men: "Why, most blessed Father, do you confide gems of that vast value to a young fellow, who is all fire, more passionate for arms than for his art, and not yet thirty years of age?" The Pope asked in answer if any one of them knew that I had done ought to justify such suspicions. Whereto Francesco del Nero, his treasurer, replied: "No, most blessed Father, because he has not as yet had an opportunity." Whereto the Pope rejoined: "I regard him as a thoroughly honest man; and, if I saw with my own eyes some crime he had committed, I should not believe it." This was the man who caused me the greatest torment, and who suddenly came up before my mind.

After telling the young men to provide themselves with fresh clothes, I took my piece, together with the gems, setting them as well as I could in their proper places, and went off at once with them to the Pope. Francesco del Nero had already told him something of the trouble in my shop, and had put suspicions in his head. So then, taking the thing rather ill than otherwise, he shot a furious glance upon me, and cried haughtily: "What have you come to do here? What is up?" "Here are all your precious stones, and not one of them is missing." At this the Pope's face cleared, and he said: "So then, you're welcome." I showed him the piece, and, while he was inspecting it, I related to him the whole story of the thief and of my agony, and what had been my greatest trouble in the matter. During this speech, he oftentimes turned round to look me sharply in the eyes; and Francesco del Nero being also in the presence, this seemed to make him half sorry that he had not guessed the truth. At last, breaking into laughter at the long tale I was telling, he sent me off with these words: "Go, and take heed to be an honest man, as indeed I know that you are."

I went on working assiduously at the button, and at the same time laboured for the Mint, when certain pieces of false money got abroad in Rome, stamped with my own dies. They were brought at once to the Pope, who, hearing things against me, said to Giacompo Balducci, the Master of the Mint, "Take every means in your power to find the criminal; for we are sure that Benvenuto is an honest fellow." That traitor of a master, being in fact my enemy, replied: "Would God, most blessed Father, that it may turn out as you say; for we have some proofs against him." Upon this the Pope turned to the Governor of Rome, and bade him see he found the malefactor. During those days the Pope sent for me, and, leading cautiously in conversation to the topic of the coins, asked me at the fitting moment: "Benvenuto, should you have the heart to coin false money?" To this I replied that I thought I could do so better than all the rascals who gave their minds to such vile work; for fellows who practise lewd trades of that sort are not capable of earning money, nor are they men of much ability. I, on the contrary, with my poor wits could gain enough to keep me comfortably; for when I set dies for the Mint, each morning before dinner I put at least three crowns into my pocket; this was the customary payment for the dies, and the Master of the Mint bore me a grudge, because he would have liked to have them cheaper; so then, what I earned, with God's grace and the world's, sufficed me, and by coining false money I should not have made so much. The Pope very well perceived my drift; and, whereas he had formerly given orders that they should see I did not fly from Rome, he now told them to look well about and have no heed of me, seeing he was ill-disposed to anger me, and in this way run the risk of losing me. The officials who received these orders were certain clerks of the Camera, who made the proper search, as was their duty, and soon found the rogue. He was a stamper in the service of the Mint, named Cesare Macherone, and a Roman citizen. Together with this man they detected a metal-founder of the Mint.

On that very day, as I was passing through the Piazza Navona, and had my fine retriever with me, just when we came opposite the gate of the Bargello, my dog flew barking loudly inside the door upon a youth, who had been arrested at the suit of a man called Donnino (a goldsmith from Parma, and a former pupil of Caradosso), on the charge of having robbed him. The dog strove so violently to tear the fellow to pieces, that the constables were moved to pity. It so happened that he was pleading his own cause with boldness, and Donnino had not evidence enough to support the accusation; and what was more, one of the corporals of the guard, a Genoese, was a friend of the young man's father. The upshot was that, what with the dog and with those other circumstances, they were on the point of releasing their prisoner. When I came up, the dog had lost all fear of sword or staves, and was flying once more at the young man; so they told me if I did not call the brute off they would kill him. I held him back as well as I was able; but just then the fellow, in the act of readjusting his cape, let fall some paper packets from the hood, which Donnino recognised as his property. I too recognised a little ring; whereupon I called out: "This is the thief who broke into my shop and robbed it; and therefore my dog knows him"; then I loosed the dog, who flew again upon the robber. On this the fellow craved for mercy, promising to give back whatever he possessed of mine. When I had secured the dog, he proceeded to restore the gold and silver and the rings which he had stolen from me, and twenty-five crowns in addition. Then he cried once more to me for pity. I told him to make his peace with God, for I should do him neither good nor evil. So I returned to my business; and a few days afterwards, Cesare Macherone, the false coiner, was hanged in the Banchi opposite the Mint; his accomplice was sent to the galleys; the Genoese thief was hanged in the Campo di Fiore, while I remained in better repute as an honest man than I had enjoyed before.

LV

When I had nearly finished my piece, there happened that terrible inundation which flooded the whole of Rome. I waited to see what would happen; the day was well-nigh spent, for the clocks struck twenty-two and the water went on rising formidably. Now the front of my house and shop faced the Banchi, but the back was several yards higher, because it turned toward Monte Giordano; accordingly, bethinking me first of my own safety and in the next place of my honour, I filled my pockets with the jewels, and gave the gold-piece into the custody of my workmen, and then descended barefoot from the back-windows, and waded as well as I could until I reached Monte Cavallo. There I sought out Messer Giovanni Gaddi, clerk of the Camera, and Bastiano Veneziano, the painter. To the former I confided the precious stones, to keep in safety: he had the same regard for me as though I had been his brother. A few days later, when the rage of the river was spent, I returned to my workshop, and finished the piece with such good fortune, through God's grace and my own great industry, that it was held to be the finest masterpiece which had been ever seen in Rome.

When then I took it to the Pope, he was insatiable in praising me, and said: "Were I but a wealthy emperor, I would give my Benvenuto as much land as his eyes could survey; yet being nowadays but needy bankrupt potentates, we will at any rate give him bread enough to satisfy his modest wishes." I let the Pope run on to the end of his rhodomontade, and then asked him for a mace-bearer's place which happened to be vacant. He replied that he would grant me something of far greater consequence. I begged his Holiness to bestow this little thing on me meanwhile by way of earnest. He began to laugh, and said he was willing, but that he did not wish me to serve, and that I must make some arrangement with the other mace-bearers to be exempted. He would allow them through me a certain favour, for which they had already petitioned, namely, the right of recovering their fees at law. This was accordingly done; and that mace-bearer's office brought me in little less than 200 crowns a year.

LVI

I continued to work for the Pope, executing now one trifle and now another, when he commissioned me to design a chalice of exceeding richness. So I made both drawing and model for the piece. The latter was constructed of wood and wax. Instead of the usual top, I fashioned three figures of a fair size in the round; they represented Faith, Hope, and Charity. Corresponding to these, at the base of the cup, were three circular histories in bas-relief. One was the Nativity of Christ, the second the Resurrection, and the third S. Peter crucified head downwards; for thus I had received commission. While I had this work in hand, the Pope was often pleased to look at it; wherefore, observing that his Holiness had never thought again of giving me anything, and knowing that a post in the Piombo was vacant, I asked for this one evening. The good Pope, quite oblivious of his extravagances at the termination of the last piece, said to me: "That post in the Piombo is worth more than 800 crowns a year, so that, if I gave it you, you would spend your time in scratching your paunch, and your magnificent handicraft would be lost, and I should bear the blame." I replied at once as thus: "Cats of a good breed mouse better when they are fat than starving; and likewise honest men who possess some talent exercise it to far nobler purport when they have the wherewithal to live abundantly; wherefore princes who provide such folk with competences, let your Holiness take notice, are watering the roots of genius; for genius and talent, at their birth, come into this world lean and scabby; and your Holiness should also know that I never asked for the place with the hope of getting it. Only too happy I to have that miserable post of mace-bearer. On the other I built but castles in the air. Your Holiness will do well, since you do not care to give it me, to bestow it on a man of talent who deserves it, and not upon some fat ignoramus who will spend his time scratching his paunch, if I may quote your Holiness's own words. Follow the example of Pope Guilio's illustrious memory, who conferred an office of the same kind upon Bramante, that most admirable architect."

Immediately on finishing this speech, I made my bow, and went off in a fury. Then Bastiano Veneziano the painter approached, and said: "Most blessed Father, may your Holiness be willing to grant it to one who works assiduously in the exercise of some talent; and, as your Holiness knows that I am diligent in my art, I beg that I may be thought worthy of it." The Pope replied: "That devil Benvenuto will not brook rebuke. I was inclined to give it him, but it is not right to be so haughty with a Pope. Therefore I do not well know what I am to do." The Bishop of Vasona then came up, and put in a word for Bastiano, saying: "Most blessed Father, Benvenuto is but young; and a sword becomes him better than a friar's frock. Let your Holiness give the place to this ingenious person Bastiano. Some time or other you will be able to bestow on Benvenuto a good thing, perhaps more suitable to him than this would be." Then the Pope, turning to Messer Bartolommeo Valori, told him: "When next you meet Benvenuto, let him know from me that it was he who got that office in the Piombo for Bastiano the painter, and add that he may reckon on obtaining the next considerable place that falls; meanwhile let him look to his behaviour, and finish my commissions."

The following evening, two hours after sundown, I met Messer Bartolommeo Valori at the corner of the Mint; he was preceded by two torches, and was going in haste to the Pope, who had sent for him. On my taking off my hat, he stopped and called me, and reported in the most friendly manner all the messages the Pope had sent me. I replied that I should complete my work with greater diligence and application than any I had yet attempted, but without the least hope of having any reward whatever from the Pope. Messer Bartolommeo reproved me, saying that this was not the way in which one ought to reply to the advances of a Pope. I answered that I should be mad to reply otherwise — mad if I based my hopes on such promises, being certain to get nothing. So I departed, and went off to my business.

Messer Bartolommeo must have reported my audacious speeches to the Pope, and more perhaps than I had really said; for his Holiness waited above two months before he sent to me, and during that while nothing would have induced me to go uncalled for to the palace. Yet he was dying with impatience to see the chalice, and commissioned Messer Ruberto Pucci to give heed to what I was about. That right worthy fellow came daily to visit me, and always gave me some kindly word, which I returned. The time was drawing nigh now for the Pope to travel toward Bologna; so at last, perceiving that I did not mean to come to him, he made Messer Ruberto bid me bring my work, that he might see how I was getting on. Accordingly, I took it; and having shown, as the piece itself proved, that the most important part was finished, I begged him to advance me five hundred crowns, partly on account, and partly because I wanted gold to complete the chalice. The Pope said: "Go on, go on at work till it is finished." I answered, as I took my leave, that I would finish it if he paid me the money. And so I went away.

LVII

When the Pope took his journey to Bologna, he left Cardinal Salviati as Legate of Rome, and gave him commission to push the work that I was doing forward, adding: "Benvenuto is a fellow who esteems his own great talents but slightly, and us less; look to it then that you keep him always going, so that I may find the chalice finished on my return."

That beast of a Cardinal sent for me after eight days, bidding me bring the piece up. On this I went to him without the piece. No sooner had I shown my face, than he called out: "Where is that onion-stew of yours? Have you got it ready?" I answered: "O most reverend Monsignor, I have not got my onion-stew ready, nor shall I make it ready, unless you give me onions to concoct it with." At these words, the Cardinal, who looked more like a donkey than a man, turned uglier by half than he was naturally; and, wanting at once to cut the matter short, cried out: "I'll send you to a galley, and then perhaps you'll have the grace to go on with your labour." The bestial manners of the man made me a beast too; and I retorted: "Monsignor, send me to the galleys when I've done deeds worthy of them; but, for my present laches, I snap my fingers at your galleys: and, what is more, I tell you that, just because of you, I will not set hand further to my piece. Don't send for me again, for I won't appear, no, not if you summon me by the police."

After this, the good Cardinal tried several times to let me know that I ought to go on working, and to bring him what I was doing to look at. I only told his messengers: "Say to Monsignor that he must send me onions, if he wants me to get my stew ready." Nor gave I ever any other answer; so that he threw up the commission in despair.

LVIII

The Pope came back from Bologna, and sent at once for me, because the Cardinal had written the worst he could of my affairs in his despatches. He was in the hottest rage imaginable, and bade me come upon the instant with my piece. I obeyed. Now, while the Pope was staying at Bologna, I had suffered from an attack of inflammation in the eyes, so painful that I scarce could go on living for the torment; and this was the chief reason why I had not carried out my work. The trouble was so serious that I expected for certain to be left without my eyesight; and I had reckoned up the sum on which I could subsist, if I were blind for life. Upon the way to the Pope, I turned over in my mind what I should put forward to excuse myself for not having been able to advance his work. I thought that, while he was inspecting the chalice, I might tell him of my personal embarrassments. However, I was unable to do so; for, when I arrived in the presence, he broke out coarsely at me: "Come here with your work; is it finished?" I displayed it; and, his temper rising, he exclaimed: "In God's truth I tell thee, thou that makest it thy business to hold no man in regard, that, were it not for decency and order, I would have thee chucked together with thy work there out of windows." Accordingly, when I perceived that the Pope had become no better than a vicious beast, my chief anxiety was how I could manage to withdraw from his presence. So, while he went on bullying, I tucked the piece beneath my cape, and muttered under my breath: "The whole world could not compel a blind man to execute such things as these." Raising his voice still higher, the Pope shouted: "Come here; what say'st thou?" I stayed in two minds, whether or not to dash at full speed down the staircase; then I took my decision and threw myself upon my knees, shouting as loudly as I could, for he too had not ceased from shouting: "If an infirmity has blinded me, am I bound to go on working?" He retorted: "You saw well enough to make your way hither, and I don't believe one word of what you say." I answered, for I noticed he had dropped his voice a little: "Let your Holiness inquire of your physician, and you will find the truth out." He said: "So ho! softly; at leisure we shall hear if what you say is so." Then, perceiving that he was willing to give me hearing, I added: "I am convinced that the only cause of this great trouble which has happened to me is Cardinal Salviati; for he sent to me immediately after your Holiness's departure, and, when I presented myself, he called my work a stew of onions, and told me he would send me to complete it in a galley; and such was the effect upon me of his knavish words, that in my passion I felt my face in flame, and so intolerable a heat attacked my eyes that I could not find my own way home. Two days afterwards, cataracts fell on both my eyes; I quite lost my sight, and after your Holiness's departure I have been unable to work at all."

Rising from my knees, I left the presence without further license. It was afterwards reported to me that the Pope had said: "One can give commissions, but not the prudence to perform them. I did not tell the Cardinal to go so brutally about this business. If it is true that he is suffering from his eyes, of which I shall get information through my doctor, one ought to make allowance for him." A great gentleman, intimate with the Pope, and a man of very distinguished parts, happened to be present. He asked who I was, using terms like these: "Most blessed Father, pardon if I put a question. I have seen you yield at one and the same time to the hottest anger I ever observed, and then to the warmest compassion; so I beg your Holiness to tell me who the man is; for, if he is a person worthy to be helped, I can teach him a secret which may cure him of that infirmity." The Pope replied: "He is the greatest artist who was ever born in his own craft; one day, when we are together, I will show you some of his marvellous works, and the man himself to boot; and I shall be pleased if we can see our way toward doing something to assist him." Three days after this, the Pope sent for me after dinner-time, and I found that great noble in the presence. On my arrival, the Pope had my cope-button brought, and I in the meantime drew forth my chalice. The nobleman said, on looking at it, that he had never seen a more stupendous piece of work. When the button came, he was still more struck with wonder: and, looking me straight in the face, he added: "The man is young, I trow, to be so able in his art, and still apt enough to learn much." He then asked me what my name was. I answered: "My name is Benvenuto." He replied: "And Benvenuto shall I be this day to you. Take flower-de-luces, stalk, blossom, root, together; then decoct them over a slack fire; and with the liquid bathe your eyes several times a day; you will most certainly be cured of that weakness; but see that you purge first, and then go forward with the lotion." The Pope gave me some kind words, and so I went away half satisfied.

MONTAIGNE

(1533-1592)

Michel Eyquem de Montaigne was born at the castle of Montaigne in Perigord. His father took an unusual interest in his education. He was taught Latin as a small child, and at an early age made the acquaintance of the chief classical authors known in his time. He attended the University of Guyenne, where he was a pupil of the famous Scottish humanist, George Buchanan. In 1546 he entered the study of law. After completing his course he held various administrative offices in Bordeaux until 1548, when, as a memorial for the death of his father in that year, he began a translation of Raymond Sebond's Natural Theology. After finishing this work in 1569, Montaigne resigned his public offices and retired to his estate to devote himself to study and meditation. At the end of ten years he produced the first and second volumes of the Essays, and departed upon a journey through the principal countries of Europe. Upon his return he occupied the office of Mayor of Bordeaux for four years, at the end of which time he was forced to flee the city to avoid the pestilence. Returning to his estate, he gave himself up to study once more, and in 1588 brought out another edition of the Essays augmented by a third volume. He died in 1592.

Although Montaigne could hardly be said to have invented the name of the essay, he deserves the honor of having created its form, which, in the Essays, we may actually see taking shape. Montaigne had no system of philosophy to propound. His purpose was to set forth the individual feelings and opinions which had come to him from a long period of wide reading and deliberate meditation. The Essays represent isolated personal reflections, through which runs a vein of skepticism, a feeling that the struggles of life are futile, and that one had best prepare his mind to view life dispassionately from a comfortable vantage point. Montaigne's style, free of rhetorical devices, is direct and familiar. In England, the Essays, especially after the English translation by Florio (1603), were hardly less popular than Amyot's translation of Plutarch. Shakespeare and Jonson both reveal familiarity with Montaigne, and Bacon, in his Essays, followed his example.

The present selections are from the translation of Charles Cotton, New York, A. L. Burt.

ESSAYS

THAT WE TASTE NOTHING PURE

The imbecility of our condition is such that things cannot, in their natural simplicity and purity, fall into our use; the elements that we enjoy are changed, and so 'tis with metals; and gold must be de-based with some other matter to fit it for our service. Neither has virtue, so simple as that which Aristo,¹ Pyrrho,¹ and also the Stoics, made the end of life; nor the Cyrenaic and Aristippic pleasure, been without mixture useful to it. Of the pleasure and goods that we enjoy, there is not one exempt from some mixture of ill and inconvenience:

¹ Aristo and Pyrrho were philosophers of the Cynic and the Skeptic schools, respectively. Aristippus, founder of the Cyrenaean philosophy, was a Hedonist. Cynicism, Skepticism, Stoicism and Hedonism can easily be distinguished one from another by their various interpretations and conceptions of virtue and pleasure.

Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus
angat." ¹

Our extremest pleasure has some air of groaning and complaining in it; would 5 you not say that it is dying of pain? Nay when we frame the image of it in its full excellence, we stuff it with sickly and painful epithets and qualities, languor, softness, feebleness, faintness, morbidezza: a great 10 testimony of their consanguinity and con-substantiality. The most profound joy has more of severity than gayety in it.
The highest and fullest contentment offers more of the grave than of the merry; 15
"Ipsa felicitas, se nisi temperat, premittit." ² Pleasure chews and grinds us; according to the old Greek verse, which says that the gods sell us all the goods they give us;
that is to say, that they give us nothing 20 pure and perfect, and that we do not purchase but at the price of some evil.

Labor and pleasure, very unlike in nature, associate, nevertheless, by I know not what natural conjunction. Socrates 25 says that some god tried to mix in one mass and to confound pain and pleasure, but, not being able to do it, he bethought him at least, to couple them by the tail.
Metrodorus ³ said that in sorrow there is 30 some mixture of pleasure. I know not whether or no he intended anything else by that saying; but for my part, I am of opinion that there is design, consent, and complacency in giving a man's self up to 35 melancholy. I say, that beside ambition, which may also have a stroke in the business, there is some shadow of delight and delicacy which smiles upon and flatters us even in the very lap of melancholy. 40
Are there not some constitutions that feed upon it?

to us, as bitterness in wine, when too old,

and as apples that have a sweet tartness.
Nature discovers this confusion to us;
painters hold that the same motions and screwings of the face that serve for weeping serve for laughter too; and indeed, 10 before the one or the other be finished, do but observe the painter's manner of handling, and you will be in doubt to which of the two the design tends; and the extreme of laughter does at last bring tears. "Nullum sine auctoramento malum

When I imagine man abounding with all the conveniences that are to be desired (let us put the case that all his members were always seized with a pleasure like that of generation, in its most excessive height) I feel him melting under the weight of his delight, and see him utterly unable to support so pure, so continual, and so universal a pleasure. Indeed, he is running away while he is there, and naturally makes haste to escape as from a place where he cannot stand firm, and where 30
he is afraid of sinking.

When I religiously confess myself to myself, I find that the best virtue I have has in it some tincture of vice; and I am afraid that Plato, in his purest virtue (I, who am as sincere and loyal a lover of virtue of that stamp, as any other whatever) if he had listened and laid his ear close to himself, and he did so no doubt, would have heard some jarring sound of human mixture, but faint and only perceptible to himself. Man is wholly and throughout but patch and motley. Even the laws of justice themselves cannot subsist without mixture of injustice; insomuch that Plato says, they undertake to cut off the hydra's head, who pretend to clear the law of all inconveniences. "Omne magnum exemplum habet aliquid ex iniquo, quod contra singulos utilitate publica rependitur,"¹ says Tacitus.

It is likewise true that, for the use of life and the service of public commerce, there may be some excesses in the purity and perspicacity of our minds; that penetrating light has in it too much of subtlety and curiosity: we must a little stupefy and blunt them to render them more obedient to example and practice, and a little veil and obscure them, the better to proportion them to this dark and earthy life. And therefore common and less speculative souls are found to be more proper for and more successful in the management of affairs; and the elevated and exquisite opinions of philosophy unfit for business. This sharp vivacity of soul, and the supple and restless volubility attending it, disturb our negotiations. We are to manage human enterprises more superficially and roughly, and leave a great part to fortune; it is not necessary to examine affairs with so much subtlety and so deep: a man loses himself in the consideration of so many contrary lusters, and so many various forms; "Voluntibus res inter se pugnant obtorpuerant . . . animi."²

'Tis what the ancients say of Simonides, that by reason his imagination suggested to him, upon the question³ King Hiero⁴ had put to him (to answer which he had had many days to meditate in), several sharp and subtle considerations, while he doubted which was the most likely, he totally despaired of the truth.

He who dives into and in his inquisition comprehends all circumstances and consequences hinders his elections: a little engine well handled is sufficient for executions, whether of less or greater weight. The best managers are those who can worst give account how they are so; while the greatest talkers, for the most part, do nothing to purpose: I know one of this sort of men, and a most excellent discourser upon all sorts of good husbandry, who has miserably let a hundred thousand livres yearly revenue slip through his hands; I know another who talks, who better advises than any man of his counsel, and there is not in the world a fairer show of soul and understanding than he has; nevertheless, when he comes to the test, his servants find him quite another thing; not to make any mention of his misfortunes.

OF ILL MEANS EMPLOYED TO A GOOD END

There is wonderful relation and correspondence in this universal government of the works of nature, which very well makes it appear that it is neither accidental nor carried on by divers masters. The diseases and conditions of our bodies are, in like manner, manifest in states and governments; kingdoms and republics are founded, flourish, and decay with age as we do. We are subject to a repletion of humors, useless and dangerous: whether of those that are good (for even those the physicians are afraid of; and seeing we have nothing in us that is stable, they say that a too brisk and vigorous perfection of health must be abated by art, lest our nature, unable to rest in any certain condition and not having whither to rise to mend itself, make too sudden and too disorderly a retreat: and therefore prescribe wrestlers to purge and bleed, to qualify that superabundant health), or else a repletion of evil humors, which is the ordinary cause of sickness. States are very often sick of the like repletion, and various sorts of purgations have commonly been applied. Sometimes a great multitude of families are turned out to clear the country, who seek out new abodes elsewhere and encroach upon others. After this manner our ancient Franks came from the remotest part of Germany to seize upon Gaul, and to drive thence the first inhabitants; so was that infinite deluge of men made up who came into Italy under the conduct of Brennus and others; so the Goths and Vandals, and also the people who now possess Greece, left their native country to go settle elsewhere, where they might have more room; and there are scarce two or three little corners in the world that have not felt the effect of such removals. The Romans by this means erected their colonies; for, perceiving their city to grow immeasurably populous, they eased it of the most unnecessary people, and sent them to inhabit and cultivate the lands conquered by them; sometimes also they purposely maintained wars with some of their enemies, not only to keep their own men in action, for fear lest idleness, the mother of corruption, should bring upon them some worse inconvenience, but also to serve for a blood-letting to their republic, and a little to evaporate the too vehement heat of their youth, to prune and clear the branches from the stock too luxuriant in wood; and to this end it was that they maintained so long a war with Carthage.

In the treaty of Bretigny, Edward III, king of England, would not, in the general peace he then made with our king, comprehend the controversy about the duchy of Brittany, that he might have a place wherein to discharge himself of his soldiers, and that the vast number of English he had brought over to serve him in his expedition here might not return back into England. And this also was one reason why our King Philip consented to send his son John upon a foreign expedition, that he might take along with him a great number of hot young men who were then in his pay.

⁴ "What other end of the impious art of the gladiators, the slaughter of young men, the delight in the effusion of blood." Prudentius, Contra Symmachum, ii, 643.

There are many in our times who talk at this rate, wishing that this hot emotion that is now among us might discharge itself in some neighboring war, for fear lest all the peccant humors that now reign in this politic body of ours may diffuse themselves farther, keep the fever still in the height, and at last cause our total ruin; and, in truth, a foreign is much more supportable than a civil war; but I do not believe that God will favor so unjust a design as to offend and quarrel with others for our own advantage.

"Nil mihi tam valde placeat, Rhamnusia
virgo,
Quod temere invitis suscipiatur heris."²

And yet the weakness of our condition often pushes us upon the necessity of making use of ill means to a good end. Lysurgus,³ the most virtuous and perfect legislator that ever was, invented this very unjust practice of making the Helots, who were their slaves, drunk by force, to the end that the Spartans, seeing them so lost and buried in wine, might abhor the excess of this vice. And yet those were still more to blame, who of old gave leave that criminals, to what sort of death soever condemned, should be cut up alive by the physicians, that they might make a true discovery of our inward parts, and build their art upon greater certainty; for, if we must run into excesses, it is more excusable to do it for the health of the soul, than that of the body; as the Romans trained up the people to valor, and the contempt of dangers and death, by those furious spectacles of gladiators and fencers, who, having to fight it out to the last, cut, mangled, and killed one another in their presence:

"Quid vesani aliud sibi vult ars impia ludi, Quid mortes juvenum quid sanguine pasta voluptas?"⁴

and this custom continued till the Emperor Theodosius' time.

"Arripe dilatam tua, dux, in tempora faman,
 Quodque patris superest, successor laudis habeto
 Nullus in urbe cadat, cujus sit poena voluptas . . .
 Jam solis contenta feris, infamis arena
 Nulla cruentatis homicidia ludat in armis."¹

It was, in truth, a wonderful example, and 10 of great advantage for the training up of people, to see every day before their eyes a hundred, two hundred, nay, a thousand couples of men armed against one another cut one another to pieces² with so great a constancy of courage, that they were never heard to utter so much as one syllable of weakness or commiseration; never seen to turn their backs, nor so much as to make one cowardly step to evade a 20 blow, but rather exposed their necks to the adversary's sword and presented themselves to receive the stroke; and many of them, when wounded to death, have sent to ask the spectators if they were satisfied 25 with their behavior, before they lay down to die upon the place. It was not enough for them to fight and to die bravely, but cheerfully too; insomuch that they were hissed and cursed if they made any hesitation about receiving their death. The very girls themselves set them on:

"Consurgit ad ictus,
 Et, quoties victor ferrum jugulo inserit, 35
 illa
 Delicias ait esse suas, pectusque jacentis
 Virgo modesta jubet converso pollice
 rumpi."³

The first Romans only condemned criminals to this example: but they afterward employed innocent slaves in the work, and even freemen too, who sold themselves to this purpose, nay, moreover, senators and knights of Rome, and also women:

"Nunc caput in mortem vendunt, et funus arenæ, Atque hostem sibi quisque parat, cum bella quiescunt."⁴

"Hos inter fremitus novosque lustus . . .
 Stat sexus rudis insciusque ferri,
 Et pugnas capit improbus viriles"⁵;

which I should think strange and incredible, if we were not accustomed, every day, to see in our own wars many thousands of men of other nations, for money to stake their blood and their lives in quarrels wherein they have no manner of concern.

COWARDICE THE MOTHER OF CRUELTY

I have often heard it said, that cowardice is the mother of cruelty: and I have found by experience, that malicious and inhuman animosity and fierceness are usually accompanied with feminine weakness. I have seen the most cruel people, and upon frivolous occasions, apt to cry. Alexander, the tyrant of Phœnix, durst not be a spectator of tragedies in the theater, for fear lest his citizens should see him weep at the misfortunes of Hecuba⁶ and Andromache,⁶ who himself without pity caused so many people every day to be murdered. Is it not meanness of spirit that renders them so pliable to all ex-

² A serious riot having broken out at Thessalonica, in which the imperial officer and several of his troops were murdered, Theodosius, to wreak vengeance upon the whole city, invited all the inhabitants to the games in the Circus. As soon as the place was full, the soldiers were employed for three hours in slaughtering them.

³ "The modest virgin is so delighted with the sport, that she applauds the blow, and when the victor bathes his sword in his fellow's throat, she is delighted, and, with turned thumb, orders him to rip up the bosom of the prostrate victim." Prudentius, op. cit., 617.

stops when it sees the enemy at its mercy; but pusillanimity, to say that it was also in the game, not having dared to meddle in the first act of danger, takes as its part, the second of blood and massacre. The murders in victories are commonly performed by the rascality and hangers-on of an army, and that which causes so many unheard-of cruelties in domestic wars is, that the dregs of the people are fleshed in being up to the elbows in blood, and ripping up bodies that lie prostrate at their feet, having no sense of any other valor:

"Et lupus, et turpes instant morientibus ursi, Et quæcunque minor nobilitate fera est" ²:

like cowardly curs, that in the house worry and tear the skins of wild beasts, they dare not come in the field. What is it in these times of ours that makes our quarrels mortal; and that, whereas our fathers had some degrees of revenge, we now begin with the last in ours, and at the first meeting nothing is to be said but, kill? What is this but cowardice?

Every one is sensible that there is more bravery and disdain in subduing an enemy, than in cutting his throat; and in making him yield, than in putting him to the sword: besides that the appetite of revenge is better satisfied and pleased because its only aim is to make itself felt. And this is the reason why we do not fall upon a beast or a stone when they hurt us, because they are not capable of being sensible of our revenge; and to kill a man is to save him from the injury and offense we intend him. And as Bias cried out to a wicked fellow, "I know that sooner or later thou wilt have thy reward, but I am afraid I shall not see it"; and pitied the Orchomenians that the penitence of Lycis- cus for the treason committed against them came at a season when there was no one remaining alive of those who had been interested in the offense, and whom the pleasure of this penitence should affect:

so revenge is to be pitied, when the person on whom it is executed is deprived of means of suffering under it: for as the avenger will look on to enjoy the pleasure of his revenge, so the person on whom he takes revenge should be a spectator too, to be afflicted and to repent. "He will repent it," we say and, because we have given him a pistol-shot through the head, do we imagine he will repent? On the contrary, if we but observe, we shall find, that he makes mouths at us in falling, and is so far from penitency, that he does not so much as repine at us; and we do him the kindest office of life, which is to make him die insensibly, and soon: we are afterward to hide ourselves, and to shift and fly from the officers of justice, who pursue us, while he is at rest. Killing is good to frustrate an offense to come, not to revenge one that is already past; and more an act of fear than of bravery; of precaution than of courage; of defense than of enterprise. It is manifest that by it we lose both the true end of revenge and the care of our reputation; we are afraid, if he lives he will do us another injury as great as the first; 'tis not out of animosity to him, but care of thyself, that thou gettest rid of him.

In the kingdom of Narsingua this expedient would be useless to us, where not only soldiers, but tradesmen also, end their differences by the sword. The king never denies the field to any who wish to fight; and, when they are persons of quality, he looks on, rewarding the victor with a chain of gold, for which any one who pleases may fight with him again, so that, by having come off from one combat, he has engaged himself in many.

If we thought by virtue to be always masters of our enemies, and to triumph over them at pleasure, we should be sorry they should escape from us as they do, by dying: but we have a mind to conquer, more with safety than honor, and, in our quarrel, more pursue the end than the glory.

Asinius Pollio who, as being a worthy man, was the less to be excused, committed a like error, when, having written a libel against Plancus, he forbore to publish it till he was dead; which is to bite one's thumb at a blind man, to rail at one who is deaf, to wound a man who has no feeling, rather than to run the hazard of his resentment. And it was also said of him, that it was only for hobgoblins to wrestle with the dead.

He who stays to see the author die, whose writings he intends to question, what does he say but that he is weak in his aggressiveness? It was told to Aristotle that some one had spoken ill of him: "Let him do more," said he, "let him whip me too, provided I am not there."

Our fathers contented themselves with revenging an insult with the lie, the lie with a box of the ear, and so forward; they were valiant enough not to fear their adversaries, living and provoked: we tremble for fear, so long as we see them on foot. And that this is so, does not our noble practice of these days, equally to prosecute to death both him that has offended us and him we have offended, make it out? 'Tis also a kind of cowardice that has introduced the custom of having seconds, thirds, and fourths in our duels; they were formerly duels; they are now skirmishes, rencontres, and battles. Solitude was, doubtless, terrible to those who were the first inventors of this practice, "Quum in se cuique minimum fiducia esset,"¹ for naturally, any company whatever is consolatory in danger. Third persons were formerly called in to prevent disorder and foul play only, and to be witness of the fortune of the combat; but now they have brought it to this pass that the witnesses themselves engage; whoever is invited cannot handsomely stand by as an idle spectator, for fear of being suspected either of want of affection or of courage. Besides the injustice and unworthiness of such an action, of engaging other strength and valor in the protection of your honor than your own,

I conceive it a disadvantage to a brave man, and who wholly relies upon himself, to shuffle his fortune with that of a second; every one runs hazard enough himself without hazarding for another, and has enough to do to assure himself in his own valor for the defense of his life, without intrusting a thing so dear in a third man's hand. For, if it be not expressly agreed upon before, to the contrary, 'tis a combined party of all four, and if your second be killed, you have two to deal withal, with good reason; and to say that it is foul play, it is so indeed, as it is, well armed, to attack a man who has but the hilt of a broken sword in his hand, or, clear and untouched, a man who is desperately wounded: but, if these be advantages you have got by fighting, you may make use of them without reproach. The disparity and inequality are only weighed and considered from the condition of the combatants when they began; as to the rest, you must take your chance; and though you had, alone, three enemies upon you at once, your two companions being killed, you have no more wrong done you, than I should do in a battle, by running a man through whom I should see engaged with one of our own men, with the like advantage. The nature of society will have it so that where there is troop against troop, as where our duke of Orleans challenged Henry, king of England, a hundred against a hundred; three hundred against as many, as the Argians against the Lacedæmonians; three to three, as the Horatii against the Curiatii, the multitude on either side is considered but as one single man; the hazard, wherever there is company, being confused and mixed.

I have a domestic interest in this discourse; for my brother, the Sieur de Matecoulom, was at Rome asked by a gentleman with whom he had no great acquaintance and who was a defendant challenged by another, to be his second; in this duel, he found himself matched with a gentleman much better known to him. (I would fain have an explanation of these rules of honor, which so often shock and confound those of reason.)

¹ "Since they had little confidence in themselves."

After having despatched his man, seeing the two principals still on foot and sound, he ran in to disengage his friend. What could he do less? should he have stood still, and, if chance would have ordered it so, have seen him he was come thither to defend killed before his face? what he had hitherto done helped not the business; the quarrel was yet undecided. The courtesy that you can, and certainly ought to show to your enemy, when you have reduced him to an ill condition and have a great advantage over him, I do not see how you can do it, where the interest of another is concerned, where you are only called in as an assistant, and the quarrel is none of yours; he could neither be just nor courteous, at the hazard of him he was there to serve. And he was therefore enlarged from the prisons of Italy at the speedy and solemn request of our king. Indiscreet nation! we are not content to make our vices and follies known to the world by report only, but we must go into foreign countries, there to show them what fools we are. Put three Frenchmen into the deserts of Libya, they will not live a month together without fighting; so that you would say this peregrination were a thing purposely designed to give foreigners the pleasure of our tragedies, and, for the most part, to such as rejoice and laugh at our miseries. We go into Italy to learn to fence, and fall to practice at the expense of our lives before we have learned it; and yet, by the rule of discipline, we should put the theory before the practice. We discover ourselves to be but learners:

"Primitiæ juvenum miseræ, bellique futuri Dura rudimenta."¹

I know that fencing is an art very useful to its end (in a duel between two princes, cousin-germans, in Spain, the elder, says Livy,² by his skill and dexterity in arms, easily overcoming the greater and more awkward strength of the younger), and of which the knowledge, as I experimentally know, has inspired some with courage above their natural measure; but this is not properly valor, because it supports itself upon address and is founded upon something besides itself. The honor of combat consists in the jealousy of courage and not of skill; and therefore I have known a friend of mine, famed as a great master in this exercise, in his quarrels make choice of such arms as might deprive him of this advantage and that wholly depended upon fortune and assurance, that they might not attribute his victory rather to his skill in fencing than his valor. When I was young, gentlemen avoided the reputation of good fencers as injurious to them, and learned to fence with all imaginable privacy as a trade of subtlety, derogating from true and natural valor.

"Non schivar, non parar, non ritirarsi,
Vogliono costor, nè qui destrezza ha parte;
Non danno i colpi or finti, or pieni, or

A mezzo il ferro; il piè d'orma non parte, Sempre è il piè fermo, e la man sempre in Nè scende taglio in van, nè punta à end; that teaches us to destroy one another against law and justice and that every way always produces very ill effects. It is much more worthy and more becoming to exercise ourselves in things that strengthen than that weaken our government and that tend to the public safety and common glory. Publius Rutilius, Consul, was the first who taught the soldiers to handle their arms with skill, and joined art with valor, not for the use of private quarrel, but for war and the quarrels of the people of Rome; a popular and civil defense. And besides the example of Cæsar, who commanded his men to shoot chiefly at the face of Pompey's soldiers in the battle of Pharsalia, a thousand other commanders have also bethought them to invent new forms of weapons and new ways of striking and defending, according as occasion should require.

But as Philopœmen¹ condemned wrestling, wherein he excelled, because the preparatives that were therein employed were differing from those that appertain to military discipline, to which alone he conceived men of honor ought wholly to apply themselves; so it seems to me that this address to which we form our limbs, those writhings and motions young men are taught in this new school, are not only of no use, but rather contrary and hurtful to the practice of fight in battle; and also our people commonly make use of particular weapons and peculiarly designed for duel; and I have known when it has been disapproved, that a gentleman challenged to fight with rapier and poniard appeared in the array of a man-at-arms; and that another should take his cloak instead of his poniard. It is worthy of consideration that Laches in Plato, speaking of a learning to fence after our manner, says that he never knew any great soldier come out of that school, especially the masters of it; and, indeed, as to them, our experience tells as much. As to the rest, we may at least conclude that they are qualities of no relation or correspondence; and in the education of the children of his government, Plato interdicts the art of boxing, introduced by Amycus and Epeius, and that of wrestling by Antæus and Cercyo, because they have another end than to render youth fit for the service of war and contribute nothing to it. But I see that I have somewhat strayed from my theme.

The Emperor Maurice,² being advertised by dreams and several prognostics, that one Phocas, an obscure soldier, should kill him, questioned his son-in-law Philip who this Phocas was, and what were his nature, qualities, and manners; and so soon as Philip, among other things, had told him that he was cowardly and timorous, the emperor immediately concluded then that he was a murderer and cruel. What is it that makes tyrants so sanguinary? 'Tis only the solicitude for their own safety, and that their faint hearts can furnish them with no other means of securing themselves than in exterminating those who may hurt them, even so much as women, for fear of a scratch:

"Cuncta ferit, dum cuncta timet."³

The first cruelties are exercised for themselves: thence springs the fear of a just revenge, which afterward produces a series of new cruelties, to obliterate one another. Philip, king of Macedon, who had so much to do with the people of Rome, agitated with the horror of so many murders committed by his order, and doubting of being able to keep himself secure from so many families, at divers times mortally injured and offended by him, resolved to seize all the children of those he had caused to be slain, to despatch them daily one after another, and so to establish his own repose.

Fine matter is never impertinent, however placed; and therefore I, who more consider the weight and utility of what I deliver than its order and connection, need not fear in this place to bring in an excellent story, though it be a little by-the-by; for when they are rich in their own native beauty, and are able to justify themselves, the least end of a hair will serve to draw them into my discourse.

Among others condemned by Philip, Herodicus, prince of Thessaly, had been one; he had moreover after him caused 10 his two sons-in-law to be put to death, each leaving a son very young behind him. Theoxena and Archo were their two widows. Theoxena, though highly courted to it, could not be persuaded to marry again: Archo married Poris, the greatest man among the Ænians, and by him had a great many children, whom she dying left at a very tender age. Theoxena, moved with a maternal charity toward her nephews, that she might have them under 20 her own eyes and in her own protection, married Poris: when presently comes a proclamation of the king's edict. This brave spirited mother, suspecting the 25 cruelty of Philip, and afraid of the insolence of the soldiers toward these charming and tender children, was so bold as to declare that she would rather kill them with her own hands than deliver them. 30 Poris, startled at this protestation, promised her to steal them away, and to transport them to Athens, and there commit them to the custody of some faithful friends of his. They took, therefore, the 35 opportunity of an annual feast which was celebrated at Ænia¹ in honor of Æneas, and thither they went. Having appeared by day at the public ceremonies and banquet, they stole the night following into a 40 vessel laid ready for the purpose, to escape away by sea. The wind proved contrary, and finding themselves in the morning within sight of the land whence they had launched over night, and being pursued 45 by the guards of the port, Poris, perceiving this, labored all he could to make the mariners do their utmost to escape from the pursuers. But Theoxena, frantic with affection and revenge, in pursuance of her 50 former resolution, prepared both weapons and poison, and exposing them before them; "Go to, my children," said she, "death is now the only means of your defense and liberty, and shall administer occasion to the gods to exercise their sacred 5 justice: these sharp swords, and these full cups, will open you the way into it: courage, fear nothing! And thou, my son, who art the eldest, take this steel into thy hand, that thou mayest the more bravely 10 die." The children having on one side so powerful a counselor, and the enemy at their throats on the other, ran all of them eagerly upon what was next to hand; and, half dead, were thrown into the sea. 15 Theoxena, proud of having so gloriously provided for the safety of her children, clasping her arms with great affection about her husband's neck, "Let us, my friend, follow these boys, and enjoy the same sepulcher they do"; and so, having 20 embraced, they threw themselves headlong into the sea; so that the ship was carried back without the owners into the harbor.

Tyrants, at once both to kill and to 25 make their anger felt, have pumped their wit to invent the most lingering deaths. They will have their enemies despatched, but not so fast that they may not have leisure to taste their vengeance. And, 30 therein, they are mightily perplexed; for, if the torments they inflict are violent, they are short; if long, they are not then so painful as they desire; and thus plague themselves in choice of the greatest 35 cruelty. Of this we have a thousand examples in antiquity, and I know not whether we, unawares, do not retain some traces of this barbarity.

All that exceeds a simple death appears 40 to me absolute cruelty. Our justice cannot expect that he, whom the fear of dying by being beheaded or hanged will not restrain, should be any more awed by the imagination of a languishing fire, pincers, 45 or the wheel. And I know not, in the meantime, whether we do not throw them into despair; for in what condition can be the soul of a man, expecting four and twenty hours together to be broken upon 50 a wheel, or, after the old way, nailed to a cross. Josephus² relates that, in the time of the war the Romans made in Judæa, happening to pass by where they had three days before crucified certain Jews, he among them knew three of his own friends, and obtained the favor of having them taken down, of whom two, he says, died, the third lived a great while after.

Chalcondylas, a writer of good credit, in the records he has left behind him of things that happened in his time, and near him, tells us, as of the most excessive torment, of that the Emperor¹ Mohammed very often practiced, of cutting off men in the middle by the diaphragm with one blow of a scimitar, whence it followed that they died as it were two deaths at once; and both the one part, says he, and the other were seen to stir and strive a great while after in very great torment. I do not think there was any great suffering in this motion: the torments that are the most dreadful to look on are not always the greatest to endure; and I find those that other historians relate to have been practiced by him upon the Epiriot² lords are more horrid and cruel, where they were condemned to be flayed alive piece-meal, after so malicious a manner that they continued fifteen days in that misery.

As also these other two following: Crœsus,³ having caused a gentleman, the favorite of his brother Pantaleon, to be seized, carried him into a fuller's shop, where he caused him to be scratched and carded with the cards and combs belonging to that trade till he died. George Sechel, chief commander of the peasants of Poland, who committed so many mischiefs under the title of the Crusade, being defeated in battle and taken by the Vayvod of Transylvania, was three days bound naked upon the rack, exposed to all sorts of torments that any one could contrive against him; during which time many other prisoners were kept fasting; in the end, he living and looking on, they made his beloved brother Lucat, for whom alone he entreated, taking upon himself the blame of all their evil actions, drink his blood, and caused twenty of his most favored captains to feed upon him, tearing his flesh in pieces with their teeth, and swallowing the morsels. The remainder of his body and his bowels, so soon as he was dead, were boiled, and others of his followers compelled to eat them.

PROSE NARRATIVE

ITALIAN

MATTEO BANDELLO

(1480-1561)

Among the various Italian story-tellers who contributed to the literary life of the Renaissance in general and to the development of the novel in particular, Bandello is probably, after Boccaccio, the best known to English readers. He was a Dominican from Lombardy who held several high offices in the church, and yet found time to write about ninety novelettes (novelle). Although the distinctly local color in his language apparently repelled such of his countrymen as resided outside his district, his tales seem to have been highly prized by both French and English.

The story of Romeo and Julietta printed in this volume is a translation of Bandello's Italian version and was published by William Painter in his famous collection entitled the Palace of Pleasure (1566-67). A poem on the same tragic theme was published in English by Arthur Brooke in 1562. Other versions which preceded and help to explain Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet are an Italian account by Luigi da Porto (about 1530) and a French translation of Bandello published by Boisteau in 1559. Bandello's story is included here as an example of the Italian novella, a type of literature that sprang into great prominence in Italy during the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries and invaded England in great numbers. The novella has in it many of the characteristics that came later to distinguish the novel as a separate form; and, although many novelle are fully worth reading for their own sake, they are perhaps most interesting because of their use by Shakespeare and others in the composition of some of the world's greatest literary masterpieces. The novella, as a rule, lacks the interest in the problems of humanity necessary to really great literature. The interest of the writer is primarily in plot, or perhaps in direct and rather obvious edification. He appeals to the reader by setting forth events of sensational cruelty or licentiousness or of appealing novelty.

The selection is taken from An Elizabethan Story-Book, London, Longmans, Green and Co., 1928.

ROMEO AND JULIETTA

The goodly history of the true and constant love between Romeo and Julietta, the one of whom died of poison, and the other of sorrow and heaviness: wherein be comprised many adventures of love, and other devices touching the same.

I am sure that they which measure the greatness of God's works according to the capacity of their rude and simple understanding will not lightly adhibit credit unto this history, so well for the variety of strange accidents which be therein described, as for the novelty of so rare and perfect amity. But they that have read

Pliny, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch and divers other writers, do find that in old time a great number of men and women have died, some of excessive joy, some of overmuch sorrow, and some of other passions: and amongst the same, love is not the least, which when it seizeth upon any kind and gentle subject, and findeth no resistance to serve for a rampart to stay the violence of his course, by little and little undermineth, melteth and consumeth the virtues of natural powers in such wise as the spirit yielding to the burden abandoneth the place of life: which is verified by the pitiful and unfortunate death of two lovers that surrendered their last breath in one tomb at Verona, a city of Italy, wherein repose yet to this day (with great marvel) the bones and remnants of their late loving bodies: an history no less wonderful than true. If then particular affection, which of good right every man ought to bear to the place where he was born, do not deceive those that travel, I think they will confess with me, that few cities in Italy can surpass the said city of Verona, as well for the navigable river called Adissa, which passeth almost through the midst of the same, and thereby a great traffic into Almaine,¹ as also for the prospect towards the fertile mountains and pleasant valleys which do environ the same, with a great number of very clear and lively fountains, that serve for the ease and commodity of the place. Omitting (besides many other singularities) four bridges, and an infinite number of other honourable antiquities daily apparent unto those that be curious to view and look upon them. Which places I have somewhat touched, because this most true history, which I purpose hereafter to recite, dependeth thereupon, the memory whereof to this day is so well known at Verona, as uneths² their blubbered eyes be yet dry, that saw and beheld that lamentable sight. When the Senior Escala was Lord of Verona, there were two families in the city, of far greater fame than the rest, as well for riches as nobility: the one called the Montesches, and the other the Capellets: but like as most commonly there is discord amongst them which be of semblable degree in honour, even so there happened a certain enmity between them: and for so much as the beginning thereof was unlawful and of ill foundation, so likewise in process of time it kindled to such flame as, by divers and sundry devices practised on both sides, many lost their lives. The Lord Bartholomew of Escala (of whom we have already spoken), being Lord of Verona, and seeing such disorder in his commonweal, assayed divers and sundry ways to reconcile those two houses, but all in vain: for their hatred had taken such root, as the same could not be moderated by any wise counsel or good advice: between whom no other thing could be accorded, but giving over armour and weapon for the time, attending some other season more convenient, and with better leisure to appease the rest. In the time that these things were a-doing, one of the family of Montesches called Romeo, of the age of twenty or twenty-one years, the comeliest and best conditioned gentleman that was amongst the Veronian youth, fell in love with a young gentlewoman of Verona, and in few days was attached with her beauty and good behaviour, as he abandoned all other affairs and business, to serve and honour her: and after many letters, ambassades and presents, he determined in the end to speak unto her, and to disclose his passions, which he did without any other practice. But she which was virtuously brought up knew how to make him so good answer to cut off his amorous affections, as he had no lust after that time to return any more, and showed herself so austere and sharp of speech, as she vouchsafed not with one look to behold him. But how much the young gentleman saw her whist³ and silent, the more he was inflamed: and, after he had continued certain months in that service without remedy of his grief, he determined in the end to depart Verona, for proof if by change of the place he might alter his affection, saying to himself: "What do I mean to love one that is so unkind, and thus doth disdain me: I am all her own and yet she flieth from me: I can no longer live except her presence I do enjoy: and she hath no contented mind, but when she is furthest from me: I will then from henceforth estrange myself from her, for it may so come to pass by not beholding her, that this fire in me which taketh increase and nourishment by her fair eyes by little and little may die and quench." But minding to put in proof what he thought, at one instant he was reduced to the contrary, who, not knowing whereupon to resolve, passed days and nights in marvellous complaints and lamentations: for love vexed him so near, and had so well fixed the gentlewoman's beauty within the bowels of his heart and mind as, not able to resist, he fainted with the charge, and consumed by little and little as the snow against the sun: whereof his parents and kindred did marvel greatly, bewailing his misfortune, but, above all other, one of his companions of riper age and counsel than he began sharply to rebuke him: for the love that he bare him was so great as he felt his martyrdom and was partaker of his passion: which caused him by oft viewing his friend's disquietness in amorous pangs to say thus unto him: "Romeo, I marvel much that thou spendest the best time of thine age in pursuit of a thing from which thou seest thyself despised and banished, without respect either to thy prodigal dispense, to thine honour, to thy tears, or to thy miserable life, which be able to move the most constant to pity: wherefore I pray thee for the love of our ancient amity and for thine health's sake, that thou wilt learn to be thine own man, and not to alienate thy liberty to any so ingrate as she is: for so far as I conjecture by things that are passed between you, either she is in love with some other, or else, determineth never to love any. Thou art young, rich in goods and fortune, and more excellent in beauty than any gentleman in this city: thou art well learned, and the only son of the house whereof thou comest: what grief would it be to thy poor old father and other thy parents, to see thee so drowned in this dungeon of vice, specially at that age wherein thou oughtest rather to put them in some hope of thy virtue? Begin then from henceforth to acknowledge thine error wherein thou hast hitherto lived, do away that amorous veil or coverture which blindeth thine eyes and letteth¹ thee from following the right path, wherein thine ancestors have walked: or else, if thou do feel thyself so subject to thine own will, yield thy heart to some other place, and choose some mistress according to thy worthiness, and henceforth do not sow thy pains in a soil so barren whereof thou reapest no fruit: the time approacheth when all the dames of the city shall assemble, where thou mayst behold such one as shall make thee forget thy former griefs." This young gentleman, attentively hearing all the persuading reasons of his friend, began somewhat to moderate that heat, and to acknowledge all the exhortations which he had made to be directed to good purpose: and then determined to put them in proof, and to be present indifferently at all the feasts and assemblies of the city, without bearing affection more to one woman than to another: and continued in this manner of life two or three months, thinking by that means to quench the sparks of ancient flames. It chanced then within few days after, about the feast of Christmas, when feasts and banquets most commonly be used, and masques according to the custom frequented, that Anthony Capellet, being the chief of that family and one of the principal lords of the city too, made a banquet, and, for the better solemnization thereof, invited all the noble men and dames, to which feast resorted the most part of the youth of Verona. The family of the Capellets (as we have declared in the beginning of this history) was at variance with the Montescches, which was the cause that none of that family repaired to that banquet, but only the young gentleman Romeo, who came in a masque after supper with certain other young gentlemen: and after they had remained a certain space with their visards on, at length they did put off the same, and Romeo very shamefast withdrew himself into a corner of the hall: but, by reason of the light of the torches which burned very bright, he was by and by known and looked upon of the whole company, but specially of the ladies, for, besides his native beauty wherewith nature had adorned him, they marvelled at his audacity how he durst presume to enter so secretly into the house of that family which had little cause to do him any good. Notwithstanding, the Capellets dissembling their malice, either for the honour of the company or else for respect of his age, did not misuse him either in word or deed: by means whereof with free liberty he beheld and viewed the ladies at his pleasure, which he did so well and with grace

so good, as there was none but did very well like the presence of his person: and, after he had particularly given judgment upon the excellency of each one, according to his affection, he saw one gentlewoman amongst the rest of surpassing beauty who (although he had never seen her heretofore) pleased him above the rest, and attributed unto her in heart the chiefest place for all perfection in beauty: and 10 feasting her incessantly with piteous looks, the love which he bare to his first gentlewoman was overcome with this new fire, that took such nourishment and vigour in his heart, as he was not able never to 15 quench the same but by death only: as you may understand by one of the strangest discourses that ever any mortal man devised. The young Romeo, then feeling himself thus tossed with this new tempest, 20 could not tell what countenance to use, but was so surprised and changed with these last flames, as he had almost forgotten himself, in such wise as he had not audacity to enquire what she was, and 25 wholly bent himself to feed his eyes with her sight, wherewith he moistened the sweet amorous venom which did so empoison him as he ended his days with a kind of most cruel death. The gentle- 30 woman that did put Romeo to such pain was called Julietta, and was the daughter of Capellet, the master of the house where that assembly was, who, as her eyes did roll and wander to and fro, by chance 35 espied Romeo, which unto her seemed to be the goodliest personage that ever she saw: and love (which lay in wait never until that time), assailing the tender heart of that young gentlewoman, touched her 40 so at the quick, as for any resistance she could make, was not able to defend his forces, and then began to set at naught the royalties of the feast, and felt no pleasure in her heart, but when she had a glimpse 45 by throwing or receiving some sight or look of Romeo. And after they had contented each other's troubled heart with millions of amorous looks which oftentimes interchangeably encountered and 50 met together, the burning beams gave sufficient testimony of love's privy onsets. Love having made the heart's breach of those two lovers, as they two sought means to speak together, fortune offered them a very meet and apt occasion. A certain lord of that troop and company took Julietta by the hand to dance, wherein she behaved herself so well and with so excellent grace, as she won that day the prize of honour from all the damsels of Verona. Romeo, having foreseen the place where- 55 unto she minded to retire, approached the same, and so discreetly used the matter, as he found the means at her return to sit beside her: Julietta, when the dance was finished, returned to the very place where she was set before, and was placed between Romeo and another gentleman called Mercutio, which was a court-like gentleman, very well beloved of all men, and by reason of his pleasant and courteous be- 60 haviour was in every company well entertained. Mercutio that was of audacity among maidens, as a lion is among lambs, seized incontinently upon the hand of Julietta whose hands wontedly were so cold both in winter and summer as the mountain ice, although the fire's heat did warm the same. Romeo which sat upon the left side of Julietta, seeing that Mer- 65 cutio held her by the right hand, took her by the other that he might not be deceived of his purpose, and straining the same a little, he felt himself so pressed with that new favour, as he remained mute, not able to answer: but she perceiving by his change of colour, that the fault proceeded of the vehemence of love desiring to speak unto him, turned herself towards him, and with trembling voice joined with virginal shamefastness, intermeddled with a certain 70 bashfulness, said to him: "Blessed be the hour of your near approach": but minding to proceed in further talk, love had so closed up her mouth, as she was not able to end her tale. Whereunto the young gentleman all ravished with joy and contentation, sighing, asked her what was the cause of that right fortunate blessing: Julietta, somewhat more emboldened, with pitiful look and smiling countenance, 75 said unto him: "Sir, do not marvel if I do bless your coming hither, because Sir Mercutio a good time with frosty hand hath wholly frozen mine, and you of your courtesy have warmed the same again." Whereunto immediately Romeo replied: "Madam, if the heavens have been so favourable to employ me to do you some agreeable service, being repaired hither by chance amongst other gentlemen, I esteem the same well bestowed, craving no greater benefit for satisfaction of all my contentations received in this world, than to serve, obey and honour you so long as my life doth last, as experience shall yield more ample proof when it shall please you to give further assay: moreover, if you have received any heat by touch of my hand, you may be well assured that those flames be dead in respect of the lively sparks and violent fire which sorteth from your fair eyes, which fire hath so fiercely inflamed all the most sensible parts of my body as, if I be not succoured by the favour of your good graces, I do attend the time to be consumed to dust." Scarce had he made an end of those last words but the dance of the torch was at an end: whereby Julietta, which wholly burnt in love, straitly clasping her hand with his, had no leisure to make other answer, but softly thus to say: "My dear friend, I know not what other assured witness you desire of love, but that I let you understand that you be no more your own, than I am yours, being ready and disposed to obey you so far as honour shall permit, beseeching you for the present time to content yourself with this answer, until some other season meeter to communicate more secretly of our affairs." Romeo, seeing himself pressed to part of the company, and for that he knew not by what means he might see her again that was his life and death, demanded of one of his friends what she was, who made answer that she was the daughter of Capellet, the lord of the house, and master of that day's feast (who, wroth beyond measure that Fortune had sent him to so dangerous a place, thought it impossible to bring to end his enterprise begun). Julietta, covetous on the other side, to know what young gentleman he was which had so courteously entertained her that night, and of whom she felt the new wound in her heart, called an old gentlewoman of honour which had nursed her and brought her up, unto whom she said leaning upon her shoulder: "Mother, what two young gentlemen be they which first go forth with the two torches before them?" Unto whom the old gentlewoman told the name of the houses whereof they came. Then she asked her again, what young gentleman that was which holdeth the visard in his hand, with the damask cloak about him. "It is," quoth she, "Romeo Montesche, the son of your father's capital enemy and deadly foe to all your kin." But the maiden at the only name of Montesche was altogether amazed, despairing for ever to attain to husband her great affectioned friend Romeo, for the ancient hatreds between those two families. Nevertheless she knew so well how to dissemble her grief and discontented mind, as the old gentlewoman perceived nothing, who then began to persuade her to retire into her chamber: whom she obeyed, and being in bed, thinking to take her wonted rest, a great tempest of divers thoughts began to environ and trouble her mind, in such wise as she was not able to close her eyes, but, turning here and there, fantasied divers things in her thought, sometimes purposed to cut off the whole attempt of that amorous practice, sometimes to continue the same. Thus was the poor pucelle¹ vexed with two contraries, the one comforted her to pursue her intent, the other proposed the imminent peril whereunto indiscreetly she headlong threw herself: and, after she had wandered of long time in this amorous labyrinth, she knew not whereupon to resolve, but wept incessantly, and accused herself, saying: "Ah, caitiff and miserable creature, from whence do rise these unaccustomed travails which I feel in mind, provoking me to lose my rest: but unfortunate wretch, what do I know if that young gentleman do love me as he saith? It may be under the veil of sugared words he goeth about to steal away mine honour, to be revenged of my parents which have offended his, and by that means to my everlasting reproach to make me the fable of the Verona people." Afterwards suddenly as she condemned that which she suspected in the beginning, said: "Is it possible that, under such beauty and rare comeliness, disloyalty and treason may have their siege and lodging? If it be true that the face is the faithful messenger of the mind's conceit, I may be assured that he doth love me: for I marked so many changed colours in his face in time of his talk with me, and saw him so transported and beside himself, as I cannot wish any other more certain luck of love, wherein I will persist immutable to the last gasp of life, to the intent I may have him to be my husband: for it may so come to pass, as this new alliance shall engender a perpetual peace and amity between his house and mine." Arresting then upon this determination still, as she saw Romeo passing before her father's gate, she showed herself with merry countenance, and followed him so with look of eye, until she had lost sight. And continuing this manner of life for certain days, Romeo, not able to content himself with looks, daily did behold and mark the situation of the house, and one day amongst others he espied Julietta at her chamber window, bounding upon a narrow lane, right over against which chamber he had a garden which was the cause that Romeo, fearing discovery of their love, began the day time to pass no more before the gate, but so soon as the night with his brown mantle had covered the earth, he walked alone up and down that little street: and after he had been there many times, missing the chiefest cause of his coming, Julietta, impatient of her evil, one night repaired to her window, and perceived through the brightness of the moon her friend Romeo under her window, no less attended for, than he himself was waiting. Then she, secretly with tears in her eyes and with voice interrupted by sighs, said: "Signor Romeo, methinks that you hazard your person too much, and commit the same into great danger at this time of the night, to protrude yourself to the mercy of them which mean you little good. Who if they had taken would have cut you in pieces, and mine honour (which I esteem dearer than my life) hindered and suspected for ever." "Madam," answered Romeo, "my life is in the hand of God, who only can dispose the same: howbeit if any man had sought means to bereave me of my life, I should (in the presence of you) have made him known what mine ability had been to defend the same. Notwithstanding life is not so dear, and of such estimation with me, but that I could vouchsafe to sacrifice the same for your sake: and although my mishap had been so great, as to be dispatched in that place, yet had I no cause to be sorry therefore, except it had been by losing the means and way how to make you understand the good will and duty which I bear you, desiring not to conserve the same for any commodity that I hope to have thereby, nor for any other respect, but only to love, serve, and honour you, so long as breath shall remain in me." So soon as he had made an end of his talk, love and pity had begun to seize upon the heart of Julietta, and leaning her head upon her hand, having her face all besprent with tears, she said unto Romeo: "Sir Romeo, I pray you not to renew that grief again: for the only memory of such inconvenience maketh me to counterpoise between death and life, my heart being so united with yours, as you cannot receive the least injury in this world, wherein I shall not be so great a partaker as yourself: beseeching you for conclusion, that if you desire your own health and mine, to declare unto me in few words what your determination is to attain: for if you covet any other secret thing at my hands, more than mine honour can well allow, you are marvellously deceived: but if your desire be godly, and that the friendship which you protest to bear me be founded upon virtue, and to be concluded by marriage, receiving me for your wife and lawful spouse, you shall have such part in me, as whereof without any regard to the obedience and reverence that I owe to my parents, or to the ancient enmity of our families, I will make you the only lord and master over me, and of all the things that I possess, being prest and ready in all points to follow your commandment: but if your intent be otherwise, and think to reap the fruit of my virginity, under pretence of wanton amity, you be greatly deceived, and do pray you to avoid and suffer me from henceforth to live and rest amongst mine equals." Romeo which looked for none other thing, holding up his hands to the heavens, with incredible joy and contentation, answered: "Madam, forasmuch as it hath pleased you to do me that honour to accept me for such a one, I accord and consent to your request, and do offer unto you the best part of my heart, which shall remain with you for gage and sure testimony of my saying, until such time as God shall give me leave to make you the entire owner and possessor of the same. And to the intent I may begin mine enterprise, tomorrow I will to the Friar Lawrence for counsel in the same, who besides that he is my ghostly¹ father is accustomed to give me instruction in all my other secret affairs, and fail not (if you please) to meet me again in this place at this very hour, to the intent I may give you to understand the device between him and me." Which she liked very well, and ended their talk for that time, Romeo receiving none other favour at her hands for that night, but only words. This Friar Lawrence, of whom hereafter we shall make more ample mention, was an ancient Doctor of Divinity, of the order of the Friars Minors,² who, besides the happy profession which he had made in study of holy writ, was very skilful in philosophy, and a great searcher of nature's secrets, and exceeding famous in magic knowledge, and other hidden and secret sciences, which nothing diminished his reputation, because he did not abuse the same. And this friar, through his virtue and piety, had so well won the citizens' hearts of Verona, as he was almost the confessor to them all, and of all men generally revered and beloved: and many times for his great prudence was called by the lords of the city to the hearing of their weighty causes. And amongst other he was greatly favoured by the Lord of Escala, that time the principal governor of Verona, and of all the family of Monteches, and of the Capellets and of many other. The young Romeo (as we have already declared), from his tender age, bare a certain particular amity to Friar Lawrence, and departed to him his secrets, by means whereof, so soon as he was gone from Julietta, went straight to the Friars Franciscans, where from point to point he discoursed the success of his love to that good father, and the conclusion of marriage between him and Julietta, adding, upon the end of talk, that he would rather choose shameful death, than to fail her of his promise. To whom the good friar after he had debated divers matters, and proposed all the inconveniences of that secret marriage, exhorted him to more mature deliberation of the same: notwithstanding, all the alleged persuasions were not able to revoke his promise. Wherefore the friar, vanquished with his stubbornness and also forecasting in his mind that the marriage might be some means of reconciliation of those two houses, in the end agreed to his request, entreating him that he might have one day's respite for leisure to excogitate what was best to be done. But if Romeo was careful for his part to provide for his affairs, Julietta likewise did her endeavour. For seeing that she had none about her to whom she might discover her passions, she devised to impart the whole to her nurse which lay in her chamber, appointed to wait upon her, to whom she committed the entire secrets of the love between Romeo and her. And although the old woman in the beginning resisted Julietta her intent, yet in the end she knew so well how to persuade and win her, that she promised in all that she was able to do, to be at her commandment. And then she sent her with all diligence to speak to Romeo, and to know of him by what means they might be married, and that he would do her to understand the determination between Friar Lawrence and him. Whom Romeo answered, how the first day wherein he had informed Friar Lawrence of the matter, the said Friar deferred answer until the next, which was the very same, and that it was not past one hour sithence he returned with final resolution, and that Friar Lawrence and he had devised, that she the Saturday
